PREFACE.

THIS WORK is designed to furnish, in the form of a Biographical Dictionary, a complete collection of materials for the History of the Christian Church from the time of the Apostles to the age of Charlemagne, in every branch of this great subject except that of Christian Antiquities. Those Antiquities have been treated in a separate Work,* and the two Dictionaries are to be regarded as forming parts of one comprehensive Cyclopaedia of Ecclesiastical History for the first eight centuries of the Christian Era. The present Work, like its companion, commences at the period at which the Dictionary of the Bible leaves off, and forms a continuation of it; and it ceases at the age of Charlemagne, because the reign of that monarch forms a recognised link between ancient and modern times. The Biography and Literature of the Ages that followed, no less than their Institutions, Arts, and Customs, afford abundant matter for a separate book.

It is the object of this Dictionary, speaking generally, to supply an adequate account, based upon original authorities, of all persons connected with the History of the Church within the period treated concerning whom anything is known, of the Literature connected with them, and of the controversies respecting Doctrine or Discipline in which they were engaged. From the Articles on Doctrine we have carefully excluded subjects of controversy which arose at a later date than the period with which the Dictionary deals; so that doctrinal terms which became matter of dispute only in the Middle Ages, or at the Reformation, are not discussed in these pages. Our object has been to treat these subjects from a purely historical point of view, and simply to give an impartial account of what was believed, thought, and done in the early ages of Christianity, without entering upon the disputable conclusions drawn from these facts by various schools or parties. Though it would be too much to hope that these principles have been applied with uniform strictness, we can at least assert that throughout the composition and revision of the Work they have been diligently kept in view.

It will readily be understood with respect to an undertaking of this comprehensive nature, dealing with extremely varied and often very obscure periods of Church history, that experience alone could determine the precise limits within which it should be confined and the best method of conducting it. At one time the intention was entertained of exhibiting a complete Onomasticon of the Christian world for the first eight centuries; but it was found that to aim at such an ideal would delay the Work indefinitely. We therefore found it desirable to adopt another standard which, without falling very far short of the former, would render the Dictionary complete for all practical purposes. The labours of great foreign scholars since the Reformation, particularly of Baronius, of Tillemont, of Ceillier, and of more recent French and German authors, have brought together nearly all the primary materials for the general Church history of our period; and similarly grand collections have been made for the Church history of particular nations. It was thought that if these labours were taken as our starting-point, and if an effort were made to ensure that all the materials afforded in these voluminous collections were verified, utilised, and brought within practicable compass, we should at least have carried the work done by our predecessors an important step forward, and should have placed within the reach of general readers whatever is essential to the study of Church history. In the execution of this plan the authorities have been investigated afresh, with the aid of the light thrown upon them by modern learning, and care has been taken that our accounts should, as far as possible, be derived immediately from the original sources. Particular attention has of course been paid to the chief Fathers of the Church, and they have been made the subject of special studies by some of our principal contributors. All persons mentioned in their works have been noticed, whether Christians or not, and accordingly Roman Emperors and pagan writers have been admitted in our pages, so far as they influenced the external fortunes or the thought of the Church.

We think, therefore, it may justly be claimed for this Work that, with the aid of great scholars of former times as well as of our own, it presents to the public a more complete collection of materials for the Ecclesiastical History of the important period with which it deals than has hitherto been produced either in England or abroad; and we venture to hope that, with the companion Work on Antiquities, it may vindicate for English scholarship a higher place in this field of learning than has hitherto been attained. At the same time it will be understood from what has been said that, as the plan of the Dictionary was only gradually formed, some inequality will be found in the treatment of the subject in the present volume, especially in the earlier part. In consequence, moreover, of the unavoidably long period over which the preparation of the volume has extended, some of the earlier articles may need to be supplemented with information which has been brought to light since they were printed. All such defects will be remedied in a Supplement, to be published at the conclusion of the Work, which will also afford an opportunity for correcting those errors or errata which, in a first edition, will be admitted to be unavoidable.

It should further be explained that special attention has been paid to the Church History of England, Scotland, and Ireland; and in this department of the Work the same plan has in substance been followed. The great historical collection known as the Monumenta Historica Britannica, Sir Thomas Duffus Hardy's Descriptive Catalogue of Materials relative to the History of Great Britain and Ireland, and the important volumes by Professor Stubbs and the late Mr. Haddan entitled Councils and Ecclesiastical Documents relating to Great Britain and Ireland have been diligently consulted, and authorities quoted by them have been, as far as possible, minutely examined. A scale has been allowed for the treatment of names in this portion of the Work which would have been, perhaps, impracticable in respect to other countries. Without including, as would have been necessary in a complete Onomasticon, all the names which might be collected from the signatures to charters and other public documents, we have endeavoured to notice every person bearing an ecclesiastical designation or office, and every person of royal rank, as it is impossible in these early ages to separate ecclesiastical from political history. Dugdale's Monasticon and similar works have, for this purpose, been carefully examined. The Church History of Scotland and Ireland was entrusted to the late Bishop of Brechin, and since his death has, in the main, been committed to the clergyman by whom, under the Bishop's superintendence, the actual work had previously been executed.

It would not have been convenient for the reader, even if it had been practicable, to apply rigidly a uniform principle to the spelling of proper names. Where an abbreviated or modified orthography has become naturalised in English, we have usually retained it in the heading of an article; taking care, however, to give the more correct form, and a cross reference when necessary. Contributors have been left to name the editions from which they quote; but as a rule, when nothing is said to the contrary, the Fathers are quoted according to the standard pagination, which is marked in large figures in the text of Migne's edition. It may also be as well to mention that Ceillier is generally referred to in the very useful edition published in Paris between 1858 and 1869.

When the plan of this Christian Cyclopaedia was formed, the editorship of the portion comprised in these volumes was placed in the hands of Professors Lightfoot and Westcott, under the general superintendence of Dr. William Smith, and the Work owes much to the labour which was at first bestowed upon it by those two distinguished scholars. The pressure of other engagements compelled them before long to relinquish this task, but their subsequent co-operation and advice, so far as their time has allowed them to afford it, claims the best thanks of the present Editors. On their retirement, Dr. William Smith assumed the editorship as far as the end of the articles in B; but from the commencement of the articles in C Professor Wace has acted as Editor, with the advice and assistance of Dr. Smith.

In conclusion, while gratefully acknowledging the hearty co-operation of all their contributors, without which the production of any such work would have been impossible, the Editors are bound to express their special obligations in two instances. Their first acknowledgments are due to Dr. Salmon, the Regius Professor of Divinity in Trinity College, Dublin, who, in addition to contributing many important articles, had the generosity to volunteer at the last moment to read through the latter and the larger part of the proof sheets; and the Editors cannot sufficiently express their sense of the advantage the Work has derived from his learned supervision. Their other acknowledgments must be tendered to the Rev. Charles Hole, the author of a Brief Biographical Dictionary, well known to historical students. The completeness with which, as the Editors hope, English Ecclesiastical History has been treated in this volume is in great measure due to the accurate labours of Mr. Hole. They have also to thank him for invaluable assistance in revising the proofs, and in making those supplementary investigations by which alone a Dictionary of this kind can be rendered trustworthy.

ABBANUS

ABBANUS (St.), of Cill-Abbain, in Uí-Muireadhaigh (co. Meath), and of Magh-Arnuidhe in Uí-Ceinseallaigh (co. Wexford), Irish abbats, in the 5th and 6th centuries. The editor of the life in the Acta Sanctorum (Bruxellis, 1867, folio) unravels the confusion which has hitherto existed on the subject, by discriminating between two saints of the same name, both of the royal family of Leinster. The earlier must be St. Abbau of Cill-Abbain, originally named Blath, son of the sister of St. Ibar the contemporary of St. Patrick in the 5th century, and commemorated in the Calendars on the 16th of March. Of him nothing certain is known. The later one is then St. Abban of Magh-Arnuidhe, son of the sister of St. Coemgen, in the 6th century, and commemorated on the 27th of October. Two Latin and two Irish lives have been preserved, but all based upon one professing to have been written by a great-grandson of one whom St. Abban had baptized. Twenty monasteries are mentioned as having been founded by the saint, almost all in the southern half of Ireland.

(O'Clery, Martyrol. Dungall., ed. Todd and Reeves; Colgan, Acta SS. Hiberniæ; Acta SS. Octobris, tom. xii. p. 270.) [H. B.]

ABDA, or ABDAS, bishop of SUSA (Theophanes, Chronogr. sub an. 406), called by Socrates (vii. 8) bishop of Persia. He is said to have assisted Maruthas in driving a demon out of the son of Isdegerdes or Yezdegerd, king of Persia. Theodoret (v. 39) relates that his zeal led him to destroy a fire-temple, which roused a persecution against the Christians, to which he himself fell a victim. Assemani saw a splendid MS. of the Acts of Abdas in the Syrian monastery at Scete, while he was making a tour of the Nitrian desert (B. O. i. 176, 177, 181; iii. 19). In another passage (ii. 401) he calls him Abda, bishop of the Huzitæ. In Socrates (vii. 8) his name is corrupted into Ἀνδᾶ, and Epiphanius Scholasticus calls him Ἀβλαάτης. [W. A. W.]

ABDIAS. Under the name of Abdias, whom the legend makes first bishop of Babylon, a collection of apocryphal Acts of Apostles, written in Latin and bearing the general title Historia Certaminis Apostolici or Historiæ Apostolicæ, has come down to us. It is distributed into ten books, and comprises the Acts of the Apostles Peter, Paul, Andrew, James the son of Zebedee, John, James the son of Alphaeus, Simon and Jude, Matthew, Bartholomew, Thomas, and Philip. The work is introduced by a preface which pretends to have been written by the historian Africanus, i.e. the celebrated chronographer Julius Africanus, who was contemporary with Origen. The 'Acts' which follow are alleged to have been originally written in Hebrew by Abdias, a companion of the two Apostles St. Simon and St. Jude, and first bishop of Babylon, to have been translated by his disciple Eutropius into Greek, and to have been thence rendered into Latin by Africanus, and distributed by him into ten books, so that each Apostle had a book to himself. This order is actually observed in the work before us, with the exception only of the sixth book, which, besides the Acts of James the Just, contains those also of his alleged step-brothers, St. Simon and St. Jude. The authorship of these last is however attributed not to Abdias himself, but to another disciple of the two apostles, who is called Craton (Hist. Apostol. vi. 20), and from whose work, which is also said to have consisted of ten books, and to have been translated into Latin by Africanus, an extract is inserted here. The conjecture of former critics that at vi. 20 we must still read Abdias and not Craton, or that the whole work before us may have circulated sometimes under the one name and sometimes under the other, is erroneous. Abdias indeed is mentioned in the same connection in which the work of Craton is referred to, but in such a way as to exclude the possibility of his being regarded as the author of that work. According to this apocryphal writer's statement, the two Apostles Simon and Jude, after ordaining Abdias bishop of Babylon, take their journey into Persia, and for the space of thirteen years traverse the twelve provinces of that country. In order therefore to be able to appeal to the testimony of an eye-witness as to the later history of the two Apostles, he purposely refers not to Abdias, who is supposed to be left behind in Babylon, but to another of their disciples and companions, Craton, as his authocity. This alone is a sufficient hint that the statement in the preface attributing the whole work to Abdias as its author is a fiction. The other statement likewise, that Africanus was the translator, is contradicted by the author's own language in the sixth book. For he there distinguishes himself from the imaginary Africanus, whom he now designates as the author of a much more extended work concerning the two Apostles Simon and Jude, of which he only gives certain extracts. The reference of these histories of the Apostles to the oldest possible and contemporary witnesses is after all a somewhat rude attempt at deception. Africanus wrote of course in Greek, not in Latin; but this author had evidently the works of Jerome and Rufinus before him. He makes a series of Scriptural quotations from the text of the Latin Vulgate, and inserts long extracts from the Church History of Rufinus, as well as from his Latin version of the Clementine Recognitions. The names of Abdias of Babylon and of Craton are inventions of some predecessor of the present writer. The latter must undoubtedly have been referred to as an eye-witness and original authority in the earlier Acts of St. Simon and St. Jude, from which large extracts are incorporated in the sixth book of the Historiae Apostolicae. His name meets us yet again in a fragment of the Acts of the Apostle Bartholomew, for which we are indebted to Stephen Praetorius. There likewise Craton is designated as a disciple of St. Simon and St. Jude. Compare the Fragmenta Apostolorum in the Appendix to Praetorius' edition (in German and Latin) of the Apocryphal Epistle of St. Paul to the Laodiceans, Hamburg, 1595. These Fragmenta are reprinted in Fabricius Cod. Apocryph. N. Test. ii. 931. The name of Abdias too belongs undoubtedly to the original source of the narrative in the sixth book of the Historiae Apostolicae. It is probably derived originally from the legend of Thaddaeus, referred to by Eusebius (H. E. i. 13), in which a certain Abdos, son of Abdu, is spoken of as having been healed of a disease in the feet by the Apostle. (Compare also the Doctrina Addaei in Cureton's Ancient Syriac Documents, London, 1864, pp. 7, 13, where the same person is called Abdu, son of Abdu.) At any rate, this name appears in the Latin version of Eusebius by Rufinus (of which diligent use is made by our author) in the more familiar form of Abdias, by which the LXX represents the Hebrew Obadiah (עֲבַדְיָה). With this has been combined a statement of Theodoret (H. E. v. 39) and of Socrates (H. E. vii. 8), according to which a Persian temple of the sun is said to have been destroyed by a bishop named Abda—a story which may at any rate remind us of the destruction of the temple of the Sun and Moon in the Persian city Suair related by our author (Hist. Apost. vi. 21–23), but by him attributed to a miraculous interposition at the martyrdom of the Apostles Simon and Jude. Moreover, the name Abda is not identical with Abdias. And however that may be, there is certainly no trace in the whole of ecclesiastical antiquity of the existence of such a work as these Acts or Histories of the Apostles by an author so named. The first signs of an acquaintance with it meet us in Venantius Fortunatus (†609), who, in a poem in praise of virginity (Op. Miscell. viii. 5, comp. 6), alludes to a series of legends concerning the Apostles which can be referred to no other than this pseudo-Abdias. The passage is as follows:—

“Nobilis Andream mittit Achaia suum
Praecipuum meritis Ephesus veneranda Joannem
Dirigit et Jacobus terra beata sacros
Laeta suis votis Hierapolis alma Philippum
Producens Thomam mundus Edessa pium
Inde triumphantem tert India Bartholomaeum
Matthaeum eximium Naddaver alta virum
Hinc Simonem et Judam lumen Persida gemellum Laeta relaxato mittit ad astra sinu.”

If to the Apostles here designated we add the names of Peter and Paul, mentioned in the verses immediately preceding, we shall have all the twelve Apostles together, of whom the Histories of Abdias treat, which, taking the variations in the Catalogues of the Apostles into account, can hardly be regarded as accidental. A still greater weight in the scale must be attached to the agreement as to the localities in which the Apostles are said to have suffered martyrdom. On this subject there is no uniform tradition, except in reference to St. Peter, St. Paul, St. John, and St. Philip. With regard to all the rest the legends and martyrologies differ widely. Venantius Fortunatus however follows throughout the tradition as exhibited by Abdias. They both, for instance, place the tomb of St. Bartholomew in India; while Gregory of Tours (573–595), and with him the Greek Acts of Bartholomew (Tischendorf, Acta Apostolorum Apocrypha, p. 259) are already acquainted with the legend that the isle of Lipari, near Sicily, possesses his bones. So also Venantius, like Abdias (vi. 20—23), knows of the martyrdom of Simon and Jude in Persia, the translation of the bones of St. Thomas from India to Edessa (Abdias ix. 25), and the city of Naddaver in Ethiopia, as the place of St. Matthew's martyrdom (Abdias vii. 1 sq.). This Naddaver is nowhere mentioned by writers of the first six centuries, but only in later Martyrologies. (Compare the Acta St. Matthaei in the Acta Sanctorum, Septemb. t. vi. p. 220 sq., a production based on this of Abdias.) It is however again mentioned by Fortunatus in the next following poem (viii. 7):—

where Patra involves a reference to St. Andrew (comp. Abdias, iii. 35 sq.), Ephesus to St. John, and Naddaver to St. Matthew. Subsequently to Venantius Fortunatus various authors exhibit acquaintance with the Apostolic Histories of Abdias; e.g. Bede (†735), who refers to them as “historiae in quibus passiones Apostolorum continentur,” and rejects them as Apocryphal (Retract. in Acta Apost. cap. i; comp. Fabricius ii. pp. 629 sq., 639); and Aldhelm (Ep. ad Geruntium regem, in the epistles of Boniface; comp. Fabricius iii. p. 602), who refers to the plots of Simon Magus against St. Peter as related in the “Certamen Apostolorum” (i.e. Abdias, lib. i. and ii.), and in the ten books of Clemens (i.e. the Clementine Recognitions). In accordance with these references, and taking into account on the one hand the acquaintance with this work betrayed by Fortunatus, and on the other its author's ignorance of the translation to the island of Lipari of the bones of St. Bartholomew, we cannot fix on a later date for its composition than the second half of the 6th century. But neither can we assign it an earlier date, as Gutschmid has proved (Die Königsnamen in den apocryph. Apostelgeschichten; Rheinisches Museum für Philologie, Neue Folge, xix. p. 387 sq.). The story told by Abdias in the Acta Matthæi of a king of Ethiopia named Beor, who in his lifetime constituted one son commander of his army and made the other king, and who lived till the day of his death in peace with the Romans and Persians (Abdias, vii. 15) has a real historical basis in the history of the Abyssinian King Elesbaas to which Fabricius refers (Cod. Apocr. N. T. ii. p. 653) in illustration of the epithet rex Christianissimus applied to Aegliippus (vii. 8). Elesbaas subjugated in the year 524 the kingdom of the Sabæans and from that time the Abyssinians were involved in the contests between the Romans and Persians. These Acta Matthæi therefore, incorporated in the work of Abdias, must have been written subsequently to the year 524.

The place where is not so easy to determine as the time when these histories of Abdias were written. One thing only is certain, that they originated in the West, and that Latin is the language in which they were written. This is evident from the use made of the Latin Vulgate, and of Eusebius and the Clementine Recognitions in the translations of Rufinus as well as of various other Latin recensions of Greek Acta. The proof is less cogent which may be drawn from plays on words such as non everti sed converti eum (viii. 8) and impetrabam non imperabam (ix. 21), the former at any rate being a mere imitation of a similar Greek paronomasia. The Greek originals however are probably only mediately made use of.

The collection as it here lies before us as a whole seems to have been made with no other object than that of gratifying a pious curiosity, and not intended to subservise any such local interests as have given rise to so many legends of the Saints. The Acta Matthæi, written in the last years of the 10th century and in the monastery of St. Eucharius at Trèves, though formerly attached, in early printed editions, to this collection of Abdias (first of all by Wolfgang Lazius, Basle, 1551), could not, as the date of its composition shows, have formed originally any part of it. Our collection appears to have been composed in some Frankish monastery in which a learned contemporary of Gregory of Tours seems to have put together what he could collect of older and more recent narrations of the deeds and fates of the different Apostles, and to have sought to enhance the credibility of his compilation by attaching to it the names of Abdias as a disciple of Apostles and of the celebrated chronographer Africanus. The first traces of its existence certainly meet us in the Frankish kingdom, and that soon after the time of its composition; and as the monastic institutions of that kingdom were in the 10th century the seat of great literary activity, the above conjecture in default of more certain information appears the most probable.

For the text of Abdias we are still dependent on the old printed editions, among which that of Fabricius (Cod. Apocr. N. T. ii. pp. 402-742), if not the most correct, is the most accessible. (For a list of older editions, see Fabricius p. 400 sq.)

But little further assistance is afforded by the parallel texts of single books as printed in the Acta Sanctorum. From a manuscript described in the Acta Sanctorum (May t. i. p. 7, and June t. v. p. 399), and also by Fabricius (p. 401) and Thilo (Acta Petri et Pauli, fasc. 1, Halle 1837, p. 28), which formerly belonged to the monastery of St. Peter and St. Paul at Weissenburg, and afterwards to a Baron Blum, Imperial Councillor of Appeals, from whose possession it passed first to Helmstädt, and then to Wolfenbüttel (Guelpherby. A. in Thilo), it is evident that these "histories" of Abdias received additions from older documents and from other sources. In this manuscript they bear the title Melito Episcopus de Virtutibus Apostolorum, followed by the Epistola Encyclica, elsewhere prefixed to the Passio Johannis (an apocryphal work, also circulated under the name of Melito; Fabricius iii. p. 604 sq.). To the Virtutes Pauli is immediately attached in this MS. the Passio Petri et Pauli of the pseudo-Marcellus, from which a passage has found its way into our present text of Abdias, though wanting in many MSS. Single books were frequently copied separately, undergoing here and there alterations in the process and receiving separate inscriptions.

The pseudo-Abdias himself indicates as the sources whence he drew his information, besides the New Testament, certain older documents concerning the martyrdoms of single Apostles (Praefatio Operi Praefixa: "nam de multis quae hac de re a veteribus scripta sunt nihil ad nos praeter ipsorum passionum monumenta venerunt"). Among these he makes special mention "of a certain book" in which the journey of St. Thomas into India and his deeds there are described (ix. 1). The reference is evidently to the Acta Thomae which still exist in a fragmentary shape in the original Greek, and were in the hands of our author in a more complete form than now in ours. From these he extracts largely, omitting what appeared to him superfluous (supervacaneis omissis); the allusion being probably to the speeches and hymns which, from their Gnostic colouring, were not fitted to edify the Church (ecclesiam roborare). He also elsewhere several times expressly declares that he is only making extracts from more copious sources of information; e.g. in the passage already referred to (vi. 20), where he assures us that he has selected only a little from the writing of the alleged disciple of the Apostles, Craton, concerning the Acts of St. Simon and St. Jude, translated, as he pretends, by Africanus. Again a similar statement meets us in the Acts of St. Matthew (vii. 8), which in the source from whence pseudo-Abdias drew his information may have been already connected in a loose or merely accidental way with those of St. Simon and St. Jude. In other places too, where he does not expressly say so, he is simply making extracts from his authorities, and these often so abridged as to be nearly unintelligible, while elsewhere he gives long connected passages. A great part of the writings thus employed are still in existence; the existence of others can with some degree of certainty be inferred. The value of his compilation for us consists in this, that he had before him a large number of works now lost, if not in the original, yet in a Latin version; and that of others he had better texts than we at present possess.

The authorities thus made use of, so far as we can still ascertain them, are the following:—(1) St. Jerome's Latin version of the New Testament (the Vulgate). (2) Rufinus' Latin version of the Church History of Eusebius (Abdias v. 3, vi. 4-6). (3) The Latin version of the Clementine Recognitions (Abdias i. 7-14, vi. 2, 3), and that of the Epistola Clementis ad Jacobum (Abdias i. 15), by Rufinus. (4) St. Jerome's book de Viris Illustr. (Abdias vi. 1). (5) Pseudo-Hegesippus De Execlio Hierosolymae or the Latin paraphrase of Josephus' work on the Jewish war (Abdias i. 16-20). (6) Pseudo-Marcellus De Passione Petri et Pauli; i.e. a Latin version of the Πράξεις Πέτρου καὶ Παύλου (Abdias ii. 7), published by Thilo (Acta Petri et Pauli, Halle, 1837, 1838) and Tischendorf (Acta Apost. Apocr. p. 1 sq.), together with a passage inserted in the section taken from pseudo-Hegesippus, and found in our printed texts of Abdias (i. 17, 18) though wanting in that given in the Acta Sanctorum. (Jun. tom. v. p. 424 sq.). (7) The Latin version of pseudo-Linus De Passione Petri et Pauli (Bibl. Patr. Maxima ii. p. 67 sq.), being a Catholic adaptation of Gnostic Acts of St. Paul and St. Peter (Abdias i. 20, ii. 8). (8) A Catholic adaptation of the Gnostic περίοδοι and the μαρτύριον Ἀνδρέου, likewise in Latin (Abdias iii. 2-42). The text of the περίοδοι, which describe the journeys of St. Andrew from Pontus to Greece (Philastrus Haer. 88), is now only known to us through Abdias (with exception of the history of St. Andrew's doings among the Anthropophagi referred to in Abdias iii. 2, 3, which we possess now in its original form in the Gnostic πράξεις Ἀνδρέου καὶ Ματθαίου in Tischendorf's Acta Apost. Apocr. p. 132 sq.). The text of the μαρτύριον from cap. 35 onwards is more complete than that contained in the Epist. Presbyterorum et Diaconorum Achaiae (Latin version in Surius Vit. Sanct. for 30 November, Greek text in Tischendorf Acta Apost. Apocr. p. 105 sq.). (9) A Latin version of the περίοδοι Ἰωάννου, which also was originally a Gnostic work but has undergone a Catholic revision. On it are based both the Latin Prochorus (Bibl. Patr. Maxima, t. ii. p. 40 sq.) and the Latin Mellitus de Passione Johannis (Fabricius Cod. Apocr. iii. p. 604 sq.). See Abdias v. 2 and 4-23: c. 2 stands in connection with the pseudo-Prochorus, cc. 4-23 with the pseudo-Mellitus. In both cases Abdias represents a text nearer the original form. Our Greek text of the πράξεις Ἰωάννου (in Tischendorf's Acta Apost. p. 266 sq.) is fragmentary, and at any rate not quite true to the original form, but agrees better with Abdias than with pseudo-Mellitus; the former indeed has here and there preserved the original form more faithfully still. (10) A Latin version of the Gnostic Acta Thomae (Abdias ix. 2-25). A great part of this work is now known to us through pseudo-Abdias only (ix. 8-15), who also has preserved the concluding part, the Martyrium Thomae, in at least a much more complete form than the Greek τελείωσις Θωμᾶ, first printed by Tischendorf (Act. Ap. Apocr. p. 235; comp. Abdias, ix. 16-25). The first portion preserved to us in the original Greek (Acta Thomae, ed. Thilo, Halle, 1823; Tischendorf Acta Apost. Apocr. p. 190 sq.) is given by Abdias in a very abridged form, and purified as much as possible from the old Gnostic elements. (11) A Latin text of pseudo-Craton De Vita et Martyrio Simonis et Judae (Abdias vi. 7-23); and (12) The Acta Matthaei, intimately connected in their origin with the above, and dating from the second quarter of the 6th century (Abdias vii.). (13) A Latin version of the Nestorian πράξεις Βαρθολομαίου (Abdias viii.) nearer to the original form than the Greek text in Tischendorf (l. c. p. 243 sq.) which is the result of a careful revision by a Catholic. (14) Acta Jacobi Majoris (Abdias iv. 2-9), a Catholic work, of which, with the exception of one passage quoted in the Hypotyposes of Clemens Alexandrinus (ap. Euseb. H. E. ii. 9), no other trace is to be found. (15) Acta Philippi, also not met with elsewhere (Abdias x. 2-4); a part of this work however appears to have been derived from the Gnostic περίοδοι Φιλίππου.

The object which pseudo-Abdias seems to have kept mainly in view in the compilation of his work, and the use made of his authorities, was neither on the one hand to reproduce them with fidelity nor on the other to subvert any purposes of dogmatic instruction, but simply to give as complete a collection as possible of the histories of the Apostles, their Acts and Martyrdoms, and more especially their miracles. Narratives which seemed to be of doubtful utility or to extend to too great length are abridged without scruple. Anything which might give offence from a dogmatic point of view is carefully removed or revised in a Catholic sense. The fiction that the whole work proceeds from an eyewitness is partly maintained by pseudo-Abdias' custom of preserving the first person wherever he finds it used by his authorities (compare ii. 3 sq., iii. 42, v. 23, ix. 18). ABDON (ABDUS) and SENNEN (SENNES), SS., two Persian princes martyred at Rome under Decius, of whom an account is given in the Dict. of Christ. Ant., p. 8.

ABEL, St., of Imleach-fiach (now Emlagh, co. Meath), an Irish abbat, is recorded to have died in 742. (Annals of the Four Masters, ed. O'Donovan.) [H. B.]

ABELONII, the name of an obscure local sect occupying the country villages round Hippo, in N. Africa, in and before the time of Augustine (De Iv. 87). When he wrote, about 428, it was confined to a single hamlet, of which it held exclusive possession. Elsewhere its adherents had "become Catholics." The members of the Abelonian community were all obliged to be married, but also to live in virgin wedlock. Each couple adopted a boy and a girl, and filled up the number whenever one died. Upon the decease of either adoptive parent the children gave their services to the survivor for his or her lifetime, and then succeeded to the property and adopted a fresh couple. There was no difficulty in keeping up the supply of adoptive children, as the prospect of an inheritance tempted poor neighbours to surrender their offspring. Unfortunately we do not learn whether these practices were combined with any peculiar doctrines.

Augustine refers the termination of Abeloni to a Punic inflexion. Some, he says, derived the name from Abel, 'so that we might call' the members of the sect 'Abeliani or Abcloitae.' [H.]

ABERCICIUS ('Αβέρκιος, 'Αουέρκιος, 'Αβίρκιος, etc.), the reputed successor of Papias as bishop of Hierapolis, c. 160, is recorded to have been born of reputable Christian parentage, to have suffered from the persecutions of M. Aurelius and Verus, and to have died a natural death in their joint reign. The memoir of the anonymous author on the origin of the Montanist heresy given by Eusebius (H. E. lib. v. c. 16) is addressed to a certain 'Αουίρκιος Μάρκελλος, who may be probably identified with the bishop of Hierapolis. He is mentioned by Nicephorus (H. E. iv. 23), simply as 'Αβέρκιός τις. In the Greek Menologies, Oct. 22, we find a notice of τοῦ ἁγίου καὶ ἰσαποστόλου 'Αβερκίου ἐπισκόπου Ἱεραπόλεως, τοῦ θαυματουργοῦ. Halloix (Vitae P.P. Orient., vol. ii.) has given a life of Abercius drawn from Symeon Metaphrastes and the Menologies, full of untrustworthy tales. The most noticeable of these is the exorcism by Abercius of an evil spirit with which Lucilla, the daughter of Marcus Aurelius, then betrothed to Verus, was possessed. M. Aurelius, in gratitude for his daughter's cure, is said to have made an annual largess of 3000 modii of corn to the poor of Hierapolis, and to have erected baths over some hot springs that had recently burst forth. Abercius is reported to have been the author of a Book of Discipline for the use of his clergy, and of a letter to M. Aurelius, a copy of which later was once in the hands of the historian Baronius, who speaks of its loss with great regret (Baron. Ann. Eccl., A.D. 163, no. xi. xv.). See Act. SS. Boll. Oct. 22. [E. V.]

ABGAR, the name of several kings of Edessa, who reigned, according to the chronology of the Chronicle of that city, at various periods, ranging from B.C. 99 to A.D. 217. The etymology and origin of this word are doubtful; derivations have been sought for it in Armenian, Syriac, and Arabic. In the Armenian history of Moses of Chorene (p. 165, ed. Whiston) it is explained as a corruption of Avagair, a word compounded of avag and air, which is said to signify vir primarius or insignis. The Greeks and Syrians, being unable to pronounce this, corrupted it to abgar. Bar Ali, in his Lexicon, quoted by Bernstein (Lex. Syr.) and Dr. Payne Smith (Thes. Syr.), says the name is Armenian and signifies "lame." His testimony is of value, though the explanation he gives may be incorrect, because it shows that he did not trace it to an Arabic or Syriac root. In Syriac the word جبار, or جبار, has unquestionably the meaning of "lame," or rather, as Lagarde (Gesammelte Abhandlungen, p. 6) says, "crippled"; but in this sense it has been borrowed from the Persian, افگار, afgâr, or فگار, figâr, which has the same meaning. It occurs in the commentary of Ephrem Syrus on 2 Sam. xix. 24, with reference to Mephibosheth; and Assemani (B. O. iii. 232) gives the surname of John V. Patriarch of the Nestorians as Bar A'lgore, which he renders "filius claudi," or rather, as he gives it elsewhere (ii. 440), "claudorum." In another passage (i. 261, note) he says, "Abgar autem Syriace claudum sonat," and maintains that it was an appellation of the kings of Edessa, as Caesar among the Romans, Pharaoh and Ptolemy in Egypt, and Antiochus in Syria. Whatever be the true etymology of the proper name Abgar, there can be no doubt that the word so much like it in Syriac, abgor or abgoro, is of foreign, probably Persian, origin. The forms, both Latin and Greek, in which the name appears are various. The coins have uniformly 'Αβγαρος. In Eusebius (H. E. i. 13) the MSS. vary between 'Αγβαρος and 'Αβγαρος. The former of these is found in Suidas (s. v. ὑψηλῶσονται), the latter in the same author (s. v. 'Ανθρευοῦς). Appian (De Bello Parth. p. 140) has 'Ακβαρος, and Herodian (iii. 9), Procopius (De Bello Pers. ii. 12), Dion Cassius (xl. 20, &c.), Suidas (s. v. Αὔγαρος, φυλάρχης, ἐλλόβια, ἱκέτευμα, ὠνήτη), Nicephorus (ii. 13), and Cedrenus (Hist. Comp. p. 175) have Αὔγαρος, a form which somewhat favours the Armenian origin of the word given above. In Latin we find Abcarius (Tac. Ann. xii. 12; Aelius Spartianus, Vit. Severi, c. 18; Julius Capitolinus, Vit. Ant. P. c. 9), and in Aurelius Victor (De Caesar. xx. 14) Agarrus. Clemens Galanus (Hist. Arm. c. 1) uses both Abgarus and Abgarus, and some MSS. of Tacitus, quoted by Ruperti, exhibit the variations Abbarus, Aebarus, Abazus, and Acharus. The forms 'Αγβαρος, or 'Ακβαρος, and Abcarius, have suggested the identification of the name Abgar with the Arabic Akbar, which is derived from a root signifying "to be great"; and this derivation is favoured by Valesius, in his notes to Eusebius (H. E. i. 13), in spite of the reading of the best MS. and the unanimous testimony of the coins. In addition to those which have been already quoted, we find, in the notes of Pontacus to his edition of Jerome's Chronicle of Eusebius, the forms Aggarus, Abacarus, and Abcarius, while in the Armenian Version of the same Chronicle (ed. Aucher, i. 164), there is yet another variety, Apharivios. The proper name Aphar still exists among the Armenians. There can be little doubt therefore, that the preponderance of evidence is greatly in favour of the form Abgar.

Of the ten kings of Edessa who, according to the Chronicle of Dionysius of Telmahar (Assem. B. O. i. 417, &c.), bore the name of Abgar, we have only to do with the last six. Before enumerating them it will be as well to call attention to the fact that the chronology of Dionysius, as has been shown by Gutschmid (Die Königsnamen in den apokryphen Apostelgeschichten, in the Rhein. Mus. N. F. xix. 171), is faulty, and that his early dates are wrong by four years. The years of the last king, Ma'nû IX., are to be reckoned to his death, and not to the capture of Edessa by Caracalla; so that the dates of the last eight kings must be put forward about 21 years. In addition to this, there is a gap of 17 years between Abgar VI. bar Ma'nû and Abgar VII. bar İzat, during which period (A.D. 91-108) Edessa was held by the Parthians.

The first king of the name was Abgar Phika, "the dumb," who reigned with Bacro two years and 4 months, and by himself 23 years and 5 months, in all 25 years and 9 months (B.C. 93-67). His son Abgar reigned 15 years (B.C. 67-52), and is mentioned by Dion Cassius (xl. 20, Αὔγαρος ὁ Ὀρρόηδος or Ὀσρομηός) as having made a treaty with the Romans in the time of Pompey. He is the same who treacherously deceived Crassus in his expedition against the Parthians (B.C. 53), and is called by Appian (De Bell. Parth. p. 140), φύλαρχος τῶν Ἀράβων.

In Plutarch (Cras. 21) his name is written Ἀριάμνης. The eleventh and twelfth kings of Edessa bore the same name, according to Dionysius (Assem. B. O. i. 419), but nothing is recorded of them except that the latter was surnamed Sumoko, "the red." We now come to the one with whom the name is most conspicuously associated, the fifteenth king, Abgar surnamed Ucomo, "the black," who reigned, according to the chronology of Dionysius of Telmahar, from A.D. 9 to A.D. 46; but, according to the rectification of Gutschmid, from A.D. 13 to A.D. 50. Moses of Chorene (in Bayer, Hist. Osrh. p. 97) traces his descent from the Parthian king Arsaces. Procopius has a story (Bell. Pers. ii. 12) of the romantic attachment which he excited in Augustus when on a visit to Rome, and of the device he was obliged to employ before the emperor would allow him to return to Edessa. The narrative of Eusebius (see Cureton's Anc. Syr. Documents), though professedly derived from no less an authority than the archives of Edessa, is in all probability equally apocryphal. He tells (H. E. i. 13) how Abgar, suffering from an incurable disease, heard of the fame of Christ's miracles, and wrote the famous letter entreating him to leave the unworthy Jews and to take up his abode with him. The reply of Christ promised that after his ascension one of his disciples should be sent to heal his disease, and to give life to him and his. Accordingly Thomas, one of the twelve, sent Thaddeus, one of the seventy, who came and dwelt with Tobias, the son of Tobias. The fame of his miracles soon reached the ears of Abgar, who recognised in him the promised messenger. He sent for Tobias, and commanded him to bring before him his distinguished guest. On the following day Thaddeus was ushered into the presence of the king, who was surrounded by the nobles of his court. As soon as he entered, a mysterious halo about the apostle's face was visible to Abgar alone, and the king, to the astonishment of all who stood by, bowed down before Thaddeus. The healing of Abgar, and of Abdu ben Abdu, a martyr to the gout, followed as a matter of course, as well as the preaching of Christianity by Thaddeus. In the later form of the legend, as recorded by Nicephorus (H. E. ii. 7), Abdu ben Abdu becomes Audu, the son of Abgar. In Procopius (Bell. Pers. ii. 12), there is a still further confusion, and the gout of Abdu is transferred to Abgar. By the time the story reached Cedrenus it had become embellished with incidents still more marvellous. In his Historiae Compendium (p. 176) it is related that Abgar suffered from a complication of maladies, gout of long standing, and the black leprosy, by the latter of which he was so disfigured that he rarely allowed any one to see him. On receiving Christ's letter, sealed with the seven mysterious Hebrew characters which signified Θεοῦ θεαθὲν θάυμα θεῖον, Abgar fell on his face before it and was straightway made whole. A slight trace of the leprosy alone remained in his face, and this was removed by the waters of baptism, which he received at the hands of the Apostle Thaddeus. In Cedrenus, too, we find the most elaborate story of the picture of the Saviour, and of its various fortunes till it was transferred to Byzantium. Ananias, the swift courier who carried the letter of Abgar, was also a painter, and endeavoured to take the portrait of Christ, but was dazzled by the great splendour of His countenance. Whereupon our Lord, having washed His face, dried it upon a linen cloth, on which was miraculously impressed the image of His features. The cloth was taken to Edessa by Ananias, and was placed by Abgar in a niche over the city gate, where formerly had stood the image of a Grecian god. It was treated with reverence till the time of his grandson, who relapsed into idolatry and announced his design of removing the sacred picture. The bishop, to prevent the sacrilege, placed a lamp in front of the picture, and covered up the niche with a tile so that nothing could be seen. Five centuries afterwards, when the Persians had been repulsed from the city through the influence of the divine picture, it was discovered with the lamp still burning before it; and, wonderful to relate, by some strange photography a duplicate of the face had been transferred to the tile which concealed it. Cedrenus then follows the fortunes of the picture to Byzantium. A more detailed, but equally veracious, account of the share which it had in the repulse of the Persians under Chosroes will be found in Evagrius (iv. 27). It has been necessary to notice the mass of ecclesiastical fiction which has grown up round the name of Abgar, though it is beside the purpose of the present article to discuss the genuineness of the famous letter, which will be treated of elsewhere. [THADDEUS.] The Syriac version of the story given in Cureton's Anc. Syr. Documents is obviously an elaborate expansion of Eusebius. In all probability the only fact in connection with Abgar which has come down to us is to be found in the pages of Tacitus (Ann. xii. 12-14), where he appears in a not very creditable light, first seducing the young Parthian king, Meherdates, to waste precious days in luxurious indulgence at Edessa, and then treacherously abandoning him on the battle field (A.D. 49). The chronology of Dionysius would transfer the odium of this conduct to his son, described by Procopius as a monster of iniquity, who, fearing the vengeance of the Romans, joined himself to Persia. But Gutschmid's correction fixes the stigma upon Abgar.

In addition to the other utterly untrustworthy narratives of Abgar, we have one by Moses of Chorene which introduces new elements of fiction. In his Armenian history he tells us how Abgar was king of Armenia, which in the second year of his reign became tributary to the Romans. He quarrelled with Herod, and defeated the army which was sent out against him. On the accession of Tiberius, Abgar prepared to throw off his allegiance, and built the city of Edessa on the Euphrates. He established Ardaches on the throne of Persia and assisted Aretas in his struggle with Herod the Tetrarch. During his campaign in Persia he had contracted an acute disease, on account of which when he had heard of the miracles of Christ he wrote his famous letter. The Empress Helena, in this mass of fiction, is made the wife of Abgar, who survived him and went to Jerusalem in the time of Claudius, during the famine which Agabus had predicted. For all this, and much more, see Cureton's Anc. Syriac Documents.

Abgar VI. bar Ma'nū, according to Dionysius, reigned for 20 years (A.D. 65-85), which Gutschmid reckons from A.D. 69-89. It must be this king who, in the Chronicle of Edessa, is related to have built himself a mausoleum (A. Sel. 400, A.D. 88), and not his successor as Assemani says (B. O. i. 421). The dynasty now seems to have changed, and the next king, Abgar VII. bar Îzat, who purchased the kingdom from the Parthians (Suidas, s. v. ἄβγαρί) and reigned A.D. 108–115, was of the royal race of Adiabene. It was this Abgar, in all probability, who behaved with such caution when Trajan made his expedition to the East. According to Dio Cassius (lxxviii. 18, 21), he did not go in person to meet the Emperor at Antioch, but sent him gifts and friendly messages. He was afraid of Trajan on the one hand and of the Parthians on the other, and therefore deferred his meeting with Trajan till he came to Edessa, where he entertained him at a banquet, at which he introduced his son Arbandes dancing some of his native dances. Suidas (s. v. Ἐδεσσα) says that Abgar went out to meet Trajan as he approached the city, taking with him 250 horses, 250 coats of mail, and 60,000 javelins; but Trajan would only accept three coats of mail, and begged him to keep the rest. The emperor was greatly taken with the young Arbandes. In consequence of the discrepancy in the chronology, Assemani is driven to suppose that this Abgar of Trajan's time was his brother, Ma'nû bar Îzat, and that his son Ma'nû is the Abgar of the time of Antoninus Pius, who is mentioned by Julius Capitolinus. It appears from Xiphilinus (Exc. ex Dion. Cass. lxxviii. 30), that Abgar at a subsequent period revolted from Trajan, who sent against him his general Lusius, who stormed Edessa and burnt it to the ground. The Acts of Sharbil, printed in Cureton's Anc. Syr. Documents, are referred to this reign.

The Abgar of the time of Antoninus Pius (Julius Capit. Vit. Ant. P. c. 9) must be Ma'nû bar Ma'nû, as Assemani suggests. Of him Dionysius relates, that after reigning 23 years he went over to the Romans, his throne was occupied by Vâl bar Sahrû for two years, and that then he was restored and reigned 12 years longer. To him Bayer attributes the story told by Procopius of Abgar Ucomô and Augustus. His son, Abgar VIII. bar Ma'nû, who reigned from A.D. 176 to 213, is the "Persarum rex" of that name who, according to Aelius Spartianus (Vit. Sev. c. 18), was conquered by Severus. Aurelius Victor (De Caesaribus, xx. 14) calls him Agarrus. According to Dio Cassius (ap. Xiphil. lxxv. 1) the Osrhoeni had revolted and besieged Nisibis, but were defeated by Severus. It is difficult to ascertain what was the exact nature of the relation between Severus and Abgar. Herodian (iii. 9 § 4) describes him as a king of the Osrhoeni who took refuge with Severus, brought a large number of archers to his assistance, and left his children with him as pledges of his fidelity. He was a Christian (Julius Africanus quoted by Georgius Syncellus A.D. 215), and we learn from Epiphanius (Hæres. lvi.) that Bardesanes was on intimate terms with him. Bardesanes himself (Euseb. Præp. Ev. v. 10) says that Abgar made a law forbidding any one to mutilate himself in honour of Cybele on pain of having his hands cut off. He appears, so far as may be gathered from an allusion in Dio Cassius (ap. Xiphil. lxxix. 16), to have gone to Rome, and to have had a brilliant reception given him by Severus. Although in the Chronicle of Dionysius he is distinguished from Abgar Severus, they are in all probability the same person. He seems to have associated with himself in the kingdom his son Ma'nû during the last year and seven months of his reign. Under him was held the council at Osrhoene of 18 bishops to decide the Easter Controversy (Grabe, Spicilegium, i. 316). Valesius believed him to have been the same who reigned at Edessa in the time of Caracalla (note in Dion. Coc. p. 747). Dio Cassius relates (ap. Xiphil. lxxvii. 12) that he reigned cruelly, and was entrapped by Caracalla, who put him in chains and took possession of Osrhoene. It was during his reign that the great flood happened at Edessa, which is described in the chronicle of the city under the year A.D. 202 (Assem. B. O. i. 390). Returning to the Chronicle of Dionysius, we find that Abgar Severus was succeeded by his son Ma'nû, who reigned 26 years. If this be correct, it would bring the date of the last Abgar bar Ma'nû, whom Gutschmid ignores, within the period of Gordianus III. (A.D. 238–242). The name of Abgar occurs on a coin of that emperor, which is supposed to have been struck to commemorate some victory over the Parthians (Osco, Num. Imp. Rom. p. 437). [W. A. W.]

ABGAR, LETTER OF. [THADDEUS.]

ABIBAS (written also Abibus). According to the story, the second and favourite son of Gamaliel, who in youth was a companion of his father's pupil, Saul of Tarsus, and afterwards was baptized by St. Peter and St. John. One Lucianus (A.D. 415) saw a vision of Gamaliel, who revealed where the body of his son, with other saints, was laid. From his letter, giving an account of his vision, we learn about this Abibas: Lucian. de Steph. § 3 sq. in August. Op. vii. app. p. 7 sq. Comp. Phot. Bibl. 171. [L.]

ABILIUS, (St.) (Ἀβίλιος), the second bishop of Alexandria (after St. Mark), 86–96 A.D. According to one tradition he was ordained presbyter, together with his successor Cerdour, by St. Mark himself: according to another he was appointed bishop by St. Luke (Const. Ap. vii. 46). The name is variously written Αβίλιος, Ἀμέλιος, Melias, &c., and perhaps represents the Latin Avilius (Vales. on Euseb. H. E. iii. 44). The first bishop Anianus, also bore a Roman name. Euseb. H. E. iii. 14, 21; Hieron. Chron. p. 600; Tillemont ii. 44, &c. Abilius is commemorated on Feb. 22 (cf. Chron. Orient. p. 90, ed. 1685; Melians.). [W.]

ABLABIUS (Ἀβλαβίος), often written Ablavius in Latin, a somewhat famous prefect of the praetorium, A.D. 326–337, under Constantine and Constantius. He was deposed and put to death by the latter (Tillemont Hist. des Emp. iv. 218 sq., 313). In 314 Constantine writes to one Ablabius, who holds some command in Africa and is apparently a Christian, summoning the disputants in the Donatist controversy to a council at Arles: August. Op. ix. app. p. 21, Labb. Conc. i. 1421. This is supposed to be the Ablabius in question, afterwards prefect of the praetorium (Tillemont Mém. Eccl. vi. p. 46). See also the edict de episcopali judicio, professing to be addressed to him by Constantine, Cod. Theod. vi. P. i. p. 339 ed. Gothofred., with his notes, and the index vi. ii. p. 35, s. v. Ablavius. [L.]

ABRAHAM, APOCALYPSE OF, a book "full of all manner of wickedness," was current among the Sethian Ophites (Epiph. Hær. 286 C.). It is probably the apocryphal work under Abraham's name condemned by Nicephorus (Credner, Zur Gesch. d. Kanons 121, 145): the length is rather over that assigned to Canticles. A Greek Testament of Abraham extant in MS. at Vienna (Fabricius, Cod. Ps. V. T. 417 f.) appears to be of much later date. [H.]

ABRAHAM, written also Abraam, Abbraam, Abraames, Abramiaeus, Abranias, Abramius, etc.

(1.) Bishop of SELEUCIA, patriarch, and kinsman of James, the brother of our Lord; of whom it is said that he quieted a persecution raised against the Christians by the king of Persia, by casting a devil out of the king's son. He died, according to Amru, A.D. 152, but this is probably an error (Assem. B. O. ii. 395; iii. 612). A poem, quoted by Assemani, in which the names of the patriarchs of the East are enumerated, calls him Abraham of Cascar or Cashear (Ib. ii. 389), and places him third in the list. According to another account, he died in the 22nd year of his episcopate, A.D. 120 (Ib. iii. 612), and was buried at Seleucia. [W. A. W.]

(2.) (Cyrensis), written Abraames, a Syrian hermit of the 4th century, afterwards bishop of CARRHAE (Haran), in Mesopotamia (Theodt. Philoth. c. 17). From his cell in the desert of Chalcidice, near Antioch (Theodt. Hist. iv. 28, Nicephor. Hist. xi. 41), he went disguised as a pedlar to convert the inhabitants of Lebanon; and, though opposed and persecuted at first, succeeded eventually in his purpose. At the end of three years, having persuaded the people to build themselves a church, he retired to his cell, but was subsequently prevailed upon, most unwillingly, to become Bishop of Carrhæ. Even then he persevered in the same austere mode of life, so that, for a time, he lost the use of his limbs through his excessive fasting. His fare was only vegetables; he abstained even from bread and water; but, though so severe to himself, he was hospitable to strangers. He was held in great reverence by the emperor and his family (Theodt. Philoth. c. 17). Perhaps this is the Abraames, of whom it is recorded that his retirement from the world was so complete, that he continued, for some time after the Council of Nicaea, to keep Easter after the old reckoning, in ignorance of the decree which had been made (Theodt. Philoth. c. 3). See Act. SS. Boll. Feb. 14. [I. G. S.]

(3.) Bishop of BATNAE, in Osrhoene near the Euphrates, was a correspondent of St. Basil, who addressed a letter to him (cir. A.D. 373) while he was living in the house of Saturninus the Comes of Antioch (Basil. Ep. 132 [315]). Various rumours had been spread as to his whereabouts, some saying that he was at Samosata, others in the country. Tillemont (vi. 578) conjectures that he was hiding from the Arian persecutions. His name appears with those of Meletius, Eusebius, Basil, and others in the letter which the bishops of the East addressed to those of Italy and Gaul, A.D. 372 (Basil. Ep. 92 [69]). He was present at the Council of Constantinople in 381 (Labbe. Conc. ii. 955). [W. A. W.]

his parents, who were wealthy inhabitants of Edessa, he was induced, against his will, to marry, but deserted his bride on the wedding-day, and was found, after three weeks, in a cell two miles from the city. After the death of his parents, twelve years afterwards, he entrusted all his property to a friend, for the poor, devoting himself to the life of an anchorite. Subsequently, against his own wishes, he was ordained priest, and sent by the bishop as a missionary to a neighbouring village of idolaters. There he destroyed the idols with his own hands, and, chiefly through the extraordinary patience with which he bore their persecution, effected the conversion of the inhabitants. After building a church for them, he deserted his flock as he had deserted his wife, and retired to his cell, to their great sorrow. During the fifty years of his seclusion he never tasted even bread, living entirely on vegetables, never changed his hair-shirt, never washed face nor hands, and yet is said to have been hale and vigorous to the last. It is recorded of him, as of other solitaries, that he experienced peculiar temptations of Satan. He was always bewailing his own faults, but gentle and tolerant to others (S. Ephr. Syr. Acta S. Abr.). When his niece had been seduced from him by a profligate monk, he sought her in vain for two years, and, at last, having disguised himself as a soldier, found and reclaimed her from her abandoned life. He is commemorated by the Greek Church on the 29th of October; by the Latin Church on the 16th of March. [I. G. S.]

(5.) Nestorian Bishop of BETH-RABAN in Media, cir. A.D. 489 (Assem. B. O. i. 204, 352). He studied sacred literature in the school at Edessa, but was expelled. Amru calls him a disciple of Narses, and says that he flourished under the Emperor Justin the Younger, A.D. 565-578, (Assem. B. O. iii. 71). He was head of the monastery of Beth-Raban (Ib. 185, 255, 468, 476), and wrote commentaries on the Books of Joshua, Judges, Kings, Ecclesiasticus, Isaiah, the twelve minor prophets, Daniel, and Solomon's Song, besides various poems (Ib. 71). Sabarjesu, surnamed Rustam, wrote his life (Ib. 455, 468). He is apparently the same with Abraham the disciple of Narses, who was contemporary with Abraham of Cascar (Ib. iii. 155). [W. A. W.]

(6.) Of Cascar, called the Great (Assem. B. O. iii. 154, 467), a famous Archimandrite, who flourished (cir. A.D. 502) under Babæus, bishop of Seleucia, the patriarch of the Nestorians (ii. 408). According to Amru, whose account Assemani quotes (B. O. iii. 155, 431), he studied at Nisibis in company with another Abraham the disciple of Narses. He afterwards removed to Hirta, where he converted the inhabitants from idolatry, and thence to Jerusalem, Egypt, and Mount Sinai, where he received the benediction of the monks. The life of him, written by John and Rustam, which is quoted by Thomas of Marga (B. O. iii. 93), tells us that he retired into the desert of Scete, and adopted there the monastic dress; that he afterwards by divine command came and dwelt in a retired cave on Mount Izla, near Nisibis, and thence spread monastic discipline among the Nestorians. He established the monastic dress and the tonsure, and so acquired the title of father of the Assyrian monks (B. O. iii. 147, 155). He died in Haza or Adiabene, and his body was taken to Cascar (Ib. 633). By

It was afterwards thrown into the Tigris by command of the Caliph Motawakkl (Ib. 510). Besides the life of him already mentioned, there is another by Thomas of Marga, and a work by Babaeus the Archimandrite upon Abraham of Nisibis, is supposed by Assemani to refer to Abraham of Cascar (Ib. 97). He wrote letters, expositions, a commentary on the whole of the Dialectics of Aristotle (Ib. 154), and drew up rules for the government of the monks (Ib. 342, 351). Theodorus, bishop of Maru, speaks of him with praise in a poem (Ib. 147). Two miracles are attributed to him; one that he raised from the dead the daughter of a citizen of Nisibis, the other that he drove away a flight of locusts with holy water (Ib. 155). [W. A. W.]

ABRANUS (St.), an Irish missionary, one of the brothers of St. Tressanus who went as missionaries from Ireland to Reims, at the beginning of the 6th century. (Colgan, Acta SS. Hiberniae, p. 275.) [H. B.]

ABRASAX ('Αβρασαξ, 'Αβραξάξ). I. In the Basilidian system described by Irenaeus (101 f.) "the unbegotten Father" is the progenitor of a series of powers, the last of whom create "the first heaven." They in turn originate a second series, who create a second heaven. The process continues in like manner till 365 heavens are in existence, the angels of the last or visible heaven being the authors of our world. "The ruler" [principem, i. e. probably τὸν ἀρχοντα] of the 365 heavens "is Abraxas, and for this reason he contains within himself 365 numbers." Substantially the same account is given by Epiphanius (Haer. 69, 73 f.), who appears to follow partly Irenaeus, partly the lost Compendium of Hippolytus (R. A. Lipsius, Zur Quellenkritik d. Epiphanius 99 f.) He designates Abrasax more distinctly as "the power above all, and First Principle," "the cause and first archetype" of all things; and mentions that the Basilidians referred to 365 as the number of parts (μέλη) in the human body, as well as of days in the year. The author of the appendix to Tertullian De Praescr. Haer. (c. 4), who likewise follows Hippolytus's Compendium (Lipsius 33 f. &c.), adds some further particulars; that 'Abraxas' gave birth to Mind (νοῦς), the first in the series of primary powers enumerated likewise by Irenaeus and Epiphanius; that the world, as well as the 365 heavens, was created in honour of 'Abraxas;' and that Christ was sent not by the Maker of the world but by 'Abraxas.' More on the doctrines here referred to will be found under BASILIDES.

Thus far we are dealing with authorities who shew no acquaintance with the doctrines of Basilides himself [BASILIDES]. The name occurs however in the Refutation of all Heresies (vii. 26) by Hippolytus, who appears in these chapters to have followed the Exegetica of Basilides. After describing the manifestation of the Gospel in the Ogdoad and Hebdomad, he adds that the Basilidians have a long account of the innumerable creations and powers in the several 'stages' of the upper world (διαορθήματα), in which they speak of 365 heavens and say that "their great archon" is Abrasax, because his name contains the number 365, the number of the days in the year (the passage is corrupt, but thus much is clear); i. e. the sum of the numbers denoted by the Greek letters in ΑΒΡΑΣΑΞ is 365. The whole passage is a parenthesis interrupting a long sentence; and the plural form of the references (κατ' αὐτούς twice, φάσκειν) seems to indicate a doctrine of Basilidians rather than of Basilides, though the usage of Hippolytus is not consistent enough in this respect to be quite decisive. Hence Uhlhorn (Das Basilid. System, 26, 65 f.) infers that Abrasax is foreign to the original system of Basilides. On the other hand it might be urged that the occurrence of words characteristic of Basilides ('stage,' 'great archon') implies the Exegetica to have been Hippolytus's authority throughout; and the contents of the parenthesis might be taken as explanatory of "all things in the Hebdomad." Yet it is very difficult to bring the representation here given into intelligible connexion with the proper scheme of Basilides, either as forming a part of it or as coextensive with the whole; and the name itself does not harmonize with the rest of his terms. Its introduction is therefore probably due to the eclecticism of disciples; and the intermixture of language in the passage of Hippolytus may be supposed to arise from an attempt to combine and adjust information from two sources. Epiphanius (Haer. 90 f.) states that the Phibionite 'Gnostici' (Ophites) recognised 365 archons; but he connects no mystic name with the number.

Nothing can be built on the vague allusions of Jerome, according to whom 'Abraxas' meant for Basilides "the greatest God" (De vir. ill. 21), "the highest God" (Dial. adv. Lucif. 23), "the Almighty God" (Comm. in Amos iii. 9), and "the Lord the Creator" (Comm. in Nah. i. 11). The notices in Theodoret (Haer. Fab. i. 4), Augustine (Haer. 4), and 'Praedestinatius' (i. 3), have no independent value.

II. A vast number of engraved stones are in existence, to which the name 'Abraxas-gems' has long been given. The subjects are mythological, and chiefly grotesque, with various inscriptions, in which ΑΒΡΑΣΑΞ often occurs, alone or with other words. Sometimes the whole space is taken up with the inscription. In certain obscure magical writings of Egyptian origin ἄβραξάξ or ἄβρασαξ is found associated with other names which frequently accompany it on gems (Reuvens, Lett. à M. Letronne s. l. Pap. bilingu., etc., Leyden, 1830). The meaning of the legends is seldom intelligible: but some of the gems are amulets; and the same may be the case with nearly all. In a great majority of instances the name Abrasax is associated with a singular composite figure, having the head of a cock or hawk, the arms of a man (bearing, the one a whip or more rarely a dagger, and the other a small round shield), and the breast of a man in a cuirass, from below which diverge two serpentine legs. The name ΙΑΩ, to which ΣΑΒΑΩΘ is sometimes added, is found with this figure even more frequently than ΑΒΡΑΣΑΞ, and they are often combined.

In the absence of other evidence to shew the origin of these curious relics of antiquity the occurrence of a name known as Basilidian on patristic authority has not unnaturally been taken as a sufficient mark of origin, and the early collectors and critics assumed this whole group to be the work of Gnostics. During the last two centuries attempts have been made to sift away successively those gems which had no claim to be considered in any sense Gnostic, or specially Basilidian, or connected with Abrasax; but with little success. Passerio (Thes. Gemm. Astrif., Flor. 1750, cited by Matter in Herzog R.E. i. 79) and Beausobre (Manich. ii. 50-69) on the other hand questioned the whole theory; and though their scepticism has met with little favour, it appears to be well founded. While it would be rash to assert positively that no existing gems were the work of Gnostics, there is no valid reason for attributing any of them to such an origin. The Basilidians of the second century are said to have "made use of magic [inferior MSS. substitute "images"] and incantations and invocations and all other curious arts" (Iren. 102: cf. Epiph. Haer. 69 D; Philastr. Haer. 32); and incantations by mystic names are noticed by Jerome as characteristic of the hybrid Gnosticism planted in Spain in the fourth century (Ep. lxxv. 3; exx. 10; on Is. lxiv. 4). It is therefore not unlikely that some Gnostics were addicted to the use of amulets, though the confident assertions of modern writers to this effect rest on no authority. Beausobre properly calls attention to the significant silence of Clement in the two passages in which he instructs the Christians of Alexandria on the right use of rings and gems, and the figures which may legitimately be engraved on them (Paed. 241 ff.; 287 ff.). But no attempt to identify the figures on existing gems with the personages of Gnostic mythology has had any success, and Abrasax is the only Gnostic term found in the accompanying legends which is not known to belong to other religions or mythologies. The present state of the evidence therefore suggests, not that the gems inscribed with Abrasax are of Basilidian origin, but that their engravers and the Basilidians received the mystic name from a common source now unknown. If this be true, the whole family of 'Abraxas-gems' has probably no connexion with Gnosticism or any form of Christianity, and belongs rather to the mixed superstitions which thrived rankly on the shores of the Mediterranean during the decay of Paganism. Some parts at least of the figure above mentioned are solar symbols (cf. Kopp, Palaeogr. Crit. iv. 132 ff.; Bellermann, 53 ff.: but only a fraction of the evidence collected by these writers is pertinent and trustworthy); and the Basilidian Abrasax is manifestly connected with the sun.

Hyginus (Fab. 183) gives Abrax Aslo Therbeo as names of horses of the sun mentioned by 'Homerus.' The passage is miserably corrupt: but it may not be accidental that the first three syllables make Abraxas.

The literature of the subject is extensive, but of little value except for the figures. The leading treatises are L'Heureux's [Macarii] Abraxas seu Apistopistus, edited by Chifflet, Antwerp, 1657; voi. ii. part ii. of Montfaucon's Antiquité Expliquée; Passerio (ut sup.); Jablonski, De Nominis Abraxas . . . significacione, in Opusc. iv. 80 ff. Leyd. 1813; Bellermann, Ueber d. Gemmen d. Alten m. d. Abraxasbilde, Berlin, 1817-9; Matter, Hist. Crit. du Gnosticisme, Paris, 1828; C. W. King, The Gnostics and their Remains, London, 1864.

III. The proper form of the name is evidently Abrasax, as with the Greek writers, Hippolytus, Epiphanius, Didymus (De Trin. iii. 42), and Theodoret; also Augustine and 'Praedestinatus'; and in nearly all the legends on gems. By a probably euphonic inversion the translator of Irenaeus and the other Latin authors have Abraxas, which is found in the magical papyri, and even, though most sparingly, on engraved stones.

The attempts to discover a derivation for the name, Greek, Hebrew, Coptic, or other, have not been successful; and Basnage and Jablonski may be right in maintaining its purely artificial character. Yet we may with better reason suppose that it came originally from a foreign mythology, and that the accident of its numerical value in Greek merely caused it to be singled out at Alexandria for religious use. It is worth notice that ΜΕΙΟΡΑΣ and ΝΕΙΛΙΟΣ have the same value. The Egyptian author of the book De Mysteriis in reply to Porphyry (vii. 4) admits a preference of 'barbarous' to vernacular names (τῶν ἐκείνων οὐκ ἐλευθέρων) in sacred things, urging a peculiar sanctity in the languages of certain nations, as the Egyptians and 'Assyrians'; and Origen (Contra Cels. i. 24) refers to the 'potent names' used by Egyptian sages, Persian Magi, and Indian Brahmins, signifying deities in the several languages.

If a fresh conjecture may be hazarded, two widely spread Shemitic roots offer a probable etymology. Ab-razach probably, ab-zarach certainly, denotes 'the father of effulgence,' a name appropriate to a solar deity. אֲבִירָח, אֲבִירָח, and אֲבִירָח are cognate roots, expressing the twin conceptions of a loud cry and the breaking forth of light. Movers (Phoen. i. 229) shews that Serach was apparently a Phoenician name of Adonis, whose worship was connected with the seasons of the year (cf. Macrob. Sat. i. 21, "Adonis quoque solem esse non dubitabitur inspecta religione Assyriorum, apud quos Veneris †Architidis† et Adonis maxima olim veneratio viguit, quam nunc Phoenices tenent"), and who had much in common with 'Jao' (ib. 542 ff.); and he mentions al-sarak, "the rising and blazing sun," as "an idol of the old Arabians, according to the Camus." Chwolsohn (SSabier, ii. 281) observes that the root zarach, 'to shine,' occurs often as a proper name among the most different Shemitic races, as the Jews, Elomites, Ethiopians, and Babylonians. We may add the Assyrian deity Assarach and the problematical Nisroch of 2 Kings xix. 37, Is. xxxvii. 38, who loses the initial N in the better MSS. or the LXX, and, what is yet more to the point, becomes Ἀράσκησ in Josephus (Ant. x. i. 5). Nor is the Persian extraction of Arsaces so certain as to preclude the suspicion that his name may have the same origin. Notwithstanding the rarity of the forms in which the r precedes the s, this various evidence shews how easily Abrasax may come from the name of a Shemitic god representing the sun, though the locality cannot at present be determined. [H.]

ABRAXAS. [ABRASAX.]

ABRES, Bishop of Seleucia and patriarch, was ordained at Antioch. He was a pupil of Mares and succeeded him. Bar Hebraeus relates that he was descended from Joseph the carpenter, the father of James and Josias. Amru says that Abres was not ordained at Antioch but at Jerusalem by St. Simeon, the successor of St. James the Great (Assem. B. O. ii. 395; iii. 611, 612). [W. A. W.]

ABRUNCULUS, APRUNCULUS, St., 24th Bishop of Treves, mentioned by Gregory of Tours. His death is placed in 557. Commemorated on April 22. He was buried in the Church of St. Paulinus. His relics were transferred to the Monastery of Sprinkirsbach. Gall. Chr. xiii. 380; Act. SS. Boll. April, iii. 30. St. Apponculus, bishop of Treves and confessor, is probably the same. [C. D.]

ABSTINENTES. So Philastrius (Haer. 84) calls a sect in Gaul, Spain, and Aquitania, evidently meaning the Priscillianists (cf. Aug. Haer. 70). [H.]

ABUNDIUS, fourth Bishop of COMO, 450-469, a native of Thessalonica. He was present at the Council of Constantinople, 450 (Labbe, ed. Coleti, iv. 751); and took an active part against the Eutychian heresy at the Council of Chalcedon, where he represented Pope Leo. He was afterwards present at a Council of Milan, 452, held to refute the same heresy (Ughelli, I. S. v. 259, Leo M. Ep. 97). The authorship of the Te Deum is ascribed in some MSS. to him (Tillemont, M. E. xiii. 962). [W.]

ABURGIUS (Ἀβούργιος), an old friend and fellow countryman of St. Basil (Ep. 33, 75, 147, 178, 196, 304). He was a person of high station and great influence (see esp. Ep. 196), and Basil more than once invoked his aid on behalf of friends in trouble (Ep. 75, 147, 178). On one occasion he appeals to him to assist his brother Gregory the bishop (Ep. 33). This is thought to be his friend Gregory Nazianzen and not his actual brother Gregory Nyssen (Garnier, Vit. Bas. Op. iii. p. lxxix). One of these letters to Aburgius (Ep. 196), sent when the writer considers himself on the point of death, is included also among the letters of Greg. Naz. (Ep. 241, where the name is read Ἀβουργίῳ), and perhaps ought not to be assigned to Basil. [L.]

ACACIUS (Ἀκάκιος), also written ACATIUS and ACHATIUS in Latin.

(1) A bishop (said to be of Antioch in Phrygia) and confessor according to his Acta (Ruinart, 138-142), but martyr according to the martyrologies (Menaea March 31, Rab. Maur. March 31, &c.), also called Agathosangelus or Agathangelus, under Decius, A.D. 250; sometimes confounded with Acacius, Bishop of Melitene in Armenia in the 5th century: see Tillemont M. E. iii. p. 357. [A. W. H.]

(2) Bishop of CAESAREA, from a personal defect known as ὁ μονόφθαλμος, the pupil and biographer of Eusebius, the Church historian. He succeeded his master as bishop, A.D. 340 (Socr. H. E. ii. 4; Soz. H. E. iii. 2). He is chiefly known to us as the bitter and uncompromising adversary of Cyril of Jerusalem, and as the leader of the intriguing band of ambitious prelates with whom truth was secondary to power, of whom Eusebius of Nicomedia was the most complete type. The events of his life show Acacius to have been a man of great intellectual ability and little honesty, ready in action, eloquent in speech, subtle in argument, and unscrupulous as to the means by which he secured his ends; with no deep convictions on the great subjects of controversy, concealing his real views with skilfully chosen ambiguity of language, and adroitly changing them when it was to his advantage to do so. After the death of Eusebius of Nicomedia, c. 342, he became the head of the courtly Arian party, and is thought by some to be the person styled by Greg. Naz. (Orat. xxi. 21) "the tongue of the Arians," George of Cappadocia being "the hand." His dispute with Cyril had its origin in a question of precedence. He assisted Patrophilus and the other bishops of his province in consecrating Cyril, A.D. 351, and in accordance with the 7th Nicene Canon he claimed a right of priority for the metropolitaneal see of Caesarea over that of Jerusalem. This Cyril refused to yield. Animosity having thus arisen, the breach was widened by mutual accusations of unsoundness in the faith. Acacius, being supported by the Palestinian bishops, deposed Cyril on frivolous grounds, and expelled him from Jerusalem, A.D. 358. The next year, A.D. 359, at the Council of Seleucia, Cyril successfully appealed against the sentence and was restored to his see; but at the Synod of Constantinople, A.D. 360, the influence of Acacius with Constantius enabled him again to procure the deposition of his adversary, who was sent into exile until the death of the Emperor [CYRIL OF JERUSALEM.] (Soz. iv. 25; Theodt. ii. 26.)

Acacius took a prominent part in the theological controversies of the period, alternately deposing and being deposed by his adversaries. He attended the council of Antioch, A.D. 341 (Soz. iii. 5), when in the presence of the emperor Constantius "the Golden Basilica" was dedicated by a band of 90 bishops, and subscribed the ambiguous creeds then drawn up from which the term Homoousion and all mention of "Substance" were carefully excluded. With other bishops of the Eusebian party he was deposed at the Council of Sardica, A.D. 347. They refused to submit to the sentence, and withdrew to Philippopolis, where they held a council of their own, and revenged themselves by anathematizing and deposing their deponents, including Pope Julius and Hosius of Cordova (Theodt. ii. 26; Socr. ii. 16; Soz. iii. 14; Labbe. Conc. ii. 625-699). According to Jerome (Vir. Ill. 98), his influence with the emperor Constantius was considerable enough to nominate Felix (the Antipope) to the see of Rome at the fall of Liberius, A.D. 357. Acacius took a leading place among the intriguing prelates, who succeeded in splitting into two the Oecumenical Council which Constantius had proposed to summon, and thus nullifying its authority. While the Western bishops were assembling at Rimini, A.D. 359, he and his brethren of the East gathered at Seleucia, where he headed a turbulent party, called after him Acacians [SELEUCIA, SYNOD of.]. After the majority of the assembled prelates had confirmed the semi-Arian creed of Antioch ("Creed of the Dedication"), Acacius brought forward a confession (preserved by Athanasius de Synod. §29; Socr. ii. 40; Soz. iv. 22) rejecting the terms Homoousion and Homoiousion "as alien from Scripture," and anathematizing the term "Anomoëon," but distinctly confessing the "likeness" of the Son to the Father. This formula the semi-Arian majority rejected, and becoming exasperated by the disingenuousness of Acacius, who interpreted the "likeness of the Son to the great Father" as "likeness in will alone," ὁμοιον κατὰ τὴν βούλησιν μόνον, and refused to be judged by his own published writings (Soer. and Soz. l. c.), they proceeded to depose him and his adherents. Acacius and the other deposed prelates flew to Constantinople, and without delay laid their complaints before the Emperor. The adroit Acacius soon gained the ear of the weak Constantius, and finding that the favour he had shown to the bold blasphemies of Aetius had to some degree compromised him with his royal patron, he had no scruple in throwing over his former friend, anathematizing his doctrines, and acquiescing in his degradation and banishment. A new council was speedily called at Constantinople, of which Acacius was the soul. The proceedings were arranged by his skill, while the numerous letters and documents it sent forth were the product of his facile pen (Philostorg. iv. 12). It was mainly through his intrigues that the Council was brought to accept the Confession of Rimini, and that this heretical formula was enforced on the acceptance of the Church, when, in Jerome's strong words, "the whole world groaned and wondered to find itself Arian" (Dial. adv. Luc. 19). To complete their triumph, he and Eudoxius of Antioch, then Bishop of Constantinople, put forth all their influence to bring the edicts of the Nicene Council, and all mention of the Homoousion, into disuse and oblivion (Soz. iv. 26). On his return to the East in 361, Acacius and his party sought to fortify themselves by the consecration of new bishops to the vacant sees. Among these Meletius was nominated to the see of Antioch, in the hope that, as he had not hitherto declared any very decided opinions on the great point of controversy, gratitude for his elevation would lead him openly to advocate these doctrines. In this they were mistaken, and Acacius revenged himself for the error by the usual course of deposition and banishment (Soer. ii. 44; Soz. ii. 26; Theodt. ii. 27). [MELETIUS]. In spite of his publicly declared opposition to the Nicene doctrines, when the imperial throne, which had been occupied by the semi-Arian Constantius, was filled by the orthodox Jovian, Acacius with his friends found it convenient to change their views; and when the emperor was residing at Antioch in 363, they voluntarily accepted the Nicene Symbol, and handed in a document expressing their adherence to it; "thus," as the philosopher Themistius sarcastically observed, "evidencing that they worshipped the purple and not the Deity" (Soer. iii. 25). On the accession of the Arian Valens, in 364, if Socrates does not do him injustice, Acacius once more went over to the more powerful side, and made common cause with the Arian Eudoxius (Soer. iv. 2). But he found no favour with the Council of Macedonian bishops that met at Lampsacus, and his deposition at Seleucia was confirmed. This is the last time history mentions him. According to Baronius, three years after this Acacius was removed by death beyond the possibility of further change, A.D. 366.

Acacius was a patron of literature as well as a copious writer. He enriched with parchments the library at Caesarea founded by Pamphilus (Hieron. Ep. ad Marcellum, 141). He wrote copiously on Ecclesiastes, and 6 books of σύνμικτα ζητήματα, besides many various treatises; a considerable fragment of his Ἀντιλογία against Marcellus of Ancyra is preserved by Epiphanius, Haer. 72. 6-9. His life of his master Eusebius has unhappily perished. See Fabricius B. G. vii. p. 336; ix. p. 254, 256 (ed. Harless), Tillemont, Mem. Eccl. vi. (passim). [E. V.]

(3) A presbyter of Beroea, who visits St. Basil about A.D. 375, bringing a favourable report of the monastic life there, Basil. Ep. 220. Basil writes to him and others (among whom the name Paulus occurs) condoling with them on the loss of their monastery, which had been burnt by the heretics, Ep. 256. This is doubtless the same Acacius who, in conjunction with Paulus, writes to Epiphanius urging him to compose a work on heresies; for the two are described as presbyters and archimandrites of monasteries in the regions of Chalcis and Beroea in Coele Syria. The letter is prefixed to the Panarium, which was the response to this appeal, Epiphanius. Op. i. p. 3; see Tillemont x. p. 805. He is probably the same with the next (4). [L.]

(4) Bishop of BEROEA, in Syria, c. A.D. 379-436. He was apparently a Syrian by birth, and in his early youth adopted the ascetic life, and entered the monastery of Gindarus, near Antioch, then governed by Asterius (Theodt. Vit. Patr. c. 2). Unless he may be identified with the last mentioned Acacius (as seems highly probable), not much is known of this period of his life. He appears, however, to have been prominent as a champion of the Orthodox faith against the Arians, from whom he suffered (Baluz. Nov. Collect. Conc. p. 746), and it is especially mentioned of him that he did great service in bringing the hermit, Julianus Sabbas, from his retirement to Antioch to confront the members of this party who had falsely claimed his support (Theodt. Vit. Patr. 2, H. E. iv. 24). We find him in Rome, probably as a deputy from the Churches of Syria, when the Apollinarian Heresy was treated before Pope Damasus (Baluz. Concil. 763). After the return of Eusebius of Samosata from exile, A.D. 378, he was consecrated to the see of Beroea (the modern Aleppo) by that prelate (Theodt. H. E. v. 4). As bishop he did not relax the strictness of his asceticism, and like Ambrose (August. Confess. vi. 3) throwing the doors of his house open to every comer he invited all the world to witness the purity and simplicity of his life (Soz. H. E. vii. 28). He attended the Council of Constantinople in 381 (Theodt. v. 8). The same year, on the death of Meletius, he took a leading part in the ill-advised consecration of Flavian to the bishopric of Antioch [FLAVIANUS]. This was in direct violation of the compact between Paulinus and Meletius, and, as perpetuating the unhappy Eustathian schism, was looked upon with well-grounded displeasure both in East and West; and Acacius and those who acted with him were cut off from communion with the Church of Rome (Soz. vii. 11). The death of Paulinus in 388, followed speedily by that of Evagrius, whom the dying bishop had weakly appointed as his successor, removed the chief obstacle to reconciliation. The Council of Capua, at the close of 391 or 392, received Acacius again into communion, together with the prelates of Flavian's party (Ambros. Ep. 9; Labbe, Conc. ii. 1072). The admission of Flavian himself caused more difficulty. Acacius, who, though 76 years old, had been deputed with Isidore of Alexandria to convey to Pope Siricius, in 398, the intelligence of Chrysostom's election to the see of Constantinople, received earnest injunctions from that prelate to do all he could to remove the prejudice from the Pope's mind. His advocacy was strengthened by the long white hair that marked his venerable age, and the reverent mildness of his aspect. He fully succeeded in his object, and returned to Syria bearing letters of communion not only from Rome, but also from Theophilus and the Egyptian bishops. The whole merit of the success was not unjustly ascribed by the bishops of the East to "their father" Acacius (Soz. vi. 9; Soz. viii. 3; Theodt. v. 23; Labbe, Conc. iii. p. 391; Pallad. p. 39).

The beginning of the 5th century saw Acacius one of the most implacable of the enemies of Chrysostom. Palladius traces the animosity to his discontent at the insufficient hospitality he had received when Chrysostom's guest at Constantinople in 401 or 402, and quotes an undignified threat that he "would cook a dish for him" (ἐγὼ αὐτῷ ἄρτυν χύτραν). Referring the reader to the article JOHN CHRYSOSTOM for the details, it will be enough here to say that Acacius took part in the infamous "Synod of the Oak," A.D. 403, where he was one of the four bishops specially excepted against by Chrysostom as men from whom no impartial sentence could be expected; and that he again took the lead in the Synod of 404, after Chrysostom's return from exile, and joined Antiochus, Bishop of Ptolemais, in urging the gentle and hesitating Arcadius to depose him, taking all the apprehended consequences of his deposition on their own heads, ἐπὶ τὴν κεφαλὴν ἡμῶν ἢ τοῦ Ἰωάννου καθαίρεσις (Pallad. p. 82). He added acts of open violence to his urgency with the timid emperor, until he had gained his end in the final expulsion of the saint, June 20, A.D. 404. Nor was his hostility even now satiated. The character of Chrysostom stood high in the West as well as in the East. Pope Innocent might take another view of the dispute. Acacius therefore sent to Rome one Patronus, a deformed dwarf, whose provincial dialect was hardly intelligible, with letters in his own name and that of his adherents, accusing Chrysostom of being the author of the conflagration of his own church. The Pope treated the accusation with deserved contempt, and Acacius was a second time suspended from communion with Rome (Pallad. p. 35). An additional ground of displeasure had been given, A.D. 404, by his clandestine and hurried ordination of Porphyrius as Bishop of Antioch, in direct opposition to the wishes of the diocese (Pallad. 145; Soz. viii. 24). Acacius did not regain communion with the West till 414, and then chiefly through the influence of the excellent Alexander of Antioch, who had healed the long-lasting Eustathian sore, and sought to restore peace fully to the Church by placing Chrysostom's name on the diptychs. The letter sent to the Pope by Acacius, together with those of Alexander, was received with haughty condescension, and an answer was returned readmitting the aged prelate on his complying with certain conditions (Conc. ii. 1266-8). His communion with Alexander was fully restored, and we find the two prelates uniting in ordaining Diogenes, a "bigamus" (Theodt. Ép. 110). Chrysostom's enmity to Chrysostom's memory seems however to have been unquenched; and on the succession of Theodotus of Antioch, A.D. 421, he took the opportunity of writing to Atticus of Constantinople to apologise for the new bishop's having, in defiance of his better judgment, yielded to popular clamour, and placed Chrysostom's name on the diptychs (Theodt. v. 34; Nicephorus, xiv. 26, 27). On the rise of the Nestorian controversy Acacius endeavoured to act the part of a peacemaker, for which his venerable age of more than 100 years, and the popular reverence which had gained for him the title of "the father and master of all bishops" well qualified him. With the view of healing the breach between Cyril of Alexandria and Nestorius, he wrote a reply to a violent letter of the former (A.D. 430), beseeching him not to disturb the peace of the Church for a word, and seeking to put his adversary's views in the most favourable light. When his pacific measures failed, and the differences had risen to a height which could only be settled by a general council, his advanced age prevented his taking any personal part in that summoned at Ephesus, A.D. 431, but he entrusted his proxy to Paul of Emesa, and it is not improbable that the Eastern bishops received a hint from him to meet Cyril with his own weapons and indict him of Apollinarianism. The influence of the aged Acacius was powerful at Court. Theodosius commissioned Count John to lay before the Council a letter Acacius had addressed to him counselling peace, as the model they should follow in their deliberations; and after the powerlessness of his advice had been proved by the unhappy schism between Cyril and the East, the Emperor wrote to him in most reverential terms beseeching him to give his endeavours and prayers for the restoration of unity to the distracted Church. His influence was also appealed to by Pope Sixtus III. for the same object (Baluz. Conc. pp. 721, 754, 757; Labbe, Conc. iii. 1087).

Acacius was strongly prejudiced against Cyril, and disapproved of his anathemas of Nestorius, which, as we have seen, appeared to him to savour of Apollinarianism. He therefore received with satisfaction the intelligence of the deposition of Cyril and Memnon of Ephesus, sent him by John of Antioch and his other friends in the Council (Baluz. Conc. 714), who, on the close of the Synod, visited him at Beroea, with a particular account of all that passed at Ephesus and Chalcedon. What he heard confirmed him in his view of Cyril's heresy. But the old man was weary of controversy, of the uselessness of which he had seen too many proofs in his long life, and Acacius spent his last days in the congenial task of promoting peace between the rival parties. He took part in the Synod held at the Emperor's instance in his own city of Beroea, A.D. 432, by John of Antioch, and did all in his power, both by personal influence and by letters to Cyril and to the Roman Bishop Celestinus, to put an end to the feud. His first endeavours proved unsuccessful, in consequence of the unreasonable demands made of Cyril. But, as detailed in the article CYRIL OF JERUSALEM, he ultimately succeeded in establishing friendly communion between John and Cyril. He saw the peace of the Church re-established, and died, full of days, and honoured of all men, at the reputed age of more than 110 years, A.D. 436.

Three letters are still extant out of the large number that he wrote, especially on the Nestorian controversy; two to Alexander of Hierapolis, Baluzius, Nov. Collect. Concil. cap. xli. p. 746, c. lv. p. 757; and one to Cyril, Ib. c. xvii. p. 440, Labbe, Conc. vol. iii. p. 382 (Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 417; Tillemont, Mem. Eccl. vol. xiv.; Baronius, Ann. Eccl.) [E. V.]

(5) Bishop of AMIDA, c. A.D. 420, chiefly famous for having induced his clergy to sell the gold and silver vessels belonging to the church in order to feed and ransom several thousands of Persian captives, who had been taken by the Romans (Soer. vii. 21; Niceph. xiv. 22; Assem. B. O. i. p. 195 sq., iii. p. 365, 371 sq., 374). "His name might have dignified the saintly calendar," says Gibbon, c. xxxii. He left some Letters, on which Mares the Persian wrote commentaries; Ebedjesu in Assem. B. O. iii. p. 51, 172. [L.]

(6) Bishop of MELITENE in Armenia Secunda, c. A.D. 431. In earlier life a reader in the Church at Melitene, he gained the good opinion of the Bishop Otreus by the sanctity of his life, and was entrusted by him with the education of St. Euthymius; Act. SS. Jan. 20. Succeeding to the see, he became famous by his steadfast opposition to Nestorius, with whom he had lived on intimate terms (σφόδρα ὑπὲρ τοῦ ἀλλοῦ ἡγάπησα are his own words, Labb. Conc. iii. 498), and whom he had tried in vain to reclaim to more orthodox opinions. At the Council of Ephesus, A.D. 431, he took an active and prominent part. Several short speeches are reported (see the indices to Labb. and Baluz. Conc.) besides a homily there delivered by him (Labb. Conc. iii. 983). After the condemnation of Nestorius, when Cyril concluded his concordat with the Oriental bishops [CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA], Acacius wrote to remonstrate with him on the step (Baluz. Conc. 785). Altogether his antagonism to Nestorian teaching was not only persistent but intemperate, and his zeal more than once betrayed him into great extravagances of language. On one occasion he had to defend himself before Theodosius against the charge of maintaining that the Deity is passible—a blasphemy at which the emperor shook out his robe and fell back in horror (Baluz. 723); and again in an extant letter to Cyril he expresses himself in a manner strongly savouring of Monophysitism (Baluz. 786). The date of his death is uncertain, but he was still living when the feuds broke out about Theodore of Mopsuestia; for we find him (c. A.D. 437), in conjunction with Rabulas [RABULAS], exerting himself actively in condemnation of this great man's writings: Liberat. Brev. 10 (Gall. Bibl. Vet. Patr. xii. p. 134). In his own church he was held in high honour. Not long after his death the bishops of his province designate him "the great Acacius our father and doctor" (Labb. Conc. iv. 950); and in some Greek Menaea he is commemorated as a thaumaturge on April 17 (see Act. SS. March 31, but there is some confusion with an earlier Acacius (1)). See Tillemont Hist. Eccl. xiv. p. 294 sq., 385, 453, 475, 567, 628. [L.]

(7) PATRIARCH OF CONSTANTINOPLE, A.D. 471-489. Acacius was originally at the head of an orphanage at Constantinople, which he administered with conspicuous success (Suidas, s. v. Ἀκάκιος). His abilities attracted the notice of the Emperor Leo, over whom he obtained great influence by the arts of an accomplished courtier (Suidas, l. c.). On the death of Gennadius (471) he was chosen Bishop of Constantinople, and soon found himself involved in controversies, which lasted throughout his patriarchate, and ended in a schism of thirty-five years' duration between the Churches of the East and West. On the one side he laboured to restore unity to Eastern Christendom, which was distracted by the varieties of opinion to which the Eutylian debates had given rise; and on the other to aggrandize the authority of his see by asserting its independence over Alexandria and Antioch. In both respects he appears to have acted more in the spirit of a statesman than of a theologian; and in this relation the personal traits of liberality, courtliness, and ostentation, noticed by Suidas (l. c.), are not without importance.

The first important measures of Acacius carried with them enthusiastic popular support, and earned for him the praise of Pope Simplicius. In conjunction with a Stylite monk, Daniel, he placed himself at the head of the opposition to the Emperor Basiliscus, who, after usurping the empire of the East, had issued an encyclic letter in condemnation of the Council of Chalcedon, and taken Timotheus Aelurus, the Monophysite Patriarch of Alexandria, under his protection, A.D. 476. The resistance was completely successful. Basiliscus publicly retracted his letter; the Asiatic bishops who had subscribed it, professed that their names were given under compulsion, and the Monophysites, who had been intruded into various sees, were expelled. In the mean time Zeno, the fugitive emperor, reclaimed the throne which he had lost; and Basiliscus after abject and vain concessions to the ecclesiastical power, was given up to him (as it is said) by Acacius, after he had taken sanctuary in his church, A.D. 477 (Evagr. H. E. iii. 4 ff; Theodor. Lect. i, 30 ff; Theophan. Chron. pp. 104, ff; Procop. B. V. i. 7, p. 195). At this period the relations between Zeno, Acacius, and Simplicius, appear to have been amicable, if not cordial. They were agreed on the necessity of taking vigorous measures to affirm the decrees of the Council of Chalcedon, and for a time acted in concert (Simplic. Epp. 5, 6). Before long a serious difference arose, when Acacius, in 479, consecrated a Bishop of Antioch (Theophan. Chron. p. 110), and thus exceeded the proper limits of his jurisdiction. However, Simplicius admitted the appointment on the plea of necessity, while he protested against the precedent (Simplic. Epp. 14, 15). Three years later (482), on the death of the patriarch of Alexandria, the appointment of his successor gave occasion to a graver dispute. The Monophysites chose Petrus Mongus as patriarch, who had already been conspicuous among them; on the other side the Catholics put forward Johannes Talaia. Both aspirants lay open to grave objections. Mongus was, or at least had been, unorthodox; Talaia was bound by a solemn promise to the emperor not to seek or (as it appears) accept the patriarchate (Liberat. c. 17; Evagr. H. E. iii. 12). Talaia at once sought and obtained the support of Simplicius, and slighted Acacius. Mongus represented to Acacius that he was able, if confirmed in his post, to heal the divisions by which the Alexandrine church was rent. Acacius and Zeno readily listened to the promises of Mongus, and in spite of the vehement opposition of Simplicius, received the envoys whom he sent to discuss the terms of reunion. Shortly afterwards the Henoticon (An Instrument of Union) was drawn up, in which the creed of Nicaea, as completed at Constantinople, was affirmed to be the one necessary and final definition of faith; and though an anathema was pronounced against Eutyches, no express judgment was pronounced upon the doctrine of the two Natures (Evagr. H. E. iii. 14)^a. Mongus accepted the Henoticon, and was confirmed in his see. Talaia retired to Rome (482-3), and Simplicius wrote again to Acacius, charging him in the strongest language to check the progress of heresy elsewhere and at Alexandria (Simplic. Epp. 18, 19). The letters were without effect, and Simplicius died soon afterwards. His successor, Felix III (II) espoused the cause of Talaia with zeal, and despatched two bishops, Vitalis and Misenus, to Constantinople with letters to Zeno and Acacius, demanding that the latter should repair to Rome to answer the charges brought against him by Talaia (Felix Epp. 1, 2). The mission utterly failed. Vitalis and Misenus were induced to communicate publicly with Acacius and the representatives of Mongus, and returned dishonoured to Italy (484). On their arrival at Rome a synod was held. They were themselves deposed and excommunicated; a new anathema was issued against Mongus, and Acacius was irrevocably excommunicated^b for his connexion with Mongus, for exceeding the limits of his jurisdiction, and for refusing to answer at Rome the accusations of Talaia (Evagr. H. E. iii. 21; Felix, Ep. 6); but no direct heretical opinion was proved or urged against him. Felix communicated the sentence to Acacius, and at the same time wrote to Zeno and to the church at Constantinople, charging every one, under pain of excommunication, to separate from the deposed patriarch (Epp. 9, 10, 12). Once again, the envoy of the Pope was seduced from his allegiance, and on his return to Rome fell under ecclesiastical censure (Felix Ep. 11). For the rest, the threats of Felix produced no practical effect. The Eastern Christians, with very few exceptions, remained in communion with Acacius; Talaia acknowledged the hopelessness of his cause by accepting the bishopric of Nola; and Zeno and Acacius took active measures to obtain the general acceptance of the Henoticon. Under these circumstances the condemnation of Acacius, which before had been made in the name of the Pope, was repeated in the name of the council, and the schism was complete^c (485). Acacius, however, took no heed of the sentence up to his death in 489, which was followed by that of Mongus in 490, and of Zeno in 491. Fravitas (Flavitas, Flavianus) his successor, during a very short patriarchate, entered on negotiations with Felix, which led to no result. The policy of Acacius broke down when he was no longer able to animate it. In the course of a few years all for which he had laboured was undone. The Henoticon failed to restore unity to the East, and in 519 the Emperor Justin submitted to Pope Hormisdas, and the condemnation of Acacius was recognised by the Constantinopolitan Church.

Tillemont has given a detailed history of the whole controversy, up to the death of Fravitas, in his Mémoires, vol. xvi, but with a natural bias towards the Roman side. The original documents, exclusive of the histories of Evagrius, Theophanes, and Liberatus, are for the most part collected in the 58th volume of Migne's Patrologia. It has been supposed that Victor Vitensis dedicated to Acacius his History of the Vandal Persecution, but this conjecture is not supported by adequate evidence: Sirmont Vict. Vit. Prol. [W.]

(8) Bishop of SELEUCIA and Catholicus of Persia, from A.D. 485, said to have been the first Nestorian patriarch. He is called the Assyrian, and was educated at the school of Edessa, where, for some reason not explained, he bore the name ܘܘܕܘܢܘܢ "suffocans quadrantem."

Thence he was summoned to Seleucia (on the Tigris) by his kinsman Babuæus, bishop of that church. Having taught there for some years, and gained a great reputation by his learning and character, he was on the death of Babuæus (A.D. 485) unanimously elected to the vacant see. After his elevation, it is said that he was driven by the threats or induced by the wiles of Barsumas bishop of Nisibis, the great Nestorian champion in those parts, to embrace Nestorianism. But his relations with Barsumas, who is said moreover to have compassed the death of his relative and patron Babuæus, are very differently reported by others, and he appears in his dealings with this unscrupulous prelate to have shown great independence and moderation. If Acacius really became a Nestorian (and it is probable that his sympathies were in this direction), he was at least no blind partisan, as the following incident shows. Having been thrown into prison by the Magians, he was released by the Persian king and sent as ambassador to the emperor Zeno, being selected for this purpose on account of his learning and ability. On this embassy he was questioned by the Western bishops about his Nestorianism, and was urged (as a condition of communion) to dissociate himself from the scandalous doings of Barsumas. On the former point he replied that he knew nothing about Nestorianism or Nestorianism; and for the latter, he determined to excommunicate Barsumas, but on his return found that prelate no longer living. He is said to have held a council at Seleucia, at which canons were passed allowing and even encouraging the marriage of the clergy. Altogether he seems to have been a wise, moderate, and enlightened ruler, but in the conflict of Nestorian and Monophysite authorities it is almost impossible to arrive at the truth. The date of his death is differently given by different authorities, and Assemani in this, as in other points, is not consistent with himself; but it must have taken place before the close of the century. Acacius wrote several orations on Fasting, as also on the Faith, in which latter

^a According to the present text of Evagrius (iii. 22), Zeno did not admit the Council of Chalcedon; but in writing to Simplicius he affirms that it was admitted by himself, by Mongus, and by all the churches.

ACATIUS. [ACACIUS.]

ACCA, the fifth Bishop of Hexham (A.D. 709-732), was a native of Northumbria and brought up in the household of Bosa, who became Bishop of York in 678 (Bede H. E. v. 20). A few years after this date he transferred himself to the service of Wilfrid, whom he accompanied in his missionary visit to Sussex about 685 (Bede iv. 14). He seems to have continued with him in the closest intercourse as long as Wilfrid lived. With him he went in 704 to Rome, visiting S. Willibrod in Friesland by the way (Bede iii. 13). Bede's mention of this probably led the pseudo-Marcellinus to reckon Acca among the twelve missionaries sent by Egberht to Friesland in 692 (see Bede, v. 10), falsely, no doubt. On the return from Rome he was made the confidant of Wilfrid's vision at Meaux (Eddius, c. 54). Wilfrid immediately before his death nominated Acca to the Abbacy of Hexham (Edd. c. 62); and the same year he was appointed to succeed him as bishop. He governed the diocese of Hexham from 709 to 732, devoting himself to the completion of Wilfrid's designs, and to the maintenance of the religious education and art of the North on the Roman model. His skill in ecclesiastical music and architecture is mentioned by Bede with especial praise. He brought Mabanus a pupil of the Kentish Church to teach Gregorian music at Hexham, and kept him there for twelve years (Bede, H. E. v. 20). His magnificence in church building was not less than Wilfrid's, whose three churches, dedicated to St. Mary, St. Peter, and St. Michael, in the neighbourhood of Hexham, he completed (R. Hexham, Hist. Hagust. cap. 4). His greatest work, however, was the Library of Hexham, which he furnished with a great number of Lives of the Saints and other ecclesiastical books.

Of his administration of his diocese we know little. He blessed Huuetbert, Abbot of Wearmouth, and Jarrow in 716 (Bede, Hist. Abbat. c. 15). His acquaintance with Bede had begun some years earlier; if the dedication by Bede of his Hexameron to Acca as abbot may be trusted, they must have been friends as early as 709. Bede acknowledges his obligations to Acca for some particulars of his history (H. E. iii. 13, iv. 14); and besides the Hexameron addressed to him a commentary on St. Mark, and a poem on the Day of Judgment (Sim. Dun. ap. Twysden, Coll. 95-98).

It was by Acca's persuasion that Eddius wrote his life of Wilfrid, and to him, conjointly with Tatberht, Abbot of Ripon, that invaluable work is dedicated (Edd. V. Wilfr. Prolog.). Of Acca's own writings only a single letter is preserved addressed to Bede pressing him to write a commentary on St. Luke. This is printed among the letters of Bede; and in Raine's Memorials of Hexham, i. 33.

In 732 Acca was driven from his see (Cont. Bed. 731, Sim. Dun. A.D. 732). The reason is unknown; but it was perhaps connected with the restoration of the metropolitical authority to York on the appointment of Archbishop Egberht who consecrated Frithuberht as Acca's successor in 734. A tradition is preserved by Richard of Hexham that Acca spent his exile in the organization of the Church at Whithern, in Galloway (Hist. Hagust. cap. 15). He died Oct. 20, 740, and was buried at Hexham, outside the east end of the church. Two crosses were set up over the grave, one of which is supposed to be still existing (Raine, Mem. Hexham. i. p. xxxiv). His relics were translated in the 11th century, and again in 1154. He was commemorated in the calendar on the 19th of February.

ACEMBES (Ἀκεμβής), of Carystus in Euboea, is named by Hippolytus (Haer. iv. 2; v. 13; x. 10); followed by Theodoret (Haer. Fab. i. 17), with Euphrates the 'Peratic' as chiefs of the Ophite sect called Peratae. In the second passage the MS. of Hippolytus has Κελαβός, in the third Ἀδεμής, which is also read by Theodoret. Possibly the true form of the name may be Acclmes: cf. Ἀκελιμᾶς (Suid.), Κέλμης, Κέλμης. In [Menander ap.] Joseph. c. Ap. i. 21 Chelbes is a Tyrian name. [PERATAE, OPHITES]. [H.]

ACEPHALI (from ἀ and κεφαλή, those without a head or a leader) is a term applied:— 1. To the bishops of the Oecumenical Council of Ephesus in 431, who refused to follow either St. Cyril or John of Antioch, the leaders of the two parties in the Nestorian controversy. 2. To a radical branch of Monophysites, who rejected not only the Oecumenical Council of Chalcedon in 451, but also the notorious Henoticon of the Emperor Zeno, issued in 482 to the clergy, monks, and congregations of Egypt, with a view to unite the Orthodox and the Monophysites. Peter Mongus, the Monophysite Patriarch of Alexandria, subscribed this compromise [ACACIUS]; for this reason many of his party, especially among the monks, separated from him, and were called Acephali. They were condemned, under Justinian, by a Synod of Constantinople, 536, as schismatics, who sinned against the churches, the pope, and the emperor. Comp. Mansi, Conc. t. viii. p. 891 sqq.; Harduin, Conc. t. ii. 1203, sqq.; Walch, Ketzehistorie, vol. vii.; Hefele, Concilien-geschichte, vol. ii. pp. 549 and 744. [MONOPHYSITES.] 3. To the clerici vagi, i. e. clergymen belonging to no diocese (as in Isid. Hispal. De Offic. Eccl., the so-called Egbert's Excerpts, 160, and repeatedly in Carolingian Councils: see Du Cange); [see DICT. OF CHRIST. ANT., art. VAGI CLERICI]; and 4. It is said to be used sometimes for αὐτοκεφάλιοι. [DICT. OF CHRIST. ANT. ART. AUTOCEPHALI]. [P. S.]

ACESIUS (Ἀκείσιος), "a bishop of the Novatian sect (θηρησεύας)," invited by Constantine to the Council of Nicaea. After expressing his agreement with the decisions of the Council, he is said to have justified his separation from Catholic communion by severe Novatian views on discipline [NOVATIANISM]: whereupon the emperor replied, "Set up a ladder, Acesius, and mount alone to heaven" (Socr. H. E. i. 10; cf. Soz. H. E. i. 22). There seems to be no sufficient reason for doubting the substantial truth of the anecdote which Socrates expressly says was told him by a Novatian presbyter, Auxanon, who went with Acesius to Nicaea, being at the time a mere boy (H. E. i. 13; cf. ii. 98). At a later time, Acesius was bishop of the Novatians at Constantinople (Soz. H. E. ii. 32). Compare Lardner, Credibility, iii. 224, f. [W.]

ACHATIUS. [ACACIUS.]

ACHEA (St.), of Kill-glais, near Ardagh, in Ireland, the daughter of St. Darerca, sister of St. Patrick, in the 5th century. Commemorated on the 5th of August. The name is also written Echea, Echi. (O'Clery, Martyrol. Dungall. ed. Todd and Reeves (Echi); Colgan, Acta SS. Hiberniae, p. 718.) [H. B.]

ACHILLAS (ΑΧΙΛΛᾶς). (1) Patriarch of ALEXANDRIA, A.D. 311–312. During the episcopate of Theonas (283–301) he was ordained presbyter and placed over the catechetical school, where he distinguished himself alike by an ardent pursuit of philosophy and a consistent Christian life (Euseb. H. E. vii. 32, § 30). It was perhaps owing to his eminence in this office rather than to any triumphs achieved during his very brief episcopate (Theodt. H. E. i. 1, ὄλιγον χρόνον πρὸς τῆ) that Athanasius honours him with the title of “the great Achillas” (Op. i. 232). On the martyrdom of Peter he was raised to the patriarchal throne, but died apparently within a year, and was succeeded by Alexander. Euphianus indeed (Haer. lxxviii. 3, p. 719; lxxix. 11, p. 735 sq.) represents Alexander as the predecessor of Achillas, who providentially dies soon after his elevation to make room for Athanasius; but the testimony of strictly contemporary authorities is decisive on this point (Euseb. l. c.; Athan. Op. i. 105, 140, 242). The length of his episcopate again is variously stated, the period assigned to it by different authorities ranging between three months and nearly ten years; but the time given above is probably correct (Tillemont, M. E. vi. 730 sq.). The only act recorded of his episcopate is the restoration of Arius to the diaconate and his promotion to the priesthood (Sozom. i. 15). As we are told that Achillas was the object of malignant attacks on the part of the Meletians (Athan. ll. cc.), it has been thought that this act of clemency to Arius was dictated by excess of zeal against their principles.

(2) One of the Alexandrian clergy, a friend and partisan of Arius, who was deposed by bishop Alexander, and retired from Alexandria with the heresiarch. His name is attached to the letter of defence written afterwards by Arius to Alexander. Contemporaries speak of him as a prime mover of Arianism (Theodt. H. E. i. 3 (4); Epiph. Haer. lxxix. 8 (p. 733); Athan. Op. i. p. 314 sq.). The name is written sometimes Ἀχιλλᾶς, sometimes Ἀχιλλεύς. The former seems to be correct. Jerome calls him a “lector” (adv. Lucif. 20, ii. p. 193), and in the existing text of bishop Alexander’s letter in Theodoret (l. c.) he appears among the deacons; but in another manifesto of Alexander (Athan. Op. l. c.) he is called a presbyter, and in the letter of Arius (Epiph. l. c.) he signs as such. The identity of the person can hardly be doubted. [L.]

ACHOLIUS, bishop of Thessalonica (“ad summum sacerdotium a Macedonicis obsecratus populis, electus a sacerdotibus”; Ambros. Ep. xv. § 12), baptised Theodosius, 380, before his Gothic war [THEODOSIUS], and died c. 383. Ambrose wrote a letter on the occasion of his death (Ep. xv.) to the church at Thessalonica, in which he compares at length his life and gifts with those of Elisha. As Elisha (he argues) was the instrument of proclaiming the discomfiture of the Syrians (2 K. vii.) so Acholius, by his prayers, drove back the Goths from Macedonia (Ambrose, Ep. l. c.; cf. Ep. xiii. § 7). Acholius was present at the Council of Constantinople, A.D. 381 (Socr. H. E. v. 8, Ἀσχόλιος; cf. Vales. l. c.). [W.]

ACLEJAM in the Conflict of Adam and Eve (p. 68 Dillm.) is the twin-sister of Abel and wife of Seth: further on she appears as Lea. In the Ethiopic ‘Clementinum’ she is called Aclenja (Dillmann, p. 139), and by other late writers, Greek, Syriac, and Hebrew (all of whom interchange her with her equally legendary sister LUSA), Climia, Chalmana, Calemora, and Caomena (Dillm. ib. and Fabr. Cod. Ps. Ep. V. T. ii. 44). [H.]

ACTS OF THE APOSTLES, APOCRYPHAL.—Under the name of Acts or Deeds (πράξεις, Acta, Actus), Circuits or Journeys (περίοδοι), and Martyrdom or Consummation (μαρτύριον, τελείωσις), of the various Apostles was comprised in the times of Christian antiquity a widely spread and manifold literature, of which very important remains still exist. As early as the 2nd century numerous legendary reports concerning the fates of the Apostles were in circulation, in part, at least, of a very romantic character. The real history of the lives and deaths of most of the Apostles being shrouded in obscurity, a pious imagination was very early busily employed in filling up the large lacunae left in the historical reminiscences of the Church. Not a few of such narratives owe their origin simply to an endeavour to satisfy the pious curiosity or taste for the marvellous in members of the primitive Church; while others subserved the local interests of particular towns or districts which claimed to have derived their Christianity from the missionary activity of one of the Apostles, or their line of bishops from one immediately ordained by him. It likewise not infrequently happened that party spirit, theological or ecclesiastical, would take advantage of a pious credulity to further its own ends by manipulating the older legends, or inventing others entirely new, after a carefully preconceived form and pattern. And so almost every fresh editor of such narratives, using that freedom which all antiquity was wont to allow itself in dealing with literary monuments, would recast the materials which lay before him, excluding whatever might not suit his theological point of view, — dogmatic statements, for example, speeches, prayers, &c., for which he would substitute other formulæ of his own composition, and further expanding or abridging after his own pleasure, or as the immediate object which he had in view might dictate. Only with the simply miraculous parts of the narrative was the case different. These passed unaltered and unquestioned from one hand to another; ecclesiastical circles the most opposed in other respects having here equal and coinciding interests, while the critical spirit, usually so acute in detecting erroneous opinions or heretical tendencies, was contented here to lay down its arms, however troubled or suspected the source from which such legendary narration might flow. Although therefore these fables originated for the most part in heretical quarters, we find them at a later period among the cherished possessions of ordinary Catholics, acquaintance with them being perpetually renewed, or their memory preserved in Catholic Christendom, partly by the festal homilies of eminent fathers, and partly by religious poetry and works of sacred art. They present however, like all legends or myths preserved in popular memory, great difficulties in the way of a satisfactory treatment from a literary point of view, perpetually springing up, as they do, afresh, now here, now there, now in one shape, now in another, and again withdrawing themselves in a tantalising way, for a longer or shorter period, from the eyes of the historical inquirer. The older church martyrologies and calendars, subject as they were to continuous processes of change and augmentation, and the collectanea of later chroniclers and legend writers, who for the most part copied one from another, have furnished us with rich stores of legendary matter, which only in rare instances can be satisfactorily traced back to their original sources. This remark applies especially to the later Byzantine literature; since in the case of the mediaeval Latin collections, such as those of Ordericus Vitalis in the 12th century, and the Golden Legend of Jacobus de Vitriaco in the second half of the 13th, the direct sources can, for the most part, be fairly ascertained. (The former of these works, Orderici Vitalis Monachi Utiensis Historiae Ecclesiasticae Libri II, was published by André du Chesne among the Scriptores Normannici, Paris 1619; the Legenda Aurea, or Historia Longobardica, is edited by Grässe, Leipzig 1845.) We still possess, with rare exceptions, all the authorities employed by Latin writers from the 7th and 8th centuries downwards, so that critical inquiries of this nature are seldom arrested at a later period than the times of Gregory of Tours († 595), Venantius Fortunatus († 609), and Isidore of Seville († 636), or, at the latest, of the venerable Bede († 735). Byzantine writers on the other hand, down to the 13th and 14th centuries, drew in part from sources now inaccessible. Among these Byzantine authorities may be reckoned along with the invaluable Bibliotheca of Photius, Patriarch of Constantinople towards the end of the 9th century (Μυρίβιβλαν, ed. Bekker, Berlin 1824), the Greek Menaea, and the numerous hagiologies which bear the name of Simeon Metaphrastes (10th century). Some of these are found in Combesisius (Auctarium Novum), others in Surius and the Bollandists (Acta Sanctorum), for the most part only in Latin translations. To these may be added the chronological works of Georgius Syncellus (published by Dindorf, Bonn 1829), and of the patriarch Nicephorus (also published by Dindorf along with Syncellus), Georgius Hamartolus (9th century, published in Migne's Patrol. Graeca, vol. cx), Georgius Cedrenus (11th century, ed. Bekker, Bonn 1838), and several others; finally the Ecclesiastical history of Nicephorus Callisti (14th century, Nicephori Callisti Hist. Eccl., ed. Fronto Ducaeus, Paris 1630). In these later Byzantine writers we not seldom find remains or fragments of older legendary Acts of Apostles which are not without importance for the literary inquirer. It is possible that many authorities of which these writers made use may still lie buried in the dust of our public libraries. At any rate, it is the fact that during the last forty years, since Thilo and Tischendorf have turned their attention to this department of literature, numerous manuscripts, hitherto unknown or at any rate unprinted, have been brought to light; and we know of the existence of several others which still in vain await publication. The pieces published by Tischendorf in his edition of the Apocryphal Acts of the Apostles (Acta Apostolorum Apocrypha, Leipzig 1851) form but a small portion of already existing materials; for the rest, we are still obliged for the most part to have recourse to the older and often not very accessible collections of Neander (Narrationes Apocryphae de Christo et Rebus Christianis, at the end of his Catechesis Lutheri Graeco-Latina, Basel 1567), Fabricius (Codex Apocryphus Novi Testamenti, tom. i. and ii., Hamburg 1703, 2nd ed. 1719, tom. iii., 1719), Grabe (Spicilegium Patrum et Haeticorum, Oxford 1698), Birch (Auctarium Cod. Apoc. Fabrician., p. i., Hamburg 1804), the Bibliothecae Patrum, and the Acta Sanctorum. The older editions are often incorrect and not to be depended on, while the selection made in recent publications is not always happy. How much still remains to be done in order merely to present our existing materials in a complete form and with good texts, is evident from the citations and references in Fabricius (ii. pp. 743-882, iii. pp. 568-660), Thilo (in the Notitia Ueberior Novae Codicis Apocryphi Fabriciani Editionis, prefixed to his edition of the Acta Thomae, Leipzig 1823, and in various programmes), and Tischendorf (prolegomena to his edition of the Acta Apostolorum Apocrypha, already referred to).

From all this it is clear that any comprehensive critical examination of the apocryphal Acts of the Apostles will have great difficulties to contend with. Some of the oldest of these documents were derived merely from oral traditions with which later editors enriched at times their own written materials. Traces of such traditions we encounter as early as the middle of the 2nd century in Dionysius of Corinth, Papias of Hierapolis, Polycrates of Ephesus, Clement of Alexandria, and afterwards in Origen, Irenaeus, Tertullian, &c. But it is now no longer possible in many instances to determine how far even the older fathers made use of already existing written authorities. In some cases this can be clearly proved, as in that of the Acts of Peter and Paul, which are mentioned as early as the end of the 2nd century. Recent investigations moreover have shown that in large portions of these Acts genuine reminiscences are to be found, though not in reference to the legends themselves, yet in regard to the setting in which they are presented to us, their secular historical background or their geographical and ethnographical scenery (compare especially Gutschmid Die Königsnamen in den Apocryphen Apostelgeschichten in der Rheinischen Museum für Philologie, Neue Folge, XIX. pp. 161 sqq. 380 sqq.). Yet, at the same time, all efforts to derive from them any trustworthy particulars as to the actual histories of the Apostles themselves, or to extract from the confused mass of legends any sound historical nucleus, have hitherto proved almost always unsuccessful.

The legends concerning the labours of the Apostles in various countries are all originally connected with that of their separation at Jerusalem, which is as old as the 2nd century. The Decretum Gelasii (vi. 37, Credner, Zur Geschichte des Kanons, Halle 1847, p. 220) refers, among libri rejiciendi, to one which it describes as "liber, qui appellatur Sortes Apostolorum, apocryphus." This book probably contained, besides the legend itself and an enumeration of the different countries which the Apostles took by lot, some account of the various fates which befel them there. It was a book of Gnostic or Manichean origin, if we may draw any conclusion from the connection in which we find it mentioned in Pope Gelasius's decree. Thilo (Acta Thomae, p. 91 sqq.), following St. Augustine (de Util. Cred. c. 3, c. Adim. c. 17), derives the whole legend from the Manichees, who are said to have purposely substituted it for the account of the Pentecostal outpouring of the Holy Spirit in Acts ii. But for proof of this he relies solely on the circumstance that nothing is said of the descent of the Holy Ghost in the Περίοδοι, while the Apostles are there represented as unacquainted with foreign languages, and their division among themselves of the different countries of the earth is said to have taken place immediately after our Lord's Ascension. But the inadequacy of this proof is evident from a comparison of the Doctrina Apostolorum, a Syriac work composed towards the end of the 4th century. (See Cureton's Ancient Syriac Documents, London 1864, p. 24 of the English translation.) In that work the Resurrection and the Pentecostal outpouring of the Holy Spirit are represented, in accordance with an early tradition, as occurring on the self-same day. After the Lord's disappearance in the clouds, the Apostles retire to their ὑπερφῶν, and are at a loss to know how they are to preach the Gospel to all nations while ignorant of their different languages. Peter admonishes his companions to commit their care unto the Lord, whereupon ensues the miracle of Pentecost, and each Apostle receives his own special tongue. Empowered by the gift of the Holy Spirit, they first issue ordinances which shall be binding on all churches and then disperse themselves through the world. From this it is evident that this tradition of the Apostles being in perplexity how they should preach the Gospel to foreign nations does not exclude that of the miracle of the gift of tongues; but, on the contrary, might be employed to suggest a motive for it, even supposing the Manichees had endeavoured to put the miracle of Pentecost in the background. Moreover, the narrative of this miracle in the canonical Book of the Acts, and the enumeration there given of the various nations of the earth whose languages the Apostles spoke, if taken in connection with the command "Go teach all nations," &c. (Matt. xxviii. 19), brings us so near to the legend of the Sortes Apostolorum, that we cannot fix the original date of that tradition later than the 2nd century. The tradition varies however, as to the time which elapsed between the Ascension of the Lord and the fulfilment of His injunction (Matt. xxviii. 19) by the Apostles. Thus the Gnostic Acta Thomae (Tischendorf, Act. Apost. Apocr., p. 190 sq.), Pseudo-Prochorus (Acta Joannis, c. i. in Biblioth. Patr. Maxima, ii. p. 46 sq.), and the Syriac Doctrina Apostolorum mentioned above (Cureton l. c.), represent the Apostles casting lots for the various countries of the earth immediately after the Ascension, and each of them forthwith departing to the province assigned him. The same tradition appears to be assumed in the apocryphal work de Transitu Mariae (Tischendorf, Apocalypses Apocryphae, p. 125, and in a different text p. 114), which, placing the death of the Virgin in the second year after the Ascension, relates how the Apostles, as many as were still alive, were miraculously summoned from distant countries to attend her deathbed. Other apocryphal narratives, on the contrary, date their dispersion 24 years after the Ascension (Tischendorf, Apocal. Apocr. Proleg. p. xliiii), while a tradition widely circulated in the 2nd century told how the Apostles remained by their Master's orders seven or twelve years in Jerusalem, before going forth on their missionary enterprises in the Gentile world. (Seven years is the time fixed in the Clementine Recognitions, i. 43, ix. 29; twelve years in Apollonius ap. Euseb., H. E. v. 18, and in Petri et Pauli Praedicationis ap. Clement. Alex. Strom. vi. 5, p. 762, Potter; cf. Hilgenfeld, Nov.

Testam. extra Can. recept. iv. p. 58.) The latter tradition assumes the existence of the legend of the Apostles dividing the countries of the earth by lot. This legend was known not only to Eusebius (H. E. iii. 1) but perhaps also to Origen (though it remains doubtful how far the citation there made by Eusebius from Origen extends), and is found circumstantially related by Rufinus (H. E. i. 9, and in the Expos. Symb. Apostol.) and Socrates (H. E. i. 19). Compare St. Jerome (in Jesuam 34, iii. p. 279, Martianay) and Nicephorus (H. E. ii. 39). Out of this tradition grew, as early as the 2nd century, the so-called διατάξεις or διαταγαὶ τῶν ἀποστόλων as well as the διδασχὴ (διδασχαι) or διδασκαλία τῶν ἀποστόλων. Notwithstanding the very extensive changes and amplifications which these works have experienced in the course of centuries, we can still find traces of the existence of three distinct original collections, of which the first forms the basis of the first six books, the second of the seventh book, the third of the eighth book of our present Apostolical Constitutions (Constitutiones Apostol., ed. Lagarde, Leipzig and London, 1862).

Inasmuch as all these collections are more or less connected by their contents, it is somewhat difficult to determine their true relation to the Apostolical Constitutions as preserved in Syriac, Coptic, Arabic, and Ethiopic versions. The first six books we still possess in a more ancient form in the Syriac Didascalia Apostolorum (published by Lagarde, Leipsic 1855), in the Abyssinian Constitutions, and in one part of the Coptic collection (published by Tattam, London, 1848). They are attributed to Clemens Romanus, and are addressed to Gentile Christians. Hilgenfeld has attempted to restore the original Jewish-Christian work, which formed the basis of this (Nov. Test. extra Can. Rec. iv. p. 79 sqq. Compare also his Apost. Väter, Halle 1853, p. 302 sqq.). The basis of the 8th Book of the Constitutions is the treatise περὶ χαρισμάτων attributed to Hippolytus (comp. διατάξεις τῶν ἁγίων ἀποστόλων περὶ χειροτονιῶν διὰ Ἰππολύτου, in Hippolyti Opp. ed. Lagarde, p. 73). It likewise corresponds to Books iii-vi of the Coptic Constitutions. The seventh book, whose contents stand in close connection with those of the first six books, has an introduction occupying 20 chapters, and consisting of a moralizing treatise concerning "the Two Ways," which is preserved in part in its original form in the introduction to the Coptic Constitutions. The basis of this treatise is the second part of the so-called Epistle of Barnabas (cc. 18-21). A very ancient recension of this work, already known, according to Lagarde and Hilgenfeld, to Clemens Alexandrinus, is the so-called Judicium Petri (κρίμα Πέτρου), or Duo Vite, which is edited in Hilgenfeld's Novum Testam. extra Canonem receptum (Fasc. iv. p. 95 sqq.), after Bickell (Geschichte des Kirchenrechts, Giessen, 1843), Lagarde (Reliquiae Juris Ecclesiastici antiquissimae, Vienna 1856, p. 74, sqq.), and Pitra (Juris Ecclesiastici Graecorum Historia et Monumenta, tom. i., Rome 1864, p. 75, sqq.). According to this work the Twelve Apostles, before separating for their different spheres of labour in the various countries which they have assigned to themselves, assemble together for the purpose of making common ordinances for the whole of Christendom. Such ordinances and regulations, either attributed to the Apostles themselves and, as here, assigned in groups to one or other among them, or put into the mouth of distinguished apostolical teachers (a Hermas, a Barnabas, an Ignatius, a Clement, or a Polycarp), were in very various forms in active circulation in the 2nd and 3rd centuries. The Ebionitic περίοδοι Πέτρου, which were the groundwork of the Clementine Recognitions, are already familiar with three classes of apostolical regulations, the observance of which is incumbent on the Gentile Churches. The first of these contains 30, the second 60, the third 100, such Mandates (Recogn. iv. 36). One very old collection, not quite identical with any above-named, is the Syriac Doctrina Apostolorum, edited by Cureton, and also by Mai (Script. Vet. Nova Collectio, tom. x.), and Lagarde (Reliquiae Jur. Eccles. antiquiss.). This contains 27 Canons. The Ethiopic collection contains 38, the Egyptian 79, the Greek in its older form 50, in its later 85 Apostolical Canons. In like manner tradition assigned the composition of the Creed to the Apostles, each Apostle having one article to himself (see Rufinus, Expos. Symboli Apostol., and Pseudo-Augustin., Sermo 115). Besides these there were current during the 2nd century several other works entitled 'the Preaching,' 'Preachings,' or 'Doctrine' (κήρυγμα, κηρύγματα, and διδασκαλία) of Peter, Paul, Thaddaeus, Matthias, or James. These from the first contained both didactic and narrative portions. To this class of writings belonged the Jewish-Christian κηρύγματα Πέτρου, which Hilgenfeld has shown to be the groundwork of the three first books of the Clementine Recognitions, the Catholic κήρυγμα Πέτρου καὶ Παύλου (Hilgenfeld, p. 52 sqq.), the Syriac Doctrina Additae (Cureton, p. 6 sqq.), the Gnostic Παραδόσεις Μαθθίου (Hilgenfeld, p. 50 sqq.), and the Ebionitic ἀναβαθμοὶ Ἰακώβου (cf. Epiiph. Haer. xxx. 16). The Precepts of Peter and Paul (Petri et Pauli Praecepta, Πέτρου καὶ Παύλου διατάξεις) still exist in MS in both Greek and Latin texts (Fabric. Cod. Apocr. N. T. tom. ii. p. 932). They are according to Grabe (Spicileg. i. 85 sq.) essentially identical with the latter part of the 8th book of the Apostolical Constitutions (c. 32 sqq.). A late recension of the κήρυγμα Πέτρου, which however in this form cannot be dated earlier than the 5th century, has been published in a Syriac version by Cureton (Anc. Syr. Doc. p. 35 sqq.). It is entitled 'The preaching of Peter in the City of Rome.' After a brief historical introduction the "Preaching" itself follows, which has a somewhat Monophysite colouring, and then the legend (drawn from the Acts of Peter) of the Apostle's conflict with Simon Magus at Rome, and his martyrdom there along with St. Paul. The book, notwithstanding its later date, is of considerable importance, as being evidently based on very old materials. It proves how closely this kind of literature was connected at an early date with the apocryphal Acts of the Apostles. On the other hand these latter (e. g. the Catholic Acta Petri et Pauli, and likewise the Acts of Bartholomew, Philip, and others) are wont to contain more or less detailed didactic expositions. In a similar way we find in the Jewish-Christian Journeys of Peter, περίοδοι Πέτρου, traces of an older work, the Preachings of Peter, already mentioned, which consisted chiefly, if not exclusively, of speeches attributed to that Apostle. A critical examination therefore of the apocryphal Acts of the Apostles cannot be conducted without taking into account these other works concerning their "Doctrine" or "Preaching."

And we find accordingly that these various "Acts," as well as the διατάξεις and διδασκαλίαι τῶν ἀποστόλων, are wont to take the traditional Parting of the Apostles as their starting-point. This is the case not only with the Acta Thomae, but also with the Historia Joannis of pseudo-Prochorus, the Greek Acts of Andrew and Matthew, the Acta Jacobi Zebedaei in the Apostolical Histories of Abdias, and with the Edessene legend of Thaddaeus. The legends also concerning the assignment by lot of their various provinces to particular Apostles vary considerably, which is the less to be wondered at as the names of the Apostles themselves are not in all such traditions the same. Some, as Thaddaeus and Bartholomew, are reckoned now among the Twelve Apostles, now among the Seventy Disciples. Jude is frequently identified with Thomas, and at a later date with Thaddaeus or with Simon. Elsewhere Nathanael is counted among the Apostles, while Cephas is distinguished from Peter, and Levi from Matthew. (For Thaddaeus compare the Acta Thaddaei and Const. Ap. vi. 14, with Euseb. H. E. i. 13, and the Syriac Doctrina Apostolorum in Cureton; for Bartholomew, the Acta Bartholomaei and Const. Ap. vi. 14, with the Acta Philippi; for Jude-Thomas Euseb. H. E. i. 13, the Acta Thomae, and the Syriac Doctrina Apostolorum; for Jude-Thaddaeus, the scholion to the Constitutions in Lagarde, p. 282, and pseudo-Hippolytus also in Lagarde, p. 283; in the first place he is also called Judas Zelotes, a name which is also found in the Chronographer of the year 354; for Jude-Simon see pseudo-Dorotheus in the Bonn edition of the Chronicon Paschale tom. ii. p. 138; for Nathanael the Judicium Petri; for Cephas the Judicium Petri and Clem. Alex. ap. Euseb. H. E. i. 12; for Levi, Heracleon in Clem. Strom. iv. 9, p. 595, Potter.) The Apostolical Constitutions (vi. 14), following Matt. x. 2 sq., enumerate the Apostles thus:—Peter and Andrew, James and John the sons of Zebedee, Philip and Bartholomew, Thomas and Matthew, James (the son) of Alphaeus (Jacobus Alphaei) and Lebbaeus with the surname Thaddaeus, Simon the Cananite and Matthias; to whom are added James the Lord's Brother and Bishop of Jerusalem, and Paul the Teacher of the Gentiles (Doctr. Gentium, ὁ τῶν ἐθνῶν διδάσκαλος). The Acts of Thomas follow the catalogue in St. Luke (vi. 14 sq.), differing from it only in calling Simon not ὁ ζηλωτής but ὁ κανανίαιος; while in substituting for Thaddaeus Jude (the brother) of James (Judas Jacobi) they make two Judes among the Apostles besides Judas Iscariot, viz. Judas Jacobi and Judas-Thomas. The Judicium Petri gives the following list:—John, Matthew, Peter, Andrew, Philip, Simon, James, Nathanael, Thomas, Cephas, Bartholomew. Here then Nathanael and Cephas occupy the places of Thaddaeus and James (the son) of Alphaeus. In the Liber Generationum (the Chronicon of Hippolytus) there is no catalogue of Apostles in the present text. The Chronographer of the year 354 enumerates them as follows:—Peter and Andrew, James and John (the sons of Zebedee), Philip and Thomas, Bartholomew and Matthew, James (Jacobus Alphaei), and Judas Zelotes and Simon the Cananite; the Scholion to the Constitutions in Lagarde thus:—Peter and Andrew, James (Jacobus Zebedaei) and John, Philip and Bartholomew, Thomas [and Matthew] James (Jacobus Alphaei) and Thaddaeus-Lebbaeus or Judas-Zelotes, Simon the Cananite and Matthias; pseudo-Hippolytus thus:—Peter, Paul, James (Jacobus Zebedaei), John, Andrew, Philip, Bartholomew, Thomas, Matthew, Judas Jacobi, Thaddaeus called also Lebbaeus and Judas, James the Lord's brother, Simon the Cananite or ὁ ζηλωτής, Matthias; to whom are then added the Evangelists, Luke, Mark, and Philip; pseudo-Dorotheus thus:—Peter, Andrew, James (Jacobus Zebedaei), John, Philip, Bartholomew, Thomas, Matthew, Judas Jacobi, Simon-Judas, Matthias, Simon ὁ ζηλωτής; the catalogue in the Chron. Pusch. (ii. 142) entitled τῶν ἰβ' ἀποστόλων αἱ πατρίδαι (?) thus:—Peter and Andrew, James and John the sons of Zebedee, Philip, Thomas, Bartholomew, Thaddaeus-Lebbaeus, James (Jacobus Alphaei), Matthew-Levi, Simon the Cananite, Simon Zelotes, Judas Iscariot. The Syriac Doctrina Apostolorum in Cureton gives no complete list of the Apostles; but, in speaking of the division of the respective provinces, it enumerates James (the Lord's brother), Mark, Judas-Thomas, Simon-Cephas, John, Andrew, Luke, Addaeus (Thaddaeus), and his disciple Aggaeus. Several of these lists have no further significance for the critical inquirer, being simply attempts to reconcile the various catalogues given in the New Testament. Such, for instance, is the identification of Thaddaeus with Judas Jacobi (so already Rufinus in Praef. Comm. Orig. in Epist. ad Rom.). The assignment moreover of special provinces to different Apostles in the Scholion to the Constitutions of pseudo-Hippolytus and pseudo-Dorotheus may in consideration of the late origin of these documents be here left out of account. On the other hand it seems worthy of remark, that in the older catalogues St. Paul's name is either omitted altogether, or added afterwards, as in the Constitutions, by a later hand. In the assignment of the various provinces he is altogether passed over, his peculiar missionary field being given to others, so that no room is left for the operations of the Apostle of the Gentiles. St. Paul indeed, according to the older view, which in this species of literature was adhered to even in later times, did not at all belong to the closed circle and sacred number of the Twelve. Even the Syriac Doctrina Apostolorum, which finds a niche for such disciples of Apostles as St. Luke and Aggaeus, makes only a passing mention of St. Paul, and that first in connection with Timothy, where it relates their journeying together through parts of Syria and Cilicia to impart to the Churches there the laws and ordinances of the Apostles, and once again afterwards towards the end where it speaks of St. Paul's journey to Rome and his martyrdom in that city. His own proper missionary field, Ephesus and all Asia, Thessalonica, Corinth and Achaia, is on the other hand assigned to St. John. It is unquestionable that such a depreciation of the Apostle of the Gentiles would in later times have been quite impossible, had not some very early tradition been equally unfavourable to his claims.

Still less agreement is to be found in respect to the missionary field of labour assigned to the various Apostles than in respect to their names. Some of these discrepancies arise from simple substitution of one name for another; as when St. Andrew, according to one account, is sent among the Scythian tribes on the borders of the Euxine (Origen ap. Euseb. H. E. iii. 1), or according to another to Achaia (Acta Andree, Tischendorf p. 105 sq.; Abdias Hist. Apost. iii. 2, 25 sq.), or when St. Matthew, who according to the older legend also laboured in Pontus (Acta Andree et Matthaei, Tisch. p. 132 sq., Acta et Martyrium Matthaei, ib. p. 167 sq.) is afterwards transferred to Ethiopia (Soerates H. E. i. 13; Abdias Hist. Apost. vii). Other seemingly discrepant narratives come, on closer inspection, to the same thing: for example, the tradition that St. Thomas laboured in Parthia (Origen ap. Euseb. H. E. iii. 1; Clem. Recogn. ix. 29), and the apparently contradictory statement that he was the Apostle of India (Acta Thomae, Tisch. p. 190 sq.). At the same time there are traditions which are really and positively opposed to each other, as for instance the legend of St. Peter's labours in Rome, and the other tradition that the Prince of the Apostles had worked along with St. Andrew and St. Matthew in "the land of the barbarians," i. e. among the non-Greek tribes of the east and south-east of the Black Sea, or in the kingdom of the Cimmerian Bosphorus (Acta Andree et Matthaei, Tisch. p. 151; Acta Petri et Andree in Tisch. Apoec. Apocr. p. 161 sq.). The antiquity and credibility of these various traditions respectively is very different.

According to the oldest forms of the tradition, the Apostles divide into three groups: of which the first (Peter and Andrew, Matthew and Bartholomew) is said to have preached in the regions of the Black Sea; the second (Thomas and Thaddaeus, and Simon the Cananite) in Parthia; the third (John and Philip) in Asia Minor. With the exception then of three Apostles—James the son of Zebedee, who early suffered martyrdom in Jerusalem, the other James (Jacobus Alphaei), whom tradition universally confounded with the Lord's brother, and the substitute Matthias, of whom nothing more was known,—we have in these three groups all the Apostles together. They went forth two and two (Mark vi. 7), as is already indicated in the form of the catalogue in Matt. x. 2 sq. (compare also Luke x. 1, where the same command is given to the Seventy). Even the assignment of spheres of labour to the different groups follows the order of names in St. Matthew, except only that the precedence of Matthew to Thomas, which is found in Mark iii. 18 and Luke vi. 15, is here assumed. So we have first Peter and Andrew, then (with the omission of James the son of Zebedee, who was beheaded in Jerusalem) John and Philip, then Bartholomew and Matthew, then Thomas and (with the omission of James identified with the Lord's brother, and therefore supposed to remain behind in Jerusalem) Thaddaeus, and finally Simon the Cananite, for whom St. Matthew's catalogue provided no companion.

(1) The first group consists then of Peter, Andrew, Matthew, and Bartholomew. St. Andrew, who according to a tradition apparently known already to Origen (in Euseb. H. E. iii. 1) laboured in Scythia, is made by another tradition certainly older than the Gnostic Acts to have worked along with St. Matthew among the Anthropophagi on the Cimmerian Bosphorus (Acta Andree et Matthaei, Acta et Martyrium Matthaei, comp. Gutschmid l. c. p. 392) and in "the land of the barbarians" to the east and south-east of the Greek colonies in Pontus. For the preaching of St. Andrew at Sinope there was an ancient local tradition appealing to his chair of white stone, which long continued to be shown in that city (Epiph. Monachus, ed. Dressel, 1843, p. 47 sq.; and the Greek Menaea for 30 Nov.). Other traditions point to Sebastopolis in Colchis, Apsaros, Trebizond, Amasia, Nicaea, and Nicomedia, as having been the seats of this Apostle (Abdias, H. A. iii. sq.; pseudo-Dorotheus in Chron. Pasch. ed. Bonn, ii. p. 136; pseudo-Hippolytus in Lagarde Cont. Ap. p. 283; and the Greek Menaea for 30 Nov.). The first canonical Epistle of St. Peter leads us by its address into the same region, being directed to the strangers of the dispersion of Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia; and the same is the case with the already mentioned Acts of Peter and Andrew, which represent the two brothers as meeting in the land of the barbarians. So likewise the Syriac Doctrina Apostolorum (Cureton, l. c. p. 33) assigns to St. Peter, besides Antioch, Syria, and Cilicia, also Galatia and Pontus; and that not only it would seem on the authority of the First Epistle, inasmuch as that epistle does not mention the earlier places. These regions belonged indeed, as well as the city of Rome, which is afterwards referred to, to the missionary sphere of St. Paul, who in this work has no province assigned him in the division made among the Apostles. In the case of St. Bartholomew likewise, his missionary field of labour is not to be sought elsewhere than in the kingdom of the Bosphorus. The Indians, to whom Eusebius makes him journey (H. E. v. 10), are simply confounded with the "Sindians," over whom the Bosphorian kings of the house of Polemo bore rule (Gutschmid, l. c. p. 174 sq.). The territory assigned in the Acts of St. Bartholomew to Polymius or Polenius, i. e. Polemo II, king of Pontus and Bosphorus, and then of Pontus and Cilicia, corresponds exactly to the region assigned in the other legend to the Apostles Peter, Andrew, and Matthew; with which agrees likewise the connection marked by the legend in Eusebius (H. E. v. 10) between the missionary labours of St. Bartholomew and the diffusion of St. Matthew's Gospel. Armenian local traditions point to the same neighbourhood, making the scene of St. Bartholomew's death to be the city of Areban, Alban, or Albanopolis, in the Greater Armenia, also called Korbanopolis and Urbanopolis (cf. Gutschmid l. c. p. 174, who supposes this to be the Armenian metropolis Erwandashat), while the tradition preserved in the Acta Philippi (Tisch. Acta Ap. Apocr. pp. 88, 91, 94; comp. the fragment from the pretended Crato in the Appendix to Steph. Praetorius' edition of the Epistle to the Laodiceans, 1595, which is also found in Fabricius l. c. ii. p. 685 sq. 931 sq., Tisch. l. c. proleg. p. lxx.) places it in Lycaonia, a country near to Cilicia, which, for a time formed part of the dominions of Polemo II.

(2) The second group of Apostles is transferred to Mesopotamia and Parthia. Not to speak here of Babylon, from whence the First Epistle of St.

Peter is dated, the local traditions of Edessa lay claim not only to Thaddaeus (Euseb. H. E. i. 13, Doctrina Addaei and Doctrina Apost. in Cureton, and the Acta Thaddaei in Tischendorf) but also to St. Thomas (Euseb. H. E. i. 13; Assemani Bibl. Orientalis, iii. p. ii. p. 34 sq.; Rufin. H. E. ii. 5, Abdias Hist. Apost. ix. 25; Fiorentini Martyrol. Hieronym. p. 147; comp. Thilo Acta Thomae p. 105 sq.). To the former (Thaddaeus) is ascribed in the Acta Thaddaei (Tisch. p. 263 sq.) five years' missionary activity in Amida on the Tigris, after which he is said to have journeyed through the cities of Syria and to have died a natural death at Berytus. A somewhat different account is given in the Doctrina Addaei (Cureton l. c. p. 20 sq.), according to which the Apostle, after many years' work at Edessa, dies in that city. Thomas, on the other hand, is in the Clementine Recognitions (ix. 29), and by Origen (Euseb. H. E. iii. 1., if the passage in question be really part of the citation from Origen), said to have preached in Parthia, and, according to the Gnostic Acta Thomae, in India, i.e. (as Gutschmid has shown, l. c. p. 162 sq.) in Aria, Drangiana, and Arachosia, over which countries, in the years A.D. 7-29, the Gundaphorus mentioned in the Acts reigned as king, himself deriving his descent from a Parthian dynasty (Gutschmid, l. c.). The bearing of this latter circumstance, however, on the legend of St. Thomas is perhaps of small significance, inasmuch as it is shown by Gutschmid's investigations that the Acts of Thomas are really based on a Buddhist work containing the history of a conversion, the scene of which must have been Arachosia, and its date the times of this Gundaphorus. We can hardly suppose that this Christian recasting of a Buddhist fiction, which implies considerable intercourse between Christian parties and the votaries of Buddhism, could have been already known to Origen. It seems indeed, that the last editor of the Clementine Recognitions certainly made use, in the corresponding portion of his work, of "the Book of the laws of the Countries," which was the composition of a disciple of Bardesanes; and yet, although the relations of Bardesanes to Buddhism might make it appear probable that these Acta Thomae were already in existence when that book was written, it seems certain that the statement that St. Thomas preached among the Parthians could not have been derived from the same source, but that, on the contrary, we must assume here, as elsewhere, the existence of an earlier Ebionitic tradition (comp. Hilgenfeld, Clement. Recognitions and Homilien p. 310). On the other hand, we have an important statement in Moses of Chorene (ii. 32, 3, p. 144 ed. Whiston), who wrote between A.D. 459 and A.D. 481, and in Suidas (s. v. ὠνητή), according to which the city of Edessa was possessed, during the years 91-108, by the Armenian branch of the Parthian dynasty (Gutschmid, p. 171). In any case, the boundary of the Parthian empire must have approached at that time so near to Edessa as to make a journey of the Apostle from thence into Parthia appear sufficiently credible, while the earlier tradition knew certainly as little of a preaching of St. Thomas among the Indians as it did of that of St. Bartholomew. Further, it is to Persia, i.e. the Parthian territory, that the Acts of Simon and Jude in Abdias (Hist. Apost. vi. 7 sq.) assign the missionary activity of those Apostles. Their royal convert Xerxes (or rather Nerseh), who according to the 'Acts' reigned in Babylon, is Vardanes, the son of Artaban III., about whose history the 'Acts' otherwise prove themselves to be well instructed (Gutschmid p. 382 sq.), although the date of their composition certainly falls late in the times of the Sassanidae. Moses of Chorene (ii. 20. 16-21, p. 140 sq.) likewise is acquainted with the legend about Simon, according to which that Apostle preached the Gospel about A.D. 42 in Persia and under a king named Nerseh, and this legend is also connected in the authorities employed by him with that of Abgar king of Edessa. (See Gutschmid p. 381 sq., and article "Gotarzes" in Allg. Encyclop. der W. und K.) The fact that Moses of Chorene mentions only Simon and not his companion Judas agrees moreover with the subordinate position which the latter occupies in the Acts of Abdias. There also Simon is the leading person, and Judas remains entirely in the background. The original legend must therefore have named the former Apostle only, and not the latter. The central point of Simon's labours is according to the Acts, as already indicated, the city of Babylon (Abdias vi. 8, 19, 20), whence he issues forth in order to travel in company with Judas through the twelve provinces of the Persian monarchy, and finally to suffer a martyr's death in the city of Suanir (or Suanis, according to the reading in the Martyrol. Hieronym.). By Suanir we are to understand (according to the conjecture of Tillemont and Gutschmid) the Suani, a tribe in the northern part of Colchis. Moses of Chorene makes the death of Simon take place in Veriosphora, i.e., as Gutschmid has shown, in the land of the Iberians, on the southern and eastern slopes of the Caucasus, with which agrees the Georgian local legend, which claims Simon for Egrisse, i.e. Colchis. (Cf. Klaproth Reise in den Kaukasus ii. 113, Gutschmid p. 383 sq.) In Colchis however the missionary territories of both the Simons, that of Simon Peter and that of Simon Zelotes or the Cananite, would meet or overlap one another, and a series of missionary efforts extending from Babylon to the Caucasus is not a very probable undertaking. There is, on the other hand, no need to derive the legend of the sojourn of Simon Cananites at Babylon from 1 Pet. v. 13, nor to admit the highly improbable supposition that the traditional fame of the great Apostle Simon Peter should have given place to that of his less distinguished namesake. We might more readily find an explanation of this transference of Simon Cananites to Colchis in the assumption that the older tradition of Simon Peter's presence there had gradually fallen into forgetfulness under the influence of the legend concerning his work at Rome, were it not for the evidence afforded (e.g. in the Gnostic Acts of Peter and Andrew, which date from the 3rd century) that the older tradition was not so easily nor so soon displaced. With regard to Babylon, there would be a still greater difficulty in accounting for the confusion between the two Apostles in a similar way by an appeal to the dating in the First Epistle of St. Peter. If the name of the place were understood literally, it would exclude the need of supposing that Simon Cananites was ever at Babylon, for it pointed to the presence of Simon Peter there; while on the other hand, if it were allegorically interpreted with most of the Fathers, as a designation of the city of Rome, there would remain no further occasion to find an Apostolical substitute for Simon Peter at Babylon. The connection on the other hand, into which the histories of Abdias bring St. Jude with St. Simon, is merely artificial, the product of later reflection. Jude or Judas is, in the older form of the Edessene legend, identified with Thomas (Eus. H. E. i. 13; Acta Thomae p. 190 sq.; Doctrina Apostolorum, p. 33), and in later ones with Thaddaeus; like Thaddaeus, he is often spoken of as one of the Seventy (cf. Assemani Bibl. Orient. i. 318, iii. 1. 302, 611; Niceph. H. E. ii. 40). Side by side with this we find another legend, similar to that of the Acta Thaddaei, which brings the Apostle Jude (Thaddaeus) from Edessa to Assyria, and from Assyria to Phoenicia, and in the latter country makes him suffer a martyr's death (Assemani, Bibl. Or. iii. 2. 13 sq.).

The conclusion then at which we arrive is this:—The oldest traditions assign to the Apostles Peter, Andrew, Matthew, and Bartholomew, as their sphere of missionary labour, a region to the north of Palestine, extending into the kingdom of the Bosphorus and embracing the whole line of coast to the east and south of the Black Sea, especially Pontus and a portion of Armenia; while to the Apostles Thaddaeus, Thomas, and Simon Cananites, an eastward region is assigned, Thaddaeus being placed in Edessa, Thomas in Edessa and the Parthian empire, and Simon Cananites also among the Parthians and especially at Babylon. It is only necessary to remark that Jews abounded in all these countries, in order to indicate the Jewish-Christian character of such traditions. Besides the region between the Euphrates and the Tigris, in which according to Josephus (Ant. xi. 5. 2) innumerable myriads of Jews were to be found, we may refer for the kingdom of the Bosphorus to Gutschmid p. 177, and the inscriptions there cited; for Pontus to Acts xviii. 2; for Sinope in particular, to the fact that it is mentioned as the home of the Jewish translator of the Bible, Aquila (Epiph. de Pont. et Mens. 14, and Sifra, Behar i. 9, ap. Grätz Gesch. der Juden iv. p. 439, 2nd ed., and Anger de Onkelo i. 9). In the Acts of Bartholomew we have simply the story of a Jewish conversion annexed bodily as it stood; for Polemo II. according to Josephus (Ant. xx. 7. 3) became, in consequence of his marriage with the Herodian Princess Bernice, a proselyte to Judaism, but afterwards relapsed into heathenism (comp. Gutschmid, pp. 174, 177). The same may be suspected to have been the case with the legendary history of Thaddaeus, if at least the Izates king of Adiabene, mentioned by Josephus (Ant. xx. 2) as a proselyte to Judaism, were really (as Gutschmid assumes, p. 172) the ancestor of the Christian kings Abgar VII. and Abgar VIII.

(3) The third apostolic group is assigned to Asia Minor, and consists of St. John and St. Philip, the former of whom is said to have laboured at Ephesus, the latter at Hierapolis in Phrygia. This tradition in respect to both Apostles was already fixed in the 2nd century, and in regard to St. John is generally held to be sufficiently accredited. It is at any rate certain that from A.D. 170–180 and onwards the churches of Asia Minor were unanimous in regarding Ephesus as having been the last home and residence of St. John (Apollonius ap. Eus. H. E. v. 18; Polycrates of Ephesus, ib. iii. 31, v. 24; Irenaeus Haer. iii. 3. 4 and elsewhere, Eusebius H. E. v. 20, 24). The statement of Irenaeus however, concerning what he had received from the mouth of the aged Polycarp in reference to St. John, rests on a confusion of the Apostle with a presbyter of the same name, who must have lived and taught in Asia Minor and especially in Ephesus, down to the times of Trajan [see however POLYCARP]. Papias, bishop of Hierapolis, the contemporary and friend of Polycarp, was probably an immediate disciple of the Presbyter, but certainly not of the Apostle (see his own words in Euseb. H. E. iii. 39, and compare them with Eusebius' remarks thereupon, which give the right interpretation of Papias' language; comp. also Euseb. H. E. iii. 36). [PAPIAS.] It was therefore a misunderstanding on the part of Irenaeus which first made Papias, as well as his contemporary Polycarp, an immediate disciple of the Apostle St. John (Haer. v. 33. 4). This John, called the "elder" or "presbyter" (i.e. a disciple of Apostles), who was from the close of the 2nd century more and more confounded with the Apostle, is named in an old tradition, as the successor of Timothy in the bishopric of Ephesus. The Apostolical Constitutions mention him in close connection with Ariston (or Aristion), with whom he is also associated by Papias, and reconcile the contradictions in the popular tradition by making him to have been ordained by the Apostle St. John (vii. 46). (Compare the account drawn by Photius, Bibl. 254, from the Martyrdom of Timothy.) Abdias also makes the Apostle himself to have been Timothy's successor (Hist. Apost. v. 2). And if some scholars of our own time have thrown doubts not only on the prolonged life and labours of St. John at Ephesus extending down to the times of Trajan, but even on the fact of his ever having lived in Asia Minor (so, following the precedent of Litzelberger, quite recently Keim in his Geschichte Jesu von Nazara I. 160 sq.), their objections seem to be quite overborne by the direct evidence of the Seven Epistles to Asiatic Churches in the Apocalypse, and the testimony there given to his presence in the isle of Patmos, even if it be granted that the Ephesian tradition may have been founded on the statements in that book. It is however certain that the earliest reminiscences of the church in Asia Minor, including those of the episcopate of Timothy at Ephesus, refer to the labours of St. Paul (Keim p. 161) in that region, and that the subsequent obscurity of the memory of the Apostle of the Gentiles by that of the Son of Thunder and Pillar-Apostle (Gal. ii. 10) St. John, was due in great measure to that Jewish-Christian tendency which even sought to exclude St. Paul from his peculiar foundations at Thessalonica and Corinth and in Achaia, and to substitute the memory of the beloved disciple (Doctrina Apost., Cureton l. c. p. 34). The later traditions of the Church followed unsuspectingly these Jewish-Christian fictions, when their original purpose was no longer apparent. Not only Catholic fathers, like Clemens Alexandrinus, Origen, Tertullian, &c., but also those Gnostic Acts (of which we now possess what is genuine only in fragments, and the rest in forms more or less altered by Catholic manipulation) speak unanimously of the residence of St. John both in Ephesus and Patmos (see Acta Johannis in Tischendorf; Prochorus de Vita Miraculis et Assumptione Joannis; pseudo-Mellitus de Passione Joannis, and Abdias Hist. Apostol. lib. v). His banishment to Patmos by Domitian is mentioned first by Irenaeus (Haer. v. 30, 3), Clemens Alexandrinus (Quis dives salvetur c. 42, p. 959 Potter) and the Gnostic Acts (cf. pseudo-Prochorus), which record the conversion of the whole island by the Apostle. His legendary martyrdom in boiling oil at the command of the same emperor is probably in its origin a Gnostic tradition, the earlier form of which placed the occurrence at Ephesus (Abdias v. 2), while local interests at a later period transferred it to Rome. Pseudo-Prochorus, against the usual tradition, asserts the composition not of the Apocalypse but of the Gospel in Patmos (compare also the pseudo-Hippolytus in Lagarde p. 283), and states that one of the seven deacons who accompanied St. John in all his travels served him on this occasion as amanuensis (pseudo-Prochorus p. 46 sq.). Another but much later author assigns this office directly to Papias, and has the temerity to cite the witness of Papias himself as his authority (compare the table of contents to the Gospel of St. John in a MS published by Cardinal Thomasius, Opp. ed. Vezzosi i. p. 344 with Hilgenfeld's observations thereon, Zeitschr. für wissenschaftl. Theologie, 1865, p. 77; and the passage from the Cutena Patrum in Joann., edited by Corder, ap. Hilgenfeld p. 79).

As St. John, so also the other Apostle of Asia Minor, St. Philip, has a namesake with whom he is frequently confounded. According to a local tradition mentioned by Polycrates of Ephesus towards the end of the 2nd century (in Eus. H. E. iii. 31, v. 24), the Apostle Philip lay buried with two virgin daughters, who had reached a great age, at Hierapolis in Phrygia, while a third daughter who, it seems, had been married (comp. also Clem. Alex. Strom. iii. 6, p. 535 Potter), rested at Ephesus. The same tradition is mentioned by Papias (Eus. H. E. iii. 39), and somewhat later by Proculus (Eus. H. E. iii. 31). In the Montanist controversies these daughters of Philip are referred to as having been prophetesses (Anon. in Euseb. H. E. v. 17, and Proculus, as before). But in the canonical Acts of the Apostles it is the Evangelist Philip who has four daughters that prophesy (Acts xxi. 8), and the suspicion is an obvious one, that it was only the wish of the Church at Hierapolis to be able to fall back on Apostolic authority that led them to confound the Apostle with the Evangelist. This suspicion increases in force when we observe that Proculus also speaks of these prophetic daughters of Philip as four in number. It is moreover so improbable that both Philips should have had prophetess daughters, and that both should have been buried with them at Hierapolis, that the apparent discrepancy as to the number of the daughters between the witness of Polycrates and that of Proculus can hardly be esteemed of any consequence, nor indeed can the further difference that Polycrates relates that one of the daughters lies buried at Ephesus, Proculus that they all four were resting at Hierapolis. The apparent greater exactness in one of these statements may be simply ascribed to legendary amplification. Yet so universally received was this false tradition at the close of the 2nd century, that the memory of the Evangelist and deacon was already completely lost in or confounded with that of his Apostolic namesake. The Gnostic Acta Philippi agree in this respect with the Catholic tradition. According to these Acts the Apostle Philip after making various circuits is crucified at Hierapolis (Acta Philippi Tisch. p. 75 sqq., containing however only the conclusion of the original work: fragments from its lost parts are preserved in Abdias lib. x., and the Acta Philippi in Hellade ap. Tischendorf, p. 95 sq., belong to one of its earlier sections). These same Acts represent the Apostle as suffering torture along with Bartholomew (one of the Seventy) and his sister Mariamne at Hierapolis, and Philip as actually dying there, while the other two are set free, Bartholomew being some time afterwards crucified in Lycaonia. Another but quite isolated statement is that of pseudo-Hippolytus (Lagarde, p. 283), according to which St. Matthew is burnt to death at (not the Phrygian but the Syrian) Hierapolis. This is evidently a mere confused echo of the legend in the Gnostic Martyrium Matthaei.

At least as well attested, in general estimation, as these accounts of St. John at Ephesus and of St. Philip at Hierapolis, are the Antiochene and Roman traditions concerning St. Peter. We have them in a double form, one Ebionite, the other Petro-Pauline. According to the former, which is most closely allied with the Simon-legend, Simon Peter, as Apostle of the true Prophet, meets his unhalloved namesake Simon Magus by the sea-side at Caesarea and follows him from thence through the maritime towns of Phoenicia and Syria as far as Antioch (so the Clementine Homilies and Recognitions on the testimony of an earlier work) and afterwards to the great metropolis of Rome, in order to oppose and frustrate by word and miracle his deceptive arts and machinations (so the Ebionitic Acts of Peter, which formed the groundwork both of the later Catholic and the Gnostic Acts of Peter and Paul).

It is now universally acknowledged that under the false Simon of the pseudo-Clementine books we must recognise St. Paul, who even in the Acta Petri (Tischendorf, pp. 1-39), after a very careful revision by a Catholic editor, is still plainly discernible through his Simon-mask. For as the legendary fictions invented in the interest of Jewish-Christian schools laid claim to Ephesus and even Thessalonica and Corinth on behalf of St. John, they had yet stronger motives for assigning the two remaining chief theatres of St. Paul's preaching, Syria with its metropolis Antioch, and Rome the final goal of all his labours in the West, to St. Peter as the genuine Apostle of the Gentiles, and to represent him as tearing off the mask from his rival teacher in those two scenes of his most successful efforts and detecting in him the sorcerer and lying prophet.

In later times this Simon-legend, when its true meaning was no longer understood, remained as a recognised possession of the Catholic Church, and the same was the case with the no less widelyspread story of St. Peter's doings at Antioch and Rome; to which the Corinthian Bishop Dionysius (circ. A.D. 170) adds, on the authority no doubt of older witnesses, a story of St. Peter having also laboured at Corinth (Euseb. H. E. ii. 25). All these traditions had a common original in the Ebionitic legend, of which in these Catholic adaptations the anti-Pauline point was broken off, by the two Apostles being represented as peacefully teaching, journeying, and suffering martyrdom in each other's company. (Dionysius Corinth. l. c., Irenaeus Haer. ii. 3. 2 sq., Gaius presb. Rom. in Euseb. H. E. ii. 25, Tertull. Fraescr. Haerct. 36, Origenes in Euseb. H. E. iii. 1). And moreover in the Petro-Pauline reconstruction of the Acta Petri St. Paul is even permitted to take part in the conflict with Simon Magus himself (Acta Petri et Pauli ap. Tischendorf). The Gnostic Acts are likewise subsequent to this conciliatory recasting of the original Peter-legend (Pseudo-Linus de Passione Petri et Pauli in Bibl. Patr. Max. ii. p. 67 sq.). The legend of the two-fold episcopate of St. Peter, first in Antioch and then in Rome, belongs also in its origin to the 2nd century, though not expressly asserted by earlier writers than those of the 4th century (for the Antiochene episcopate, see Eusebius Chron. an. 2055 Abrah., H. E. iii. 36; for the Roman, Euseb. Chron. l. c., H. E. iii. 4, and the Chronographer of the year 354 ap. Mommsen Abhandlungen der königl. sächs. Gesellschaft der Wissenschaften Philol.-histor. Klasse, 1ter band, Leipzig 1850, p. 634). It is to the latter half of the 2nd century that the date of the oldest catalogue of Roman bishops must be referred, which traces their succession back to the Prince of the Apostles.

Notwithstanding its high antiquity however, this Roman legend concerning St. Peter must be regarded as a mere fiction invented to subserve certain powerful interests; while that other tradition, which points to the "lands of the barbarians" on the shores of the Euxine and to the Jewish communities which were settled there, is not only of equal authority but distinctly preferable, as not being burdened with the like suspicions as to the motive which led to its invention. It can moreover lay claim to an equal antiquity of origin; for though the Gnostic Acts of Peter and Andrew, and the Acts of Andrew and Matthew so closely connected with them, cannot be referred to an earlier date than the 3rd century, it seems certain that the legend or tradition which forms their groundwork must have been of a much greater antiquity, and the inscription prefixed to the First Epistle of St. Peter distinctly seems to be in its favour.

If then we would ascertain the earliest traditions in respect to the countries in which the Apostles laboured or suffered martyrdom, it is just those very traditional legends which can be shewn to have existed in the 2nd century and have been generally supposed to be the best attested (as indeed they have received the widest circulation), which we shall have to subject to the most searching criticism. Such must be especially the case with the received traditions concerning the Apostles John, Philip, and Peter. These we must either entirely set aside, or, as in the case of the Ephesian tradition concerning St. John, admit their claims with considerable abatements.

But the like is also more or less the case with other legends concerning the deaths of most of the Apostles. Tradition, since the close of the 3rd century, has uniformly made them all martyrs except St. John, though much divided as to the manner of their deaths. In the case of the beloved disciple likewise, various legendary particulars have been added to adorn the simple tale of his natural departure (comp. John xxi. 23, with the Acta Johannis in Tischend. p. 274 sq., Abdias Hist. Apost. v. 23, pseudo-Mellitus de Passione Johannis ap. Fabric. Cod. Apocr. N. T. p. 621 sq., Augustin. Tractat. in Joann. 124, Ephraim Theoplit. in Photius Bibl. 226). There still remains however one perfectly trustworthy witness from the second half of the 2nd century, according to which at any rate the three Apostles, Matthew, Philip, and Thomas, along with Levi, who is generally identified with Matthew and otherwise quite lost to tradition, all died a natural death (Heracleon in Clem. Alex. Strom. iv. 9, p. 595 Potter). This witness deserves the more attention, inasmuch as it comes from a Gnostic source, i. e. from one of those circles in which afterwards sprang up the legends of the martyrdom of St. Matthew by fire, the crucifixion of St. Philip, and the impaling of St. Thomas (Acta et Martyrium Matthaei, Acta Philippi, Acta Thomae,—all three in Tischendorf). The statement that Philip died a natural death is supported by the local tradition in Phrygia (see ref. above). If indeed the person originally meant in that tradition was not the Apostle but the deacon Philip, the legend of his martyrdom at Hierapolis presupposes the same confusion of the persons whom it is hardly probable that Heracleon knew how to distinguish. It follows then, that the Church, as early as A.D. 170, no longer knew anything of the fate of the actual Apostle Philip. Nor did the Edessene tradition know of the pretended martyrdom of St. Thomas any more than of the violent death of Thaddaeus, whom, as we have already observed, the Greek Acts likewise represent as having died in peace.

Of the history of Jacobus Alphaei nothing more was known in very early times except so far as he was identified with James the Just, who according to a trustworthy account suffered a violent death in a tumultuous time (Joseph. Ant. xx. 9. 1; somewhat differently Hegesipp. in Euseb. H. E. ii. 23, and after him Clem. Alex. in Euseb. H. E. ii. 1). Jude the brother of James (Judas Jacobi), who in the lists of the Apostles is only mentioned by St. Luke, is (as already observed) regarded in the older forms of the tradition as the same with St. Thomas.

If therefore we omit James the son of Zebedee, who according to the canonical Book of the Acts (xii. 2) was put to death by Herod, and likewise St. Paul, there remain only Simon Peter, Andrew, Bartholomew, and Simon the Cananite, of whose deaths by martyrdom there could have been any tradition in the time of Heracleon.

The crucifixion of St. Peter is unanimously reported as a fact both by Gnostics and Catholics from the last decade of the 2nd century onwards, and the knowledge of it appears to have been derived from the old Ebionitic source (Orig. in Euseb. H. E. iii. 1, Tertull. Fraescr. Haer. 36, Acta Petri et Pauli, pseudo-Linus, &c.), though handed down to us only in connection with the Roman tradition, which appears to find some support in the passage in the appendix to the Gospel of St. John (xxi. 18). The Epistle of Clement of Rome to the Corinthians, written at the end of the 1st or beginning of the 2nd century, contains at any rate nothing certain concerning the martyrdom of the Apostle (c. 5). As to the crucifixion of St. Andrew and St. Bartholomew, the tradition was current in the same Gnostic circles as those in which St. Matthew, St. Thomas, and St. Philip were revered as martyrs. In both cases the alleged localities to which the martyrdoms are assigned, must be taken into account—Patrae in Achaia for St. Andrew, Lycaonia for St. Bartholomew; for St. Andrew never was in Greece at all, and the ancient metropolis of Armenia from very early times disputed the possession of the bones of St. Bartholomew with the Lycaonians. The Acts of St. Bartholomew (preserved in Latin in Abdias Hist. Apost. lib. viii., in Greek ap. Tischend. p. 243 sq.), according to which the Apostle was flayed and beheaded, are certainly not older than the 3rd century. Not much later probably are the Acts of Simon and Jude, preserved to us only by Abdias (Hist. Apost. lib. vii.), which represent the two Apostles as perishing through a popular tumult in an idol temple at Suanir (or Suanis). Their author must at all events have had the history of Simon before him as an already existing tradition. This Simon is occasionally confounded with Simeon son of Clopas, bishop of Jerusalem, who was crucified in the reign of Trajan at the command of the proconsul Atticus (Hegesipp. in Euseb. H. E. iii. 32; pseudo-Hippolyt., Lagarde p. 284; pseudo-Dorotheus in Chron. Pasch. ii. p. 138, ed. Bonn; Scholion in Const. Ap. Lagarde, p. 282). The same Apostle in very late accounts is said to have preached the Gospel in Gaza and Eleutheropolis, and thence onwards in Egypt, Africa, Mauritania, and even as far as Britain; and at last to have suffered death by crucifixion in Ostrakina in Egypt (pseudo-Dorotheus l. c., comp. pseudo-Hippolyt. l. c., and Niceph. Call. H. E. ii. 40, who transfers what is substantially the same account to Jacobus Alphaei).

As respects their origin the apocryphal Acts of the Apostles may be divided into four different classes,—(1) Ebionitic, (2) Gnostic, (3) originally Catholic, and (4) Catholic adaptations or recensions of what were originally Ebionitic or Gnostic documents. The far greater number of the texts preserved to us belong to the fourth class. Only a few of the third class, and those for the most part late works, are now accessible. Of the first and second classes we have but remains and fragments, yet some of those of considerable importance. Nay even the Catholic adaptations have generally come down to us only at third or fourth hand. Few documents in their present form carry us back beyond the 5th century, though the nucleus of most of them is of much earlier date. The Gnostic Acts for the most part date from the second half of the 3rd century at latest; while the Ebionitic and some Catholic adaptations of them cannot be later than the second. And further, since Catholic writers were very apt to borrow from Gnostic sources, and conversely Gnostic writers from Catholic sources, it is often not easy to determine the exact literary relationship between them.

I. Ebionite Acts of Apostles. Such apocryphal Acts are mentioned as in use among Ebionite Christians by Epiphanius (Haer. xxx. 16 sq., 23). Among these the ἀναβαθμοὶ Ἰακώβου were specially distinguished by their marked anti-Pauline tendency (Epiph. Haer. xxx. 16). Remains of this work have recently been supposed to exist in a very ancient fragment now incorporated in the Clementine Recognitions (i. 22–74). Hilgenfeld however supposes this piece, which consists of polemical discussions between the Apostles and certain Jewish parties in the Temple at Jerusalem, to be rather a section of some old Petrine Prædicationes (κῆρύγμα, or more correctly κῆρύγματα Πέτρου) professing to be written by St. Peter himself. Our present sources of information (e.g. Clementis Epist. ad Jacobum c. 20 in the Latin text, Clem. Recogn. i. 17, Clem. Homil. i. 20) certainly show an acquaintance with these κῆρύγματα as a pseudo-Clementine writing. They were divided into ten books, the contents of which are preserved for us in Recogn. iii. 75, and were worked up in the composition of the three first books of the Recognitions. To them were added the old περίοδοι Πέτρου διὰ Κλήμεντος, of which we have two different recastings in the present Clementine Recognitions (ἀναγνωρισμοὶ Κλήμεντος, in ten books, published by Gersdorf, Leipzig 1838), and the Clementine Homilies (τὰ Κλημέντια) in twenty books (now at length published entire by Dressel, Goettingen 1853, and Lagarde, Leipzig 1865). These works contain addresses of St. Peter and disputations between him and Simon Magus, first in Caesarea and afterwards in other towns of Phoenicia and Syria, and have for their historical framework the family romance of Clement of Rome. To the same Petrine literature belonged the old Πράξεις Πέτρου ἐν Ῥώμῃ, which related the Apostle's conflict with the sorcerer at Rome, Simon Magus's miserable end, and St. Peter's crucifixion. All we now know of this work is derived from its later Catholic recasting in the Πράξεις Πέτρου καὶ Παύλου. But portions of it not contained in these Acts seem to have been made use of in the Martyrium Petri et Pauli, called after Symeon Metaphrastes (Acta SS. Jun. V. p. 411 sq.). Of Jewish-Christian origin were also the Histories of James the Elder (comp. Clem. Alex. in Euseb. H. E. ii. 9, and Abdias Hist. Apost. lib. iv.), of James the Lord's brother (comp. Hegesipp. in Euseb. H. E. ii. 23), and of St. Matthew (in Clem. Alex. Paedag. ii. 1, p. 175 Potter, comp. Epiph. Haer. xxx. 23). Among other Jewish-Christian histories of the Apostles are probably to be reckoned Acts of St. Andrew, which formed the groundwork of the Gnostic Acta Andree et Matthæi, Acts of St. Bartholomew the basis of the Nestorian Martyrium Bartholomæi, perhaps also Acts of Peter and Paul, &c.; but of these very uncertain traces are all that remain to us.

II. Catholic adaptations of Ebionite Acts. Among all works of this class, the foremost place must be assigned to the Acta Petri et Pauli, Πράξεις Πέτρου καὶ Παύλου, Greek and Latin (Thilo, Acta Petri et Pauli, Halle 1837, 1838; the Greek text in Tischendorf, l. c. pp. 1–39; the Latin text of the pretended Marcellus in Fabric. p. 632 sq.), in their present form not older than the 5th century, but in their main constituents belonging to the close of the second. They treat in their first section of St. Paul's journey to Rome, in the second of his dealings with the Jewish-Christians there, and then of the audience of both Apostles before Nero, the overthrow of Simon Magus by their combined action, and their martyrdom together. The conciliatory purpose of the work in its present form is as undeniable as the stern anti-Pauline character of the (Ebionite) original. These Acts, as Πράξεις Παύλου, were already known to Origen (in Joann. t. xx. § 12). They are reckoned by Eusebius (H. E. iii. 3, comp. 25) among the Antilegomena; and in the catalogues of books of the N. T. of the Codex Claromontanus and of Anastasius Sinaita (Credner Geschichte des Kanons, 177, 241) among the Apocrypha of the New Testament. With these Acts was also probably connected the Petropauline κήρυγμα Πέτρου, from which Clemens Alexandrinus has preserved numerous extracts (see Hilgenfeld, Nov. Test. extra Canon. rec. iv. p. 52 sq.). This work is to be carefully distinguished from the Ebionite κηρύγματα.

Lastly, there is the Martyrium Bartholomaei, a work in its present form of the 5th century (in Abd. Hist. Apost. lib. viii., and in the revised Greek text in Tischend. p. 242 sq.) and of Nestorian origin, but based on a much older narrative, which itself was the adaptation to Christianity of a Jewish tale of conversion. The scene of the narrative is the kingdom of the Bosphorus under Polemo II., with whose history the writer exhibits considerable acquaintance.

III. Gnostic or Manichean Acts are frequently mentioned by the Fathers of the 4th century and onwards, as made use of by various Gnostic sects and by the Manichees (Euseb. H. E. iii. 25; Epiph. Haer. xvii. 1, lxi. 1, lxiii. 2; Philastr. Haer. 88; Augustin. de Actis c. Felic. Manich. ii. 6, c. Adimant. 17, c. Faust. xxii. 79, c. Advers. Leg. et Proph. i. 20, Tractat. in Joann. cxxiv; Evodius Uzalensis de Fide c. Manich. c. 38; pseudo-Augustin. de vera et falsa Poenit. c. 22; Turibius Asturicensis Epist. ad Idicium et Leporium, in Fabric. Cod. Apocr. ii. p. 754 sq.; Ephraim Theopolit. in Photius Bibl. 229; pseudo-Hieron in Fabric. Cod. Apocr. i. p. 8 sq.; Gelasii Decretum de Libr. recip. c. vi.; Innocent. ep. Rom. ad Exuperium Epist. iii [vi]; Photius Bibl. 114, 179; Timoth. presb. Constantin. in Fabr. i. p. 138 sq.; pseudo-Athanas. Synops. Scr. Sacr.; Nicephor. Stichom. ap. Credner Geschichte des Kanons, p. 242 sq.; pseudo-Mellitus, or Melito, de Passione Joannis in Fabr. iii. p. 604; pseudo-Melito de Transitu Mariae ap. Tisch. Apocal. Apocr. p. 124 and fr.). As the author of this work, as well as the originator of many Gnostic Gospels, is named a certain Lucius Carinus or Leucius Charinus (Λεύκιος Χαρίνος), who is spoken of as a Manichean. According to Photius, Bibl. 114, this work of Lucius Charinus bore the title τῶν ἀποστόλων περιόδοι, and contained the Acts of Peter, John, Andrew, Thomas, and Paul; in another place (Bibl. 179) the Byzantine scholar mentions a collection in use by a Manichean named Agapius, which bore the title πράξεις τῶν δώδεκα ἀποστόλων, and was perhaps identical with the work attributed to Lucius Charinus. At any rate the apocryphal Acts above referred to are by no means the only ones of Gnostic origin. This Lucius Charinus is simply the legendary representative of the whole of this extensive branch of literature, which certainly did not proceed from a single author. The date of its origin must be carried back to the 3rd century—for the most part rather to the beginning than the end—and in some cases even to the closing decades of the 2nd century. The extensive use made of these writings by the Manichees must not mislead us to attribute their authorship to members of that sect. According to the testimony of Epiphanius, they were largely in use among other heretical parties, and much that still remains to us seems frequently to favour older sectarian opinions, although in our present texts the most characteristic passages have been toned down or removed. Scarcely one of these Gnostic Acts of the Apostles has come down to us wholly untempered with; while on the other hand even in works, which have passed already several times through the reforming hands of Catholic revisers, some of the old Gnostic features, despite all their efforts, are still distinctly traceable. The great abundance of this literature need not surprise us, any more than the extensive use made of it by the Catholics. The original purpose with which these apocryphal writings were composed was that of diffusing a knowledge of the doctrines and customs of the various Gnostic schools, and of setting up against the Catholic tradition another which appealed with no less confidence to the authority of Apostles and their immediate disciples. And yet it was hardly as a sort of rival or additional canon that these writings were presented to the Christian public of those times. They aimed rather at supplying a popular kind of religious reading in the shape of tracts set forth by the Gnostic propaganda, which, professing to contain historical reminiscences from Apostolic times and composed in the credulous spirit of the age, seemed to satisfy the demands of pious curiosity and soon obtained an extensive circulation. Catholic bishops and teachers knew not how better to stem this flood of Gnostic writings and their influence among the faithful, than by boldly adopting the most popular narrations from the heretical books, and, after carefully eliminating the poison of false doctrine, replacing them in this purified form in the hands of the people. That this process of purification was not always complete need not surprise us when we consider how changeable or uncertain on some points was the boundary-line between Gnostic and Catholic doctrines. In general however these Gnostic productions, apart from any more or less marked assertion of heretical dogmas or rules of life, betray their real origin by the overgrowths of a luxuriant imagination, by their highly-coloured pictures, and by their passionate love for mythical additions and adornments in excess even of the popular belief in signs and wonders. The favourite critical canon—"the more romantic the more recent in origin"—does not hold good as against this branch of literature, in which exorcisings of demons, raisings of the dead, and other miracles of healing or of punishment, are multiplied endlessly. The incessant repetition of the like wonders baffles the efforts of the most lively imagination to avoid a certain monotony, interrupted however by dialogues and prayers, which not seldom afford a pleasant relief, and are sometimes of a genuinely poetical character. There is withal a rich apparatus of the supernatural, consisting of visions, angelic appearances, voices from heaven, speaking animals, and demons, who with shame confess their impotence against the champions of the truth; unearthly streams of light descend, or mysterious signs appear, from heaven; earthquakes, thunders, and lightnings terrify the ungodly; the elements of wind, and fire, and water minister to the righteous; wild beasts, dogs, and serpents, lions, bears, and tigers, are tamed by a single word from the mouth of the Apostles, or turn their rage against the persecutors; dying martyrs are encompassed by wreaths of light or heavenly roses and lilies and enchanting odours, while the abyss opens to devour their enemies. The devil himself is often introduced into these stories in the form of a black Ethiopian, and plays a considerable part. But the visionary element is the favourite one. Our Lord often appears to His servants, now as a beautiful youth, and again as a seaman, or in the form of an Apostle; holy martyrs return to life to manifest themselves, at one time to their disciples, at another to their persecutors. Dreams and visions announce beforehand to Apostles their approaching martyrdom, or to longing souls among the heathen the fulfilment of their desires. All this phantastic scenery has been left, for the most part, untouched by Catholic revisers, and remains therefore in works which in other respects have been most thoroughly recast. Yet was it only in very rare cases that these romantic creations of fancy were themselves the original object in view with the writers who produced them. That object was either some dogmatic interest, or, where such retired into the background, an ascetic purpose. Many of these narratives were simply invented to extol the meritoriousness of the celibate life, or to commend the severest abstinence in the estate of matrimony. On this point Catholic revisers have throughout been careful to make regular systematic alterations, now degrading legitimate wives to the position of concubines, and now introducing objections connected with nearness of kin or other circumstances which might justify the refusal or the repudiation of a given marriage. But where merely the praise of virginity was concerned, the views of Catholics and Gnostics were nearly identical, except that the former refused to regard the maintenance of that estate as an absolute or universal moral obligation.

Different recensions of the same texts, or here and there isolated fragments preserved in quotations by the Fathers, enable us to make some instructive comparisons, and afford a clue, by the help of which we may follow out the method whereupon later editions and recensions were constructed. Where texts differ, the shorter one is almost invariably the more recent. Narratives, which appeared on any grounds objectionable, were commonly abridged, and that often in a way which rendered them simply unintelligible.

The Gnostic Acts, of which we still have some certain knowledge, are the following:—

(i) ACTA PETRI (πράξεις or περίοδοι Πέτρου), dating perhaps from the end of the 2nd century, a Gnostic recasting of Catholic Acts, attributed to the authorship of Linus the disciple of Apostles. The conclusion of this work is still preserved in a superficial Catholic redaction of the 5th or 6th century, which also bears the name of Linus and is entitled Passio Petri. (A Latin translation will be found in the Bibl. Patr. Max. ii. p. 67 sq.; the Greek text is still only in MS.) It must not be confounded with another book bearing the same title, the composition of pseudo-Abdias (Acta SS. Jun., v. p. 424, sqq.). The Gnostic prayers attributed to St. Peter, which are left nearly in their original form, are important for the knowledge of Gnostic doctrines. Further remains of this work are preserved in a more or less altered shape in pseudo-Hegesippus (de Excid. Hierosol. iii. 2), in the Acts of Nereus and Achilleus (Acta SS. May iii. p. 7 sq.), in various citations made by Fathers, in some additions in the present text of the Catholic Acts, and in another Catholic edition of the Acts of Peter, which was used by Johannes Malala, Anastasius Sinaita, Nicephorus Callisti, and Cedrenus.

(ii) ACTA PAULI. These likewise pretend to be written by Linus: their concluding section, which treated of the Apostle's martyrdom, has been put into fresh shape in the Passio Pauli, and attached to the Passio Petri mentioned above (the Greek text is contained in the same MS., the Latin in Bibl. Patr. Max. ii. p. 70 sq.). Another portion of these Acta Pauli, containing the history of the veil of Perpetua or Plautilla, has found its way, in a somewhat different recension, into some MSS of the Catholic Acta Petri et Pauli. These Acts formed originally, along with the Acta Petri, a far more comprehensive and important whole. The legend contained in this work, and the persons therein named, meet us again and again in subsequent ecclesiastical traditions.

(iii) ACTA JOHANNIS. Remains of these have been collected by Thilo (Fragmenta Actuum S. Johannis a Leucio Charino conscriptorum, Halle 1847). An extract from these Acts, made by Catholic hands, yet retaining numerous traces of the Gnostic original, and embracing only a very small part of the entire work, has been edited by Tischendorf from two MSS (Acta Apost. Apoc. p. 266 sq.). A much more thorough Catholic recasting of these Acts, based on an old Latin version, is found in pseudo-Abdias (Hist. Apost. lib. v). From the same source as this last is derived pseudo-Prochorus, de Vita Miraculis et Assumptione S. Johannis, a Latin rifacimento of what in the Greek text exists only in MS (comp. Thilo, Acta Thomae p. lxxvii. sq.), the περίοδοι Ἰωάννου συγγραφῆσαι παρὰ Προχόρου (Bibl. Patr. Max. ii. p. 46 sq.), and pseudo-Mellitus (Melito), de Passione S. Johannis (in Fabric. l. c. iii. p. 604 sq.). Of these three texts that in Abdias comes the nearest to the original work (in its Latin dress). Pseudo-Mellitus, who from chap. 14 onwards presents quite the same text as pseudo-Abdias, has greatly abridged the earlier portions (cc. 4–13), and the conclusion (cc. 22, 23), which in Abdias still contain much Gnostic matter. Pseudo-Prochorus has likewise still some literal points of agreement with Abdias (compare cc. 8–11 of the Latin text of Prochorus with Abdias v. 2), but the great part of his narrative is occupied with accounts of St. John on the isle of Patmos, which are omitted by the others. A comparison of the concluding words in the Latin Prochorus with the commencement of the narrative in Mellitus shews that both pieces originally constituted one whole. This, in the one work, is attributed to the authorship of Prochorus, one of the seven deacons and presumed companion of St. John; while for the other, the Catholic redaction, Melito of Sardis is made to lend his name.

(iv) ACTA ANDREAE. These, like the fore-mentioned Gnostic Acts, are often referred to by the Fathers, and were circulated among the Gnostics themselves in various editions. The oldest portions of them consist of the 'Acts of Andrew and Matthew among the Anthropophagi' (Acta Andree et Matthaei, not Matthiae as is read in some MSS), and the closely allied work, the 'Acts of Peter and Andrew in the Land of the Barbarians' (Acta Petri et Andree). Of these two the former is preserved to us in a Catholic recension, which is imperfect towards the end, the latter only in fragments, but both in Greek (Thilo, Acta SS. Apost. Andree et Matthiae, Halle 1847; the same in Tischendorf, Acta Apost. Apocr. p. 132 sq.; and Acta Petri et Andree in Tisch. Apocul. Apocr. p. 161 sq.). The foundation of these Acts consisted in a legend known in Jewish-Christian circles, and probably already committed to writing. Based upon them is the Anglo-Saxon poem Andreas and Elene, edited by Jacob Grimm, Kassel 1840. A misunderstanding as to the land in which the Apostle is here said to have suffered martyrdom gave occasion for the pretended Epistle of the Presbyters and Deacons of Achaia concerning the Passion of Andrew, which has come down to us in a Catholic recension, much abridged towards the beginning, and in both the Greek and Latin texts (Greek in Woog Presbyt. et Diacon. Achaiae de Martyrio S. Andree Epistolu Encyclica, Leipzig 1747, and Tischendorf Act. Apost. Apocr. p. 105 sq.; Latin in Surius on 30 Nov. and elsewhere, and in a partially more complete excerpt in pseudo-Abdias Hist. Apost. iii. 35 sq. Fragments of the original text are found in Evodius de Fide c. Manich. c. 38, and in pseudo-Augustin. de Vera et Falsa Poenit. c. 22.). In order to combine and reconcile these two pieces another fiction was devised, the περίοδοι Ἀνδρέου, containing the narrative of St. Andrew's Journey from Pontus to Greece; this is referred to by Philastrius (Huer. 88) as a Gnostic invention, in contradistinction to other Gnostic Acta Andree (the Martyrium). Pseudo-Abdias has preserved some excerpts of it (Hist. Apost. iii. cc. 3-34). We have a Catholic rifacimento of the Acts of St. Andrew (both the Acta Andree et Matthaei and the Martyrium) in the Vita Andree of the Monk Epiphanius (Epiphani edita et inedita, cura A. Dressel, 1843).

(v) ACTA ET MARTYRIUM MATTHAEI, a continuation of the former Acta Andree et Matthaei, describing the completion of the work commenced by St. Andrew among the Anthropophagi by his fellow Apostle St. Matthew, and the death of the latter by a fire martyrdom. The Greek text, which is still preserved (Tischendorf, Acta Apost. Apocr. p. 167 sq.), has been only slightly revised. The old Gnostic element is still very apparent, especially in the prayers. A Catholic excerpt is given by Nicephorus H. E. ii. 41.

(vi) ACTA THOMAE, one of the most famous among the Gnostic Apostolical histories. The former half is preserved almost entirely in its original form (Greek text in Thilo Acta Thomae, Leipzig 1823, and Tischendorf Act. Apost. Apocr. p. 190 sq.). The Gnostic speeches and prayers which it contains, and which have hardly been tampered with by Catholic hands, have been submitted by Thilo to a learned and acute examination, who comes to the conclusion that they exhibit traces of alterations under Manichean influences—a point which perhaps admits of dispute. Of the latter half we have the conclusion containing the Martyrium in a short Greek extract (Consummatio Thomae in Tischendorf l. c. p. 235 sq.). An abstract embracing the whole work is found in Abdias (Hist. Apost. lib. ix), which for the mid-portions of the work (cc. 8-16 in Abdias) is still our only authority.

(vii) ACTA PHILIPPI. Of these, which are seldom mentioned by the Fathers, only fragments have come down to us. The Martyrium of Philip (Acta Philippi in Tisch. Act. Apost. Apocr. p. 75 sq., Apoc. Apocr. p. 141 sq.), forms according to a note in the MS only a part of the original work "from the 15th Act to the end." Of the Greek text we possess various recensions which have been more or less subjected to revision. Abstracts made from them by Anastasius Sinaita and in various Greek Menologies have been collected by Tischendorf (Act. Apost. Apocr. proleg. p. xxxi. sq.). The Vatican MS (mentioned in the Acta SS. May, i. p. 8 sq., but which has remained unedited) appears to contain further remains from that part of the work which immediately preceded the 15th Act. Besides this we have yet another fragment entitled Acta Philippi in Hellade (Greek text in Tisch. Act. Apost. Apocr. p. 95 sq.), which relates the Apostle's conflicts with Greek philosophers and with the High Priest of the Jews who had himself come to Greece for the purpose and suffers a miraculous punishment for his obstinate unbelief. The stories of miracles in the Greek Meneae seem to have been derived from these Gnostic Acts. These are adopted in part for the feast of the Apostle on 1 May in the Acta Sanctorum, and the rest reserved for the 6 June, the festival of the deacon Philip. In the Martyrium edited by Tischendorf we find, besides St. Philip, the Apostles John and Bartholomew and Mariamne sister of the latter, appearing on the scene. The statements in reference to Bartholomew (pp. 88, 91, 94) appear to point to the (viii) ACTA BARTHOLOMAEI, the scene of which lay in Lycaonia. These Acts probably stood in a similar relation to those of Philip, as the Acta Matthaei to those of St. Andrew. Yet hitherto no trace of them has been discovered, except it be in a fragment published by Steph. Praetorius (Fabric. Cod. Apocr. ii. p. 685 sq., iii. p. 931 sq.), and attributed to the authorship of Crato, a disciple of Apostles.

(ix) ACTA PAULI ET THECLAE; written according to the testimony of Tertullian by a presbyter in Asia "out of love to Paul." The author, who must have lived in the 2nd century, was deposed from his ecclesiastical rank on account of this writing (Tert. de Bapt. 17, "sciant in Asia presbyterum qui eam scripturam construxit, quasi titulo Pauli de suo cumulans, convictum, atque confessum id se amore Pauli fecisse loco decessisse"). Tertullian mentions, as special matter of offence, the rights given to women to preach and baptise after the example of Thecla. But still more objectionable perhaps was the Gnostic character of these Acts, which is discernible even in the present text, although the greater part of what was opposed to Catholic faith or practice, such as the fable of the baptised lion (still found by Jerome, Vir. Ill. c. 7), has been carefully removed. Of other doubtful stories, such as the appearance of our Lord in the form of St. Paul, as Thecla throws herself into the pool for the purpose of baptism, there remains now only a brief indication. But throughout the work its Gnostic origin betrays itself in the implied rejection of marriage, and in the commendation of total abstinence from all sensual indulgences by the example of St. Paul and Thecla. The groundwork of the fiction appears to have been a local legend, and the Queen Tryphaena, who is also a relation of the Emperor, was, as Gutschmid's investigations have established, a historical person, who seems really to have lived at the time when St. Paul travelled through Pisidia and Lycaonia (Gutschmid, l. c. p. 177 sq.). Notwithstanding the author's deposition from his ministry, the history of Thecla was universally welcomed in Catholic circles, frequently re-edited and often used as a subject of homiletic discourse. (Comp. the passages collected in the Acta Sanctorum for September, vi. p. 546 sq., in Grabe Spic. Patr. i. p. 87 sq., and in Tischendorf Act. Apost. Apocr. proleg. p. xxi. sq.) Founded upon it are the writing of Basil of Seleucia de Vita et Miraculis S. Theclae, (ed. Tiletanus, Antwerp 1608), and the Acta Pauli et Theclae of Simeon Metaphrastes (in Tiletanus, l. c. p. 250 sq.). The Greek texts which have come down to us give the impression (even in the case of the longer recension) of a frequently abrupt excerpt (in Tischendorf, l. c. p. 40 sq.).

(x) ACTA BARNABAE; first published by Papebroch (Acta SS. Jun., ii. p. 431 sq.) from a Vatican MS, and afterwards by Tischendorf (Acta Apost. Apocr. p. 64 sqq.), who makes use in addition of a Paris MS. The text of these Acts is Greek. They profess to be written by John Mark, and treat of the journeyings together of the two Apostles Paul and Barnabas, their strife concerning Mark and consequent separation, Barnabas' missionary work in Cyprus, his martyrdom there, and the subsequent removal of his companion, Mark, to Alexandria. The present text, a few expressions only (near the commencement) excepted, contains no indications of a Gnostic origin, but is evidently nothing but an excerpt from a larger work. The original Acts could hardly have been older than the second half of the 3rd century, and the present text must have been written before the year 478, when the bones of Barnabas are said to have been discovered (Cedrenus Hist. Compend. p. 618 sq. ed. Bonn); for according to these Acts St. Barnabas was burned, and nothing remained of his body but ashes. The Laudatio S. Barnabae, ascribed to a Cypriote monk named Alexander (Acta SS. Jun. ii. p. 436 sq.), is a very late and worthless compilation made in the interest of the Milanese Church.

IV. Catholic reconstructions of Gnostic Acts have been frequently discussed already. We may here add to those mentioned above the "Apostolical Histories" of the pretended Abdias [ABDIAS] (Historia Certaminis Apostolici, Fabricius Cod. Apocr. N. T. II. p. 402 sq.), of which certain parts have been frequently circulated as distinct works and under different names. The whole work, written in Latin in the second half of the 6th century, is a compilation from very various sources. Great use is made of Gnostic Acts, not in their original form, but in Latin translations of Catholic revisions. Such is especially the case with the histories of Peter, Paul, Andrew, John, Thomas, and perhaps also with that of Philip. We may also refer here to the biographies of the Apostles attributed to Simeon Metaphrastes (about the 10th cent.). Though they were written in Greek, the existing printed texts are for the most part Latin translations, e.g. in the Legendarium of Mombritus (1474), the Vitae Sanctorum of Lipomannus (1551 sq.), in Surius (1569 sq.), and (partially) in the Acta Sanctorum of the Bollandists. These biographies go back in many instances to Gnostic sources, and Gnostic Acts were at any rate mediately used by the Church historian Nicephorus Callisti (H. E. ii. 36 sq.) and the Byzantine chroniclers.

V. Acts originally Catholic. Of these very few remain. Besides the already mentioned Acta Bartholomaei, which are of Nestorian origin, and are probably based on an older Jewish-Christian work, we may name the following:—

(i) DOCTRINA ADDAEI; in Syriac, published by Lagarde (Reliquiae Juris Eccles. Antiquiss.), and Cureton (Anc. Syr. Documents, London 1864, with an English translation, p. 6). This work treats of the legend of Abgarus, and the missionary labours of Thaddaeus (Addaeus) and his disciple Aggaeus in Edessa, and must be carefully distinguished from the Doctrina Apostolorum, which in one MS. is bound up with it. It was written towards the end of the 3rd or in the beginning of the 4th century, but its groundwork must be much older, and it is not without importance for the history of the Canon of the New Testament. Much less original, and yet written before the middle of the 4th century, are the Greek Acta Thaddaei (in Tischendorf, l. c. p. 261 sq.), which already show acquaintance with the legend of the miraculous impression of the Lord's countenance on the handkerchief—a celebrated relique formerly in possession of the Edessenes. [ABGAR.] (On a method of fixing the terminus ad quem for the composition of these Acts by means of the interpolated glosses which they contain, compare Gutschmid, l. c. p. 171.) A late redaction of the same legend is found in Simeon Metaphrastes (Latin in Lipomann. Sanctor. Hist. i. 189; Greek in Combes. Oriq. Constantinop. Manip. Paris 1664, p. 75 sq.). The account given in Moses of Chorene was drawn from an Armenian version of these Acts, which has been lately rediscovered.

(ii) ACTA SIMONIS ET JUDAE. These Acts, professedly composed by one Crato, a disciple of the Apostles, are given in excerpt by pseudo-Abdias (vi. 7 sq.) The two Apostles are there represented as opposing Manichean doctrines in the person of two magicians, Zoroës and Arfaxat. The historical framework of the Acts is derived from the actual history of the Parthian empire about the middle of the 1st century after Christ. This appears to indicate a high antiquity in the original legend, and perhaps the existence of an older Jewish-Christian work containing it, which possibly had passed through Gnostic hands before being made the basis of the present text. The latter conjecture is suggested by the romantic character of some of the details, the miracle of the speaking infant, the tamed tigers, &c.

Finally, the latest among all these apocryphal Acts of Apostles are the

(iii) ACTA MATTHAEI in Abdias (Hist. Apost. vii.) composed about the middle of the 6th century. To assume the existence of any earlier nucleus for these Acts is out of the question, inasmuch as Aethiopia, the country in which their scene is laid, became acquainted with Christianity not earlier than the time of Athanasius (Rufinus H. E. i. 9). Their historical framework moreover is that of a late period; while, as we have seen, in the case of other legendary histories, it is wont to be of a much earlier date. Here it points to the time of King Elesaas, who about the year 524 conquered the Sabeans; though the names of other kings, Aeglippus (Aglebū, Aglebūl) and Beer (Bawaris) are borrowed from a much older Aethiopian dynasty (Gutschmid, l. c. p. 386 sqq.). These Acts, as they appear in the work of Abdias, are connected in a certain way with the Acts of Simon and Jude before mentioned, a connection which may be due to their author himself. [R. A. L.]

ACUANITAE. [ACUAS.]

ACUAS ('Ακουας), an early teacher of Manicheism, who is said to have come from Mesopotamia, and introduced the heresy into Etheuthropolis. The Manicheans were sometimes named after him Acuanitae ('Ακουανίται). Epiphanius (Adv. Haer. lvi. 1) calls him a veteranus, and places the rise of his followers in the fourth year of the reign of the emperor Aurelian (A.D. 273). [E. B. C.]

ACYLAS. [AQUILA.]

ACYLLINUS. [AQUILINUS.]

ADALARIUS (Athalaricus, Adelherius, Adelherus), a priest who accompanied St. Boniface in his expedition to Frisia in 754, and shared with him the glory of martyrdom. See Willibald's account in Act. SS. Boll. Jan. 1, 471. His body was translated from Utrecht with that of St. Eoban to Erfurt, and buried in the monastery of St. Mary. In the breviary of Erfurt he is commemorated with a double rite on April 20, as Episcopus et Martyr. The title of bishop seems to be a baseless assumption, but it probably gave rise to Baillet's statement, which rests apparently on no historical foundation, that Adalard was the first and only bishop of Erfurt, the see after his death being united to that of Mainz. See Henschen, Analecta Bonifuciana, Act. SS. Boll. Jun. 1, 494. Baillet, Vies des Saints, ii. Jun. 58, and iv. Index Topog. 93. See also ADALHARD. [C. D.]

ADALBERT, a prince of the royal race of Northumbria, who devoted himself about the year A.D. 740 to missionary exertions in Holland. Selecting the neighbourhood of Egmond as the scene of his labours, he devoted himself with much zeal to the work of spreading the faith among the heathen Frisians, and after his death was long held in veneration by the inhabitants as their spiritual father. An imperfect life of him is given in Mabillon, Act. Bened. iii. 586. [G. F. M.]

ADALBERT, S. (1) (Teut. "nobly bright," Engl. forms Ethelbert, Albert), a deacon, commemorated June 25. The Bollandists give his acts written by the monks of Egmond and Mettoch. According to these he was a disciple of St. Egbert, and was by him sent into Germany with St. Willebrord and ten others, A.D. 690. He accompanied St. Willebrord when the latter was sent by Pepin of Herstal into Frisia, and there died. His body was preserved at Egmond, and a church and monastery were founded there in his honour by Theodoric II. For a discussion of the statement of Marcellinus that he was son of St. Oswald, king of Deira, see Le Cointe, iv. 392-394. According to him he was present at the Synod of Utrecht in 702, and died in 705. Baillet (Juin, p. 310), considers the Acts very corrupt. (Act. SS. Boll. Jun. v. 94-110; Mabillon, Act. SS. Ben., i. 631-646.)

(2) Count of l'Ostrevant, commemorated on April 22. He married Regina, niece of King Pepin, with whom he dedicated himself to a life of devotion, alms-giving, and good works. From the documents of the church of Denain we learn that they founded the monastery at that place, where their remains rest above the high altar. They are said to have had ten daughters. The exact date of their death is not known, but they flourished about the middle of the 8th century. Act. SS. Boll. April, iii. 73.

(3) A soldier, father of Werinbert, a monk of St. Gall. This Werinbert supplied materials for the first part of his work, to the anonymous monk of St. Gall, who, late in the 9th century, wrote on the personal history of Charles. At Werinbert's death the author takes up the narrative from his youthful recollections of Adalbert's stories about his campaigns against the Huns, and Saxons, and Slaves, when he served before 800 under Keroldus, brother of Queen Hildegardis. He describes Adalbert as a secular man, and little versed in literature, and confesses that he was a reluctant pupil. The old man's perseverance in repeating his tales has been the means of preserving to us some interesting particulars about Charles's expeditions, whatever may be their historical value. Monumenta Carolina, in Rev. Germ. iv. 666, 667. [C. D.]

ADALGISILUS, also written Adelgisus, "Dux Palatii;" appointed in 632 guardian of Sigebert, King of Austrasia in his childhood. Act. SS. Bely. ii. 354, 367, and Ghesquier's note, p. 368. [C. D.]

ADALGISUS (Teut. = noble pledge). (1) i. q. St. Grimo, abbat of Tholey, q. v.

(2) or ALDGILSUS (Baeda lib. v. c. 19), a king of Frisia in 678, when St. Wilfrid touched those shores on his way to Rome. Though it is not stated that he was himself baptized, he gave St. Wilfrid every facility for converting his people, and indignantly refused Ebroin's offer of a peck of gold coin in return for the saint or his head. Tearing the letter into fragments, and throwing them into the fire, he sent back the answer, "So may the Maker of the world utterly cut off his reign and life, who breaks plighted faith with a friend." It is thought that Adalgisus gave Dagobert of Austrasia permission to build a monastery in his territory. Mabill. Ann. i. 540; Batavia Sacra, p. 25. For what is known and conjectured further on the history of this king—there written Aldegillus—an obscure and vexed period, see Urbo Emmius, Rer. Frisicar. Hist. pp. 48–50.

(3) or ADELCHISUS, son of Desiderius the last king of Lombardy and his wife Ansa, associated with his father in the government soon after his succession. He assisted his father in building, in 759, the monastery of Brescia for his sister Ansilberga. Gisla, the daughter of Pepin and Bertrada, was destined for him, but the marriage did not take place. That it was entertained is a proof to Mabillon that Gisla was not yet tied by monastic vows. The strong opposition of Stephen IV. to her brother's Lombardic matrimonial alliance (Gibbon, vi. 155, ed. Milman) was perhaps sufficient to make void the proposal; though, see Mabill. ubi infra after Eginhard. At the descent of Charles into Italy in 773, when Desiderius was being blockaded in Pavia, Adalgisus went to Verona with Auchar a Frank, and the wife and sons of Carloman. They were kindly received by Charles, but from that time history is silent about Adalgisus. Mabill. Ann. ii. 226. [C. D.]

(4) ADELGISUS, Duke sent by Charles in 782 against the Vandals, and treacherously cut off by some rebellious Saxons. Krantzii Rer. German. Script. ii. 38. [C. D.]

ADALGUDIS, co-founder with her husband Grimo in 697 of a nunnery at Limours dio. Paris (if this not Limeux dio. Bourges is Lemansum Gall. Chr. vii. 421). See the charter of foundation with her subscription in Mabill. Ann. i. 704. A placitum of Childbert III. in 703, vindicating the property of this convent, of which Adalgudis, then a widow, was an inmate, against the claims of one Aigatheus, may be seen in Gall. Chr. vii. Instr. p. 4. [C. D.]

ADALHARD (ADELHARD, ADELARD). (Teut. = nobly, stern). .S. abbat of Corbie. His long life, 753–826, forms a link of connection between the 8th and 9th ages; though the most stirring scenes of his life took place shortly before its close, his prominence during the last 25 years of the 8th century demands that his biography should be included in the present work.

The original materials available for our information are—1. A life written by Paschasius Radbert, his disciple, in a flowing style, and overlaid with rhetorical embellishments. 2. There is a more succinct account by Gerard, monk and cellarer of Corbie in the 11th century, afterwards abbat of La Seauve, in Guienne, compressed from the diffuse life by Paschasius, with the object of presenting Adalhard's acts in an historical form. 3. Gerard's book on the posthumous miracles of S. Adalhard, with a continuation by an anonymous monk of Corbie, adds little or nothing of value. 4. A memoir of Adalhard's last years is included in the 'Translatio S. Viti' in Jaffé's Bib. Ker. German. i. pp. 7–11.

Adalhard had all the natural advantages of noble birth and high abilities. His father was Count Bernard, son of Charles Martel. He was thus cousin-german to Charles the Emperor. He was born in Artois, perhaps at a village called Huise (Hustia), near Audenarde. Brought up at the Courts of Pepin, Carloman, and Charles, he might have shone as a courtier, but he became disgusted at the prevalent vices, and made

Charles' rejection of his Lombard princess Ermengarde an excuse for retiring to Corbie, a Benedictine abbey on the Somme, a few miles above Amiens, where he took monastic vows about 773. There he was entrusted with the care of the garden, but his earnest desire was seclusion, and as he could not escape at Corbie from the frequent visits of his relations, after two years he retired to Monte Cassino. Thence he was soon recalled by the importunity of Charles, and his subsequent attempt to lead a recluse's life at Corbie was frustrated by the abbot Nordram compelling him to share in the government of the monastery; the duty of instructing and directing the monks falling to his share. In these duties he was eminently successful. His eloquence and wisdom procured him the name of Aurelius Augustinus, while Alcuin addresses him as Antonius (Alc. Epp. cvii.). It is uncertain at what date precisely he became abbat of Corbie. He was allowed to remain there, quietly performing his duties till 796, when Charles obliged him to mingle in state affairs, and sent him into Italy as chief minister to his son Pepin. In this capacity he won high fame for practical wisdom and strict integrity. Pope Leo III. treated him with an intimacy, says Gerard, such as had been extended to no Frank before by the popes. It is not improbable, considering his relationship to Charles, that Adalhard had some hand in arranging the coronation in St. Peter's basilica on Christmas day, 800. In 809 he was sent by Charles to Rome with another abbat and two bishops. The object of this journey was to obtain the Pope's consent to the decisions of a council which Charles had summoned at Aachen in the spring of the same year on the subject of the Procession of the Holy Ghost (Robertson, C. H. ii. 171–173). See the curious dialogue held between the Pope and the Missi, in Mansi Concil. xiv. 18. At Pepin's death in 810, Adalhard acted as guardian to his son Bernard, then a boy of 12 years. As a proof that this position of authority was distasteful to him, immediately on Charles' death in 814 he returned to Corbie. He was present the same year at the Council of Noyon. His disgrace followed immediately afterwards. It has been attributed to very various causes. It is stated (Robertson, ii. 251), that with his brother Wala he had tried to induce Charles to nominate Bernard as his successor in the place of Louis. Others say that they took part in the actual conspiracy of Bernard, a supposition, says Baillet, amply disproved, since the conspiracy was not detected till two or three years after the dismissal of Adalhard and the compulsory monasticism of Wala. The hagiologists attribute all to the malicious calumnies of political enemies. Louis' ample public apology on their restoration may favour this view. According to the Nouvelle Biographie Générale, Louis' courtiers painted Adalhard as an ambitious demagogue, a statement which seems as gratuitous as the assertion in the same article that he was an open preacher of equality in the application of the laws to nobles and villains. If it be true that Adalhard had always lived as a recluse at Court, his banishment to the abbey of Noirmoutiers in an island called Hère off Poitou, could have affected his peace of mind very little, especially as his brother Wala was put in his place at Corbie. He was recalled from exile in 822, about which date must be fixed his mission-tour into Saxony, and the foundation of New Corbey, as it is spelt, in the diocese of Paderborn. It seems from the statement of Sainte-Marthe, that the origination of this scheme was due to Wala and the younger Adalhard, but our Saint is reckoned its first abbat. He returned to his old monastery in 823, and lived there in the practice of great austerities and virtues till his death, at the age of 73, in 826. Several parish churches in the Netherlands and on the Lower Rhine, are dedicated to St. Adalhard. He is commemorated on Jan. 2. He was buried at Corbie: his epitaph may be seen in Mabill. Ann. ii. 500.

Adalhard's personal character is on all hands allowed to have been very high. If we check the rather profuse eulogies of his biographers with the ascertained historical facts in which he took part, our impression will be that he maintained through a long life of more than common difficulties a very high standard of integrity and of personal goodness. He had high administrative qualities, which were developed during the actual government of his own monastery, and the virtual government of a kingdom. He seems to have retained through life a singular degree of humility. He would often seek advice from the meanest monk, and he was noted for a singular faculty of shedding tears. (The metonym Jeremiah belongs, however, says Mabillon, to his brother Wala.) His liberality bordered on profusion, but the present age would render its warmest acknowledgments to his anxiety for the promotion of learning beyond the walls of his own monastery. See Chalmers' Biog. Dict. He was celebrated in debate, Agobard praises his wisdom in the Conventus of Attigny, 822. (Mab. Ann. ii. 467). He was present at Compiègne in 823.

The writings of Adalhard were probably numerous, but many have perished, and as many perhaps, existing in MS., are still unpublished. Mabillon intended to print some Capitula of instructions to his monks, which he found on the same MS. as the Statuta of Corbie (Act. SS. o. s. B. v. 308), and 52 sermons (Nouvelle Biographie Générale). He did publish a placitum of Adalhard's, in his Iter Italicum, i. 53-56. His most important work, De ordine Palatii, is lost, but Hincmar, who had seen Adalhard and copied this work, gives some considerable extracts (Opp. ed Paris, 1645, ii. 206-215). Hincmar mentions another lost treatise on the Paschal Moon. Adalhard's Statuta Antiqua Abbatiae Corbiensis, copied from the original MS., dated Jan. 822, are in D'Achery's Spicilegium, i. 586-592. A letter addressed to a certain Count by Adalhard, Fulrad and another, as Missi of Charles, dating, says Jaffé, between 801 and 814, may be seen among Epp. Carolinæ, Bib. Rer. German. iv. 417.

All authors who have written with any care on this period mention Adalhard. The following notices should be particularized:—Baillet, Vies des Saints, i. Jan. 34-37. The dates above are chiefly taken from him. Gall. Chr. x. 1266. Mabillon, Ann. ii. passim. See Index Generalis, p. 758. Act. SS. Boll. Jan. i. 95-123. Guizot, Histoire de la Civilisation en France, ii. 116, 344-385. [C. D.]

ADALONGUS (1) (or ADALONUS, ABDALONGUS), Bishop of MARSEILLES, when that city was betrayed to the Saracens by Maurontus in 739: whether they actually occupied it is disputed. Adalongus was inserted among the Saints of March 1 by Molanus in his additions to Usuardus' Martyrology, but he is not recognized by the modern Breviaries or by the Bollandists. Gall. Chr. i. 640; Le Cointe, v. 17.

(2) (ADALUNG or ADALUND, Metrop. Salisburg. iii. 323), with his brothers, Hiltipalt or Kerpalt, and Antonius or Otakir, founded the Benedictine monastery of Schliersee in Bavaria about 779. It was consecrated by Aribio, Bishop of Frisingen. Wigul. Hund (loc. citat.) gives the original charter of foundation, but apparently doubts its genuineness. See also Mabill. Ann. ii. 246. [C. D.]

ADALTRUDIS, wife of Nemfidius, Patrician, and joint-donor with him of some estates near Digne to the monastery of SS. Mary and Victor at Marseilles. Adaltrudis having taken the veil after her husband's death, the donation was disputed by Antenor the Patrician, who had surreptitiously removed and burnt the instruments kept above the altar of St. Victor. The dispute, taken up by Abbo the Patrician, came before Charles in 780. Adaltrudis, by some duplicates of the charters, which she had kept hidden, convinced the missi of the validity of the donation, and her statements being corroborated by inhabitants of Digne, the village in question, Caladium (Chandel) was confirmed to the monastery. See the instrument which is the authority for this history in Gall. Chr. i. Append. 106.; Mabill. Ann. ii. 252. [C. D.]

ADALWIN (Teut. = noble friend), abbot of St. Haimeranus, and 4th, or acc. to an ancient rhyme (in Mabill. Ann. ii. 160), 5th bishop of Regensburg. In 792, two years after he became bishop, he presided at a council which Charles, during a years' stay at Regensburg for the prosecution of his war against the Huns, summoned for the condemnation of the Felician heresy. See Einhardi Ann. and Ann. Lauresham. in Pertz M. G. H. i. p. 179, and Mansi Concil. xiii. 855. Hund supposes that the transfer of the Cathedral from the monastery of St. Haimeranus to the church of St. Stephen within the walls of Regensburg, which was only confirmed about 800 by Pope Leo, was first proposed at this council. He argues the probability that the exchange was made under pressure from Charles, and against the judgment of Adalwin, who at his death in 814 preferred to be laid among his predecessors in the old cathedral. *Metrop. ADAM BOOKS OF—I. THE CONFLICT OF ADAM AND EVE. In 1853 Dillmann printed in the 5th vol. of Ewald's Jahrbücher d. bibl. Wissenschaft a work, half history, half religious romance, under the name The Book of Adam of the Christian East—Das christliche Adambuch d. Orients (also published separately, Göttingen, 1853). The original was an Ethiopic MS. at Tübingen, a recent paper copy brought home by the missionary Krapff from Abyssinia. The full title in the MS. is "The conflict of Adam and Eve which they had to wage after their expulsion from the Garden and during their stay in the Cave of Treasures according to the command of the Lord their Creator and Preserver." This description agrees with the contents of the first 70 pages out of the 125 occupied by the translation. But the story proceeds without the slightest break to depict on a smaller scale the fortunes of the patriarchs down to Melchisedec, who is made a son of Cainan and grandson of Arphaxad. Here too (p. 116) there is no decisive break; but the narrative changes its character, becoming very brief and chiefly occupied with chronology and genealogy. The legendary matter is slight and scattered, and lacks the vigour of the earlier fables. Here also for the first time (at least in clearly genuine portions of the text) appear distinct literary notices, direct quotations from the Bible, and Christian doctrines nakedly set forth. The last page of all contains allusions to Adam and Eve and to the 'treasures' of their 'cave,' but feebly expressed and nowise answering to the bold prophetic language of the original author. The account of the meeting of Melchisedec and Abraham (120, 122) shews no appreciation of the extraordinary office previously assigned to Melchisedec. There are moreover theological differences which can hardly be accidental. The hand of a second author is betrayed by these signs with tolerable certainty. The 104 pages (13-116) of the proper work have a few short passages which look much like interpolations; not merely heads of sections incorporated with the text, as noted by Dillmann, but didactic comments interrupting the story, and out of harmony with it (73 f., ? 100 f., 101, 103, 107: this last page contains 4 such insertions, one of them misplaced by 2 lines). The occurrence of a similar intrusive paragraph at p. 121 indicates that the interpolation is of later date than the concluding portion of the book. To a like origin we may safely refer a detached sentence on the marriage of Noah's sons, which avowedly follows the "Seventy-two wise interpreters" "in the first of the Greek books of the Bible" (99).

After the Fall, which is not itself described, the exiles are represented as permitted to dwell in the "Cave of Treasures," under the western boundary of the Garden. They have to endure a series of trials, partly from the unfamiliar elements of nature, partly from the malice and cunning of Satan, who with his attendant 'Satan's' assumes various shapes to compass their destruction. Yet from the first God makes known to them His covenant, promising that in due season they shall be redeemed by His Word which created them and which they 'transgressed'; and from time to time in their worst extremity He visits them either by His Word or His angels, to give them comfort or enlightenment. Soon He promises to take on Himself human trouble and death; and when Adam and Eve offer on a hastily raised altar their own blood, gathered up from the sharp rocks, He announces that he will one day offer His own blood on the altar, and 'blot out the debts.' At His command gold, frankincense, and myrrh are brought by angels, dipped in the water by the tree of life, and given to Adam as 'tokens' out of the Garden: these are the sacred 'treasures' of the cave, where they are deposited one on each side, the gold to give light by day and night, the frankincense for perfume, and the myrrh for consolation. Then follow in order various events, all pointing back to the Fall, and yet marking steps in the new life; the beginning of clothing, of food, of marriage, of agriculture (and with it of an Eucharistic offering, of which Adam and Eve 'communicate'), of birth, of rivalry of lovers, and of murder. When Adam dies, Seth embalms the body and places it in the cave with a light burning before it, and then receives a renewal of the covenant.

The descendants of Seth are warned by one patriarch after another to have no dealings with the posterity of Cain. At length the catastrophe is brought about by Satan's devices in the days of Jared, and the time of the Flood draws near. Noah carries the body of Adam into the ark, his three sons following with the sacred tokens. After his death the young Melchisedec, divinely summoned to fulfil the command of his forefathers, approaches the ark. It opens miraculously at his touch, a voice from heaven pronounces him priest, and he brings out the body of Adam, his great-grandfather Shem bearing the tokens. With the help and guidance of Michael they journey onwards for three days till they reach a spot where the rock opens and receives the chest containing the four sacred objects. There Melchisedec remains, clothed and girded with fire, to serve God before the body of Adam to all time.

Thus ends the original book of Adam: at least, thus limited, the narrative forms a complete whole. The drama of primitive history is imperfect so long as the body of Adam has not reached its final resting-place. When at length it is restored to the ground whence it was fashioned, on the spot in the centre of the earth where the Second Adam is to accomplish redemption, and when the priest has been divinely consecrated to serve before it for ever, then the work of the First Adam is done.

The merits of this Book of Adam are of a kind to which it is impossible to do justice in a bald summary. In the less interesting chronicle of O. T. events which follows, though worthy of study for the sake of comparison with other Oriental traditions of Jewish history, it will suffice to notice a few salient points. In the days of Nahor, at an interval of 33 years, two great storms of wind are said to have swept the earth, and broken to pieces all the idols (118 f.). Peculiar stress is laid on the intermingling of the seed of Lot with the people of God in Ruth and "Emnan" (Naamah, 1 Kings xiv. 21, 31) as representing Moab and Ammon (123 f.). Daniel is made to be a son of Jehoiakim, born as his mother was being carried captive to Babylon; and Hananiah, Azariah, and Mishael sons of Jechoniah (129). There is a curious passage on the fate of Jewish writings during the Captivity; "The scribes and the expositors [?Targumists?LXX] corrupted the writings, and the Hebrews changed them, and the Syrians and Greeks lost a great part of them," &c. (130); the seeming purpose being to account for the defects in the genealogies, and especially for the rare occurrence of the names of women. "But I, O my brother," the author proceeds further on (132), "have studied much and explored much in the old writings of the Greeks and Hebrews, and have found the names of the wives written in them." He accordingly supplies from his own stores the information which was wanting, he says, to the Jews. Of his records the most cherished is a genealogy of the Virgin Mary. Its absence in "the old historians" (a strange description of the Gospels) had exposed the Christians, he assures us, to the mockery of the Jews. But henceforth the mouth of the unbelievers is stopped, "and now they know that Mary is of the seed of David and of the seed of the patriarch Abraham." The loss of the pedigrees among the Jews he attributes to three burnings of "the Law and the Prophets," "once in the days of Antiochus, who burnt the whole house, the second time when the strongholds of Jerusalem were destroyed, the third time when the writings were burnt" (133).

The legendary basis of the original work is evidently taken from Jewish traditions of greater antiquity, probably much older than the N. T., and sufficiently widely spread to have left traces even in Mahometanism. The form in which it is cast is on the other hand purely Christian. The narrative is often diffuse and consequently wanting in strength: but the style is admirably adapted for its purpose, simple, sincere, and in the best sense popular; and the pervading spirit is a pure and deep religious feeling which seldom flags. The direct introduction of Christian dogma is avoided with a true artistic instinct; while type and prophecy are skilfully contrived to shadow forth Christian beliefs and rites. Redemption is on the whole the prevailing idea. God is set forth as carrying on from the first a saving process in man, educating him through a succession of "conflicts" for his final restoration to the Garden and the realm of light, and encouraging him in the struggles, not merely by ever renewed teaching and help, but by an abiding covenant from generation to generation and the growing hope of a future descent of Himself into the conditions of human life. These prophecies of the Incarnation have a uniform character: they are technically Patripassian. Once only (when the voice from Adam's body speaks to Melchisedec on the second evening of the journey, p. 114; cf. p. 14) is it said that "the Word of God" will come down and suffer and be crucified and wet the crown of Adam's head with "His blood." Elsewhere the suffering and death are invariably predicated of the one "God" or "the Lord" of Adam and his children. Of a Son of God or an Anointed of God there is nowhere a hint. On the other hand in the part of the book which follows the establishment of Melchisedec at Golgotha the Patripassian language completely disappears: not only is "Christ" freely named, but we hear of "the suffering of our Redeemer Jesus Christ" (135) and of "our Lord Christ" as "crucified and dying after the body" (137); as well as (in an apparent interpolation, p. 121) of "the crucifixion of the Son of God." This peculiarity of the earlier language is imperfectly accounted for by the dramatic form; it can proceed only from the belief natural to the author himself. The place held by "the Word of God" is very remarkable. Sometimes the term might be thought a mere metaphor for God speaking: yet oftener the Word of God appears distinctly as a person. Usually God sends His Word to speak to Adam, and His angel or angels to help him; and both modes of intervention are often combined in the same incident; while at times the Word acts and an angel speaks. In one striking passage just before the close (p. 115) the Word and the angels ascend together into heaven. This conception of the Word is not of Christian, much less of Alexandrine origin; but it corresponds essentially with that found in the Targums, and so represents an early Palestinian tradition. The few and slight allusions to the Holy Spirit are interesting as far as they go. Before the Fall His "glories" "satisfy" Adam and Eve, so that they neither hunger nor thirst (34): He descends upon accepted sacrifices (61, 115): the voice from Adam's body out of the ark came to Melchisedec "through the Holy Spirit" (113): His measure of length, applied to the height of the Garden above Eden and to the ark, is three times the ordinary measure (83, 106).

A remarkable negative characteristic of the Conflict of Adam and Eve is its independence of all influence from the Books of Henoch and of Jubilees. The capital difference lies in the interpretation of Gen. vi. 1-4, where it is the sons of Seth who mix with the daughters of Cain (94 f.), not the watcher angels with the daughters of Seth. Here the author (if it be not rather an interpolator: the language on the whole suggests the one alternative, the position of the comment [100 f.: cf. 83] the other) argues against what "earlier sages have written and said" on behalf of the antagonistic view. Elsewhere, as in the names of Adam's daughters and the manner of Cain's death, he ignores the more ancient, or more anciently recorded, legends.

The time and place at which The Conflict of Adam and Eve was written admit of only a loose determination. The immediate original of the Ethiopic version, Dillmann says confidently (7 f.), was not Greek and is shown by various signs to have been Arabic. The names of months are Egyptian as pronounced by Arab lips. It follows that the Arabic version came into Abyssinia out of Egypt, where it must have been executed during the period of Arab supremacy, i.e. not earlier than the 7th century. Again there are no internal signs, of language or of matter, that it was originally composed in Greek; and no clear traces of use by Greek or Latin writers. On the other hand various late Syriac and Arabic documents exhibit coincidences too extensive to be fortuitous, though it is possible that they were indebted to some kindred book constructed of similar materials. Much characteristic detail appears from Dillmann's notes to recur in a late collection bearing the name of Clement, extant in Ethiopic at Tübingen and apparently in Arabic at the Vatican. The same may be said of what appears to be another recension of the same work, an 'Apocalypse of Peter' by the hand of Clement, preserved in Arabic at Oxford and Rome (Nicoll, Cat. codd. orient. Bodl. II. i. 49 ff.; Assemani, Cat. codd. orient. Vat. III. i. 282; cf. Tischendorf, Apocal. Apocr. xx ff.), corresponding with the description of certain Arabic 'Revelations of St. Peter' shown to James of Vitry at the siege of Damietta in 1219. A still closer connexion is discernible with a Syriac book called The Cave of Treasures, on which some information may be gleaned from various notices in Cureton's publications and from Assemani (B. O. ii. 498; iii. 281). The two known copies, in the British Museum and the Vatican, were both written at the beginning of the 18th century in Chaldee letters on paper (Cureton, Corp. Ign. 360; Assemani, l. c.). The verbal coincidences leave no doubt that The Conflict of Adam and Eve itself supplied, to say the least, the foundation for the later work, which has a much more chronogical form (partly reproduced in the 'Apocalypse of Peter'); and two of the quotations (in Cureton, Corp. Iyn. 287; Spicil. Syr. 94 f.) shew that the supplementary matter had been already added at the end (118 f., 135). On the other hand The Conflict of Adam and Eve (134) is free from the interpolation of 3 names into the genealogy taken from Matt. i. (at v. 8), which The Cave of Treasures has in common with some other Syriac writings (Cureton, Syr. Gosp. vii f.). These various marks point to a Syrian origin. Curiously enough a passage attributed to Ephrem himself, the pride of Syriac literature, from his "doctrinal discourses on Paradise," is cited by G. Syncellus (i. 26 Dind.), the purport of which nearly coincides with statements in the Conflict of Adam and Eve; and vaguer references elsewhere to the same effect are not wanting (Dillmann, 10). It is true the passages referred to do not appear in Ephrem's published writings. But according to Dillmann (10) "nearly all that is contributed in the Book of Adam towards describing the original state and the change of man after his banishment from the Garden rests on Ephremic thoughts and expressions and is to be read here and there in his writings, specially in the hymns on Paradise; and even of the legends and biblical interpretations occurring in our book several may be distinguished in Ephrem's printed works;" of which his notes supply instances. Indeed he thinks himself justified in affirming that the author either expanded a short (as yet unknown) treatise of Ephrem, or worked up the scattered notices which he found throughout Ephrem's works. It seems a more natural inference that both drew from a common tradition familiar to Syrian Christians at least as early as the 4th century. Dillmann (11) reasonably suggests the 5th or 6th century as the probable date of the Conflict. The Patristic language seems to imply a popular form of Monophysitism; and the other indications of doctrine and ritual are hardly compatible with an earlier date; as far at least as can be judged while Syriac literature is almost wholly buried in manuscript. The Monophysite character of the Egyptian Church under the Arabs is well known.

A Life of Adam, described in terms which might be applied to the beginning of the Conflict, occupies 54 leaves in one of D'Abbadie's Ethiopic MSS. (No. 125 of his Catalogue). He says that it is almost unknown in Abyssinia.

The preface and compressed notes which Dillmann has added to his beautiful German translation are rich in illustrative matter without superfluities. He passes over the theology; and he has failed to detect the structure of the book. In other respects his learning and judgement have provided help such as rarely offers itself to the readers of first editions. But the true charm and value of the book is independent of curious erudition. As an unaffected romance of the Christian East, sympathetically painting the infancy of mankind in the light of God's unchanging counsel, without thought of controversy or any secondary purpose, it stands alone.

II. ADAM, TESTAMENT OF. A remarkable group of fragments, bearing in the MSS. the name Testament of our father Adam the First, was published by Renan in 1853 (Journal Asiatique, ser. v. t. ii. pp. 427-470) with a translation, introduction, and illustrative notes. It is extant only in Syriac and Arabic versions, with a double recension in each language. Part of the Syriac text is likewise printed in Wright's Syriac Apocrypha, pp. 61 ff. There are altogether four parts, but the 4th occurs only in a single Syriac MS., which omits the second. The first two are closely connected: they are a Horarium of the universe for night and for day, distinguishing at each of the 24 hours the adoration paid by some one order of created beings, as angels and demons, men, animals, abysses, &c. The third part, fragmentary in the Syriac, headed More of Adam our first father, contains short prophecies spoken by Adam to Seth, relating to the Incarnation, the restoration of Adam, the making of the cross (such is evidently the sense) from the wood of the fig-tree identified with the tree of knowledge, and the Deluge. It ends as follows "And I Seth have written this testament; and after the death of my father Adam my brother and I buried him at the east of Paradise, opposite the town of Henoch, the first which was built on the earth. And the angels and the virtues of the heavens themselves celebrated his obsequies, because he had been created in the image of God. And the sun and the moon were darkened, and there was darkness during seven days. And we sealed this testament, and placed it in the Cave of Treasures, where it has remained to this day, with the treasures which Adam had brought out of Paradise, the gold, the myrrh, and the frankincense. And the sons of the Magian kings shall come and take them and bring them to the Son of God in the cave of Bethlehem of Judah." Then follows a colophon "End of the Testament of our father Adam." The fourth part is called More of the Testament of our father Adam. It is a short account of the different orders of "heavenly powers," angels, archangels, principalities, &c.

These fragments evidently represent a work current under different titles in the early ages. Epiphanius (Haer. 89 B) notices 'revelations (apocalypses) of Adam' along with 'many' apocryphal writings in Seth's name among the books held sacred by his 'Gnostici,' an Ophitic sect. From the form of his language Lücke (Eint. in d. Offenb. Joh. 232) has doubtfully inferred the existence of one or more Apocalypses of Adam recognised by the Church; and appealed in confirmation to the ascription of "ecstasy" and prophecy to Adam by Tertullian (De an. 11) in reference to Gen. ii. 24 (or Eph. v. 31 f.): but neither passage will bear the strain. 'A book which is called the Repentance of Adam, apocryphal,' is condemned in the Gelasian Decree (vi. 30 in Credner, Zur Gesch. d. Kanons, 219); that is either at Rome about 500 or (apparently) in Spain between 500 and 700 (Credner, 282-9). According to Samuel of Ani, an Armenian historian, about 590 a band of Syrian Nestorians, "men of honeyed words," entered Armenia intending to propagate their doctrine, but were driven away with anathemas. They translated however their sacred books for the benefit of some disciples whom they made. These books were the Kaurdosag, the Guragosag, the Vision of St. Paul, the Repentance of Adam, the Testament [sic], the Infancy of the Lord, the Sebios, the Cluster of Blessing [cf. Gennad. de vir. ill. 1], the Book which ought not to be hid, and the Exposition of the Gospel of Mani (Renan, 430 f. on the authority of M. Dulaurier). In this enigmatical and miscellaneous list The Repentance of Adam is distinguished from The Testament. Yet if, as appears likely, Adam's name belongs to both titles, the nature of the existing fragments is not such as to compel us to suppose that they designate two wholly distinct books. G. Syncellus (18) and Cedrenus (i. 17) say that 'Adam in his 600th year repented and knew by revelation the thing concerning the Watchers [the 'sons of God' in Gen. vi. 1 ff.] and the Deluge, and repentance and the Divine Incarnation, and the prayers which are sent up to God at every hour of day and night from all creatures through Uriel the archangel of repentance:" and Cedrenus adds an enumeration for 12 hours which agrees very nearly with the Syriac "Hours of Day." Every head in this passage except the Watchers and Uriel (cf. B. of Henoch ix. 1; xx. 2, &c. and Dillmann, p. 98) corresponds with something in the extant fragments: and it is to be observed that "repentance" and "revelation" are prominent words, while "testament" holds a yet more significant place in the Syriac prophecy. Thus the three names are brought together. The authority chiefly followed hereabouts by G. Syncellus and Cedrenus is the Book of Jubilees. In one place a Life of Adam is referred to by G. Syncellus (9); but there is nothing except internal evidence to shew the origin of the passage quoted above. The Apostolic Constitutions (vi. 16) mention Adam among the O. T. personages whose names were affixed to apocryphal books.

The name "Testament" is familiar in apocryphal literature to denote the supposed last words of a prophet. Besides the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs we hear of the T. of Moses (in the catalogue of books appended to the Chronography of Nicephorus: Credner, l. c. p. 121), and the T. of Job (Decret. Gelas. ib. 220). Nor was it unnatural that such last words should be regarded as the fruit of a "repentance" (cf. Test. Rub. 1. 2—καὶ τὴν ἀκούσασά μου, τέσσα, ἃ εἶδον . . . ἐν τῇ μεταβολῇ μου). Thus the Gelasian Decree (l. c. 220) notices a Repentance of Origen, a R. of St. Cyprian, and a R. of James and Mambres. The hymns uttered by the Pistis Sophia, in the Gnostic work bearing the same name, are likewise, as Renan (p. 430) points out, called "repentances" (47, 51 f. &c.).

The Hours and the Prophecy have every appearance of forming parts of one work. In each Adam speaks to Seth, and refers to his past sin, and there is considerable similarity of tone. They are probably however mere extracts: the several passages are disconnected, and the dramatic framework is perceptible only at the end. A sort of introduction indeed occurs in the Arabic recensions, which likewise place the hours of day before those of night (Renan, 462 ff.); and the materials may well have been derived from a corresponding part of the original work: this is however all that can safely be allowed. The fourth part, on the Heavenly Hierarchy, may possibly belong to the same book as the other Syriac fragments, as it certainly belongs to the same literature: but it is addressed to "my friends" instead of Seth, and it reads rather like a later appendix. Internal evidence suggests that 'the Repentance of Adam' is merely a second title; and the same may be said, though with less certainty, of 'the Revelations of Adam.' The book doubtlessly underwent various modifications, as indeed is shown by the existing texts; and the names may belong to different recensions. Strangely enough, in one of the Arabic MSS. "our text forms part of an apocryphal work attributed to St. Clement, and entitled The secret books of purity" (Renan, 438, 471; and see above, p. 36, b). It evidently enters likewise into the composition of the 'Apocalypse of Peter' mentioned under I. (Nicoll, Cat. Cod. Or. Bodl. II. i. 49 ff.) Traces of it occur elsewhere in the catalogues of Syriac and Arabic MSS.

In the Coptic Apostolic Constitutions (80–88 Tattam), where private prayers are enjoined at every third hour (cf. Clem. Strom. vii. 40, p. 854), there are traces of the characteristic language of the Syriac "Hours:" they are wanting in the corresponding Greek recension (viii. 34). At the seventh hour of the night and tenth of the day mention is made of healing of the sick by unction with holy oil (cf. James v. 14 f.) which "the priest of God" mingles with water. The reference to the legend of the 'Cave of Treasures' at the end of the Prophecy implies a connexion with the Conflict of Adam and Eve published by Dillmann. An earlier paragraph gives Leboras as the name of the sister for whom Cain was jealous of Abel, and makes her the younger sister. 'Leboras' probably represents the LUYA of the Conflict: but the exact form, as also the inversion of the two sisters, is found now only in late and secondary authorities, e. g. Eutycheus. Lastly Renan (p. 464) points out a connexion between some passages in Eutycheus and in one of the Arabic recensions. These various coincidences are not however sufficient to fix the age or country of the Testament of Adam. If it is the book meant by Epiphanius, it cannot be later than the 4th century, and nothing decisive can be urged against this date, though it is impossible to speak with confidence.

The Testament, as it stands, is short and unpretending: yet a lofty spirit pervades a great part of it. The leading idea of the Hours is the community of all created things in the adoration of their Maker. The last hour of the day is assigned to the "Prayer of men to the benevolent Will [εὐδοκία] which dwells before God, Lord of all things." In the Prophecy Adam is assured that his premature desire to become a god shall be fulfilled at last as a result of the Incarnation and Glorification, so that he shall learn, "he and his children, that there is a justice in heaven." No distinctive doctrine is to be found beyond what lies in the passages already cited. There is no evidence that the Testament is of Gnostic origin (Renan, 428, 434 f.) in the proper sense of the word, though like other apocryphal productions claiming the authority of O. T. names it may have been used by some Gnostic sects. But it appears to lie outside Greek and Latin Christianity, and is thus an interesting monument of an almost unknown world of ancient creeds.

III. LIFE OF ADAM. See under I. and II.

IV. BOOK OF THE DAUGHTERS OF ADAM, condemned in the Gelasian Decree (ap. Credner, Zur Gesch. d. Kan. 218) as apocryphal. A second title (if the reading is sound) is 'Leptogenesis,' which usually means the Book of Jubilees. As however the daughters of Adam there occupy only 6 lines in the 4th chapter, some other book appears to be meant; unless 'Gelasius' knew it only by this reference (e. g. from Epiph. Haer. 287 B), and invented the first title.

V. STORY AND CONVERSATION OF ADAM. As Jewish legend furnished materials to the Syrian Christians who wrote I. and II., so another form of it is in like manner the base of a Greek work not unworthy to be classed with them. The Story and Conversation of Adam [and Eve], revealed by God to Moses [read Seth] His servant, taught by the archangel Michael (such is the simplest of the descriptive titles found in MSS.), begins, after the first few lines, with the murder of Abel. At God's bidding Michael commands Adam "The mystery which thou knowest proclaim not to Cain thy son, for he is a son of wrath: but grieve not, for I will give thee instead of him another son; he shall shew thee all that thou shalt do" (3). By this introduction Seth is at once marked as the organ of revelation, and he is distinguished throughout by special prerogatives; so that the proper title of the book would be the Apocalypse of Seth. Another independent work seems to be incorporated in the middle, probably with little change, interrupting the narrative for 17 chapters by a confession from Eve's lips: it might well be called a Testament or Repentance of Eve.

The true subject of the book is the death of Adam, and his giving place to Seth. In his mortal sickness he collects his sons around him. Afflicted at his groans, Eve and Seth approach the Garden to pray for the oil of mercy from the Tree, but in vain: he will die, Michael tells them, within three days. Eve then describes the circumstances of the Fall at great length (cc. 14-30), the embellishments of the Biblical account having at times some imaginative beauty. She goes out to pray, but is raised up by an angel to see Adam (his spirit) borne up in a chariot of light. He is washed in the Acherusian lake, and committed by "the Father of the universe" to Michael to be placed in the third heaven. God Himself descends to give promises of restoration and resurrection to the body. It is buried by angels, and Abel's body with it. Within a week Eve is laid in the same grave, and Michael returns to heaven singing Hallelujah.

Various echoes of N. T. language indicate that the book is of Christian origin, though there is no quotation and no distinct Christian doctrine. The phrases 'son of wrath' (3), 'Thy elect angels' (32), 'vials' associated with incense (33, 38), perhaps "the Father of lights" (36, in one MS. only, but that the best), "the third heaven" along with "Paradise" (37, 40), the turning of sorrow into joy (39), "Receive my spirit" (42), and some others less distinct, when taken together, sufficiently betray their origin: but they are confined to the Sethian chapters. Besides the borrowing of the framework and various details from Jewish tradition, there are points of connexion with other extant apocryphal books, as in Seth's quest of the "oil of mercy" (9, 13; Ev. Nicod. 19), and the dipping by angels in the Acherusian lake (Apoc. Pauli 22, p. 51 Tisch.: cf. Plat. Phaed. 113 A). The original language appears to be Greek: the biblical narrative is evidently used in Eve's confession through the medium of the LXX. (cf. 27 εὐθύτητας κρίνεις, Ps. lxxv. 3), and the play of words in the phrase 'oil of mercy' can be only Greek (τὸ ἔλαιον—sometimes written ἔλεον—τοῦ ἐλέου: see Thilo, Cod. Apocr. 687 f.). Grammar however and inflexions are of a debased type, and the tone is that of an Oriental population, such as might be found in Palestine or Western Syria. It seems impossible at present to find evidence as to date: no early century from the second onwards can be put out of question.

The work was first published in 1866 in Tischendorf's Apocalypses Apocryphae under the fictitious title Apocalypsis Mosi. Moses is named in the headings of the 4 known MSS.; but there is not the slightest reference to him in the text, and the narrative is in the third person except in c. 34, where (? by inadvertence) Eve is made the speaker. It seems likely that ΣΗΘ or ΤΩ ΣΗΘ should be read for ΜΩΣΗ, though the by no means uniform headings may have received their present shape after the substitution had taken place. Two of the MSS. (A B) present a recension deformed by verbose amplifications and other changes, and unfortunately this is the chief source of Tischendorf's text. The purest as well as earliest MS. (D) is reproduced in full in Ceriani's Monumenta Sacra et Profana (V. i. 21 ff. Milan 1868), specimens only having been used by Tischendorf; but 18 chapters are wanting in the middle. No one of the 4 MSS. is complete; and the text is in a bad state in all. There is an English version of Tischendorf's text in the volume of the 'Ante-Nicene Christian Library' devoted to Apocryphal literature.

VI. LIBER ADAMI, also known as Codex Nasaræus, properly The Great Book or Treasure of the MANDAITES. [H.]

ADAMANTIUS.—1. [ORIGEN.]

2. The name of the orthodox interlocutor in a Dialogue against various heresies. The author is unknown: but at an early period it was assumed that he must be identical with 'Adamantius:' for similar cases see ARCHELAUS, BARDEISAN, CAIUS. The next step was to suppose that by 'Adamantius' must be meant Origen, whose name stands at the head in some if not all MSS. and in a short Greek summary. This confusion must have taken place before 380, if a note at the end of c. 24 of the Origenian Philocalia was written by the compilers; but this is uncertain. Again Anastasius Sinaita (Hodeg. qu. 48) in the 6th century quotes the Dialogue under Origen's name. On the other hand about 453 Theodoret refers to 'Adamantius' and Origen separately among his authorities (Haer. fab. i. praef. 25). These are the only allusions to the book in ancient times.

Origen's authorship, though defended by J. R. Wetstein and others, does not merit serious discussion. Style, doctrine, and indications of date are alike conclusive. Again internal evidence gives no support to the conjecture that Origen was dramatically intended as the chief speaker under the name Adamantius; indeed the author cannot have been an admirer of Origen. But such suppositions are needless, for 'Adamantius' is a sufficiently common name. The date is approximately fixed by an allusion to the contemporary "God-fearing" emperor, who "built up what" his persecuting predecessors "pulled down, loved what they hated, and pulled down the temples and idols which they honoured" (i. p. 816 E Ru. = 282 Lom.); a description which applies to no one but Constantine in his later years (330-337; cf. Heinen on Eus. Vit. Const. iii. 54). With this period agrees the language about "the God-Word consubstantial, eternal" (i. p. 804 C Ru. = 255 Lom.), and "the Holy Trinity consubstantial and inseparable" (v. p. 871 D Ru. = 416 Lom.), which points to the recent (325) determination of Nicaea. The Dialogue moreover makes large use of the writings of Methodius, who suffered about 312 (Clinton, F. R. i. 361); chiefly his treatise On Free Will (Routh, Rel. Sac. ii. 79 ff.; Alb. Jahn, Method. Platonizans, Halle 1865, pp. 118-124), but also that On the Resurrection (Jahn 79, 87). The principal passage taken (with some abridgement) from the former work is likewise given entire by Eusebius (P. E. vii. 21 f.) as from a treatise On Matter by Maximus, a writer whom he elsewhere (H. E. v. 27) places at the end of the 2nd century; and from Eusebius it was copied into the Philocalia (l.c.), where it stands alone among genuine extracts from Origen. Routh pointed out that the Dialogue was immediately indebted not, as is usually said, to Maximus but to Methodius: we are not therefore further concerned with MAXIMUS here. The author possibly threw his argument into a dialogue in imitation of Methodius, four at least of whose works were dialogues; though the borrowed matter retains hardly a trace of its original form in this respect. Neander's conjecture (Gnost. Syst. 206 f.) that the whole treatise is a patchwork made up of different genuine dialogues of the 3rd century, such as that said to have been held by Origen with Candidus (Hier. c. Ruf. ii. 19), has nothing to recommend it: but it is likely enough that the author made liberal use of works now lost.

The heading in some, perhaps all, MSS. is Against the Marcionists, a title which applies only to a small part. The summary already noticed describes the Dialogue as being "on the right faith in God," and the early translators adopted these words as a title: but it is not satisfactory. In the Greek editions the Dialogue is cut into five sections; a perverse arrangement which disguises the true structure. The MSS. (? all) with better reason divide into three dialogues, of which the former two answer to Sections I. II., and the third has three heads, (1) without a title, (2) On the Christ, (3) On the Resurrection. The last corresponds with Wetstein's Section V.: his III. and IV. are arbitrary. Properly speaking the whole Dialogue falls into two parts, A (Sections I. II.) against two Marcionists, and B (III.-V.) against a Bardesanist: each part ends with a formal judgement by the umpire. The second part is clearly divided into three heads, with transitive speeches from the umpire (849 A B Ru. = 360 f. Lom. in IV., and end of IV.). Two Valentinians are brought in to complete the discussion of the great question of the origin of evil under the first head, and a Marcionist briefly interrupts the argument of the first and third heads. When the umpire is apparently about to give his final decision, the subject of the first part is resumed by an argument with one of the Marcionists, and then the Dialogue is brought to a close in due form. On the whole it seems likely that the author began by writing the first part as an independent work, and at a later time continued it by the more composite second part, taking advantage of the opportunity to add near the end a last word on the earlier subject. There are no traces whatever of interpolation.

In I. Adamantius a Catholic and Megethius a Marcionist agree to hold an amicable controversy before the heathen Eutropius as umpire in the presence of an audience. Each disputant states his own 'definition' of primary doctrine, Megethius declaring for three first 'principles,' the Good God, the Demiurge, and the Evil One. After a short discussion, closed by an orthodox dictum from Eutropius, Megethius proceeds to attack the authority of the canonical gospels on various grounds, and then returns to the three 'principles,' arguing chiefly from the supposed antagonism of the Law and the Gospel. Here (II.) Marcus another Marcionist interposes, maintaining two 'principles' only, by identifying the Demiurge or Just God with the Evil One. The argument is mainly conducted by reference to so much of the N. T. as the Marcionists accepted. At the close Eutropius pronounces in favour of Adamantius, and prays to be himself "numbered with" "the Catholic Church." Marinus a Bardesanist now (III.) desires to dispute with Adamantius before the umpire. He dissents from Catholic doctrine on three heads, the creation of the devil by God, the birth of Christ from a woman, and the resurrection of the body. In one place Megethius, though at first checked by Eutropius as having had his say, strikes in to express agreement with the doctrine that the substances of good and evil are alike without beginning or end. Presently (IV.) Droserius declares his discontent with the arguments of Marinus and his wish to substitute "the definition of Valentinus" on the origin of evil, such definition being in fact part of the Valentinian's exposition in Methodius's Dialogue on Free Will. To this Adamantius soon opposes his own "definition," which is the orthodox reply from the same Dialogue, attributed (as we have seen) by Eusebius to Maximus. In the midst Valens another Valentinian objects to the doctrine of Droserius that matter existed prior to its qualities. At length Eutropius again decides for the teaching of the Church, and calls on Marinus to plead, if he chooses, on his second head. In the rest of the section accordingly the Bardesanist doctrine of Christ's "heavenly" body is discussed, and Eutropius gives judgement as before, bidding Marinus proceed to his third objection. In the last section (V) the resurrection of the body is impugned and defended, first on physiological and then on biblical grounds. Once Megethius interrupts Adamantius to protest against his reading of 1 Cor. xv. 38 as at variance with Marcion's. The discussion is ended by a declaration of Eutropius that he has been satisfied about the resurrection. Adamantius asks to expound his own view positively, as founded on Scripture; but soon breaks off, exclaiming impatiently at the want of competent cultivation (ἀπαίδευσία) in his antagonists. Eutropius declares that want to be the cause of all worthless things (φάυλων): in it, he says, were born and bred (ἢ συμπεφέκασι καὶ συνήθησαν) Megethius, Droserius and Marcus, Valens and Marinus. Once more Adamantius sets himself to refute the Marcionists' doctrine out of their own apostle St. Paul, and a short disputation with Marcus ensues. Finally, Eutropius professes himself satisfied with the arguments of Adamantius and anxious to join the Catholic Church, on which and its doctrine he pronounces an elaborate panegyric. The concluding acclamation in praise of Adamantius is probably not genuine.

The Dialogue cannot rank with the productions of the greater Fathers; yet it has considerable merits of its own. We look in vain for depth of thought or elevation of tone; but argumentative and exegetical power are by no means wanting. The heretics and their doctrines can scarcely be said to be fairly treated, and a somewhat offensive air of intellectual superiority is assumed towards them. On the other hand a genuine attempt is made to reproduce a part at least of their arguments; and there is hardly any scurrility. The controversy is to all appearance with the nameless heretics of the author's own day, not directly with the writings or original doctrines of Marcion, Bardeisan, and Valentinus. The literary merits of the work are clearness and occasionally some little vigour. As a dialogue it shews no dramatic power; indeed the language of the heathen empire for the most part whimsically resembles that of the orthodox champion. The style is bald and unattractive; and not a few words, inflexions, and constructions belong to a rude and popular form of Greek.

The Dialogue was printed first in Latin, translated from a single MS. by John Pic, at Paris in 1556. Another version, paraphrastic in character, by Lawrence Humphrey one of the Zurich refugees, from a MS. lent by Froben, is dated Basel 1557, but appeared first, according to Wetstein, in the Basel Origen of 1571. It was reprinted by Genebrard (ii. 533 ff.), along with a third translation by Péron (i. 497 ff.), in his Paris Origen of 1574. The first Greek edition, containing likewise Origen's Exhortation to Martyrdom and Epistle to Africanus, is due to J. R. Wetstein the younger, Basel 1674. It has a version and copious notes, which supply some good illustrations as well as abundance of worthless matter. Wetstein followed a Basel MS., probably that used by Humphrey, and obtained some information from Hyde about an Oxford MS. (see below). The Dialogue was included by De la Rue in his great edition of Origen, Paris 1733 (i. 800-872): he somewhat improved the text with the help of four MSS., Vatic. 1089, two at Paris (evidently Reg. 56, 219), and one belonging to T. Gale, now at Trinity College, Cambridge, a modern copy of an Oxford MS., evidently Bodl. Gr. Misc. 25 (ol. 2040). De la Rue is followed by the later reprints of Origen's works. Besides these five MSS. others are said to exist at Dublin (288) and Venice (496). Trinity College, Cambridge, possesses a copy of Reg. 56, with various readings and supplements from Reg. 1219, made at Paris for Isaac Voss.

The Dialogue has shared the neglect which usually befalls works unfortunate enough to be known as 'spurious.' For both text and illustration it needs and deserves a good edition. [H.]

ADAMANTUS. [ADANTUS.]

ADAMAS.—[OPHITES.]

ADAMIANI.—An obscure sect who supposed themselves to be restoring primitive innocence by calling their community Paradise, and worshipping in a state of nudity. They met for divine service in hypocauts. They stripped at the door (where chamberlains were stationed to receive the clothes), entered and sat down naked, both sexes alike, and so continued while the readings and other parts of the service proceeded. The office-bearers and teachers were mixed indiscriminately with the rest of the congregation. The whole sect professed absolute continence; and excluded from communion any offender against the rule, alleging as a precedent Adam's expulsion from the Garden after eating the forbidden fruit.

Such is the report furnished by Epiphanius (Haer. lii. 458 ff.). He states expressly that he followed oral accounts, having never met with any Adamians or found them noticed in books; and he affects a gratuitous scepticism as to their existence. He supplies no mark of place or time, but oral statements would probably be contemporary; hence the date seems to be the middle of the 4th century. Later writers merely borrow from Epiphanius.

Theodoret (Haer. fab. i. 6) gives the name Adamitae to the followers of PRODICUS, whether on good authority or by a confusion, it is impossible to say. There is at all events no ground for supposing any connexion between the two sects. [H.]

ADAMNAN, an Irish name, the diminutive of Adam, and interpreted by Colgan Parvus Adam. (1) The first who is of record as so called was a Scot, of Irish extraction, who happens to be mentioned by Bede (H. E. iv. 25) in connection with Coludi-urbs (Coldingham), a mixed monastery, situated on the Border, in the modern Berwickshire. As a young man he had committed some offence which weighed upon his mind, and was revealed in confession to an Irish priest. A penitential course of life having been prescribed to him, in which brevity was intended to be coupled with intensity, the confessor returned to Ireland, and soon after died. Adamnan resolved upon a voluntary continuance in his strict discipline until the end of his life, and remained at Coldingham, from about 670, in the practice of the utmost self-denial, tasting meat and drink only on Sundays and Thursdays, and frequently spending whole nights in watching and prayer. He observed with sorrow the laxity of discipline in the monastery, and, it is said, had a revelation of its approaching destruction by fire which came to pass after the death of the abbess Aebba, about the year 679. He is commemorated in the English Martyrology of Wilson at the 31st of January, at which day his festival is found in Colgan (Actt. SS. Hib. p. 224) and Bollandus (Actt. SS. Jan. tom. iii.) See also Mabillon Annal. O. S. Bened. tom. i. p. 510.

(2) Ninth abbot of Hy or Iona (sed. 679-704), the most able and accomplished of St. Columba's successors (Bede H. E. v. 15, 21). He was born in Ireland, at Drumhona, in the south-west of the county of Donegal, and was, by his father Ronan, of the same lineage as St. Columba. By his mother, Ronnat, he was connected with that branch of the Hy-Neill race, who occupied the district where Rath-both (Raphoe) was situate; of which church, when it became a bishop's see, he was, under the softened name of Eunan (ADHAMNAN=Owнан, Onan, Eunan), adopted as the patron saint. He entered the monastery of Hy under Seghine, the fifth abbot, during whose incumbency, and that of the three immediate successors, he acquired such a reputation for piety and learning as recommended him for the presidency of the Columbite order, now in the meridian of celebrity and importance. On the death of Faillbe, the eighth abbot, in 679, Adamnan was chosen his successor, being now fifty-five years of age. Among his contemporaries were the valiant Bruide, son of Bilé, sovereign of the Picts, and Aldfrid, the Northumbrian prince, who had been an exile in Ireland, and was styled by the natives Dalta Adhumnain, or "alumnus of Adamnan." The death of Ecgfrid, in 685 ("post bellum Ecgfridi," Adam. Vit. Col. ii. 46), restored Aldfrid to his country and the enjoyment of his hereditary rights; so that, when his former instructor, now abbot of Hy ("presbyter et abbas monachorum qui erant in insula Hii,"—Bede, H. E. v. 15), went, in the year following, on a mission to procure the liberation of some Irish captives whom Beret had carried off from Meath (Bede, H. E. iv. 26; Tighernach, 685), he was received at the Northumbrian court with great kindness, and succeeded in bringing back to Ireland, in the enjoyment of their liberty, sixty of his fellow-countrymen (Tighernach, 687).

In 688 he visited King Aldfrid a second time, having been sent by his nation on an embassy to him (Adam. Vit. Col. ii. 46). On this occasion he made some stay in Northumbria, during which he visited various churches of the Angles, and among others, Jarrow, where the abbot, Ceolfrid, had a discussion with him regarding Easter and the Tonsure, which resulted in the conversion of Adamnan from the British to the Catholic usage, and his earnest advocacy of the latter. Ceolfrid's account of the transaction is preserved by Bede (H. E. v. 21). It was probably about this time that Adamnan presented to Aldfrid the book de Locis Sanctis, of which Bede makes such honourable mention (H. E. v. 15). On his return to Hy he laboured hard to bring the brotherhood round to the adoption of his views regarding the two great questions which then divided the British Churches, but without immediate success. In 692 he visited Ireland on some business of importance (Tighernach, 692); and this was probably his first endeavour to bring the Irish into conformity with the Saxon Church. How long he remained is uncertain, but he returned to Ireland in 697, and at his instance a synod of ecclesiastics and chieftains was held at Birr, near the middle of Ireland, where an enactment was solemnly promulgated, exempting women from going to battle. The acts of this assembly are preserved, entitled the "Law of Adamnan," without the assistance of which it would be very hard to understand what was meant by the Annals of Ulster, in recording, at the year 696, "Adomanus ad Hiberniam pergit, et dedit Legem Innocentium populis." He appears to have remained for some years after this in Ireland, furthering his social reform, and urging the adoption of the Catholic Easter and Tonsure.

He was certainly there in 701, when he convened a synod at Tara, to condemn a chieftain who had been guilty of a gross outrage; and Bede also states that he celebrated in Ireland his last Easter, in the following summary which he has left us of the closing scenes of our saint's life: "Returning home [from Northumbria], he endeavoured to bring his own people that were in the isle of Hii, or that were subject to that monastery, into the way of truth, which he had learned and embraced with all his heart: but in this he could not prevail. He then sailed over into Ireland, to preach to its people, and by modestly declaring the correct time of Easter, he reduced many of them, and almost all that were not under the dominion of the Society of Hii, to the Catholic unity, and taught them to keep the legal time of Easter. Returning to his island, after having celebrated the canonical Easter [which fell this year on the 30th of March] in Ireland, he most earnestly advocated in his own monastery the Catholic observance of the season of Easter, yet without being able to prevail; and it so happened that he departed this life before the next year came round, the Divine goodness so ordering it, that as he was a great lover of peace and unity, he should be taken away to everlasting life before he should be obliged, on the return of the season of Easter, to differ still more seriously with those who would not follow him in the truth" (H. E. v. 15). He died in the year 704, aged seventy-seven, on the 23rd of September, which is the day of his commemoration both in the Irish and Scotch calendars.

In Ireland he is the patron saint of the churches of Raphoe and Drumhome, in the county of Donegal; of Errigal, Dunbo, Bovevagh, and Grellach, in the county of Derry; and of Skreen, in the county of Sligo. In Scotland he is especially venerated in the churches of Fuvie and Aboyn, in Aberdeenshire; of Forglen, in Banff; of Tannadice, in Forfar; and in the islands of Inchkeith and Sanda; among which his name has assumed the various disguises of Eunen, Teunan, Thewnan, Ainan, Skeulan, and Arnold.

Of his character for learning and the graces of the Christian ministry, we have the highest testimony in the almost contemporary statements of Ceolfrid and Bede, the latter of whom styles him "vir bonus et sapiens, et scientia scripturarum nobilissime instructus." Aleuin classes him among the "Praelari patres Scotorum." His undoubted writings are (1) the work De Locis Sanctis, of which Bede has transferred into the body of his history large portions of two chapters (H. E. v. 16, 17). It was first printed in full by Gretser, with Bede's extracts on alternate pages (Ingoldst. 1619, 4to.), and subsequently, from a better manuscript, by Mabillon (Act. SS. Ord. Bened. saec. iii. pt. 2, p. 456). The substance of the narrative was taken down by the author, as he states, on wax tablets, from the dictation of a Franco-Gallic bishop, called Arculf, and when arranged, transferred to membranes. (2) The Vita S. Columbae, in three books, which was compiled by him between the years 692 and 697, from earlier memoirs and from the traditions of the island. The Latinity of this work is not so flowing or free from Celticisms as the former one, but it is a much more precious relic of antiquity, and is one of the most important pieces of hagiology in existence. It was first published by Canisius (Antiq. Lectt. Ingoldst. 1604), then by Messingham (Florilegium, Par. 1624), Colgan (Trias Thaumaturga, Lovan. 1647), Baert (in Ac tt. Jun. tom. ii. 1698), Pinkerton (Vitæ Antiquæ, Lond. 1789), and lastly, from the autograph of Dorbene, a monk of Ily, who died in 713, collated with six other manuscripts, by William Reeves, D.D. (Irish Archaeol. and Celt. Soc. Dublin, 1857, 4to.). In the Append. to the Preface is a memoir of St. Adamnan (pp. xl.—lxviii.), a popular summary of which is given by the Comte de Montalembert, in Les Moines d'Occident (xiii. 3), under the head Adamnan.

(3) An Irish bishop, whose church of Rathmaighe-connigh is now known as the parish church of Raymoghly, near Raphoe, in the east part of the county of Donegal. The place was of early importance, as St. Brugach, a disciple of St. Patrick, who is in the calendar at Sept. 1; and a St. Ciaran, who died Nov. 1, 784, were also commemorated here. Adamnan's obit, as episcopus sapiens, is all that is recorded of him, which appears in the Irish Annals, under the year 731 (An. Ust. 730; F. Mast. 725). [W. R.]

ADANTUS (Ἀδαντος), one of Manes' twelve disciples. (Petrus Siculus, Hist. Man. xvi.) Photius (Contra Man. i. 14) writes the name as Adamantus. In the Greek form of Anathema (ap. Cotelier's Patres Apost. I. p. 545) he seems to be called Ἀδάμ. [E. B. C.]

ADAUTCUS, M. (1) An Italian of noble family, who had been intendant of the imperial treasury (Rationalis), martyred under Diocletian A.D. 303 (Euseb. H. E. viii. 11; Rufin. ib.; Damasus, Carm. xxiv.): burned together with a whole town in Phrygia and all its inhabitants, according to Rufinus, but Eusebius only mentions both facts consecutively without connecting them. (2) Another, also called AUDACUS, is assigned by the Martyrologies to the same persecution as joined with St. Felix (Baed., &c., and Baron. Aug. 30); the name being given to a chance comer, name unknown, who meeting Felix on his way to martyrdom, declared himself forthwith to be a Christian too, and was thereupon also beheaded. [A. W. H.]

ADDA (1) Son of Ida, king of Northumbria, succeeded his brother Glappa, as king of Bernicia in 559, and reigned eight years (Sim. Dun. Mon. H. B. 649; Nennius, ibid. 75).

(2) One of the companions of S. Cedd in his mission to the Middle Angles in 653. He was an Englishman by birth, and brother of Utta, abbot of Gateshead (Bede, H. E. iii. 21). [S.]

ADDAS, (Ἀδδᾶς, Ἀδδᾶς), one of the three first disciples of Manes. According to the Acts of Archelaus he was originally sent to preach his master's doctrines in Scythia, and was afterwards commissioned with the others to collect Christian books (Archel. et Man. disput. liii., liv.). He was subsequently sent as a missionary to the East, τὰ τῆς Ἀνατολῆς μέρη (Ib. xi., given in Epiphanius, Adv. Haer. lxxvi. 31). Cyril of Jerusalem, Catech. vi. 31, gives his name as Baddas (Βαδδᾶς); Photius, Contra Man. i. 14, calls him Budas (Βούδᾶς), and Petrus Siculus, Hist. Man. xvi. Buddas (Βουδδᾶς); but this is apparently only a confusion with the account of Manes' supposed predecessor Terebinthus [TEREBINTHUS].

Photius, Biblioth. Cod. 85, mentions certain writings of Addas, one of which was entitled ῥόδιον, in allusion to Mark, iv. 21, and which was refuted by Diodorus, bishop of Tarsus. The Greek form of abjuration (ap. Cotelier's Patres Apost. vol. I. p. 544) mentions a work against Moses and the Prophets as written by Adas in conjunction with Adimantus [ADIMANTUS.] (Beausobre, Hist. de Manich. I. pp. 63, 433; Baur, das Manichäische Kelig. pp. 414, 466). [E. B. C.]

ADDI, a "comes" or gessith, who possessed land in the neighbourhood of Beverley. One of his servants having recovered from a severe illness in consequence of the prayers of S. John of Beverley, Adda bestowed the village of North Burton on the church there (Bede, H. E. v. 5; Mon. Angl. ii. 129). [S.]

ADECERDITAE, properly Hadecerditae, the name given by 'Prædestinatus' (i. 79) to a 'sect' who said, according to Philastrius (Haer. 125), that Christ preached after his death to all that were in Hades, that they might repent and be saved. It was a widely spread opinion in the early Church. [H.]

ADELBERT [ALDEBERT].

ADELOPHAGI, the name given by 'Prædestinatus' (i. 71) to a sect who, according to Philastrius (Haer. 86), "did not eat their meat with men," alleging prophetic example (? Ezek. xxiv. 17, 22); and believed the Holy Spirit to be created. [H.]

ADELPHIUS, a Gnostic, contemporary with Plotinus (Porph. V. Plot. 16). He is not mentioned by Christian writers. [H.]

ADELPHIUS (Adelfius) (1) A member of the first Council of Arles 314; supposed to have been bishop of Lincoln. (Aug. Opp. ix. App. 1095 A; cf. Cave, Hist. Litt. i. 350; Routh, Rel. Sacr. iv. 313.)

(2) An Egyptian bishop and confessor, exiled by the Arians (Athanas. Ap. de Fuga, 7) to the Thebaid (id. Hist. Ar. 72). In 362 he writes as Bishop of Onuphis in the Delta (id. Tom. ad Ant. 615, 616). Athanasius addressed a letter to him c. 371, in which he briefly defends the Catholic faith against the objections of Arians and (by anticipation) of Nestorians and Eutychians (pp. 728-732). [W.]

ADELPHUS, chorepiscopus to Adolus, bishop of Arabissus, in the middle of the 5th century. He signed as proxy for his diocesan at the council of Chalcedon, 451. (Labbe, iv. pp. 86, 332, 571.) Moschus, Spirit. Prat., c. 129, followed by George of Alexandria in his life of Chrysostom, antedates the episcopate of Adelphus by half a century, and confusing him with the unnamed bishop of Cucusus by whom Chrysostom was honourably received on his arrival at his place of exile, makes the saint lodge at his house at Cucusus. He relates also a vision of Chrysostom in glory, seen by Adelphus at the time of his death. (Tillemont, xi. 623; Baronius, Annal. ann. 407, § 29.) [E. V.]

ADEODATUS (1) A natural son of Augustine, of great promise (De Beata Vita, 6)—horrori mihi erat illud ingenium, Augustine says—who was baptised with his father in 387, being at the time about fifteen (Confess. ix. 6). He appears as an interlocutor in Augustine's treatise De Beata Vita (cc. 6, 12, puer ille minimus omnium, 18), written in 386 and contributed largely to his treatise De Magistro, written two years later. He seems to have died soon afterwards (Cito de terra abstulisti [Deus] vitam ejus, et securior eum recordor . . . Confess. ix. 6). [W.]

(2) Bishop of Rome; succeeded Vitalianus in April, A.D. 672, and reigned above four years, dying in June, A.D. 676. (Clicht. and Jaffé, fr. Anast. B.) Anastasius records that he was a Roman monk, and that his father's name was Jovinianus; and gives as his character that he was most mild and benign, particularly in his hospitality towards men of every condition, and especially towards pilgrims. Two letters of his are extant, (1.) Dec. 23rd, A.D. 673, confirming the liberties of St. Peter's monastery at Canterbury, at the request of Abbot Hadrian (Mansi, xi. p. 103); (2.) to the Gallican bishops, giving privileges to St. Martin's of Tours (M. loc. cit. xi. 103). [G. H. M.]

ADIMANTUS (Ἀδείμαντος), one of Manes' twelve disciples. Photius (Contra Man. i. 14) and Petrus Siculus (Hist. Man., xvi. Ἀδείμαντος), in their list of the twelve, after mentioning his name, add that he was sent as a missionary into various regions; but he seems to have met with especial success in Northern Africa, where he was still held in the highest veneration in Augustine's time, and considered an authority second only to Manes himself (Augustine, Contra Adim. 12. 2; Contra Faust. i. 2). He wrote a book, apparently in Latin, in which he endeavoured by a series of examples to prove a contradiction between the Old Testament and the New, taking them chiefly from the Pentateuch, but also a few from the Psalms, Proverbs, and the Prophets. In the Greek form of abjuration (ap. Cotelier's Patres Apost., vol. i. p. 544,) it is ascribed to Adas as well as Adimantus. Augustine answered most of these objections in his treatise Contra Adimantum; but he admits elsewhere (Contra Advers. Legis et Prophet. ii. 42) that he had been obliged, through want of leisure, to leave a few unexamined, which he hoped at some future time to take up and refute (compare also Serm. de Script. xii.). He mentions (Contra Adv. Leg. l. c.) that Adimantus' prænomen was Addas, "Adimantus, qui prænominis Addas dictus est;" this is the reading in the Benedictine edit. from the older MSS.,—the common editions read "proprio nomine," which would have implied a confusion between the names of two of the most celebrated of Manes' disciples—a charge brought against this father by Beausobre (Hist. de Manich. i. 432). [E. B. C.]

ADOLIA, a wealthy matron of Antioch, an old friend and correspondent of Chrysostom. Her property was the cause of much anxiety and family discomfort, which Chrysostom earnestly exhorted her to free herself from by distributing her wealth to the poor. His counsels do not appear to have found a ready response, and his letters manifest considerable dissatisfaction. One cause of complaint was Adolia's want of readiness to visit her spiritual guide in his place of exile. "Cucusus," he reminded her, "was but a short distance from Antioch. The season was favourable. It was neither too hot nor too cold. Old and sickly as he was, were he not a prisoner, he would come and see her." Her plea of severe sickness was only half believed. That of the treachery of friends and business engagements only strengthened his arguments for her renunciation of her property. "At any rate she might write to him more frequently. He had sent six letters, and only received two. Want of means of transmission might be some excuse. But when Libanius came from Antioch, whom everybody knew, why did she not send a letter by him? Perhaps he started without her hearing of his intention. He could only say that he was always inquiring if any one was going near Antioch, who could take a letter to her." Tillemont is inclined to identify her with the Adolia mentioned by Palladius (Hist. Laus.) as having served God virtuously to the best of her ability, but not so excellently as her sister Ousia, whom he had seen in the monastery of Hesyca, τὰ ἅλα σεμνοτάτην. (Chrysost. Epist. xxxiii., liii., lviii., cxxxiii., clxix., ccxxxi.) [E. V.]

ADOPTIONISTS (Adoptiani, Adoptivi),* the followers of a Christological heresy in the age of Charles the Great, in Spain and Gaul, who held that Jesus Christ, as to his human nature, was the Son of God only by adoption or by name.

1. History.—The history of this sect is confined to the West, while all the older Christological controversies took place mainly in the East. It originated in that part of Spain which was under the rule of the Saracens, where the Catholics had to defend the eternal and essential sonship of Christ against the objections both of the Arians and the Mahometans. The Council of Toledo, 675, in the preface to the Confessio Fidei, states: "Hic etiam Filius Dei natura est Filius, non adoptione." But about a century afterwards Elipandus, the aged Archbishop of Toledo, and primate of Spain under the Mahometan dominion, endeavoured to modify the orthodox doctrine, by drawing a distinction between a natural and an adopted sonship of Christ, and by ascribing the former to his divine, the latter to his human nature. He did this, perhaps (as Neander suggests), with the hope of avoiding the objections of Mahometans. Having little confidence in his own opinion, he consulted Felix, bishop of Urgel or Urgella in Catalonia, in that part of Spain which, since 778, was incorporated with the dominion of Charles the Great. Felix was more learned and clear-headed than Elipandus, and esteemed, even by his antagonist Alcuin, for his ability and piety. Neander (iii. 317) regards him as the originator of Adoptionism; at all events, he reduced it to a formal statement. Confirmed by his friend, Elipandus taught the new doctrine with all the zeal of a young convert, although he was already eighty years of age, and taking advantage of his influential position, he attacked the orthodox with overbearing violence. He found many friends, but also vigorous opponents; among whom Etherius, Bishop of Osma or Othma (formerly his pupil), and Beatus, a presbyter and abbot, took the lead in the defence of the old and the exposure of the new Christology. Elipandus, who was a man of violent temper, and jealous of his dignity, charged his opponents with confounding the natures of Christ, like wine and water, and with scandalous immorality (he calls Beatus a "disciple of Antichrist, carnis immunditia foetidus et ab altario Dei extraneus"), and pronounced the anathema on them. Pope Hadrian being informed of these troubles, issued a letter in 785 to the orthodox bishops of Spain, warning them against the new doctrine as rank Nestorianism. But the letter had no effect; and, generally, the papal authority plays a subordinate rôle in this whole controversy. The Saracen government, indifferent to the theological disputes of its Christian subjects, did not interfere. But when the Adoptionist heresy, through the influence of Felix, spread in the French portion of Spain, and even beyond the Pyrenees into Septimania, creating a considerable commotion among the clergy, the Christian Emperor Charles called a Synod to Regensburg (Ratisbon) in Bavaria, in 792, and invited the Bishop of Urgel to appear, that his case might be properly investigated. The Synod condemned Adoptionism as a renewal of the Nestorian heresy; and Felix publicly and solemnly recanted before the Synod, and also before Pope Hadrian, to whom he was sent. But on his return to Spain he was so much reproached for his weakness, that, regardless of his solemn oath, he yielded to the entreaties of his friends and reaffirmed his former opinions. Charles, who did not wish to alienate the Spanish portion of his kingdom, and to drive it into the protection of the neighbouring Saracens, directed Alcuin, who in the mean time had come to France from England, to send a mild warning and refutation of Adoptionism to Felix. When this proved fruitless, and when the Spanish bishops, under the lead of Elipandus, appealed to the justice of the emperor, and demanded the restoration of Felix to his bishopric, he called a new council at Frankfort on the Main in 794, which was attended by three hundred bishops. As neither Felix nor any of the Adoptionist bishops appeared in person, the council, under the lead of Alcuin, confirmed the decree of condemnation passed at Ratisbon. Subsequently Felix wrote an apology, which was answered and refuted by Alcuin. Elipandus reproached Alcuin for having 20,000 slaves (probably belonging to the convent of Tours), and for being proud of his wealth. Charles sent Archbishop Leidrad of Lyons and other bishops to the Spanish portion of his kingdom, who succeeded, in two visits, in converting the heretics (according to Alcuin 20,000). About that time a council at Rome, under Leo III., pronounced, on very imperfect information, a fresh anathema, erroneously charging the Adoptionists that they denied to the Saviour any other than a nuncupative Godhead (Hardouin, iv. 928). Felix himself appeared, 799, at a Synod in Aix-la-Chapelle, and after a debate of six days with Alcuin, he recanted his Adoptionism a second time. He confessed to be convinced by some passages, not of the Scriptures, but of the fathers (especially Cyril of Alexandria, Leo I., and Gregory I.), which he had not known before, condemned Nestorius, and exhorted his clergy and people to follow the true faith (Hard. iv. 929-934; Alcuin, Epp. 92, 176; and the Confessio Fidei Felicis in Mansi, xiii. 1035, sq.). He spent the rest of his life under the supervision of the Archbishop of Lyons, and died 818 (not 816, as Neander has it). He left, however, a paper in which the doctrine of Adoptionism is clearly stated in the form of question and answer; and Agobard, the successor of Leidrad, felt it his duty to refute it (Adv. Dogma Felicis Episc. Urgellensis, libri III., Opera Agob. ed. Baluze, Par. 1666, t. i.). Elipandus, under the protection of the government of the Moors, continued openly true to his heretical conviction. But Adoptionism lost its vitality with its champions, and passed away during the 9th century. Slight traces of it are found occasionally during the middle ages. Duns Scotus (1300) and Durandus a S. Porciano (1320), admit the term Filius adoptivus in a qualified sense. (See Walch, Hist. Adopt. p. 253; Gieseler, Church History, 4th Germ. ed. vol. ii. part i. p. 117, note 13.) The defeat of Adoptionism was a check upon the dyophysitic and dyotheletic feature in the Chalcedon Christology, and put off indefinitely the development of the human side in Christ's Person. (Comp. Dörner, ii. p. 311.) In more recent times the Jesuit Vasquez, the Lutheran divines G. Calixtus and Walch, have defended the Adoptionists as essentially orthodox (Gieseler, l. c.).

* The Germans, after the mediæval Latin Adoptiani, say Adoptianer, Adoptianismus, as they say Creatianer, Subordinationatiner, etc. But in English, where we have the nouns adoption, creation, subordination, from the corresponding Latin nouns, the spelling of those derivative theological terms with an o instead of an a seems to be more natural, and is universally accepted in the case of subordinationist and subordinationism.

II. Doctrine.—The doctrine of Adoptionism is closely allied in spirit to the Nestorian Christology; but it concerns not so much the constitution of Christ's person, as simply the relation of his humanity to the Fatherhood of God. The Adoptionists were no doubt sincere in admitting at the outset the unity of Christ's person, the communication of properties between the two natures, and the term Theotokos (though in a qualified sense) as applied to the Virgin Mary. Yet their view implies an abstract separation of the eternal Son of God and the man Jesus of Nazareth, and results in the assertion of two distinct Sons of God. It emphasized the dyophysitism and dyotheletism of the orthodox Christology, and ran it out into a personal dualism, inasmuch as sonship is an attribute of personality, not of nature. The Adoptionists appealed, without good reason, to Ambrose, Hilary, Jerome, Augustine, and Isidore of Seville. Sometimes the term adoptio is indeed applied to the Incarnation by earlier writers, and in the Spanish liturgy (the Officium Mozarabicum), but rather in the sense of assumptio or ἀνάληψις, i. e. the elevation of the human nature, through Christ, into union with the Godhead; and in a passage of Hilary (De Trinit. ii. 29) there is a dispute between two readings—"carnis humilitas adoptatur," and "adoratur" (Alcuin)—although the former alone is consistent with the context, and "adoptatur" is used in a more general sense for assumitur (so Agobard). They might, with better reason, have quoted Theodore of Mopsuestia as their predecessor, but they were probably ignorant of his writings and doctrine of the υἱὸς θεός, which is pretty much the same as their filius Dei adoptivus. (See Neander, Kirchengeschichte, iii. p. 318, f.) The fundamental point in Adoptionism is the distinction of a double Sonship in Christ,—one by nature and one by grace, one by generation and one by adoption, one by essence and one by title, one which is metaphysical and another which is brought about by an act of the divine will and choice. The idea of sonship is made to depend on the nature, not on the person; and as Christ has two natures, there must be in him two corresponding Sonships. According to his divine nature Christ is really and essentially the Son of God (secundum naturam or genere), begotten from eternity; but according to his human nature he is the Son of God only nominally (nuncupative) by adoption, or by divine grace Begotten Son of God (Unigenitus, μονογενής, secundum adoptionem, or gratia, electione, voluntate, beneplacito). By nature he is the Only (John i. 14), by adoption and grace he is the First begotten (Primogenitus, πρωτότοκος ἐν πολλοῖς ἀδελφοῖς, Rom. viii. 29; comp. Col. i. 15). Thus Epist. Episc. Hisp. ad Episc. Galliae, in Alcuin's Opera, ed. Froben ii. 568: "Nos confitemur et credimus, Deum Filium ante omnia tempora sine initio ex Patre genitum—non adoptione sed genere, neque gratia sed natura—pro salute vero humani generis, in fine temporis ex illa intima et ineffabili Patris substantia egrediens. . . . secundum traditionem Patrum confitemur et credimus, eum factum ex muliere, factum sub lege, non genere esse filium Dei sed adoptione, neque natura sed gratia." The Adoptionists quoted in their favour mainly John xiv. 28; Luke i. 80, xviii. 19; Mark xiii. 32; John i. 14, x. 35; Rom. viii. 29; 1 Cor. xi. 3; 1 John iii. 2; Deut. xviii. 15; Ps. ii. 8, xxii. 23, and other passages from the O. T., which they referred to the Filius primogenitus et adoptivus; while Ps. lx. 4 (ex utero ante Luciferum genui te), xlv. 2; Is. xlv. 23; Prov. viii. 25, were understood to apply to the Filius unigenitus. None of these passages, which might as well be quoted in favour of Arianism, bear them out in their peculiarity. Christ is nowhere called the adopted Son of God. Felix inferred from the adoption of the adopted children of God, that they must have an adoptive head. He made use of the illustration, that as a son cannot have literally two fathers, but may have one by birth and the other by adoption, so Christ, according to his humanity, cannot be the Son of David and the Son of God in one and the same sense, but he may be the one by nature and the other by adoption. (Alcuin, Contra Felicem, i. 12, and iii. 1.) It is not clear whether he dated the adopted Sonship of Christ from his exaltation (Dorner, ii. 319), or from his baptism (Walch), or already from his birth (Neander). He speaks of a double birth of Christ, compares the baptism of Christ with the baptism or regeneration of believers, and connects both with the spiritualis generatio per adoptionem (l. c. ii. 15); but, on the other hand, he seems to trace the union of the human nature to the divine to the womb of the Virgin (l. c. v. 1). The Adoptionists, as already remarked, thought themselves in harmony with the Christology of Chalcedon, and professed faith in one divine person in two full and perfect natures—"in una persona, duabus quoque naturis plenis atque perfectis," Alcuin, Opp. ii. 567); they only wished to bring out their views of a double Sonship, as a legitimate consequence of the doctrine of two natures.

The champions of orthodoxy, among whom Alcuin, the teacher and friend of Charles the Great, was the most learned and able—next to him Paulinus of Aquileja and Agobard of Lyons, —unanimously viewed Adoptionism as a revival or modification of the Nestorian heresy, which was condemned by the third Oecumenical Council (431). (Alcuin, Contra Felicem, l. i. c. 11:—"Sicut Nestoriana impietas in duas Christum dividit personas propter duas naturas; ita et vestra indocta temeritas in duos eum dividit filios, unum proprium, alterum adoptivum. Si vero Christus est proprius Filius Dei Patris et adoptivus, ergo est aliter et alter," etc. Lib. iv. 6, 5: "Nonne duo sunt, qui verus est Deus, et qui nuncupativus Deus? Nonne etiam et duo sunt, qui adoptivus est Filius, et ille, qui verus est Filius?") Starting from the fact of a real incarnation, the orthodox party insisted that it was the eternal, only begotten, Son of God who assumed human nature from the womb of the Virgin, and united it with his divine person, remaining the proper Son of God notwithstanding this change. (Ibid. ii. 12:—"Nec in illa assumptione alius est Deus, alius homo, vel alius Filius Dei, et alius Filius Virginis: sed idem est Filius Dei, qui et Filius Virginis; ut sit unus Filius etiam proprius et perfectus in duabus naturis Dei et hominis.") The learned Walch defends the orthodoxy of the Adoptionists, since they did not say that Christ, in his twofold Sonship, was alius et alius, ἄλλος καὶ ἄλλος (which is the Nestorian view), but that he was Son aliter et aliter, ἄλλως καὶ ἄλλως (Ketzehistorie, vol. ix. pp. 881, 904). Baur (ii. p. 152) likewise justifies Adoptionism, as a legitimate inference from the Chalcedonian dogma, but on the assumption that this dogma itself includes the Nestorian dualism in the doctrine of two natures. Neander, Dorner, and Niedner, concede the affinity of Adoptionism with Nestorianism, but affirm, at the same time, the difference and the new features in Adoptionism (see especially Dorner, ii. p. 309, sq.).—The radical fault of this heresy is, that it shifts the whole idea of Sonship from the person to the nature. Christ is the Son of God as to his person, not as to his nature. The two natures do not form two sons, since they are inseparably united in the one Christ. The eternal Son of God did not in the act of Incarnation assume a human personality, but human nature. There is therefore no room at all for an adoptive Sonship. Christ is, in his person from eternity, by nature what Christians become by grace and regeneration. The Bible nowhere calls Christ the adopted Son of God.

AEGIDIUS S. (Αἰγίδιος, Dim. form of αἰγίς or αἰγύς, Ital. Sant' Egidio, Span. San Gil, French, S. Gilles, Engl. St. Giles), abbat and confessor, a saint of whom in proportion to his wide-spread celebrity and popularity there is singularly little trustworthy information. All writers agree in throwing discredit upon the acts from which the life of the saint, as it is popularly given, has been composed. (Baillet, Vies des Saints, Septembre, col. v.; Stilling in Act. SS. Boll. Sept. i. 289.) The following appears to be the only incontestable point of history, that Aegidius, an abbat in Languedoc, was sent by his bishop, St. Caesarius, in 514, to Pope Symmachus at Rome, on a request about the readjustment of the provinces of Southern Gaul (Labbe, Concilia, iv. p. 1310). The question whether this person is identical with S. Aegidius, whose date a legend fixes in the reign of Charles Martel (see the quotation from the Antwerp Breviary in Boll. p. 291), though the original Acts, written not later than the 9th or 10th century, name the king Flavius,* has divided modern hagiologists and historians. Mabillon, who, when he wrote the Analecta Vetera (iii. 433), had no hesitation in pronouncing their identity, afterwards (Annales i. 99) changed his view, and is followed by Stilling (loc. citat. p. 291 seqq.) against the Benedictine editors of the History of Languedoc, i. 666, Baillet, and most of the moderns. Assuming then that Aegidius, the friend of St. Caesarius, is not identical with the person whom we know as St. Giles, and premising that much confusion as to the chronology has arisen from the attempts of modern writers to harmonize what is incapable of harmony, we may take as the most probable view that arrived at by Stilling after much laborious research—that Aegidius was born in Greece, perhaps of noble parentage, about 640, and came to the coast of Provence about 25 years later. He thinks that 'Caesarius' is a scribe's interpolation, and does not mark a second bishop of Arles of that name, while he gives reasons for concluding that Veredemus, the saint's companion in his solitude, was identical with Veredemus, bishop of Avignon, who flourished about 700; he holds that Aegidius lived a hermit's life near the Guerdon, a tributary of the Rhone, till 670 or 671, when he penetrated to a still deeper solitude in a forest, where he was discovered by King Flavius, i. e. Wamba (or possibly Ervigius), a Catholic king of the Visigoths (not Amalaric or Theudo, who were Arians, as Mabillon, nor Theodorice, king of Italy, nor Chilbert, king of France, as others, who defend the earlier date, suppose), in the following way. A hind pursued in the chase by the king's dogs, and wounded by an arrow, fled for refuge to the cave where the saint lodged. He supported his life on the milk of this hind, and the fruits and herbs of the forest, spending all his time in acts of devotion. Struck by the sight of the saint kneeling in prayer, with the wounded hind by his side, the king ordered him to be left unmolested, and according to one account he resisted all attempts to draw him from his solitude, and died in his cavern. But according to the commonly-received legend, he obeyed the royal summons, and after a short visit to the court returned about 673 (Stilling, p. 296) to his solitude, and founded the monastery which after his death bore his name. Pope Benedict II. is said to have granted him a privilege of exemption, and some cypress-wood, of which the doors of the church were formed about 684. If we may believe the Acta he foretold the destruction of his monastery by the Saracens, which must have taken place about 720, when according to our supposition the saint would be 80 years of age. At this point we must suppose that his interview with Charles Martel at Orleans took place, Aegidius having escaped from the Saracens into the part of Gaul which was subject to the Franks. This course was actually adopted by SS. Baudelius and Romulus of Nismes. The Acta carry him back to his monastery, where we must suppose that he died before the second irruption of the Saracens in 725, unless we imagine that he attained a very extreme old age. This view, which is consistent and presents no insuperable difficulty, seems preferable to that which would reject the latter part of the Acta as spurious, and refer the foundation of the monastery to the posthumous fame of sanctity and miraculous power which attracted pilgrims to the hermit's resting-place. Some (e. g. Mabillon, Annal. i. 99, Baillet, ut supra) have argued from the style of the existing abbatial buildings against the antiquity of the foundation as claimed above. But this argument would be equally valid against the historical mention of the abbey as one of those included in the list presented in 817 to the Council of Aachen (Gall. Christ. vi. 481). Copies of bulls and letters issued by Popes John VIII. Martinus I., Adrian III., Stephen V., and Sergius III., between the years 879-910, confirming the independence of the Abbey of St. Gilles from the bishops of Nismes, are to be seen in Ménard, Histoire de Nismes, t. i. Preuves, pp. 11-16. This author (t. vii. 618-621), writing in 1758, gives a succinct history of the abbey and town of St. Gilles, with full references to authorities. Pilgrims were attracted, he says, in great numbers to the saint's tomb from all parts of Christendom, and the town owes its origin to the necessity for their accommodation on the spot. It soon came into the hands of the counts of Toulouse. He exposes the common error which asserts that it became an independent county and the capital of Lower Languedoc. The counts of Toulouse were however frequently called counts of St. Gilles, from the accession of Raymond IV., Count of Rouergue, Nismes, and Narbonne, who cherished a special devotion for the saint (cf. Catel, Hist. des Comtes de Toulouse, p. 131), and is commonly distinguished from other counts of his name as "Raymond de St. Gilles." The situation of the town on a small arm of the Rhone, which furnished it with an accessible and safe harbour, may have stimulated the devotion which during the 11th and 12th centuries is remarked by many writers. Among these the Rabbi Benjamin of Tudela, who travelled in Europe in 1160, noticed the crowds of foreigners who used to flock to St. Gilles from the most distant countries. Others remark the fair held on September 1, which, says Ménard, though it still lasts, is now far less frequented. To this date we may probably refer the great extension of the cultus of St. Gilles, especially in England and Scotland; for instance, we may suppose that pilgrims from Oxford on their return built the church in the north suburb of their city, and instituted the annual fair, which to this day bears the name of their patron, while London, Edinburgh,^b and most of the other principal British cities, possess 11th or 12th century churches under this dedication.

It is beyond the scope of the present article to give the subsequent history of the abbey and town of St. Gilles. The former, a Benedictine foundation, was secularized by Pope Paul III. in 1538; and the Upper Church was demolished in part by the Duc de Rohan, when the Huguenots no longer found it tenable as a fort, in 1562. A good description of the present state of this Upper Church, begun in 1116 by Alphonso, son of Count Raymond IV., originally 290 feet in length by 88½ feet in breadth, and in its integrity "probably the grandest church in the South of France," may be seen in Murray's Handbook to France, p. 520, edit. 1869, where it is stated that in the Lower Church, which is still complete, and adjoins the church already mentioned, the central part over the tomb of St. Giles is of earlier date than the rest, perhaps a relic of the church consecrated by Urban II. in 1096. The celebrated spiral staircase, called Le vis de St. Gilles, is the only relic of the priory, and itself narrowly escaped destruction at the Revolution. The town, which in Ménard's time contained only 3500 inhabitants, has revived, and now numbers 6804.

Of such personal characteristics as may be gathered from the Acts of this saint, perhaps the most remarkable is his intense—as we should say—morbid humility, which withdrew him from the notice of his countrymen, and the open exercise of practical virtues, to a desert, and led him to refuse treatment for an accidental lameness that he might be able to practise more rigid self-mortification. From this anecdote he has been esteemed the patron of cripples. St. Giles' Cripplegate, built about 1090 (Newcourt, Repertorium, i. 355) is dedicated to him, and it has often been noticed that churches built under his patronage are generally at the entrance of towns, e. g. St. Giles-in-the-Fields, London. "Every county in England, except Westmoreland and Cumberland, has churches named in his honour, amounting in all to 146, and Warrington in Devon is named after SS. Martin and Giles conjointly." Calendar of the Anglican Church (Parker), p. 106. A brotherhood of St. Mary and St. Giles is mentioned by Newcourt, in connection with the church at Cripplegate. Matilda, Queen of Henry I. founded a hospital of St. Giles outside the city walls of London for lepers. St. Giles' church in Rome used to be much frequented by women before childbirth. (Mirabilia Romae, p. 38, edit. 1618.) Other monasteries and churches, dedicated to St. Giles, are at Liège, St. Hubert in the Ardennes, Sentiges in Hungary, St. Quintin in Picardy, Bamberg, Brunswick, Munster, and Nuremberg. See Stilling, pp. 285-287.

Modern ingenuity has attributed the selection of extra-mural and secluded spots by the founders of these churches to a recognition and imitation of the saint's love of privacy (J. J. Moore's Historical Handbook for Oxford, p. 201). Why churches should have been so situated for the benefit of cripples is certainly not apparent. If it was "in order to afford poor and lame travellers a ready opportunity of resorting to them, on their entering from the country" (Blunt, Annotated Prayer Book, preface, p. 55), the end in view must have been very partially secured.

In art St. Giles is generally represented as an aged man, with a long white beard; a hind, sometimes having its neck pierced with an arrow, rests its head or forefeet in his lap, or crouches at his feet. "In pictures his habit is usually white, because such pictures date subsequently to the period when the abbey of St. Giles became the property of the reformed Benedictines, who had adopted the white habit. Representations of St. Giles are seldom met with in Italy, but very frequently in early French and German art." (Mrs. Jameson's Legends of the Monastic Orders, p. 34.) A drawing of the saint after Albert Durer, given in the same work, p. 201, represents him as unbearded (see also the woodcut from painted glass in Parker's Calendar, &c. p. 106), and with his hand pierced by an arrow.

Giles is a common Christian name; nowhere more so than in Belgium. Its frequency as a surname, both in France and England, may be seen by reference to modern biographical dictionaries.

It is now generally allowed that it was another Aegidius who wrote some medical treatises in Latin verse (Trithemius, De Viris Illust. lib. 2, cap. 22; Hoffmann, Lexicon, s. v. Aegidius).

The relics of the saint, buried in the church dedicated by himself to St. Peter, but translated by Abbat Antulphus in 925 to the neighbouring abbey (Gall. Christ. vi. 483), were allowed to rest in peace, till the Albigensian war in 1209 exposed them to danger, when they were transported to Toulouse and laid over one of the altars in the church of St. Saturninus (St. Sernin), where the body still was when Baillet wrote. Pope Urban IV. added to the honour of the saint, by giving his office a place in the Roman Breviary as a semi-double; but since the middle of the 16th century it has been reduced to a simple office. St. Giles, whose name was received into the English Martyrologies subsequently to the time of Bede (Martyrologium in t. iv. p. 117. ed. Giles), still retains a place in the reformed English Calendar; the Sarum Epistle and Gospel were Eccles. xxxix. 5-9, St. Luke xi. 33-36. His festival is kept on September 1.

The original materials for the life of Aegidius are:—(1) the life by an anonymous author, published from the collation of six MSS. by Stilling, with his critical notes in Act. SS. Boll. Sept. i. 299-304; (2) two lives in prose, and one in verse, mentioned by Baillet; (3) Acts, kept in the treasury of the parish of SS. Leu and Gilles in Paris, commended by René Benoit, Curé of St. Eustache, and André Du Saussay, Bishop of Toul. (4) Miracles, composed by Petrus Guillelmus, Librarian of St. Gilles, in 1120, edited by Jaffé in Pertz, Monumenta, xiv. 316-323. A tract by J. L. Spoerl on St. Giles, as the patron of Nuremberg, was published at Altorf in 1749. [C. D.]

AELIUS PUBLIUS JULIUS, bishop of Debelum, a colony in Thrace, towards the close of the second century, one of several bishops who attested by their subscriptions their rejection of the Montanist pretensions to the gift of prophecy. It does not distinctly appear to what document, or on what occasion these signatures were affixed, or for whose use they were specially destined. They are produced in a letter, a fragment of which is preserved by Eusebius (H. E. v. 19), by Serapion, bishop of Antioch; but may have been copied by him from a letter of Claudius Apollinaris, bishop of Hierapolis, which Serapion cites on the same occasion, in order to show that the activity of the MONTANIST SCHOOL.

Montanist school of prophecy was "abominated by all the brotherhood in the world." Aelius ascribes the Montanist prophecies to demoniacal possession, and attests with an oath that Sotas, bishop of Anchialus, had been prevented by "the hypocrites" from exorcising the Montanist prophetess Priscilla. Similar stories are elsewhere told of other bishops [MONTANISM]. The anomalous combination of three gentle names in Aelius Publius Julius deserves to be noticed. [G. S.]

AELURUS TIMOTHEUS. [TIMOTHEUS.]

AENEAS, of Gaza (Gazaeus), a Christian philosopher of the Neoplatonic school, a disciple of Hierocles of Alexandria, flourished c. 487 A.D. All we know of him is drawn from his own writings, of which we only have a dialogue, entitled Theophrastus from one of the interlocutors, On the Immortality of the Soul and the Resurrection of the Body (Galland, Bibl. Patr. tom. x. pp. 629-664), and 25 letters, which have been printed by Aldus in his Epistol. Graec. Collectio, Ven. 1499. From his letters it appears that he was a friend of his fellow-townsmen Procopius, and had the same correspondents. His date is ascertained in his Theophrastus, where he asserts (as "a cool, learned, and unexceptionable witness, without interest and without passion," (Gibbon, D. & F., ch. 37) that at Constantinople he had heard the confessors whose tongues Hunneric, son of Genserich, had caused to be cut out in the persecution of the orthodox at Tipasa, A.D. 484, speak articulately. (Theophr. ap. Galland, Bibl. Patr. x. p. 661; cf. Victor Vitens, de Persec. Vandal. v. 6; Gibbon, v. a.)

His Theophrastus is praised by Ritter for the brilliancy of its style and successful imitation of Plato's dialogues. Its chief purpose is to attack the doctrine of the previous existence of souls, and to establish those of the immortality of the soul and the resurrection of the body. He maintains an incessant creation of souls by God, and holds that a soul cannot exist anteriorly to its descent into an earthly body. Without the body man cannot be. The body contains a germ, enclosing something of the Eternal within itself, and therefore, though it decays, and appears to perish, is destined to be renewed and come to perfection (Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 459; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. i. 689; Gallandi, Bibl. Patr. x. 629-664; Oudin. i.; Brucker, Hist. Ant. Philos. iii. 527; Ritter, Philosoph. Chrétienne). [E. V.]

AEON, in the Valentinian and some later systems, is the name for the various subordinate heavenly powers evolved from the Supreme Deity. How a word signifying an "age" came to be applied in this manner has never been satisfactorily explained. Philo's usage is merely Platonic; and both the αἰών of Greek philosophy and the Αἰών of Greek mythology are alien to the Gnostic conception. We should probably look rather to some secondary employment of the Shemitic equivalent עולם (Olam). The plurality of Aeons here creates the difficulty. There was undoubtedly (Jablonski, Opusc. i. 373 f.; Movers, Phoen. i. 544 f.) a Phoenician deity called in Greek Αἰών (Sanchun. ap. Eus. P. E. i. 10; Damasc. de Princ. 268 Αἰών κοσμικός, 385 Ὀὐλαμός), who appears to have been introduced at Alexandria (Damasc. ap. Suid. s. v.

Διαγνώμων, Ἡραΐσκος, Ἐπιφάνιος). The supreme "Bythus" was indeed by some Valentians called the "Perfect Aeon" (Iren. 5) or the "Never-aging Aeon" (Auct. Valent. ap. Epiph. Haer. 168b; cf. AGERATUS), &c.; but these designations evidently presuppose a plurality.

In Bardeisan's system the Syriac Itic, Beings (Ephr. Syr., as quoted by Hahn, Bardes. 58 f.), may perhaps represent the Aeons. They are said to occur under their proper name "Olamim" in the Mandaean Thesaurus. Mani too had true Aeons, "saecula" (Ep. fund. ap. Aug. c. Ep. Man. 11; Aug. c. Faust. xv. 5; cf. Flügel, Mani u.s.w., 274 ff.).

For the doctrine of Aeons see VALENTINUS, GNOSTICISM. [H.]

AERIUS, Ἀέριος, founder of the heretical sect of the AERIANS, c. 355, still living when Epiphanius wrote against heresies, 374-376. He was the early friend and fellow-disciple of Eustathius of Sebasteia in Pontus [EUSTATHIUS of SEBASTEIA]. While they were living an ascetic life together the bishoprick of Sebasteia became vacant. Each of the friends was a candidate for the office. The choice fell on Eustathius. This was never forgiven by Acrius. Eustathius endeavoured to soften his friend's disappointment by at once ordaining Acrius presbyter, and setting him over the hospital established at Sebasteia for the reception of strangers, the maimed, and incapable (ξενοδοχείον, or πρωχοτροφείον). But all his attempts were fruitless. The irritated pride of Acrius caused him to take a prejudiced view of all his rival's proceedings; envy deepened into dislike, and dislike into open hostility. He threw up his charge, deserted the hospital, and openly published grave charges against his bishop; whom he accused of being entirely changed, having deserted the ascetic life, and being simply intent on the amassing of wealth. Eustathius spared no pains to regain his friend: he tried caresses, entreaties, warnings, threats, in vain. The rupture with himself widened into a rupture with the Church. Acrius and his followers, who amounted to a considerable number of both sexes, openly separated from their fellow-Christians, and professed ἀποταξία, or the renunciation of all worldly goods. Very hard measure seems to have been dealt to them by the Christians of the day. They were denied not only admission to the churches, but even access to the towns and villages, and they were compelled, even in the depth of winter, when the country was covered with snow, to sojourn in the open fields, or in caves and ravines, and hold their religious assemblies in the open air exposed to the severity of the horrible Armenian winter. Little mercy would be inculcated by the ecclesiastical rulers towards the followers of one who ventured to bring Scriptural weapons to the attack of the fast-growing sacerdotalism of the age; who dared to call in question the prerogatives of the episcopate; and who was struggling to deliver the Church from the yoke of ceremonies which were threatening to become as deadening and more burdensome than the rites of Judaism. The protest of Acrius was premature. Centuries had to elapse before it could be effectually renewed. The Acrians were proclaimed heretics by the united verdict of an offended hierarchy, and their voices died out unheeded.

Our only knowledge of the tenets of Acrius is from Epiphanius. Augustine's account, in his work, De Haeresibus, c. 53, is merely an epitome of the statement of Epiphanius. Acrius, "to the world's misfortune," μέγα κακὸν τῷ κόσμῳ, was still "living in the flesh and surviving in life" when Epiphanius wrote. His teaching was still fresh, and his followers not few or unimportant, while the principles he enunciated—so remarkable an anticipation of those propounded by the Protestant churches at the Reformation—went so fearlessly to the root of much that the Church was beginning to cling to as its most precious possession, that we cannot feel much surprise at the excessive vehemence of the language employed by Epiphanius with regard to his teaching: μανιώδης μᾶλλον ἢ περ καταστάσεως ἀβρωπίνης. He even plays upon his name, declaring, with reference to Eph. ii. 2; vi. 12, that Acrius was rightly so called: ἀέριον γὰρ ἔσχεν πνεῦμα ἐξ ἀκαθαρσίας ἀπὸ τῶν ἀερίων πνευμάτων τῆς πορνείας τὸ ἐν αὐτῷ οἰκήσαν κατὰ τῆς Ἐκκλησίας.

Whether, as Epiphanius asserts, he went beyond Arius in his impieties or no, his early connection with Eustathius will hardly allow us, with some Protestant writers, to call in question the Arian character of his teaching, which is distinctly affirmed by Epiphanius. But it was not on this that the charge of heresy was grounded. Epiphanius specifies four special counts, each of which he thinks sufficiently important to call for particular refutation. (1) The first of these, with which the name of Acrius has been chiefly identified in modern times, is the assertion of the equality of bishops and presbyters, μία τάξις, μία τιμὴ, ἐν ἀξίωμα. He bases this view on the language of the Apostolic Epistles, where no such distinction can be generally maintained, and from the identity of many of their functions. When he says that each χειροθετεῖ, the ambiguity of the word leaves it uncertain whether he denied the grace of orders and the necessity of episcopal ordination. Augustine's statement (l. c.) "docuisse fertur quod episcopus non potest ordinare" must be a misrepresentation of his tenets. No one ever denied a bishop's power to ordain. The only question was whether he alone possessed that power. (2) Acrius also ridiculed the observance of Easter as a relic of Jewish superstition, to be cast aside now that "Christ our Passover has been sacrificed for us." (3) Prayers and offerings for the dead he regarded not as useless only, but as pernicious. If they availed to the benefit of the departed, no one need trouble himself to live holily: he would only have to provide, by bribes or otherwise, a multitude of persons to make prayers and offerings for him, and his salvation was secure. (4) All set fasts he condemned. A Christian man should fast when he felt it to be for his soul's good: appointed days of fasting were relics of Jewish bondage. Epiphanius charges his followers with showing their contempt for Church usage, by gratifying their appetites to a greater degree than usual on Wednesdays and Fridays and the solemn weeks before Easter, and fasting on Sundays; and indulging in undisguised mockery of those who followed the rule of the Church.

Philaster, whose authority when unconfirmed by other testimony is very small, confounds the Aerians with the Encratites, and asserts that they practised abstinence from food and rejected marriage (Philast. Haer. 72).

The only original authority on Aerius and his followers is the Panarium of Epiphanius, Haer. 75. A summary of his statements is given by Augustine, De Haeres. 53; Philaster, l. c., is simply misleading. The student may further consult Schröckh, Christliche Kirch. Gesch. vol. vi. pp. 226-234; Walch, Ketzerhist. vol. iii. pp. 221, sq.; Neander, Ch. Hist. vol. iii. pp. 461-463 (Clark's translation); Herzog, Real Encycl. vol. i. 165; Tillemont, *Hist. AERIUS, a Christian sophist, a native of Cyrus, and friend and correspondent of Theodoret. Theodoret wrote to him early in his episcopate, inviting him to the consecration of the church he had built at Cyrus; and again (c. 442) in behalf of Celestiacus, formerly a wealthy senator of Carthage, who had lost his all in the sack of the city by Genseric. AETIUS (Ἀέτιος), the founder and head of the strictest sect of Arianism, upon whom, on account of the boldness of his reasonings on the nature of God, theological bitterness with its customary exaggeration, affixed the surname of "the ungodly," ἄθεος (Soz. iii. 15): an epithet, however, not to be taken in its modern sense of "atheist," which, as implying intention and system, is far too strong. He was the first to carry out the doctrines of Arius to their legitimate issue, and in opposition both to Homoiousians and Homoiousians maintained that the Son was unlike, ἀνόμοιος, the Father, from which his followers took the name of Anomoeans. [ANOMOEANS]. They were also known as Eunomians [EUNOMIANS], from his amanuensis and pupil Eunomius, who proved the principal apologist of the party; and as Heterusiasts and Exukontians, as affirming that the Son was ἐξ ἑτέρας οὐσίας from the Father, and created ἐξ οὐκ ὄντων.

The events of his singularly vagrant and chequered career are related from very different points of view by the Eunomian Philostorgius, and the orthodox writers Socrates, Sozomen, Theodoret, and Gregory Nyssen. The friendly pen of Philostorgius carefully softens all the offensive features of his history, which his theological adversaries delight to paint in the blackest colours. After making all due allowance for the unfairness of party spirit, we must regard Aetius as a bold and unprincipled adventurer, endowed with an indomitable love of disputation, which, together with an ostentatious delight in displaying his dialectic skill, led him, without any depth of conviction, into incessant arguments on the nature of the Godhead, the person of our Lord, and other transcendental subjects, and rendered his life one unwearied and fruitless strife, not only with the orthodox but with the less pronounced of the Arian party who shrunk from accepting his dogma of the dissimilarity of the Father and the Son. Born of comparatively humble parentage, "his restless and aspiring spirit urged him to try almost every profession of human life. He was," in the graphic words of Gibbon, "successfully a slave, or at least a husbandman, a travelling tinker, a goldsmith, a physician, a shoemaker, a theologian, and at last the apostle of a new church" (Decline and Fall, c. xxi.). He was born at Antioch. His father, who had held some minor office, possibly as apparitor, under the president of the province, having died insolvent, his property was confiscated to discharge his official liabilities, and Aetius, then a child, and his mother, were left in a state of extreme destitution (Philostorg. H. E. iii. 15; cf. Valesius' notes; Suidas, sub. voc. Ἀέτιος). According to Gregory Nyssen, he became the slave of a woman named Ampelis; and having obtained his freedom in some disgraceful manner, took up the trade of travelling tinker. Gregory paints a lively picture, for which he probably drew largely on his imagination, of the future heresiarch travelling the country with his leathern tent, and mending pots and pans with his little hammer and portable anvil. He soon tried a higher flight, and applied his hand to richer metals, practising the art of a goldsmith. Having been convicted of substituting copper for gold in an ornament entrusted to him by a soldier's wife for repair, he gave up his trade, and attaching himself to an itinerant quack, picked up some knowledge of medicine. He met with a ready dupe in an Armenian, whose large fees placed Aetius above the reach of want. He now began to take rank as a regular practitioner at Antioch, and attended the consultations of the physicians of the place, where his loud voice, ready tongue, and power as a disputant were, according to Gregory, at the command of any who would pay for them (Greg. Nyss. adv. Eunom. lib. i. vol. ii. p. 293). Philostorgius knows nothing of this passage in his history, but tells us that his mother's death having rendered it unnecessary for him to carry on his trade, he betook himself entirely to the study of philosophy and dialectics, to which he had already devoted his nights, and became the pupil of Paulinus, the Arian bishop, the friend of Eusebius the historian, recently removed from Tyre to Antioch, c. 323 (Philost. iii. 15). Aetius attached himself to the Aristotelian form of philosophy, and with him, Milman remarks (Hist. of Christianity, vol. ii. p. 443) the strife between Aristotelianism and Platonism among theologians seems to have begun. His chief study was the Categories of Aristotle, the scope of which, according to Socrates (H. E. ii. 35), he entirely misconceived, and which he simply employed as instruments for building up sophistical arguments to prove his prosaic and unimaginative doctrines, repudiating the prevailing Platonic mode of argument used by Origen and Clemens Alex. The jealousy and ill-will he had excited as an indomitable disputant, whom it was equally hopeless to silence or to convince, broke out when the death of Paulinus, after a six months' tenure of the see, deprived him of his protector, c. 324. His successor Eulalius yielded to the popular feeling, and banished Aetius to Anazarbus in Cilicia, where he again gained his livelihood by his trade, disputing at the same time with all who would enter into argument with him. Here his dialectic skill charmed the heart of a grammarian, who took him home and instructed him more fully, receiving repayment by his menial services. Unable to resist his combativeness, he tried his polemic powers against his benefactor, whom he put to public shame by the open confutation of his interpretation of Scripture. On the ignominious dismissal which naturally followed, Athanasius, the Arian bishop of the place, opened his doors to the outcast, and read the Gospels with him. He prosecuted his study of the New Testament by reading St. Paul's epistles at Tarsus with Antonius, who, like Athanasius, had been a disciple of Lucian, Arius' master. On Antonius' elevation to the episcopate, Aetius returned to Antioch, where he studied the prophets, particularly Ezekiel, with Leontius, afterwards bishop of that see, also a pupil of Lucian. The storm of unpopularity to which he had already been forced to yield was again excited by his unbridled tongue and the obtrusive impiety of his doctrines, and soon drove him from Antioch. Cilicia was once more his haven of refuge; but his former good fortune seemed to have forsaken him, and he was defeated in argument by one of the Borborian Gnostics. Overwhelmed by the disgrace of his defeat, he left Asia, and betook himself to Alexandria, and soon recovered his former character as an invincible adversary by vanquishing in argument the Manichean leader Aphthonius, whose fame had contributed to draw him to Egypt. Aphthonius, according to Philostorgius (H. E. iii. 15) only survived his defeat seven days. Here Aetius again took up his former professions, studying medicine under Sopolis, and practising gratuitously for the benefit of the poor, and working as a goldsmith at night and at spare hours, undertaking any jobs that required a hand of more than ordinary skill.

On the murder of Gregory the Arian bishop of Alexandria, and the triumphant return of St. Athanasius in 349, Aetius felt it prudent to return to Antioch, of which his former teacher Leontius was now bishop. By him Aetius was ordained deacon c. 350 (Philost. iii. 17; Socr. H. E. ii. 35; Athanas. de Synod. § 38, Oxford translation, p. 137; Suidas, s. v.), with permission to teach publicly. This was far more to his taste than the humbler duties of the diaconate, which his patron permitted him to repudiate. His ordination was successfully protested against by Flavian and Diodorus, though still laymen, and he was inhibited from the exercise of his ministry (Theodoret, H. E. ii. 24). Epiphanius erroneously asserts that he was admitted to the diaconate by George of Cappadocia, the intruding bishop of Alexandria (Epiphani. Haeres. lxxvi. 1). Aetius now developed more fully his anomæan tenets, teaching openly that the Son was created ἐξ οὐκ ὄντων, and was dissimilar to the Father, and exerted all his influence to induce the Arian party to refuse communion with the orthodox. His failure exasperated him, and he now began to withdraw himself from the less pronounced Arians, and in his turn to refuse to hold communion with them (Socr. H. E. ii. 359). This schism in the Arian party was still further developed at the first council of Sirmium,

A.D. 351, where he attacked the respectable semi-Arian (Homoiousian) bishops, Basilus of Ancyra, and Eustathius of Sebaste, with a vehemence and ability that, according to Philostorgius (H. E. iii. 16), reduced them to a humiliating silence. Exasperated by his discomfiture, Basil denounced his opponent to the weak and cruel Gallus, who, having been named Caesar in 351, had fixed his abode at Antioch, and declared himself a champion of a faith which he never allowed to restrain his passions or influence his conduct. Gallus ordered the pestilent heretic to be put to death by "crurifragium;" but his life was spared at the intercession of the bishop Leontius, who refuted the calumnies of his enemies; and being subsequently introduced to Gallus by Theophilus Blemmys, he speedily gained his friendship, and acquired so much influence with him that he was sent by Gallus to his brother Julian to win him back from the paganism into which he was lapsing. Gallus also appointed him his religious teacher (Philost. H. E. iii. 27; Greg. Nyss. u. s. p. 294).

The fall of Gallus in 354 caused a change in the fortunes of Aetius. He was accused of complicity in the massacre of Domitian and Montius, but escaped the vengeance of Constantius, and returned to Alexandria in 356 to support the waning cause of Arianism against the influence which Athanasius, though again banished, exerted from his desert hiding-place. The see of Athanasius was then occupied by George of Cappadocia, under whom Aetius served as a deacon, and when nominated to the episcopate by two Arian bishops Serras and Secundus, he refused to be ordained by them on the ground that they had held communion with the Homoiousian party (Philost. iii. 19). Here he was joined by his renowned pupil and secretary Eunomius, who had been drawn from Cappadocia by the fame of his wisdom, and eventually became the most powerful champion of his master's doctrines (Greg. Nyss. u. s. p. 299; Socr. H. E. ii. 22; Philost. H. E. iii. 20). Greater troubles were now at hand for Aetius. The sense of his defeat, which still rankled in the breast of Basil of Ancyra, was exasperated by his disappointment once more in not obtaining the see of Antioch after the death of Leontius, and he denounced his vanquisher to the civil power. Constantius had taken Arianism under his imperial protection. The views of Aetius were heterodox even to the heterodox, and his theological errors were rendered more unpardonable by his supposed complicity in the treasonable designs of Gallus. He was accordingly given over to Basil and his party, by whom he was banished to Pepuza in Phrygia. The influence of the court prelates Ursacius and Valens soon procured the revocation of the decree of banishment. But the untiring hostility of his opponents, after a short interval, drove him again into exile. The hard irreverence of Aetius, and the determination with which he pushed to the utmost the legitimate conclusions from the principles of Arius, shocked the more religious among the Arian party, and forced the bishops in self-defence to use all measures to crush one equally dangerous as an ally and an opponent. His doctrines were also becoming alarmingly prevalent. "Nearly the whole of Antioch had suffered from the shipwreck of Aetius, and there was danger lest the whole (once more) should be submerged" (Letter of George bishop of Laodicea, ap. Soz. H. E. vi. 13). They therefore employed all their influence with Constantius to procure the summoning of another council to settle the great theological controversy. The synod was appointed for Nicomedia in Bithynia. But a violent earthquake which shattered the city, prevented its assembling there, and the intrigues of the court party and the influence of the all-powerful eunuch Eusebius brought about its division into two synods. That for the west met at Ariminum; that for the east at Seleucia in Isauria, A.D. 359. The latter council, after four or five days' deliberation, separated without having come to any definite conclusion. "The Arians, Semiarians, and Anomoceans, mingled in tumultuous strife, and hurled mutual anathemas at one another" (Milman, Hist. Christ. iii. c. 8). Whatever triumph was gained rested with the opponents of the Aetians, who appealed to the emperor and the court, and a second general council was summoned to meet at Constantinople (St. Athanas. de Synod. § 10, 12). Of this council Acacius was the leading spirit, and by some strange combination of circumstances a split occurred among the Anomocean followers of Aetius. The party triumphed, but its founder was sent into banishment. The place of his exile was Mopsuestia: but the emperor hearing that he was kindly treated there by Auxentius the bishop, ordered him to be transferred to Amblada in Pisidia, a wild and barbarous place at the foot of Mount Taurus. Here, however, he gained the goodwill of the savage inhabitants by the power of his prayers, having, as they supposed, averted a pestilence caused by the extreme heat (Theod. ii. 23; Soz. iv. 23, 24; Philost. iv. 12; Greg. Nyss. u. s. p. 301).

The death of Constantius, A.D. 361, put an end to Aetius' exile. Julian, on his accession, recalled all the banished bishops, and wrote a private letter to Aetius, evidencing an agreeable recollection of his former intercourse, and inviting him to his court (Ep. Juliani, 31, p. 52, ed. Boisson; Soz. v. 5). He furnished him with public conveyances to facilitate his return, and at the instance of Eudoxius (Philost. ix. 4) presented him with a landed estate in the island of Lesbos as a token of his goodwill. The ecclesiastical censure was taken off Aetius by Euzoios, the Arian bishop of Antioch (Philost. vii. 5), who, with the bishop of his party, compiled a defence of his doctrines (Phil. viii. 2). According to Epiphanius (Haer. u. s.), he was consecrated bishop at Constantinople, though not to any particular see; and, in conjunction with Eunomius, consecrated bishops for his own party in the capital and elsewhere (Philost. viii. 2). On the death of Jovian, A.D. 364, Valens, on his return from Illyricum to Constantinople, showed special favour to Eudoxius, between whom and Aetius and Eunomius a schism had arisen. Aetius in disgust retired from the city to the farm given him by Julian in Lesbos (Philost. ix. 4). The revolt of Procopius once more endangered his life. He was accused to the governor, whom Procopius had placed in the island, of favouring the cause of Valens, A.D. 365-6, and his life was only saved by the intervention of a powerful favourite of Procopius, who was a kinsman of two of Eunomius' most attached followers (Philost. ix. 6). Aetius once more returned to Constantinople, where he resided for a short time with Eunomius, his firm friend through all his vicissitudes, and Florentius, the bishop to whom they had entrusted their party. His death took place A.D. 367. His last hours were watched over by Eunomius, by whom and his theological adherents his funeral was performed with much magnificence (Philost. ix. 6).

Aetius was the author of several letters to Constantius and others, filled with theological technicalities and subtle disquisition on the nature of the Deity (Socr. ii. 35), and of 300 heretical propositions, of which Epiphanius has preserved 47 (Haeres. lxxvi. § 10), together with a refutation of each. [E. V.]

AETIUS. (1), a Palestinian bishop, who condemned the ARCHONTIC Peter of Capharbaricha, about a generation before 361 (Epiph. Haer. 291). A Bishop of Lydda (Diospolis) of this name subscribed the C. of Nicaea (325). Yet he had been claimed not long before by Arius as a partisan (Theodoret, H. E. i. 5: cf. v. 7; Epiph. Haer. 731c); he took part in the Arian Synod of Antioch in 330 (Theodoret, H. E. i. 20); and the Arian historian Philostorgius (H. E. iii. 12) accuses him of having joined the Athanasians in the hope of evading a charge of fornication, adding that he died soon after by an appropriate judgment. An Aetius stands second among the Palestinian bishops who subscribed the C. of Sardica (347: Ath. Ap. c. Ar. 50), and who two years later specially congratulated Athanasius on his return from exile (Ath. ib. 57; cf. H. Ar. ad Mon. 25).

(2). A bishop of the Valentinians at Constantia in Cyprus. According to Polybius (V. Epiph. 59) he was struck dumb by Epiphanius for his blasphemies, and died on the 7th day. [H.]

AETLA, a pupil of S. Hilda in the monastery of Whitby, who according to Bede became bishop of Dorchester. He is probably the same as Haeddi, who was bishop of the West Saxons from 676 to 705; see HAEDDI: but Florence of Worcester (M. H. B. 622) supposes him to have been the bishop of a new see established for the South Angles in 679, in consequence of the decree of the Synod of Hertford. Dorchester, however, was still a part of Wessex, nor was the see finally fixed at Winchester until the translation of S. Birinus by Haeddi, which took place before 693. Perhaps Aetla may have been a diminutive of Haeddi (Bede, H. E. iv. 23; Ang. Sacra, i. 192, 193). [S.]

AFRICANUS, an imaginary writer on heresies referred to by "Praedestinatus" (i. heading and c. 83). [H.]

AFRICANUS, JULIUS (Ἀφρικανός), a Christian writer at the beginning of the 3rd century, twice called by Suidas Sextus Africanus (s. v. Ἀφρικανός, Σωσάννα), but this was probably a lapse of memory. No other ancient writer calls him Sextus, or Sextus Julius, by which combination it has been proposed to reconcile Suidas with the other authorities. He may have been, as Suidas also asserts, a Libyan by birth; but a great part of his life was passed at Emmaus in Palestine, not however the village Emmaus described by St. Luke (xxiv. 16) as distant sixty stadia from Jerusalem, a point taken for granted by the ancient authorities (Sozomen, H. E. v. 21; Hieron., in libro de Locis Hebraicis, s. v. Ἐμμαούς, ii. p. 439; et in Epitaph. Paulae, iv. p. 673); but, as Reland has shown in his Palæstina, pp. 427, 758 (see also Smith's Dictionary of Geography, s. v. Emmaus), the town Emmaus situate in the plain country, (1 Macc. iii. 40) at the distance of 22 Roman miles (= 176 stadia) from Jerusalem. This town Emmaus having become ruined, Africanus, A.D. 221, went on a successful embassy to the Emperor Elagabalus, and was placed by him at the head of a commission for the restoration of the city, which thenceforward bore the name Nicopolis (Euseb., Chron.; Hieron., De Vir. Illust. cap. 63). According to Sozomen (l. c.) the town did not then first receive that name, but had been built a little after the destruction of Jerusalem, and had been called Nicopolis to commemorate the Roman victories over the Jews. Georgius Syncellus, in a passage, supposed by Scaliger to have been derived from the first part of the Chronica of Eusebius, names not Elagabalus, but his successor Alexander, as the emperor to whom the embassy was sent. It is quite possible that two or three years may have intervened between the sending of the embassy and its successful termination. Two Syrian writers (the earlier of whom however lived at the end of the 12th century), Dionysius Barsalibi and Hebedjesu, represent Africanus to have been Bishop of Emmaus (Assemani, Bibl. Orient. ii. p. 158, iii. p. 14). Against this statement must be set (besides the silence of earlier authorities, none of whom asserts Africanus to have been even a presbyter,) the fact that Origen in his letter to Africanus (see below) addresses him as "brother," which is not the language of a presbyter writing to a bishop. The letter also concludes with a salutation sent to "our good Pope Apollinarius;" and it is most natural to conjecture that this Apollinarius (of whom we do not read elsewhere) and not Africanus was bishop of the place to which the letter was sent. If not a bishop at this time (about A.D. 238), Africanus could scarcely have become one afterwards; for he addresses Origen as "son," and if he were not then a bishop, this must indicate some considerable difference of age; but Origen was then over fifty, so that Africanus could scarcely have been less than seventy.

Cedrenus (Hist. Comp., p. 207) places Africanus as flourishing in the reign of Pertinax, A.D. 193. Eusebius (H. E.) places his notice of him under the reign of Gordian, A.D. 238-244. Hence Scaliger, in the ιστοριῶν συναγωγή appended to his edition of the Chronicon of Eusebius (p. 392), places Africanus the chronographer under Pertinax, and the author of the Cesti under Gordian. But even if we accept the unsupported testimony of so late an author as Cedrenus, it is possible that one man's literary activity may have extended over the whole intervening period; he may have been born A.D. 170, or a little earlier, and died A.D. 240, or a little later.

We have been able to find no authority for the statement made by Cave, and repeated by several subsequent writers, that Africanus died about A.D. 232.

Africanus seems to have been a man of considerable personal activity. He mentions in his Chronica cited by Eusebius (H. E. vi. 31) that he made a journey to Alexandria on account of the celebrity, for his knowledge of philosophy and Grecian science, of Heraclius, who afterwards, A.D. 233, became Bishop of Alexandria, and who had been placed by Origen in charge of the catechetical class, about A.D. 213. Africanus elsewhere (ap. Syncellum, p. 56, Routh, Rel. Sac. ii. 250) refers to this visit to Egypt. He also states (Routh, ii. 243) that he had personally visited the two spots which had been identified with the resting-place of Noah's ark, viz., Mount Ararat in Parthia (Armenia), and Cælaenæ (Απαμεία, ἡ Κιβωτός) in Phrygia. He describes the Dead Sea from personal observation. He seems to have visited Edessa. To these travels we must add his journey (to Rome?) on the occasion of his embassy; and if, as there seems good reason, we are to ascribe to him the κεστοί, the list of his travels must be further extended.

Africanus ranks with Clement and Origen as among the most learned of the ante-Nicene fathers (Socrates, H. E. ii. 35; Hieron., Ep. ad Magnum, 83, vol. iv. p. 656). His great work, which was intended to give a comparative view of sacred and profane history from the creation of the world, demanded an extensive range of reading; and the fragments that remain contain references to the works of a considerable number of historical writers.

The only work of Africanus which has come down to us in a complete state is his letter to Origen already mentioned. This has been preserved in several MSS., and is referred to by many authors (Eus. H. E. vi. 31; Hieron., De Vir. Ill. cap. 63; Photius, cod. 34; Suidas, s. v. Ἀφρικανός; Niceph. Call., H. E. v. 21, and others). The correspondence originated in a discussion between Origen and a certain Bassus, at which Africanus was present, and in which Origen appealed to the authority of that part of the Book of Daniel which contains the story of Susanna. Africanus, "as was proper," acquiesced at the time, but afterwards wrote a short letter to Origen urging with great vivacity several objections to the authenticity of this part of the book; that the story is wanting in gravity, that it contains internal improbabilities, that the kind of prophetic inspiration ascribed to Daniel is different from that attributed to him in the genuine book, that he is made to quote the language of his predecessors which no true prophet has done, that the style is different from that of the genuine book, that this section is not in the Book of Daniel as received by the Jews, and that it contains a play on Greek words which shows that it was originally written in Greek and not in Hebrew, in which all the books of the Old Testament are written. Origen replied at greater length, refuting these objections with more or less success. He thinks it likely that the lost Hebrew original contained a play on words which the translators endeavoured to preserve. He contends that the argument that this section is not owned by the Jews would prove too much, and would oblige us also to reject the story of Bel and the Dragon, the Song of the Three Children, and many other passages found in the Greek text and not in the Hebrew. And he urges an argument, afterwards pressed by Rufinus against Jerome, that it would be a degradation to the Church if she were forced to cast aside her sacred books, and go begging to the Jews to give her unadulterated Scriptures.

This letter of Africanus has been regarded as proving that he was acquainted with Hebrew; but he makes no objections which might not have been urged on slight knowledge of the language, or on information derived from Jewish sources. A passage in Origen's reply conveys the impression that he did not rate his correspondent's Hebrew acquirements very highly; and the chronological work of Africanus is based on the Septuagint and not on the Hebrew, the fragments preserved showing that in some cases he did not look beyond that version (see Routh's Fragments, iii., v., vii.). It seems probable that while Africanus had that slight knowledge of Hebrew which a learned and inquisitive man could scarcely have lived in Palestine without acquiring, it was not enough to enable him to make much use of the Hebrew Bible.

The date of the correspondence between Africanus and Origen is limited by the considerations that Origen writes from Nicomedia, having previously visited Palestine, and that he makes a reference to his labours in a comparison of the Greek and Hebrew texts which indicates that he had already published the Hexapla. These conditions are best satisfied by a date about A.D. 238. This correspondence was first printed in a Latin translation by Leo Castrius (Salamanca, 1570), appended to his commentaries on Isaiah. Of subsequent editions the more remarkable are Wetstein's (Basle, 1674), with notes intended to extenuate as much as may be Origen's defence of the story of Susanna; and De la Rue's, who gives the letters, with notes replying to Wetstein, in the Benedictine edition of Origen, vol. i. The letters were printed also in Gallandii Bibl. Vet. Pat. vol. ii.; and the letter of Africanus, but not that of Origen, is given in Routh's Rel. Sac. ii. 225.

Not less celebrated than the letter of Africanus to Origen, is his letter to Aristides, of whom nothing else is known, on the discrepancy between our Saviour's genealogies as given by St. Matthew and St. Luke. This has not been completely preserved, but a considerable portion is given by Eusebius (H. E. i. 7), and Routh (Rel. Sac. ii. 228) has published this together with a fragment not previously edited. A compressed version of the letter is given also in Eusebii ad Stephanum, Quest. iv. (Mai, Script. Vet. Nov. Coll., vol. i.). Africanus begins his letter by rejecting an explanation previously offered, namely, that the genealogies are fictitious lists, designed to establish our Lord's claim to be both king and priest by tracing his descent in one Gospel from Solomon, in the other from Nathan, who it was assumed was Nathan the prophet. Africanus insists on the necessity of maintaining the literal truth of the Gospel narrative, and protests against the pious fraud of attempting to draw dogmatic consequences from any statements not founded on historical fact. He then proceeds to give his own explanation, founded on the levirate law of the Jews, and professing to be traditionally derived from the Desposyni (or descendants of the kindred of our Lord), who dwelt near the villages of Nazareth and Cochaba. According to this view Matthew gives the natural, Luke the legal, descent of our Lord. Matthan, it is said, of the house of Solomon, and Melchi of the house of Nathan, married the same woman, whose name is given as Estha. Heli the son of Melchi (the names Matthan and Levi found in our present copies of St. Luke are omitted by Africanus), having died childless, his uterine brother Jacob, Matthan's son, took his wife and raised up seed to him; so that the offspring Joseph was legally Heli's son as stated by St. Luke, but naturally Jacob's son as stated by St. Matthew. For a critical examination and defence of this solution, see Mill On the Mythical Interpretation of the Gospels, p. 201. Serious doubts as to the trustworthiness of the testimony on which it rests are suggested by a story, which Africanus tells on the same authority, of a destruction of genealogies by Herod in order to conceal the ignobleness of his own origin; a story, the details of which are completely contradicted by history. And Africanus was not likely to be a severe critic of the evidence, since he maintains that in default of being able to produce a better solution we ought to accept his even on weak testimony.

Besides references to this letter to Aristides in places already indicated of Eusebius, Jerome, Photius, and Nicephorus Callistus, the solution of Africanus is adopted by St. Augustine (Retract. lib. ii. cap. vii.).

We come now to give an account of the great work of Africanus, his "accurately laboured" (Eus., H. E. vi. 31) treatise on chronology, in five books. As a whole this work has been lost, but we can form a good idea of its general character from the still remaining Chronicon of Eusebius, which was based upon it, and which undoubtedly incorporates much of it. Eusebius himself, p. 132, mentions the writings of Africanus among his authorities for Jewish history, subsequent to the times of which the Hebrew Scriptures treat. Several fragments of the work of Africanus can be identified by express quotations, either by Eusebius in his Praeparatio and Demonstratio Evangelii, or by other writers, in particular by Georgius Syncellus in his Chronographia. These have been collected by Gallandi (Bibl. Vet. Pat. vol. ii.), and more fully by Routh (Rel. Sac. vol. ii.). Photius describes the work of Africanus as concise, but omitting nothing necessary to be recorded; as beginning from the Mosaic cosmogony, and going down to the coming of Christ, and afterwards touching cursorily on the events after Christ down to the reign of Macrinus. An extract from the work itself, preserved by Georgius Syncellus (p. 212), shows that the chronicle was brought a little further down, to the consulship of Gratus and Seleucus, the fourth year of Elagabalus, Olymp. 250, 1, A.D. 221. The year of the world (5723) assigned in the extract to this consulship is the same as that named by Photius for the conclusion of the chronicle. The work must have been published early in that year, and before the result of the Olympic contests was known, for the list of Olympic victors copied from Africanus by Eusebius terminates with the 249th Olympiad. The ancient chronologers usually arranged their work in two parts, a χρονολογία and κανών; the former part containing historical and chronological discussions, the latter drawing out their results into tables, in which each year was marked with its place in the different series compared, as, for instance, its dates, according to the Olympiads, A.U.C., after Christ, its number in such an emperor's reign, its consuls, and so forth. It is of this latter part that the word chronicon in the singular number is properly used. This part, containing the expanded results, is also sometimes called τὸ κατὰ πλάτος, as the former is καθ' ὁμάδα. Now Anianus calls the five books of Africanus τὰ καθ' ὁμάδα. Yet that they were not unaccompanied by a κανὼν appears from Fragment xxxvi. in Routh, where Africanus says that ἡμέτερος κανὼν places the first Olympiad in the reign of Jotham, King of Judah.

The following is an account of the plan of the work, and of some of its principal results. Before the time of Africanus, the Christian Apologists had been forced to engage in some chronological discussions in order to remove the heathen contempt of Christianity as a novelty, by demonstrating the great antiquity of the Jewish system, out of which the Christian sprang. Thus Tatian (Or. ad Graec. cap. 39), Theophilus of Antioch (ad Autol. iii. 21), Clement of Alexandria (Stromata, i. 21), discuss the question of the antiquity of Moses, and, following Josephus (cont. Apion. i. 16), arrive at the conclusion that Moses was a contemporary of Inachus, and that the Exodus took place 393 years before the coming of Danaus to Argos. Africanus first set himself to make a complete synopsis of sacred and profane history from the creation of the world, where should be put in their proper places the most important facts recorded in Scripture or by secular historians. To establish a synchronism between sacred and profane history, he used as a fixed point the accession of Cyrus, which, alleging the authority of Diodorus, Thallus, Castor, Polybius, Phlegon, and others, he placed Olymp. 55, 1. Counting backwards then in sacred history, he computes 1237 years between the Exodus and the end of the 70 years' captivity or the first of Cyrus. Similarly going back in profane history he computes, on the authority of Hellanicus and Philochorus, 1020 years between Ogyges and the first Olympiad, and, adding 217 years between the first Olympiad and Cyrus, he finds also 1237 years between Ogyges and Cyrus, and concludes that Moses and Ogyges were contemporaries. He thinks it likely that there was a connection between the Ogygian deluge and the plagues of Egypt; and he confirms his conclusions by showing that it can be deduced from Polemo, Apion, and Ptolemaeus Mendesius, that Moses was a contemporary of Inachus, whose son, Phoroneus, reigned at Argos in the time of Ogyges. In the sacred history Africanus follows the Septuagint chronology; he counts 2262 years to the deluge: he does not recognize the second Cainan: he places the Exodus A.M. 3707. In computing the years of the Judges he is blamed by Eusebius for lengthening the chronology by adding, without authority, 30 years for the elders after Joshua, 40 for anarchy after Samson, and 25 years of peace. He thus makes 740 years between the Exodus and Solomon. Our Lord's birth he places in the year of the world 5500, and two years before our common computation of Anno Domini. But he allows only one year for our Lord's public ministry, and brings the crucifixion thus to the year A.M. 5531. He has a mystical calculation, in which he makes the 31 years of our Saviour's life the complement of the 969 years of Methuselah. To the period of the 70 weeks he devoted especial attention, and it seems to have been the subject of a separate treatise (Routh, ii. 306). He calculates the commencement from the 20th year of Artaxerxes: from this to the death of our Lord he counts only 475 years; but he contends that the 70 weeks of Daniel are to be understood as 490 lunar years of 354 days each, which are equivalent to 475 Julian years. And here he makes a curious remark, which is worth quoting as illustrating the extent of his scientific knowledge. He apologizes for using the popular value for the length of the year, 365½ days, and says that he is well aware that it would have been more accurate to use the value 365⅓. This is a correction in the wrong direction, making the year longer than its value, according to the Julian calendar, instead of shorter as it really is. The explanation evidently is, that he accepted as accurate the cycle of Euctemon and Meton, in which 235 months, containing in all 6940 days, were made equivalent to 19 years. This gives the length of a year used by Africanus. He computes correctly that the substitution of the Metonic for the Julian value of the length of a year would make a difference in his calculation of six days and a quarter; and if his astronomy is not up to the highest scientific standard of his age, his arithmetic is entitled to all praise. In like manner he computes that the difference between the Metonic value for the length of a month, 29⅓⅓, (for so the corrupt figures in the present text must be corrected) and the common value, 29½, is ⅓⅓ of a day, a quantity which he regards as too small to affect his calculations.

Another interesting passage in the χρονικά is one in which he treats of the darkness at the crucifixion, and shows, in opposition to the Syrian historian Thallus, that it was miraculous, and that an eclipse of the sun could not have taken place at the full moon. Lastly, we may notice his statement that the remains of Jacob's terebinth at Shechem, Gen. xxxv. 4, were in his time still remaining, and were held in honour; and that Jacob's tent had been preserved in Edessa until it was struck with lightning in the reign of the Emperor Antoninus [Elagabalus?]. Africanus probably had personally visited Edessa, whose king, Abargar, he elsewhere mentions.

The work in all probability concluded with the Doxology, which St. Basil has cited (De Spir. Sanct. §. 73, iii. 61) in justification of the form of doxology ὄν Ἁγίῳ Πνεύματι.

It remains to speak of another work, the κεστοί, expressly ascribed to Africanus by Eusebius (H. E. vi. 31), Photius (l. c.), Suidas (l. c.), and Syncellus (p. 359), the last-named writer being supposed by Scaliger to have copied his statement from the Chronica of Eusebius. According to this authority, the work consisted of nine books; and it is probably owing to errors of transcribers that we now find Photius enumerating 14 and Suidas 24. The work seems to have received the fanciful name of Cesti, or variegated girdles, from the miscellaneous character of its contents, which embraced the subjects of geography, natural history, medicine, agriculture, the art of war, &c. The portions that remain have suffered by mutilation and addition, different copyists having selected those parts which related to the subjects in which they were interested, and having added precepts from later writers. The military precepts have been published by Thevenot, Veteres Mathematici, Paris, 1693; several of the agricultural are included in the Geoponica of Cassianus Bassus, Cambridge, 1704, and an extremely curious summary of some of the medical precepts is given by Michael Psellus (Lambecii Comma. de Bibl. Caes. Vind. vii. 223). Modern critics have been unwilling to ascribe this work to our Africanus, on account of its completely secular character; of the repulsiveness of some of its contents, as, for instance, the directions for poisoning provisions and wells included in the art of war; and on account of the superstitious reliance on the efficacy of charms, so unlike what the critical and sceptical spirit of the letter to Origen would dispose us to expect from Africanus. And some incredible things, to which the writer gives his personal attestation (c. 29), lay him open to the charge not merely of credulity, but want of veracity. It has been held that if Julius Africanus were the writer, it must have been while he was yet a heathen; and the notice in Suidas has given rise to the conjecture that we must distinguish the Libyan Sextus Africanus, the author of the Cesti, from Julius Africanus of Palestine, the ecclesiastical writer. But the external evidence for ascribing the Cesti and Chronology to the same author is too strong to be easily set aside, and is not without some internal confirmation. Thus the author of the Cesti was better acquainted with Syria than with Libya; for he mentions the abundance of a certain kind of serpent in Syria, and gives its Syrian name (Vet. Math. p. 290), but when he gives a Libyan word (Geopon. p. 226) he does so on second-hand testimony. And he was a Christian, for he asserts (Geopon. p. 178) that wine may be kept from spoiling by writing on the vessels "the divine words, Taste and see that the Lord is gracious." The unlikelihood of Africanus having written such a work becomes less if we look upon him not as an ecclesiastic, but as a Christian philosopher, pursuing his former studies after his conversion, and entering in his note-books many things more in accordance with the spirit of his own age than of ours. It was probably in his character of philosopher that he presented himself to the emperor to plead the cause of Emmaus, and these books, which Syncellus tells us were dedicated to the Emperor Alexander, may have been presented to prove his claim to that character.

The Syrian writers who speak of Africanus as a bishop also ascribe to him commentaries on the New Testament (Assemani, l. c. and ii. 129). Citations purporting to be from Africanus are made in the catenae of Macarius on St. Matthew (Fabric. Bibl. Gr. viii. 676), and of Nicetas on St. Luke (Mai, Script. Vet. ix. 724). That he should have engaged in such a work is consistent with the praise given him by Origen as a diligent student of Scripture.

Of works, the ascription of which to Africanus is clearly erroneous, we may mention the Acts of the martyrdom of Symphorosa and her seven sons (Bollaund, Acta Sanct., July 18). The spuriousness of these Acts is abundantly proved by S. Basnage (Annal. ii. 46). The manuscripts not only claim these Acts for Africanus, but also assert, on the authority of "Saint Eusebius the historian," that he wrote the acts of nearly all the martyrs of Rome and of all Italy. Such a statement it is needless to discuss. For further information see Fabric. Bibl. Gr. iv. 240, ed. Harles. [G. S.]

AGAPE, a Spanish lady, a disciple of MARCUS of Memphis. From her and her own disciple Helpidius Priscillian received the rudiments of his doctrine (Sulp. Sev. Chron. ii. 46 [61]; Hieron. Ep. 75 § 3). She was thus one of the links between the Gnosticism and Manichaeism of the East and the Priscillianism of Spain. Jerome no doubt had her chiefly in view when he spoke of "Gnostics deceiving noble ladies of Spain, mingling pleasure with fables, and claiming for their own folly the name of knowledge" (Com. in Es. lxiv. 4; cf. l. c.). AGAPE (Iren. 7, 135; Epiph. Haer. 165, 169). [VALENTINUS.] [H.]

AGAPETUS, bishop of Rome, was, we are told, a Roman by birth, the son of Gordianus a priest (Anast. quoted by Clinton, Fasti Romani, p. 763; Jaffé, Regesta Pontificum, p. 73). He was already an old man when, six days after the death of Johannes II. he was elected pope at the beginning of June, A.D. 535. The election may perhaps have been influenced in his favour by Theodahad the Gothic king, whom we find soon after employing him as legate to Constantinople.

On his first accession, however, he began by formally reversing an act of Bonifatius II., one of his own immediate predecessors. On the death of the antipope Dioscorus, A.D. 530, Bonifatius II. had stooped to the unnecessary revenge of fulminating anathemas against him, and forcing all his clergy to subscribe the decree which contained them. This decree Agapetus caused to be burnt in the midst of the assembled congregation (Anast. vol. i. p. 100).

We next find him entering Constantinople on the 19th Feb., A.D. 536 (Clint. F. R. p. 765). He was sent thither by Theodahad to avert, if possible, the war with which he was threatened by the emperor Justinian in revenge for the murder of his queen, Amalasontha: and we are told that he succeeded in the objects of his mission (Anast. vol. i. p. 102). But he certainly failed to avert the war; Justinian, we are told, had already incurred such expense as to be unwilling to turn back (Liberat. quoted by Baronius, Annales Ecclesiastici, vii. p. 314): and, as a matter of fact, Belisarius took Rome within the year. But Agapetus, who had already shown his independence of mind in his correspondence with Justinian, probably had other objects in view besides the avowed one, which brought him to Constantinople. The year before Anthimus, who was suspected of Monothelitism, had been appointed Patriarch of Constantinople by the influence of Theodora. Agapetus, on his first arrival, refused to receive Anthimus unless he could prove himself orthodox, and then only as bishop of Trebizond, for he was averse to the practice of translating bishops. At the same time he boldly accused Justinian himself of Monophysitism; who was fain to satisfy him by signing a "libellus fidei" and professing himself a true Catholic. But the emperor insisted upon his communicating with Anthimus, and even threatened him with expulsion from the city if he refused. Agapetus replied with spirit that he thought he was visiting an orthodox prince, and not a second Diocletian. Then the emperor confronted him with Anthimus, who was readily convicted by his antagonist. He was formally deposed, and Mennas substituted; and this was done without a council, by the single authority of the pope Agapetus; Justinian of course allowing it, in spite of the remonstrances of Theodora (Anast. vol. i. p. 102; Theophanes, Chronogr. p. 184). Agapetus followed up his victory by denouncing the other heretics who had collected at Constantinople under the patronage of Theodora. He received petitions against them from the Eastern bishops, and from the "monks" in Constantinople, as the Archimandrite coenobites were beginning to be called (Baronius, vii. p. 322); and would no doubt have proceeded to demand their expulsion, when he was cut short by death, on the 21st April, A.D. 536 (Clint. F. R. p. 765). His body was taken to Rome and there buried in St. Peter's basilica, Sept. 17th. There are five of his letters remaining:— 1. July 18th, A.D. 535, To Caesarius, bishop of Arles, about a dispute of the latter with bishop Contumeliosus (Mansi, viii. p. 356). 2. Same date, to same, "de augendis alimonis pauperum" (M. viii. p. 855). 3. Sept. 9th, A.D. 535, Reply to a letter from African bishops to his predecessor Johannes (M. viii. p. 848). 4. Same date, reply to Reparatus, bishop of Carthage, who had congratulated him on his accession (M. viii. p. 850). 5. March 13th, A.D. 536, to Peter, bishop of Jerusalem, announcing the deposition of Anthimus and consecration of Mennas (M. viii. p. 921). [G. H. M.]

AGAPETUS, bishop of the Macedonians at SYNNAIDA. The sect was fiercely persecuted by Theodosius, the Catholic prelate, whose motive was not to enforce orthodoxy but to extract money. During his absence from Synnada Agapetus convened the clergy and laity of his sect and persuaded them to accept the Homoousion. Having thus united the whole people of Synnada in a common creed, he took possession of the churches and the episcopal throne, from which Theodosius on his return was unable to oust him. (Soer. vii. 3.) [L.]

AGAPETUS, bishop of RHODES, one of the metropolitans to whom the Emperor Leo wrote respecting the death of Proterius. His answer is extant (Labbe. Conc. iv. 1891, ed. Coleti). His name appears affixed to the encyclical Epistle of the Council of Constantinople, A.D. 459, directed against Simony (ib. v. 49). [L.]

AGAPETUS (or AGAPIUS) (1) Bishop of SELEUCIA, metropolis of Isauria, present at the councils of Nicaea and Antioch, A.D. 341. (Labbe, Concil. ii. 58, 586.)

(2) Bishop of APAMEA, succeeded his brother Marcellus in the reign of Arcadius c. 398. He was a disciple of St. Marcin, and had been conspicuous for eminence in ascetic virtue. Theodoret speaks of him with high commendation, and bestows on him the epithet ὁ πανεὐφύμνος (Theod. H. E. iv. 28; v. 27; I. el. Hist. c. 3). [E. V.]

(3) A friend and correspondent of Chrysostom, whom he addresses with much respect, ἀιδεσιμώτατε καὶ θαυμασιώτατε. He appears to have offered to visit Chrysostom in his banishment at Cucusus, but he begs him to content himself with writing. "The season was unfavourable, and the Isaurian banditti rendered the journey hazardous" (Chrys. Ep. xx, lxxiii). [E. V.]

AGAPIUS, bishop of CAESAREA, succeeded Theotecnus, towards the end of the 3rd century. He is praised by his contemporary Eusebius, from his personal knowledge, for the laborious character of his episcopate, the minute oversight of his diocese, and his great liberality to the poor. Eusebius' friend, the saint and martyr Pamphilus, was ordained presbyter by him (Euseb. H. E. vii. 32; Niceph. vi. 37). [E. V.]

AGAPIUS (Ἀγάπιος), one of Manes' twelve disciples (Petrus Siculus, Hist. Man. xvi.; Photius, Contra Man. i. 14). Petrus Siculus and Photius (ibid.) mention a book of his entitled Heptalogus (cf. also the Greek form of abjuration, op. Cotelier's Patres Apost. I. p. 544); and Photius (Biblioth. cod. 179,) gives an account of two other works of his, respectively containing twenty-three, and one hundred and two chapters. These two works were dedicated to a female follower named Urania, and maintained the doctrine of the two principles, the sinful nature of the body, and the duty of abstinence from flesh, wine, and marriage. He seems to have studiously veiled his ideas under Christian terms, but to have attacked the Old Testament and to have made great use of the apocryphal Acts of the twelve Apostles, and especially those of St. Andrew. Photius gives some praise to his style, and allows him to be not devoid of controversial power. Photius adds that in some parts of these works he seems to have combated the errors of the Arian Eunomius, (μάχεσθαι δὲ δοκεῖ πρὸς τὴν Ἐνομόλου κακοδοξίαν); but this is probably only his own conjecture, as Agapius could hardly have been personally acquainted with Manes, if he had lived on so far into the fourth century. [E. B. C.]

AGATHA, a virgin martyred at Catania in Sicily under Decius A.D. 251, Feb. 5, according to her Acta; but under Diocletian according to the Martyrol. and Aldhelm (De Virgin. 22); mentioned by Pope Damasus A.D. 366 (Carm. v.), and by Venantius Fortunatus, c. A.D. 580; inserted in the canon of the Mass by Gregory the Great according to Aldhelm (ut supra, and see also S. Greg. M. Dial. iii. 30); and commemorated in a homily by Methodius c. A.D. 900. Her name is in the Carthag. Calendar of c. A.D. 450, in Ruinart, p. 695. Her legend is the not uncommon one, in the heathen persecutions, of an attempt by the Roman judge, in this case a Consul named Quintianus, to obtain possession of her person and wealth by means of the persecuting edicts against Christians; changed, when he was foiled by her unflinching purity, into hideous attempts to outrage her in the common stews, followed by cruel tortures, and ended by his causing her to be rolled naked over live coals mixed with potsherds, under which torments she died. St. Peter is said to have once miraculously healed her wounds, when the judge refused to allow them to be dressed. A church is said to have been dedicated to her at Rome by Pope Symmachus about A.D. 500; and a second, rebuilt there by Ricimer A.D. 460, was enriched with her relics by Gregory the Great (Dial. iii. 30). Gregory II. also built a church dedicated to her at Rome in 726. She is likewise honoured as patroness of the island of Malta. And her veil, carried in procession, is said to have frequently averted eruptions of Mount Etna from the town of Catania (Butler's Lives of Saints). Her name is still in the black letter calendar in the English Prayer-book; and her "letters" were regarded in the Middle Ages as a charm against fire. See also the Homily against Peril of Idolatry, p. iii.; and below under Sr. AGNES. [A. W. H.]

AGATHIAS, one of the most interesting and valuable of the Byzantine historians, whose history embraces a period of six years of the reign of Justinian, from A.D. 553 to A.D. 559. Agathias was born, as he himself tells us in the preface to his history, at Myrina, a small town in Acolis, at the point where the river Pythicus enters the Elaitic Gulph. His father's name was Memnonius, his mother's Pericha, the former a rhetorician, the latter a woman praised for her affection and wisdom, but who died when her child was three years old. An epigram written by her son makes her lament the fact that she was buried away from her native country in the dust of Constantinople, so that it is probable that Memnonius had removed to the metropolis for the purposes of his profession soon after the birth of his child, and that Agathias would receive his education there. That education, however, had also been carried on at Alexandria, and it was not till the year 554 that, after some time spent in that city, the youth returned to Constantinople (Hist. ii. 16). He would then be about seventeen or eighteen years of age, for the probability is that, as conjectured in the short notice of his life prefixed to his history, he was born about A.D. 536 or 7. On his return to Constantinople he devoted himself to the study of the Roman law, and was a successful pleader in the courts, a circumstance from which he has received, like so many others of that time, the name of scholasticus, or lawyer.

It has been doubted whether Agathias was a Christian or a heathen, and it must be allowed that the latter supposition is favoured by the absence of all specific confession of Christian truth in his writings; by the manner in which he speaks of the protomartyr Stephen, whom he refers to as "said" to have voluntarily exposed himself to danger and death by stoning for behoof of those who favoured the Christians (iii. 5); by his allusions to the latter as if he did not belong to them (iii. 24); by his frequently speaking of God simply as the δ κρείττων; by his satirical account of those controversies in which one Uranius was wont to engage with regard to the divine nature, controversies from which the combatants departed, having neither given nor received any benefit, but having been only turned from friends to enemies of one another (ii. 29); and by his evident admiration of the pagan philosophers (ii. 12). On the other hand, however, his adoption of the Christian sentiment of Matt. xvi. 26, and that almost in the very words of Scripture, "for what shall we be profited though we gain the whole Persian empire, but lose our own souls" (iii. 12); his poems to the Archangel Michael; his praise of the Franks as all Christians, as entertaining the most correct sentiments with regard to God, and as celebrating the same feasts as we do (i. 2); together with his general tone when speaking of the Greek or Barbarian idolatry, might suggest the opposite conclusion. The writer of the life already alluded to infers from his general tone in speaking of the religious errors and rites of heathen nations, that he must have learned toleration in the Christian school of adversity and persecution for his own faith, and that he had embraced Christianity, if not from conviction, at least from a desire to escape the violence to which, as a heathen, he would have been exposed. But toleration was not then learned in such a school, and what of it Agathias exhibits is rather that of the philosopher than the earnest believer. It seems probable, upon the whole, that he had gained from Christianity those just notions of God and religion to which he often gives expression, but that he had not embraced its more peculiar truths.

The profession of the law had no attractions for him. He pursued it under the pressure of necessity, and he bitterly mourns over being obliged to sit from morning till evening in the royal porch turning over law-books, troubled by crowds, and involved in the causes of the courts, when he would so much rather have been engaged in reading the writings of the wise ancients, in the enjoyment of that freedom from care which was so necessary to literary pursuits (iii. 1). He was, indeed, mainly the man of letters. His first literary efforts were poetical. He wrote a number of epigrams or sonnets on a great variety of subjects, and published them, along with other short pieces of a similar kind, in an anthologia. Many of these have been preserved, and are appended to his history.

It was at the age of thirty that Agathias turned his attention more particularly to history itself, of which he entertained the most lofty and just ideas. It seemed to him that it was that storehouse of the past from which lessons for the present were to be drawn, and that it was the great encourager of noble deeds. Previous historians, too, with the exception of Procopius, whom he greatly admired, afforded him little satisfaction. He thought them unjust to the departed, and too laudatory of the living. Above all, the times were eventful, illustrating even that sympathy which Neander has said so often shows itself in critical periods between nature and man. Everywhere war; the northern barbarians desolating Italy with their incursions; Africa a scene of tumult; Asia not less so; comets appearing in the sky; and earthquakes laying waste the cities of the East and the islands of the Aegean with a frequency and a terribleness of destruction which has never been exhibited since. Agathias was, even as a young man, struck with these things (ii. 16); and, partly under the impression which they produced, partly at the solicitation of friends who had no doubt observed the impression, and been both by it and otherwise convinced of his fitness for the task, resolved to devote himself to history, and especially to continuing the History of Procopius (Praef. and iv. 29). The principles upon which he resolved to proceed, and which he has fully stated in his preface, were in a high degree excellent, and the calm, reflective, even philosophic, tone of what he has written, proves that he adhered to them. He is undoubtedly one of the ablest and most trustworthy writers of his time, and he is all the more interesting that he stands on the very verge of the period when the last rays of light were about to be swallowed up in the long darkness that followed. He wrote in five books, taking up the thread of events at the point where Procopius had dropped it, and beginning with the defeat and death of Teias the last king of the Goths, and the victorious progress of the eunuch Narses, one "among the few," says Gibbon, "who have rescued that unhappy name from the contempt and hatred of mankind" (History of the Roman Empire, c. xliii.). From this he pursues the story of the campaign of Narses against the Franks and the Alemanni, then turns to the war of Rome against the Persians and Huns, dwelling much upon the history of Chosroes, and breaking off with the internal dissensions of the Huns and their destruction of one another at the instigation of Justinian. He did not begin to write till after the death of Justinian and the accession of Justin the younger, A.D. 565; the fourth book was not written till after the death of Chosroes in A.D. 577; and the publication of the whole probably soon followed, how soon it is not easy to say, for the year of his death is assigned by some to A.D. 582, by others to a date not earlier than A.D. 594.

Agathias is valuable for the facts which he mentions, many of which are not to be found elsewhere. He has been largely depended on by Gibbon for that part of the reign of Justinian to which his history relates. At the same time his notices of the religion and customs of the nations that he speaks of are highly important. His style has been characterized by Vossius as tersa et florida (de Hist. Græc., lib. ii. p. 270). It is, however, marked much more by the latter than the former quality, being often stilted and pretentious, so that Gibbon has not unaptly spoken of his "prolix declamation" (c. xliii.). Partly, perhaps, because of the honour in which he was held as a historian, but mainly because of more substantial benefits conferred by him upon his native city, he was along with his father Memnonius honoured by it with a statue (vita Agathiae, p. 16).

Agathias may be consulted for such particulars as the following: the six years, A.D. 553-559; the wars of the Empire with the Alemanni, Goths, &c., his accounts of which he often intersperses with interesting remarks on the manners, customs, and religion of these nations; the war with the Persians, where he takes occasion to describe the religion of Zoroaster; the campaigns of Belisarius and Narses; the character, history, and fate of Chosroes, king of the Persians; the terrible earthquakes and plagues which desolated the East in the middle of the 6th century; together with many incidental notices of cities, forts, and rivers, philosophers and subordinate commanders.

His history was published in Greek at Leyden, by Vulcanius, A.D. 1594. The same scholar afterwards published separately a Latin translation of it. Both the Greek text and the Latin translation were again published together at Paris, A.D. 1660; but the best edition is that of B. G. Niebuhr, in the Corpus Script. Hist. Byzant. The Latin translation, and the notes of this edition, are those of Vulcanius. [W. M.]

AGATHO, bishop of Rome; originally a Sicilian monk, succeeded Domnus, A.D. 678 (in June or July, Jaffe's Regesta Pontificum, p. 166). The event of his reign was the sixth œcumenic council at Constantinople, the summons to which was sent by Constantine Pogonatus during the pontificate of Domnus, but arrived after his death. In A.D. 679, preliminary metropolitan synods were held in the ecclesiastical provinces of the Western Church, and among the rest one at Hatfield, in England, presided over by Theodorus of Canterbury (Beda, H. E. iv. 17). Agatho, we find from a letter of his own, had hoped that Theodorus would attend his synod at Rome, to be held in the spring of the next year, and would go as one of the delegates from the Western Church to Constantinople. But Theodorus declined the invitation. He was just then involved in a dispute with Wilfrith, bishop of York; and hearing that Wilfrith was on his journey to Rome to plead his cause in person, he sent one Cenwald thither, to arrive if possible before him, and give his version of the matter in dispute. The synod of the Western Church assembled in the autumn of A.D. 679, and sat till the following spring. We hear of three sessions:—1. October, A.D. 679, present 16 bishops, in which the affairs of the British Church were generally discussed, and in which probably Cenwald was heard (Wilkins, i. p. 45). 2. Present more than 50 bishops and priests, in which Wilfrith's petition was received (Eddius, Vit. Wilfr. 29). 3. March 27th, A.D. 680, present 125 bishops, in which Wilfrith's acquittal was pronounced, and he allowed to take his seat among them (Edd. 51), while they proceeded to choose delegates for the Council at Constantinople:—bishops Abundantius of Paternum, Johannes of Rhegium, and Johannes of Portus. These they entrusted with a commendatory letter to the emperor, in which it was stated that the legates were not empowered to argue about uncertainties, but only to define and defend what was certain and immutable. To these legates from the council, Agatho added some others to represent himself personally. These were Theodorus, archbishop of Ravenna, who had newly reconciled his see with that of Rome, two priests, a deacon and a sub-deacon, and some monks. He sent by them a private letter to the emperor, in which he apologized for having been obliged to send such unlearned men, evidently with reference to Theodorus of Canterbury, "the philosopher," whom he had wished to send, asserted the supremacy of the Roman see over the Eastern Church, and the absolute infallibility of its bishops, and concluded by saying that if the council were to agree in heterodox decrees, he and the Western Church should hold fast by the old faith.

The two bodies of delegates travelled together, and did not reach Constantinople, where their coming was anxiously expected, till the 10th of September, A.D. 680 (Baron. viii. p. 682). Eight days after they were honourably received in the Blachernal, and on the 7th of November the Council began its sittings in the chamber called Trullus of the Imperial palace. The proceedings of the Council will be found elsewhere. [DICT. OF CHR. ANT. art. 'Constantinople, Sixth Council of.'] The Western legates seem to have strictly adhered to Pope Agatho's instructions, and to have confined themselves to protesting against the reading of certain passages from the fathers in favour of Monothelitism, which they said were forged. Nevertheless, in the seventh sitting the scale was turned in their favour by the adhesion of Georgius, patriarch of Constantinople: and it does not seem to have been thought very humiliating to the Western Church, that their victory involved the anathematization of Pope Honorius, one of Agatho's predecessors.

Agatho just lived through the sessions of the Council. It broke up on the 16th Sept. A.D. 681, and he died the 10th Jan. A.D. 682, before the return of his victorious delegates to Italy. (Jaffé's Regesta Pontificum, pp. 166, 167; Baronius, Annales Ecclesiastici, vol. viii. pp. 659-716.)

Eight letters and decrees of his are extant.—1. Giving privileges to Wearmouth Abbey, at the request of Biscop Baducing (Beda, H. E. iv. 18). 2. To Theodorus of Ravenna, inviting him to Rome, Agnelli, Vit. Theodori, 4, in Muratori's Rerum Italicarum Scriptores. 3. & 4. The letters referred to above, and to the Emperor Constantine (Mansi, xi. pp. 234, 286). 5. Decree giving privileges to St. Peter's, Medeshamsted (Peterborough) (Mon. Angl. i. p. 66). 6. Ditto to Hexham and Ripon Monasteries (Eddius, Vit. Wilfridi, 45, 49). 7. Ditto to St. Paul's, London, at the request of Earconwald, its bishop (Mon. Angl. iii. p. 299). 8. Letter to the Universal Church, claiming for all papal decrees the authority of St. Peter himself (Gratian, i. Dist. 19, c. 2). [G. H. M.]

AGATHOPODES, more properly AGATHOPUS, a deacon of Antioch, named Rheos Agathopus, one of the two companions of St. Ignatius in his journey to his martyrdom at Rome, and one of the authors of the Acta of that martyrdom (S. Ignat. Epist. ad Smyrn. et ad Philadelph.; T. Smith in Praef. ad Acta S. Ign.); himself however not known to have been a martyr, although in Baronius' Martyrology (April 25). He appears in the first set of Pseudo-Ignatian epistles as an "elect man," who has "renounced life" and followed Ignatius from Syria (ad Philadelph. 11); and as hospitably received by the Church of Smyrna (ad Smyrn. 10). He is reproduced in the second set of spurious epistles (ad Tars. 10; ad Ant. 13; ad Philip. 15). [A. W. H.]

AGATHOPUS. Clement of Alexandria (Strom. iii. § 59, p. 538) quotes Valentinus from "his epistle to Agathopus." I. Voss and others without reason identify this otherwise unknown person with the Rheos Agathopus mentioned above. As Voss observes, the name is found in several inscriptions. [H.]

AGELIUS appears to have been the immediate successor of Acesius, as bishop of the Novatian body at Constantinople, A.D. 345, and to have held his see forty years till his death in 384. He suffered during the fierce persecution of the Homoousians by Macedonius, described by Socrates, and fled from Constantinople (Socr. H. E. ii. 38). As a Homoousian he was also persecuted by Valens, and banished by him (Socr. H. E. iv. 9; Soz. H. E. vi. 9). Venerable for his age, his sufferings for the orthodox faith, and the apostolic simplicity of his life, he was consulted by Nectarius (ὡς κατὰ τὴν πίστιν διόφρονα) when Theodosius had opened his plan for restoring peace to the divided church in 383.

Doubting his ability in disputation, Agecius deputed his lector, Sisinnius, a fellow-pupil of the Emperor Julian under Maximus, to represent him. The result was favourable to the Novatians, who were acknowledged as orthodox, and permitted to hold their meetings within the city (Socr. v. 10; Soz. vii. 12). When near his end, Agecius named Sisinnius as his successor. This was displeasing to the people, who desired Marcian, the tutor of the princesses, to whose influence they owed the restoration of their liberty of worship. Agecius yielded to their wishes, on the condition that if Sisinnius outlived Marcian he should be the next bishop (Socr. v. 21; Soz. vii. 14; Clinton, F. R. i. 509, ii. 443). [E. V.]

AGENNETUS (Iren. 54: cf. 56). [VALENTINUS; EPIPHANES.] [H.]

AGERATUS (Iren. 6, 135; Epiph. Haer. 165, 169; cf. Auct. Val. ap. Epiph. 168B). [VALENTINUS.] [H.]

AGIL or ST. AISLE (quem propter celeres motus infantiae Agilum nominaverunt), was the son of Agnoald, councillor of Hildebert, prince of Burgundy and Austrasia, and his wife Deuteria. His father was on friendly terms with the eminent Celtic missionary, COLUMBANUS, who persuaded him to devote his child at an early age to the monastic life. Accordingly he entered the monastery of Luxeuil about the year A.D. 590. There he devoted himself to study and prayer, and in the year A.D. 615 was deputed by a synod of the Frankish churches to accompany EUSTACIUS, abbot of Luxeuil, on a missionary tour in Bavaria. After labouring in that country with no little success, he was requested by Dagobert, the successor of Clothaire, to undertake the superintendence of a neighbouring monastery. Accordingly he set out thither about the year A.D. 636, and surrounding himself with numerous ardent followers continued till an advanced period of his life to carry on the missionary operations, which had been so successfully begun by Columbanus. (Acta SS. Ord. Bened. ii. 303-312.) [G. F. M.]

AGILBERT, bishop of Dorchester and afterwards of Paris. He appears in Bede first as "pontifex quidam, natione Gallus," from which the authors of the Gallia Christiana conclude that he had been consecrated by French bishops without any see. After his consecration he studied in Ireland, whence he came into Wessex about the year 648, and was appointed by king Cenwalch successor to Birinus in the bishopric of the West Saxons. In this position he continued for several years, but being unable to learn English, Cenwalch, who knew no other language, introduced another bishop, Wina, to whom he gave half of Agilbert's diocese, placing his see at Winchester. Agilbert, disgusted at this proceeding, left Wessex and went to Northumbria, whence, after taking part with Wilfrid, and his own priest Agatho, at the synod of Strensall, in 664, he retired to France. There he received and consecrated Wilfrid (whom he had already ordained priest) at Compiègne, and was, about the year 668, made bishop of Paris. Bede places his promotion to the see of Paris before the consecration of Wilfrid. Cenwalch, who had in the mean time quarrelled with Wina, invited him to return to Wessex, but he was unwilling to leave Paris, which is said to have been his native place, and sent his nephew Leutherius, who was made bishop of Dorchester in 670. In 669 Agilbert entertained Theodorus on his way from Rome to Canterbury. His name is attached to a single charter as bishop of Paris, probably of the year 670. The year of his death is unknown, but it took place in the monastery of Jonarre on the 11th of October. It is questionable whether he is the Agilbert who, according to Fredegar, was sent in 680 by Ebrouin to the duke Martin, to deceive him by taking a false oath on an empty reliquary. (v. Fredegar, ii. 97; ap. Bouquet, ii. 451; Bede, H. E. iii. 7, 25-28; iv. 1, 12; Gallia Christiana, sub. sed. Paris; Edius, v. Wilfridi, x. xii.) [S.]

AGNELLUS, archbishop of Ravenna, was born A.D. 486, and held his bishopric from 556 to 569; and died at the age of 83. Agnellus was of noble birth, and considerable wealth, and enjoyed the favour of Narses, who on the defeat of the Goths made over to him all the property possessed by them in Ravenna. On the death of his wife he entered holy orders, and became præfectus of the church of St. Agatha; and in 556 was consecrated bishop. He reconciled the churches that had been polluted by Arian services in the time of Theodoric, built the church of St. Gregory, and adorned others with gifts and ornaments. He was the author of Epistola de Ratione Fidei ad Arminum against Arianism (Bibl. Patr. Colon. 1618, vol. v. p. 642). He was buried in the church of St. Agatha, and his epitaph is given by Muratori, p. 1823, i. Ravennas. and Oudin. (Cave, Hist. Lit. i. p. 529; Clinton, F. R. ii. p. 482; Oudin, i. p. 1443; Rubens, Hist. Ravenn. lib. iii. p. 169.) [E. V.]

AGNES, M., a virgin either 12 or 13 years old, beheaded at Rome under Diocletian, after vain efforts first made to overcome her faith by vile outrage: celebrated by St. Ambrose (De Offic. i. 41, De Virg. ad Marcell. i. 2), St. Jerome (Epist. 97 ad Demetriad.), St. Augustin (Serm. 273, 286, and 354), Sulp. Sever. (Dial. ii. 14), Prudentius (περὶ Στεφάνων, xiv.), Venant. Fortunatus (Poem. vii. iii. 35), Aldhelm (De Virgin.); and by her Acta in Syriac in Assemani, Act. Mart. ii. 148 sq.; besides Acta falsely attributed to St. Ambrose, a doubtful homily of St. Maxim. Taurin., and some verses questionably assigned to Pope Damasus. And her name is in the Carthag. Cal. of c. A.D. 450, Jan. 21; in Ruinart p. 695. Her legend resembles that of St. Agatha, save that St. Agnes had made a vow of virginity, and that her suitors, and not at first the judge, were her persecutors. One who tried to outrage her in the brothel to which she was sent was struck blind, and then healed at her intercession. Finally, having refused to burn incense to idols, and making the sign of the Cross when the officers tried to force her to do so, she was beheaded, apparently without actual torture. A church at Rome, in her honour, said to have been built in the time of Constantine the Great, was repaired by Pope Honorius, A.D. 625-638, and another was built at Rome by Innocent X. (Assemani, Act. Mart. ii. 154, 155). See also Act. SS. Jan. 21, on which day also her name stands in the black letter calendar of the English Prayer-book. Baela and Usuard place her day on Jan. 23; the Menology, and Menæa, on July 5. It is one of four

(St. Margaret's, St. Lucy's, and St. Agatha's days being the other three) appointed in England by the Synod of Worcester, under Walter de Cantilupe, A.D. 1240, "ferianda ab operibus mulierum tantum" (Wilk. i. 678). [A. W. H.]

AGNOEA (Iren. 108). [BARBELIOTÆ; OPHITES.] [H.]

AGNOËTÆ (Ἀγνοῦται, from ἀγνοῶ, to be ignorant of), is a name applied to two sects who denied the omniscience either of God the Father, or of God the Son in his state of humiliation.

I. The first were a fraction of the Arians, and called from Eumomius and Theophrontius "Eumomio-Theophrontians" (Socrates, H. E. v. 24). Their leader, THEOPHIRONIUS of Cappadocia, who flourished about 370, maintained that God knew things past by memory, and things future only by uncertain prescience. Sozomenus (H. E. vii. 17) writes of him: "Having given some attention to the writings of Aristotle; he composed an appendix to them, entitled Exercises of the Mind. But he afterwards engaged in many unprofitable disputations, and soon ceased to confine himself to the doctrines of his master [EUMONIUS]. Under the assumption of being deeply versed in the terms of Scripture, he attempted to prove that though God is acquainted with the present, the past, and the future, his knowledge on these subjects is not the same in degree, and is subject to some kind of mutation. As this hypothesis appeared positively absurd to the Eumonians, they excommunicated him from their church; and he constituted himself the leader of a new sect, called after his own name, 'Theophrontians.'" [S.]

II. Better known are the Agnoëtæ or Themistiani, in the Monophysite controversy in the sixth century. THEMISTIUS, deacon of Alexandria, representing a small branch of the Monophysite Severians, taught, after the death of Severus, that the human soul (not the divine nature) of Christ was like us in all things, even in the limitation of knowledge, and was ignorant of many things, especially the day of judgment, which the Father alone knew (Mark xiii. 32). The question of Christ concerning Lazarus, "Where have ye laid him?" (John xi. 34), likewise implied ignorance of this fact. The majority of the Monophysites rejected this view, as inconsistent with their theory of one nature in Christ, which implied also a unity of knowledge, and they called the followers of Themistius Agnoëtæ. The orthodox, who might from the Chalcedonian dogma of the two natures in Christ have inferred two kinds of knowledge, a perfect divine, and an imperfect human admitting of growth (Luke ii. 52), nevertheless rejected the view of the Agnoëtæ, as making too wide a rupture between the two natures, and generally understood the famous passage in Mark of the official ignorance only, inasmuch as Christ did not choose to reveal to his disciples the day of judgment, and thus appeared ignorant for a wise purpose (κατ' οἰκονομίαν). The question concerning Lazarus was explained from reference to the Jews and the intention to increase the effect of the miracle. Eulogius, patriarch of Alexandria, wrote against the Agnoëtæ a treatise on the absolute knowledge of Christ, of which Photius has preserved large extracts. Sophronius, patriarch of Jerusalem, pronounced the anathema on Themistius.

Agnoëtism was revived by the Adoptionists in the 8th century. [ADOPTIONISTS.] Felix of Urgel maintained the limitation of the knowledge of Christ according to his human nature, and appealed to Mark xiii. 32.

AGOBARD (in Lyonese dialect Agobaud), S., Archbishop of Lyons, holding a high rank in the intellectual and political movements of his age, was born in 779 of Gallic parents settled in Spain, and was removed into Gallia Narbonensis in 782. (Mabillon, Iter Ital. p. 68, quoting a MS. note, probably in the autograph of Agobard himself. See Hist. Littér. de la France, iv. 367.) Thence he was brought to Lyons by Archbishop Leidrad in 798, who ordained him priest in 804. Subsequently, probably in 813, Leidrad, oppressed by age and infirmities, gave him a share in the administration of his diocese, and episcopal ordination; when he retired into a monastery in 816, Agobard was, "with the consent of the emperor, and the entire Synod of Gallican Bishops," appointed his successor. (Ado, Chron. cf. Hug. Flav. Chron. Virdun.) "Some persons objected to the appointment on the ground that Agobard had been consecrated by three bishops in the see of Lyons at the order of Leidrad, whereas the canons lay down that there should not be two bishops together in one city, and that a living bishop should not choose his own successor." The weight of this charge will depend, says Henschen (Act. SS. Boll. Jun. i. 749), on whether we adopt the reading of the text Chorepiscopus = Suffragan Bishop, or Rainaud's conjecture Coeppiscopus = Coadjutor Bishop, which latter title would imply a right of succession. The whole transaction is represented in a different, and, perhaps, a truer light in Gallia Christ. iv. 55, where a quotation from a Grenoble breviary is transcribed at length. According to this document the emperor and some few bishops supported Agobard's nomination, while the great body of Gallican bishops opposed it, met in synod at Arles, and decided that Leidrad should return to his see, and that for the future no more co-episcopi should be appointed. In spite of this decision Agobard still retained his see, and ruled it vigorously and wisely.

His first polemical attack was against the writings of Felix, Bishop of Urgel, the heresiarch of the Adoptionists (see Mosheim, ed. Stubbs, i. 517), who had been banished by Charles to Lyons, where he had lately died. Agobard's treatise, addressed to the emperor, tended to prove that the heresy of Felix was equivalent to Nestorianism in a milder form. It is chiefly a catena from the fathers.

Of the same character is a series of four works against the Jews, who appear to have flocked to Lyons about this time in great numbers under the shelter of Louis's protection. The first is a remonstrance to the emperor against their insolent bearing and outrages against the Christians; the second opposes their superstitions; in the third he addresses Adalhard, Abbat of Corbie, and other chief officers of the palace, asking how he ought to deal with the case of Jewish servants postulating baptism against their masters' consent; the fourth is a letter addressed to Nebridius, Bishop of Narbonne, complaining of the disadvantages suffered by Christians in their commercial relations with Jews.

Other works in this class are tracts exposing and refuting the popular superstitions of the day (1.) Against the law of Gondobad, and the impious contests which spring from it; (2.) On thunder and hail, popularly ascribed to sorcery; (3.) Against the Judgment of God . . . or those who hold the damnable opinion that the truth of Divine judgment is disclosed by fire or water or single combat.

Agobard also wrote a book in answer to some strictures of Fredegisus, abbat of St. Martin's, Tours, in which he defends some former statements, and declares strongly against the verbal inspiration of Holy Scripture (see Herzog); a letter to Bartholomew, Bishop of Narbonne, on a prevalent epilepsy; and a further complaint against the Jews to Matfred, a courtier.

His practical works on Church discipline and points of doctrine are of more permanent interest.

These are (1.) to Bishop Bernard on the privileges and rights of the priesthood, an able and useful work; (2.) on pictures and images, the best known and most frequently controverted of Agobard's works (see particularly Cave, Hist. Literaria ii. 12, and Hist. Lit. de la France, iv. 575, 576), probably undertaken in connexion with the synod of Paris in 824 (Cave, H. L. ii. 72), which ordered that images should be retained but not superstitiously venerated. Agobard draws most of his arguments from St. Augustin, citing also Popes Leo I., Gregory I., and sometimes Eusebius of Caesarea, adapting them however rather freely. He certainly goes beyond the opinion of his western contemporaries in respect to the use of images in worship. "He even appears," say the Benedictine compilers just cited, "to espouse the side of those who blame the cultus of images; and this is why our separatist brethren, who dislike this practice, esteem this treatise so highly, and sometimes quote it with satisfaction." St. Marthe (Gall. Christ. iv. 56) characterizes the work as containing "si nonnulla duriora, nihil certe contra fidem." See the comments of Rairaud and Mabillon in Le Cointe, Ann. t. viii. an 840, n. 14.

(3.) On the truth of the Faith, &c.: an exhortation to the people of Lyons.

(4.) A letter to Ebo Bishop of Rheims on hope and fear: a manual of choice selections, of which only the preface has been printed.

(5.) On the administration of Ecclesiastical property: a tract directed against the prevalent usurpations of the rights of the Church by lay landholders, and even by bishops and other ecclesiastics.

(6, 7.) On Divine Psalmody, which is really a preface to a book On the correction of the Antiphonary, written with much animosity against Amalarius, a priest of the Church of Metz, who had called in question the changes and retrenchments lately introduced by Agobard into the office-book of his church. The alteration had been made on the principle of excluding everything but the pure Word of God, "lest," he says, "we should offer strange fire to the Lord." Cardinal Bona (De Divina Psalmodia, p. 383, ed. Paris, 1663) reckons this as not the least of Agobard's errors.

(8.) A less bitter work on the same subject has the title, A book against the four books of Amalarius.

The third class of Agobard's writings are connected with the one event of his life, which has left a serious stain upon the integrity and uprightness of his character—his participation in the rebellion of Lothaire against his father, Louis, in 833. The most influential of Lothaire's episcopal partisans was Ebbo of Rheims, but Agobard ranked next to him, and while acknowledging the crime, tried to vindicate it. "So detestable an act," says St. Marthe, "in a man, however faultless in other respects, is quite beyond excuse." The document affirming Louis's deposition at the synod of Compiègne was issued by Agobard, and is certainly from his pen. The pieces extant on this subject are (1) a lamentable letter (Masson's title) to Louis on the division of the empire among Louis's sons—a dissuasive against a fresh partition for the sake of Charles the youngest; (2) a letter to Louis on the comparison of ecclesiastical with civil government, asserting the dignity of the Church as superior to the majesty of the empire. (3) To this is appended an Epistle of Gregory IV. in reply to those Gallican bishops who were attached to the side of Louis. Masson ascribed this letter to Agobard's pen, but it is now acknowledged to be the genuine production of Gregory; (4) An Apology for Lothaire and Pepin, in which the motive for their revolt is stated to have been the reformation of abuses at court. (5) The cartula of Louis's deposition mentioned above, presented by Agobard to Lothaire as emperor. It is thought that the other bishops presented similar documents. Some have uselessly laboured to palliate Agobard's guilt in this revolt on the ground of an oath taken to Lothaire (Rainoud, t. viii. p. 28). He was probably sincere in his repentance. Having followed Lothaire into Italy, he was in 835 at the Council of Thionville deposed from his see, and some further steps were taken at Cremieu in 836, but his absence saved him from more direct punishment, and in the following year he recovered Louis's favour and the see of Lyons. Employed confidentially by Louis on state affairs, he died at Saintonge, during a visit for some political object, on June 6, 840 (not 841 as Hugh of Flavigny states. See Gall. Christ.).

The claims of Agobard to the title of Saint are not undisputed. The landists give him a place in their work on the following grounds, as explained by Henschen in a rather meagre critical notice: (1) because Masson, his first editor, allows him the title; (2) because he is commonly called St. Aguebaud in the church of Lyons; (3) because he is included in the local martyrologies, and a rite of nine lections is assigned to him in the Breviarium Lugdunense. Du Saussay uncanonizes him, on the ground, as Henschen thinks, of his complicity in Lothaire's rebellion; but inconsistently, as he recognizes the sanctity of Bernard, Archbishop of Vienne.

There are no proper Acta. Agobard's character is well sketched by St. Marthe, in these terms: "He was a man of high intellect and consummate erudition for his age, skilled in theology, patristic learning, and tradition; acute in interpreting, and very severe in defending Church discipline and the ancient canons; a deadly enemy of superstitions; obstinately wedded to an opinion which he had once adopted; vigorous and bold in his writings, but in other respects timid, and scarcely daring to raise his voice in the society of the great; unimpeachable in his morals, faithful to the laws of the Church, and constant in his attendance at the sacred offices." A marked, but still an inconsistent feature of his character, is that liberal independence of thought which has attracted Protestant writers; for those who would applaud his tract on images, his exposure of popular superstitions, and his canons on the inspiration and use of Holy Scripture, would reprobate as narrow and intolerant his opposition to the Jews, and his rigid "sacerdotalism." See Baluze's estimate of his character in Cave, II. L. ii. 11.

Agobard's works were lost to the world, until a MS. copy was discovered by Papius Masson, who rescued it from a bookbinder's hands in Lyons, and finding its value, published it (Paris, 1605, 8vo.). For this and similar bibliographical anecdotes, see Maitland, Dark Ages, p. 279, sqq.

A second and far more valuable edition, with illustrative notes, was undertaken by M. Baluze (Paris, 1666, 2 vols. 8vo.). His text is more accurate than that of Masson, and is substituted for it, though without the notes in the later editions of the Bibliotheca Patrum, t. xiv. pp. 234–329. Select quotations from the Epistles are in Bouquet, Rec. vi. 356–368. Lists of Agobard's works are given in Cave, Hist. Lit. t. ii. pp. 12, 13, and with full comments in Hist. Lit. de la France, t. iv. pp. 571–581. To the prose writings above enumerated should be added two small poems, The Epitaph of Charles the Great, and On the Translation of the Relics of SS. Cyprian, Speratus, &c. These are of no merit; his prose is generally written in a simple and natural style, without embellishment. He made more use of assertion than argument, and borrowed largely from ancient writers, showing the closest acquaintance with the works of St. Augustine and with Holy Scripture.

A list of the authors who till his own time had contributed to elucidate the history of Agobard may be seen in Fabricius, Bibliotheca Med. et Inf. Latinitatis, s. v.; those of later date in Potthast, Bibliotheca Hist. Med. Aevi, p. 108. As a local historian Menestrier (Hist. Civile de la Ville de Lyon, pp. 214–237) is very valuable; while Dr. Hundeshagen, who contributed the article 'Agobard' to Herzog's Real Encyclopædie, gives the results of late critical research in his Commentatio de Agobardi Vita et Scriptis, Giessae, 1831. [C. D.]

AGRICOLA, martyred with his slave Vitalis by crucifixion at Bologna (under Diocletian, according to a letter [55] falsely attributed to St. Ambrose), his body being pierced with large nails more in number than his limbs. The authority for his story is a sermon preached by St. Ambrose (Exhort. ad Virgin.) at the dedication in 393 of a church at Florence, to which the relics of both martyrs, just found by St. Ambrose at Bologna, were transported by him. See also Paulinus of Nola (Poem. xxiv.), Paulinus in V. S. Ambros. (xxix.), Greg. Turon. (De Glor. Mart. 44, Hist. Franc. ii. 16). [A. W. H.]

AGRIPPA CASTOR (Ἀγρίππας Κάστωρ), an ecclesiastical writer who lived in the reign of Hadrian (about A.D. 135) described by Eusebius (H. E. iv. 7.) as ἐν τοῖς τότε γυναιμάτατος συγγραφέυς, and by Jerome as "vir valde doctus" (De Vir. Ill. cap. xxi). He is the first who is mentioned as having written against heresy. He wrote against BASILIDES, and gave what Eusebius accounted as a most satisfactory refutation and complete exposure of his imposture. That Agrippa wrote also against Isidorus, the son of Basilides, seems to be an unwarranted inference from the statement of Theodoret (Haer. Fab. i. 4) that Basilides and Isidorus were opposed by Agrippa, Irenæus, Clement, and Origen. [G. S.]

AGRIPPINUS, probably praedecessor of Cyprian—his decessor Donatus—(Pearson, Ann. Cyp. A.D. 248). The interval is described by Augustine (de Bap. l. iii. 12) as "ab Agrippino usque ad Cyprianum;" and Cyprian (Ep. 71, 4) speaks of him as "bonae memoriae vir cum caeteris, &c. . . . qui illo in tempore gubernabant" (Ep. 73) "multi jam anni et longa aetas ex quo sub Agrippino," &c. These must explain Augustine's term praedecessor and his phrase "paucis ante se annis" in Bap. c. Don. iv. 6

He held the First Council of Carthage (A.D. 215-7, Labbe, Conc. vol. i. p. 735; A.D. 186-7, Morcelli, vol. ii. p. 44) consisting of seventy (Aug. de Bap. c. Petil. xiii. 22) bishops of Africa and Numidia (Cyp. Ep. 71), which decided for the rebaptism of heretics; he being according to Augustine, the author of that novelty. This seems to favour his earlier date, as, if the later were taken, Tertullian's opinions would have been adopted by rather than from his church, whereas he speaks in his catholic treatise De Baptismo as if rebaptism were the accepted rule (Ad nos editum est, c. 15). On the contrary, Hefele (Concil. ii. § 4) decides for the later date because Tertullian, praising the Greek use of councils, mentions no African council. Döllinger (Hipp. und Kall. p. 190) maintains that Carthage is alluded to when Hippolytus says that rebaptism was of Callistus' time (Philosophum, p. 291), and so gives A.D. 218-222 as date of Council, accepting the possibility of Tertullian's having influenced the African view. Hippolytus, however, writes of Rome, and Tertullian speaks of general councils. The arguments for the earlier date are more weighty. The expression of Novatus, one of the oldest of the 87 bishops, in A.D. 257 (4th Sent. Epp.) seems noticeable. He could scarcely have called them "sanctissimae memoriae viros," had not their generation completely passed away, nor "collegas," if they had been quite beyond memory. Vincent. Lirin. and Facundus Hermian. (l. x. 3) do not seem to have been in possession of other information than we have. [E. W. B.]

AHMINIUS (AHYMNUS, AHYMMUS; 2 MSS. and August. de Bap. c. Don.), bishop of Ausuaga (Ausuagga) (Ausana, Ausagga, Vict. Vit. Fell.) in Prov. Zeugit. of Africa (together with bishops Fortunatus, Optatus, Privatianus, Donatulus, Felix), consults Cyprian as to restoration of Ninus, Clementianus, and Florus, who in the Decian persecution, after enduring the question before the native magistrates, succumbed to the greater severity of the proconsul, and had spent three years subsequently in penance. The case referred by them to Cyprian (who reserves it to next council) had been referred to them by bishop Superius of the diocese where it happened. The occasion of their meeting was to consecrate a bishop for Capsa (Ep. 56), and as Donatulus subsequently appears (Conc. Carth. de Bap. iii. Suffrag. 69) as bishop of that place he no doubt was the person ordained. Münter in a list full of errors, p. 15, Prim. Ecc. Afr. considers the name Ahymnius Phoenician; Gesenius Greek. [E. W. B.]

AIDAN (AEDAN), ST., Celtic Apostle of Northumbria, and first bishop of Lindisfarne, though his name is not included in the oldest martyrologies, except as an insertion in the MS. additions to Usuard, enjoyed the highest reputation for holiness and practical wisdom during his life, and was venerated as a Saint from the date of his death, 651. Bede, who was born twenty years after this epoch, "has made his character and life the subject of one of the most eloquent and attractive pictures ever drawn by the pen of the venerable historian" (Montalembert, Monks of West, iv. 23, Transl.). Stilling (Commentary, in Act. SS. Boll. Aug. vi. 688), who examined the mediæval biographies of this Saint, states that they were entirely drawn from Bede and added nothing from other sources. There are no records of Aidan's birthplace, or early life. He is first noticed by Bede (H. E. iii. 5) as a monk of Hy or Iona under the 5th Abbat Seghean, and of the full canonical age for the Episcopacy. His ordination was due to the ill-success of a missionary named Corman,^a who had been sent to convert Northumbria by the elders of the Scottish Church (i.e. the heads of the Columban monasteries) at the request of King Oswald of Northumbria, himself converted during his seventeen years' exile in Scotland (Montalembert, iv. 5 and Genealogical table). When Corman had reported to the synod of his Church his want of progress, which he ascribed to the stubborn and barbarous spirit of the English, and the fathers were perplexed what to recommend, Aidan, one of the assessors, attributed Corman's failure to his too great severity. "You did not," he said, "after the Apostolic precept, first offer them the milk of more gentle doctrine, till by degrees through the nourishment of God's Word they might have strength to receive and practise God's more perfect and exalted counsel." This discreet advice convinced the synod that Aidan possessed the great qualification for missionary success which Corman lacked. He was consecrated bishop probably in 635; Bede's authority makes for this date rather than 634 or 636. (Alford, Annals, ii. 239.) He fixed his own residence on an island^b near Bamborough, called Lindisfarne (afterwards Holy Island), which became the monastic and episcopal capital of Northumbria. Whether the choice of this spot rather than Cataract, where James the Italian deacon still kept alive the relics of the Christianity which Paulinus had planted and Peuda's invasion had nearly obliterated, was due to his determination to have no connexion with the Gregorian missionaries (Hook, Archbishops, i. 118), or in imitation of the local particulars of St. Columba's monastic foundation (Montalembert, iv. 19), or from the reasons which had decided Oswald to apply for missionaries to Iona rather than to Canterbury (ibid. p. 14), cannot well be decided.^e Lindisfarne would be more favourable than York to the development of the monastic system, and its local situation in Bernicia, Oswald's hereditary domain, within sight of his residence at Bamborough, would alone account for the change. The intercourse between king and bishop was very close until Oswald's death in 642. Aidan did not easily acquire the English tongue, and Oswald at first acted as his interpreter. He also in all things humbly and willingly obeyed his admonitions.

^a The name rests only on the more than suspicious authority of Hector Boëthius (lib. ix.)

It was probably the life of Aidan rather than his preaching which converted Northumbria to Christianity. (See Lappenberg, Anglo-Saxon Kings, p. 158. ed. London, 1845.) "He left his clergy," says Bede, "a most wholesome example of abstinence and continence, and the highest commendation of his teaching was that his own life corresponded with it." He hated display, and, except in cases of urgent need, always travelled on foot. Thus he was able to stop frequently during his journeys, and to urge travellers either to accept the Faith, or, if they were already Christians, to commend it by their lives. He seems to have possessed a singular charm of manner and address, which first won his hearers, and then incited them to an imitation of his own self-denial and austerity. This Bede contrasts with the greater laxity of his own age. "All who accompanied him, whether monks or laymen, were under obligation to meditate, that is, either to read the Scriptures or to learn the Psalter." He would hurry away from the king's table, where however he was rarely a guest, to read or pray, and many persons followed his example of fasting on Wednesday and Friday, except during Eastertide, till the ninth hour. He never flinched from rebuking vice or oppression in the rich and powerful, and when they claimed his hospitality, he gave them no presents, but bestowed whatever he had received from the rich either in the relief of the poor or in redeeming captives, especially those who had been unjustly sold. Many of these freedmen were raised to the priesthood (Baeda, H. E. iii. 5). Education was an important feature of his system. At the beginning of his mission he took personal charge of twelve English youths (H. E. iii. 26). As each church and monastery was founded, it became a school where a complete education was given by monks who had followed Aidan from Scotland. For his personal use he retained nothing of the grants of land received from the king and nobles, except a church or chapel, a small chamber, and a few fields at each of the principal villae (H. E. iii. 17). Aidan survived his patron and partner in good works, the Bretwalda Oswald, who rivalled if he did not surpass the bishop in posthumous glory. At the untimely death of this prince in battle with the pagan king of Mercia, Penda, in 642, Northumbria was divided between Oswald's brother Oswy, who claimed Bernicia, and Oswin, son of Osric, of the Deiran stock, who, returning from exile, was received in his father's dominions. Oswin, already a Christian, and endowed with a saintly spirit in addition to singular comeliness and grace of person, lived on terms of close friendship with Aidan, who retained his episcopal jurisdiction throughout divided Northumbria, as he had held it in Oswald's reign. We are told of no direct intercourse between him and Oswy. Indirectly his prayers availed the king, who was besieged by Penda in his fortress of Bamborough, and would have been burnt with the town, had not the wind suddenly changed, it was believed, at the intercession of Aidan, and hurled back the flames on the besiegers (H. E. iii. 17).

None of Aidan's sermons have been preserved, and but few of his sayings. What we have are very characteristic. Besides the words already mentioned, which are thought to have led to his mission, he once said to Oswald on Easter-day, seizing his hand as he was ordering the distribution of a silver dish and its contents among the poor, "May this hand^d never perish!" (H. E. iii. 14); and Oswin, who ventured to complain when the bishop had bestowed on a poor beggar a splendid horse, the king's own present, received the following rebuke. "What sayest thou, O king? Is that son of a mare dearer to thee than this son of God?" The young king threw himself at Aidan's feet, professing that he would never henceforth grudge anything to the children of God, whereupon the bishop began to shed tears, and answered a priest's enquiry as to the cause of his sadness in the Celtic tongue. "I know that the king will not live long, for never till now have I seen a king so humble; and so I think that he will soon be taken from this life, for the nation is not worthy of such a ruler." (H. E. iii. 315.) Shortly after Oswin was betrayed to Oswy and murdered by him on August 20, 651. Aidan survived him only twelve days. He was at the royal villa near Bamborough when a violent illness seized him. They pitched a tent to protect him against the west wall of a small church, so that he expired with his head leaning against a post which served as a buttress. This post stood intact after the church had been twice burnt down, and chips from it were reputed efficacious for the cure of diseases. Aidan's body was buried at Lindisfarne, at first in the monastic cemetery, then in St. Peter's church beside the altar. On the night of the bishop's death Cuthbert, then a youth, while tending some sheep on the mountains, saw a band of angels descend from heaven, and return with a soul of surpassing brightness. This vision he considered a decisive call to undertake the monastic life (Baeda, Vita S. Cuthberti, iv.). Bede qualifies his very high praise of Aidan in only one particular. He adhered to the heterodox Celtic Easter (H. E. iii. 3, 17). "His zeal for God was not altogether according to knowledge: for he was wont to keep Easter Day, according to the custom of his country, from the fourteenth to the twentieth moon." Aidan continued the Celtic practice, it seems without contradiction, till his death, though James the Roman deacon at York kept "the true and Catholic Easter with all whom he could bring to the knowledge of the truer way." Though the difference involved the observance of a double Easter in the same diocese, and a serious clashing of fast and festival, all men tolerated it patiently whilst Aidan lived, seeing that he could not depart from the custom of his country, while he diligently laboured to practise the works of faith, piety and love, for which reason he was deservedly beloved by all, and was held in veneration by such bishops as Honorius of Canterbury, and Felix of East Anglia (H. E. iii. 25).

It remains only to notice that Aidan predicted a storm which overtook Utta, a priest, who was sent by Oswy to fetch home from her exile in Kent his destined bride, Eanfleda, daughter of Edwin, king of Northumbria, and that a flask of oil which Utta had received from Aidan for the purpose actually allayed the storm (H. E. iii. 15). Aidan also patronised Heiu, the first nun in Northumbria, and the celebrated Abbess Hilda, whom in her early monastic life he constantly visited and diligently instructed (H. E. iv. 23). Eata, one of Aidan's twelve boys, was, on bishop Colman's departure into Scotland in 654, made abbat and afterwards bishop of Lindisfarne. Colman carried away part of the bones of Aidan, and left the rest at Lindisfarne. In ecclesiastical art this Saint is sometimes represented with a stag crouching at his feet (Husenbeth's Emblems). He is commemorated on August 31. Bamborough Church is dedicated to him. The Theological College at Birkenhead is a modern foundation. [C. D.]

AIGRADUS (written ANGRADUS, Trithemius, Cave, &c.; also ANSGRADUS, ANSGARDUS), monk of Fontanelles (S. Vandrille), near Rouen, flourished about 699. He wrote at the request of St. Hilbert, the fourth abbat of S. Vandrille, the life of his predecessor St. Ansbert, who ruled the monastery from 678 to 695, during eleven years of which period he was also archbishop of Rouen. This life, written in an elegant style, and with some taste and judgment, has been unhappily interpolated by a later hand, so that it is hard to decide, says Henschen in the Acta SS. Boll., what is Aigradus' genuine work: he fully proves that the work is interpolated; but the editors of the Hist. Lit. de la France do not think that its integrity or value have been seriously affected. It was first printed by Surius on Feb. 9, the day of St. Ansbert's death (pp. 938-949, ed. 1571); and more accurately, with critical notes, by the Bollandists, Feb. vol. ii. pp. 347-356.

The compilers of Gallia Christiana (xi. 167), and all modern authors, attribute to Aigradus the fragment of the life of St. Lambert or Lambert, edited as anonymous by Mabillon, Acta SS. Bened. sac. iii. par. 2, pp. 462-465. He had received his monastic institution under St. Lambert, who succeeded St. Wandregisilus, founder of Fontanelles in 667, and became archbishop of Lyons in 678. The fragment preserved contains little more than the introduction, which is of some historical value. The Bollandists have erred in supposing that Aigradus claims to have written the life of St. Condedus, hermit of Fon-tanella. See besides the places already cited Henschen's previous commentary, Act. SS. Boll. Feb. ii. 343, and Histoire Lit. de la France, iv. 33-35, 57. [C. D.]

AIGULPHUS, M., abbot of Lerins, deported to an islet between Corsica and Sardinia by his own monks, who after horrible tortures murdered him and his companions about A. D. 660 (or 651, according to some), and who is placed in the martyrologies Sept. 3 (Baron. Ann. ad an. 644, and Martyr. Sept. 3, Surius Sept. 3). [A. W. H.]

AKIBA, BEN JOSEPH (עקיבא), RABBI, was, according to tradition, a proselyte of Canaanitish race, and descended from Sissera. He was originally a herdsman in the employ of a rich man named Kalba-Sabua. His master's daughter, Rachel, fell in love with him, and they were secretly married; but her father, on discovering it, expelled them from his house. She persuaded him, though he was forty years of age, to begin the study of the law; and for some years she lived by herself in the deepest poverty, while he attended the lectures of R. Nachum of Gimso and R. Eliezer ben Hyrcan. There is a legend that when he became a renowned teacher he gave his wife a golden ornament, with a representation of Jerusalem on it; R. Gamaliel's wife asked her husband for a similar present, but he answered that only a wife who had shewn such fidelity in poverty deserved such a reward. Akiba is said to have told his disciples, "what you are and what I am, we owe to my wife." He taught at Bene Berak, which some place near Joppa and others near Azotus. He is celebrated as one of the chief founders of the rabbinical school of interpretation; he held rigidly to the written text, even in preference to any emendation of the Masora, and maintained that every particle and even letter had its separate meaning. Hence it is said in the Talmud (Menach. fol. 29), "when Moses ascended into the mount, he found God tying crowns (sc. κεφαλαί) to the letters, and he said to him, "Lord, what delays thy hand?" He answered, "many ages hence there will arise a man by name Akiba ben Joseph, who shall make unnumbered stores of comments on every tittle." He also strongly held the mystical character of Solomon's song. He seems to have been the first who attempted to systematise the immense mass of halachoth or authoritative decisions of former rabbis, as he arranged them in chapters according to their subject matter, and also invented a set of mnemonics to facilitate their committal to memory. This Mishna of R. Akiba, as it was called, or Middoth (cf. Epiph. contra Haer. § 15, § 33, of the four current δευτερώσεις, δευτέρα δὲ ἡ τοῦ καλουμένου Παββιακῆ), was oral and not committed to writing; but it no doubt served as the first idea of the subsequent Mishna of R. Jehuda. He is said to have also studied those dark questions of cosmogony and theosophy which the Jewish gnosis of that time sought to discover in the Mosaic account of the creation and in Ezekiel's chariot; hence it is said "four rabbis plunged into these mysteries, Ben Asai, Ben Soma, Elisha, and Akiba, and only the last passed through, sound in body and soul." He held that these chapters should not be read aloud except before qualified hearers, and that none should study them under thirty years of age. Four of his moral sayings are given in the Pirke Aboth, iii. 10-13.

Akiba threw himself with all his energy of character into the national discontent against the Roman government under Trajan and Hadrian. He spent several years in travelling in different countries to visit the Jews and animate their hopes, and we hear of him in Africa (Cyrene?), Arabia, Nisibis, the chief seat of Jewish learning in Mesopotamia, Cilicia, and Cappadocia. He became an enthusiastic supporter of Simon Bar Cochba, who was the leader of the rebellion against Ticinius Rufus, the Tyrannus Rufus of the Talmud; and he applied to him the prophecies of Numbers xxiv. 17, and Haggai ii. 6. The rebellion lasted more than three years, and was finally crushed by the capture of Bethar (Beth Zor), A.D. 135 (or, according to some writers, 125). R. Akiba was one of the many victims who fell after the suppression of the movement; the tradition is that he was torn to death with iron combs. At his death it was said that "the arms of the law were broken and the fountains of wisdom stopped up." Jerome seems to allude to him in his Comm. on Eccles. iv. 13, "Hebraeus meus, cujus saepe facio mentionem, cum Ecclesiasten mecum legeret, haec Baraciban (so Epiphanius. con. haer. 15 Ἄκιβάν η̅ Βαρακιβάν), quem unum vel maxime admirantur, super praesenti loco tradidisse testatus est." In his Comm. on Is. viii., he calls him Akibas, and mentions him as Aquila's teacher. (Graetz, Geschichte der Juden, iv. pp. 60-68, 116, 117, 157-194; Frankel's Zeitschrift für Gesch. und Wissen. des Judenthums, iii. pp. 45-51, 81-93, 130-148.) [E. B. C.]

ALARIC (Teut. prob. = Athalaric, "noble ruler"), general and king (398) of the Goths, the most civilized and merciful of the barbarian chiefs who ravaged the Roman Empire. His life has already been given in the Dictionary of Greek and Roman Biography. It therefore remains here, after recapitulating its chief events in outline, to draw out Alaric's attitude towards, and influence upon, Christianity.

Alaric first appears among the Gothic army who assisted Theodosius in opposing Eugenius, 394. He led the revolt of his nation against Arcadius, ravaged the provinces south of the Danube, and invaded Greece 395. Athens capitulated, and afterwards Corinth, Argos, and Sparta. Stilicho, general of the Western Empire, the only man who could cope with Alaric, on his second expedition into Greece (see Gibbon iv. 27, note, ed. Smith), attacked Alaric in Peloponnesus, and hemmed him in. His escape is referred by Zosimus to Stilicho's carelessness, but by Claudian, with greater probability, to intrigues with the Court of Constantinople, which was jealous of Stilicho's interference. Under the title of Master-General of Eastern Illyricum, 398, he became the ally of Arcadius, and secretly planned the invasion of Italy. In the winter of 402 Alaric crossed the Alps, towards the close of that year penetrated into Italy, and was defeated by Stilicho at Pollentia on Easter Day 403, after which he retreated from Italy with some further losses. In 404 he exchanged the prefecture of Eastern for that of Western Illyricum, and the service of Arcadius for that of Honorius, and, after the incursion and annihilation of Rhadagaisus and his Sclavonian hordes in 405, he was subsidized for his supposed services to the empire by the payment of 4000 pounds of gold. Stilicho's ruin and death in 408, the subsequent massacre of the Goths settled in Italy, and Honorius' impolitic refusal of Alaric's equitable terms, caused the second invasion of Italy, marked by the first blockade of Rome, which ended in a capitulation, Alaric retiring with a large ransom. At the second siege in 409, preceded by the capture of Ostia, the city was surrendered unconditionally, and Alaric set up Attalus as emperor, in opposition to Honorius, who remained at Ravenna. At the close of the third siege, in 410 (August 24), the city was in the hands of the Goths for six days, during three of which the sack was continued. Alaric's intended invasion of Sicily and Africa was prevented by his death at Consentia late in 410.

The authorities for this history are given in the Dictionary of Greek and Roman Biography, and they may be examined more fully in the notes to Gibbon's Roman Empire, vol. iv. pp. 23-112.

The effect of Alaric's conquests on the cause of Christianity, and on the spiritual position of Rome in Western Christendom, is well traced by Dean Milman (Latin Christianity, i. 120-140). Alaric and his Goths had embraced Christianity probably from the teaching of Ulphilas, the Arian bishop, who died in 388 (Mosheim, ed. Stubbs, i. 233). This age witnessed the last efforts of Paganism to assert itself as the ancient and national religion, and Rome was its last stronghold. Pagans and Christians had retorted upon each other the charge that the calamities of the empire were due to the desertion of the old or new system of faith respectively, and the truth or falsehood of either was generally staked upon the issue. The almost miraculous discomfiture of the heathen Rhadagaisus by Stilicho, in spite of his vow to sacrifice the noblest senators of Rome on the altars of the gods which delighted in human blood, was accepted as an ill omen by those at Rome who hoped for a public restoration of Paganism (Gibbon, iv. 47-49, ed. Smith; Milman, Latin Christianity, i. 122). Rome, impregnable while Stilicho, her Christian defender, lived, could submit only to the approach of Alaric, "a Christian and a soldier, the leader of a disciplined army, who understood the laws of war, and respected the sanctity of treaties." In the first siege of Rome, 410, both Pagan and Christian historians relate the strange proposal to relieve the city by the magical arts of some Etruscan diviners, who were believed to have power to call down lightning from heaven, and direct it against Alaric's camp. That Pope Innocent assented to this public ceremony rests only on the authority of the heathen Zosimus (v. 41). It is questioned whether this idolatrous rite actually took place. Alaric perhaps imagined that he was furthering the Divine purpose in besieging Rome. Sozomen (Hist. Eccl. ix. cap. 7) mentions as a current story that a certain monk, on urging the king, then on his march through Italy, to spare the city, received the reply that he was not acting of his own accord, but that some one was persistently forcing him on, and urging him to sack Rome.

The shock felt through the world at the news of the capture of Rome in Alaric's third siege, 410, was disproportioned to the real magnitude of the calamity: contrast the exaggerated language of St. Jerome, Ep. ad Principiam, with Orosius, l. vii. c. 39, and St. Augustine De Civ. Dei, ii. 2 (a work written between 413 and 426 with the express object of refuting the Pagan arguments from the sack of Rome), and his tract, De excidio Urbis (Opp. t. vi. 622-628, ed. Bened.). The book in which Zosimus related the fall of Rome has been lost, so that we have to gather information from Christian sources; but it is plain that the destruction and loss was chiefly on the side of Paganism, and that little escaped which did not shelter itself under the protection of Christianity. "The heathens fled to the churches, the only places of refuge. . . . There alone rapacity and lust and cruelty were arrested and stood abashed" (Milman, p. 133). The property of the churches and, in some instances at least, the persons of Christian virgins were respected. Several characteristic anecdotes, preserved by Jerome, Orosius, and others, are found in all accounts of the siege. The Pagan inhabitants of Rome were scattered over Africa, Egypt, Syria and the east, and were encountered alike by St. Jerome at Bethlehem and by St. Augustine at Carthage. Innocent I. was absent at Ravenna during the siege of Rome. On his return heathen temples were converted into Christian churches; "with Paganism expired the venerable titles of the religion, the great High Priests and Flamens, the Auspices and Augurs. On the pontifical throne sat the bishop of Rome, who would soon possess the substance of the imperial power. The capture of Rome by Alaric was one of the great steps by which the pope rose to his plenitude of power" (Milman, p. 139).

Alaric was instrumental in driving Paganism from Greece as well as Rome. Zosimus (v. 7) asserts that on his approach to Athens its walls were seen to be guarded by Minerva and Achilles. Gibbon, while wishing to give Zosimus the full benefit of an age of credulity, confesses "that the mind of Alaric was ill prepared to receive, either in sleeping or waking visions, the impressions of Greek superstition. . . . The invasion of the Goths, instead of vindicating the honour, contributed, at least accidentally, to extirpate the last remains of Paganism; and the mysteries of Ceres, which had subsisted eighteen hundred years, did not survive the destruction of Eleusis and the calamities of Greece" (vol. iv. p. 37).

The conquests of Alaric, though achieved at an age when the Church boasted many eminent saints and writers, afford far fewer materials for the martyrologist and hagiologist than those of Attila. Alaric, though an Arian, is nowhere recorded to have persecuted the Catholics whom war had placed in his power. Jornandes and Isidore of Seville, Gothic historians, and Orosius, a Spanish Catholic, are equally silent on this point. The following facts of personal history have been preserved. In the sack of Rome Marcella, an aged matron, was thrown on the ground and cruelly beaten (Jerome, Ep. ad Principiam); a nameless lady who persistently repelled her capturer, was conducted by him to the sanctuary of the Vatican; and an aged virgin, to whose charge some sacred vessels had been entrusted, through her bold constancy preserved them intact. At the plunder of Nola in Campania, St. Paulinus its bishop is said to have prayed, "Lord, let me not suffer torture either for gold or silver, since Thou knowest where are all my riches" (Fleury, Eocl. Hist. ed. Newman, bk. xxii. c. 21). Proba, widow of the prefect Petronius, retired to Africa with her daughter Laeta, and her granddaughter Demetrias (Jerome, Epist. cxxx. t. i. p. 969, ed. Vallars.), and spent her large fortune in relieving the captives and exiles. (See Tillemont, Mém. Ecclés. t. xiii. p. 620-635.) Valuable contributions to the history of Alaric not already mentioned are Sigonius, Opp. t. i. par. i. p. 347, sqq. ed. Argellati; Aschbach, Gesch. der Westgothen. [C. D.]

ALBANUS, M. (1) The protomartyr of Britain—if he ever existed (and the doubt may at least serve to signalize the remarkable paucity of martyrs in the several conversions of these islands): martyred probably at Verulamium, and according to either the "conjecture" or the "knowledge" (conjecturam or cognoscimus) of Gildas in the time of Diocletian, and if so, A.D. 304, but according to another legend, which however still speaks of Diocletian, in 286 (Anglo-Sax. Chron., Lib. Landav.). Eusebius (H. E. viii. 13, and De Mart. Palæst. xiii. 10, 11), Lactantius (De Mort. Persecut. xv. xvi.), and Sozomen (i. 6), deny that there was any persecution during the time of Constantius in "the Gauls," which term included Britain. It is possible, however, that Constantius may have been compelled to allow one or two martyrdoms. And it is at least certain, that 125 years after the latest date assigned to Alban's martyrdom, 144 after the earliest, viz. A.D. 429 (Prosper, Chron.), Germanus visited his relics in Britain, and it is to be presumed at Verulamium (Constant. in V. S. Germani, written A.D. 473-492). Gildas mentions him in 560 (whose statement however about the persecution is of no value, being simply a transference of Eusebius's words to Britain, to which Eusebius himself says they did not apply), and Venantius Fortunatus (Poem. viii. iv. 155) about 580. Bæda in 731 copies Constantius, and certain Acta otherwise unknown. And the subsequent foundation of Offa in 793 only serves to identify the place with the tradition. The British Life discovered by the St. Alban's monk Unwona in the 10th century, according to Matthew Paris, in V. Abb. S. Alban., is apparently a myth. And the Life by William of St. Alban's in the 12th century is of the ordinary nature and value of Lives of the kind and date. But the testimony of Germanus, in Constantius' Life of him, seems sufficient proof that a tradition of the martyrdom of somebody named Albanus existed at Verulamium a century and something more after the supposed date of that martyrdom. That he was a heathen, who sheltered a clergyman flying from persecution, and who, when himself dragged in that clergyman's robe (caracalla or amphibalus) to the tribunal on a charge of favouring the clergyman's escape, affirmed himself (being unbaptized) to be a Christian, and who, upon refusing likewise to sacrifice, was condemned to be scourged and beheaded; that he miraculously divided a river, when the crowd blocked up the bridge, on his way to the place of execution, and brought up a fountain at the place itself, to quench his thirst; that the intended executioner was converted and suffered with him, while the actual executioner's eyes dropped out at the instant of his beheading him; all this represents a belief as old as the 7th century (Baed. i. 7), but is of course pure fiction, as much so as are the equally stereotyped numbers of 888, or 989, or 889 companions of his martyrdom. His reputation seems to have extended to the Continent, as (not to mention Venant. Fortunatus in 580, above referred to) Norman-French Lives and tracts about him appear to exist. The English poet Lydgate also, in 1439, "translatyd the glorious Lyves of Seynt Alban and Seynt Amphiball oute of Frensh and Latyn" into English verse; and his work was printed at St. Alban's, 4to, 1534, by one John Hertford (Hardy's Descript. Catalogue, &c. i. 23). Aaron and Julius are the two names preserved of his companions, or at any rate contemporaries, in martyrdom. And for these there is the evidence of a Welsh tradition anterior to Geoffrey of Monmouth (viz. in the Lib. Landav.) connecting them with Caerleon. They were invented certainly before Gildas's time. The amplification of the persecuted priest into the legend of Amphibalus is a twelfth century fiction. He is first found by name in Geoffrey of Monmouth and is conjectured to have arisen out of St. Alban's cloak (amphibalus). His "inventio," and his miracles, appear to date from the time of William of St. Alban's. St. Alban of Verulamium is frequently confounded in the martyrologies with

(2) Albanus of Mentz, martyred at Mentz no one knows when, according to Baeda under Diocletian also, according to Sigebert (in Chron.), who says he had been driven from Philippi with Theonistus his bishop, in 425, and respecting whom Rabanus Maurus goes so far abroad as to call him an African bishop flying from Hunneric, and whose day is June 21 (Baron. June 21), as the British St. Alban's is June 22. St. Alban of Britain, and Gildas, St. Patrick, and St. Petroc, are the four British saints who found entrance into Saxon and into early Continental calendars. [A. W. H.]

ALBERHT. (1) King of East Anglia in 749. On the death of Elfwald he divided the kingdom with Hunbenna (Sim. Dun. M. H. B. 662).

(2) (Aldberht, Chr. Sax.) Abbot of Ripon: he succeeded abbot Botwin in 786; was probably present at the legatine Council of the North, held in September 787, the acts of which were signed by an abbot Aldberich. He died in the autumn of the same year (Sim. Dun. M. H. B. 666; Spelman, Concilia, i. 301).

(4) The ninth abbot of Glastonbury in Malmesbury's list; dated 712. [S.]

ALBINA, daughter-in-law of Melania, the friend of Rufinus, and mother of St. Melania, a wealthy and devout Roman lady (Pall. Hist. Laus. 118, 120). Shortly before the taking of Rome by Alaric she retired with her daughter and Pinnianus, her son-in-law, to Africa; and after seven years there to Jerusalem, where they became acquainted with Pelagius. There, probably, she died (Aug. de Grat. l. Epp. 124, 5, 6; Hier. Ep. 143). In these passages Albina, not Albinus, appears to be the correct reading. [I. G. S.]

ALBINUS. (1) An Englishman (Bede, H. E. v. 20) brought up at Canterbury in the monastery of S. Augustine under abbot Adrian, whom he succeeded according to Bede in 710. He was instructed in Latin and Greek by Adrian and Theodore. Bede was induced by him to undertake his Ecclesiastical History, towards which Albinus contributed his own knowledge of the period of the Conversion. This was communicated to Bede through Nothelm, who had been sent to Rome to search the archives there for materials. Bede's letter of thanks to Albinus is still extant. According to W. Thorn and Elmham, Albinus was blessed as abbot by archbishop Brihtwald on the 22nd of April, 708, and died in 732. He was buried in the church of S. Mary under the abbey of S. Augustine, and was afterwards translated in the time of abbot Wido. His name is attached as witness to a charter of Ethelbert II., king of Kent, Feb. 20, 732 (Bede, H. E. Pref. and v. 20; Elmham, ed. Hardwicke 294, 295, 301).

(2) [ALCUIUS.] [S.]

ALBOIN, king of the Langobardi, or Lombards, and founder of the kingdom subject to that people in Italy, was the son of that Audoin under whom the Lombards emerge from obscurity to occupy Pannonia, invited by the emperor of Constantinople, in accordance with the usual Byzantine policy, as a check to the Gepidae. In the wars with the latter nation Alboin first appears. The confused accounts of them which Procopius preserves exhibit the tribe and their prince as rude and ferocious barbarians, and personally Alboin appears to have possessed the qualities which would fit him to be the leader of such a tribe. He is described as "vir bellis aptus et per omnia strenuus" (Paul. Diac. l. 27) (a man well fitted for warfare and every way energetic), "statura procerus et ad bella peragenda toto corpore coaptatus" (id. ii. 28) ("he was tall of stature, and his whole frame was built for a life of war"). That he was personally a Christian, though an Arian, is proved by a letter from a Gallic bishop to his first wife, a Gallic princess, which deplores, not his heathenism, but his heresy (Sirmond. Conc. Gall. i.). The passages which might seem to imply that the Lombards were not converted till the end of the century, either refer to a conversion from Arianism, or speak merely of some part of Alboin's mongrel host. Procopius distinctly calls them "Langobardos, jam tum Christianos" (who were by that time already Christians).

Succeeding to his father's power, Alboin accomplished, by the aid of the Avars, the destruction of the Gepidae. The characteristic story of the circumstances which led to his marriage with Rosamond, the daughter of Cunimund their king, may be legendary, but the fact of the marriage is rescued from uncertainty by the subsequent notoriety of his wife (see Gibbon, c. xlv.). The conquest of Italy followed. An expedition of 2200 Lombards about fifteen years before, had been despatched to the assistance of Narses, in virtue of some kind of agreement,* and tempted as well by a solid bribe as by the vague attractions of Italy. Their behaviour may be reasonably supposed to have been the first cause of the hatred which henceforth attached to their name in Italy, and confirms the idea already formed of their character (πρὸς τῇ ἄλλῃ ἐς τὴν δίαιταν παρανομία, τὰς τε οἰκοδομίας, αἷς ἂν ἐντύχοιεν ἐνεπίπρασαν, καὶ γύναιι ταῖς εἰς τὰ ἱερὰ καταφευγούσαις βιαζόμενοι ἐπλησίαζον), their conduct was marked by universal license, and in particular they burnt every dwelling which they came to, and violated the women who had taken refuge in sanctuary, Procop. iv. 33). They had been dismissed on this account by Narses, but they had doubtless carried home such reports of Italy as would render superfluous the specimens of its produce with which Narses is said to have accompanied the invitation which now called them to avenge his injuries. That invitation is itself doubtfully authentic, and is rejected by Muratori (Annal. ann. 567). But it is supported by historical analogies and by the direct evidence of the majority of writers,^b and is therefore accepted by the moderns (Troja, lib. iv. 7), in spite of the silence of the Greek authors, and some incoherence in one of the chief witnesses (Anastas. Vit. Joann. iii.; Muratori, iii. 233). Alboin's army was heterogeneous. Besides 20,000 Saxons accompanied by their families, who recrossed the Alps after the conquest, Muratori has deduced (Antich. It. i. diss. 1) from Italian topography the presence of the Bavarians, and Paul (ii. 26) adds distinctly the names of several other tribes. The number of the army is unknown. That it was considerable is shown by the fact that it was in reality a migration of the whole tribe, and by the extent to which it changed the character and arrangements of population in Italy. Alboin left Pannonia in April, 568, the passes were unguarded, and he learnt from his own success, the need of securing his rear and the frontier of his future kingdom by entrusting the defence and government of Venetia Prima, his first conquest, to Gisulf his nephew, with the title of duke and the command of those whom he should himself select among the most eminent of the "Farae" or nobles (Paul. ii. ix.). From this point the conquest was rapid. In Liguria (the western half of north Italy), Genoa, with some cities of the Riviera, alone escaped. Pavia held out for three years: we may suppose that its siege was not very vigorously pressed; and as a matter of fact, we know that a great part of Alboin's force was detached in flying squadrons which ravaged the country southwards all through Tuscany and Aemilia, to so great a distance that Paul mentions Rome and Ravenna as almost the only exceptions to the devastating inroad.^c The conquest of a part of S. Italy and the foundation of the duchy of Beneventum under Zotto, has been by some attributed, without certain evidence, to this interval. The death of Alboin followed the fall of Pavia. If an interval of three years and six months is to be allowed between the two events as Muratori thinks;^d at any rate nothing is known of its history. The story of his death is like that of his early life in the picture which it gives of a thoroughly barbaric society, where the scull of an enemy is used as a drinking-cup, and the men hold their banquets apart from the women. It may be read in Gibbon's forty-fifth chapter. Paul avouches that the cup was still to be seen in his own day.

* Langobardi Jampridem foederati (Paul. Diac. iii. 1); ἀναπεισθέντες τῇ τῆς βασιλείας συνθήκῃ (Procop. iv. 26). These expressions throw light on the obscure words of Nicetius, Bishop of Trèves (Sirmond. i. Conc. Gall.), "Ipse Imperator suis ipsum (sc. Alboinum) proponit."

Alboin reigned so short a time in Italy that we can form little idea of his policy towards the conquered people. His protection of the bishop of Treviso (Paul. Diac. ii. xii.) to whose prayer he granted all the possessions of his see, exhibits him as clement; and although we are told that he vowed he would lay Pavia in ruins, it appears that at the last moment he relented and spared the city whose obstinate resistance had so much exasperated him (id. ib. xxvii.). The favourable view which these facts suggest would be confirmed by an incidental expression in Paul, "populis extinctis, exceptis his regionibus quas Albuinus ceperat" (the population destroyed, except in those districts which Alboin himself had conquered) (ii. xxxii.), and opposed more feebly by the negative evidence that no beneficial institution or law is ascribed to him: or by suggesting that perhaps the anecdote of the bishop of Treviso becomes somewhat suspicious when we remember that the bishops of Aquileia and Milan fled from the conqueror. The cruelties which gave the Lombards their reputation seem to be proved only against his successors.

It would seem that Alboin left behind him a hero's memory, not in the land of his conquests, but in the country of his birth, for Paul tells us that in his own time among the Bavarians, of whom Alboin had led a band into Italy, whose frontiers touched those of the kingdom which he founded, and whom a common enmity to the East Franks linked to some degree to the Lombards, the praises of Alboin were still repeated, "hactenus etiam apud Baioariorum gentem . . . eius liberalitas celebratur;" and a certain duke of the Veronese march, who opened the tomb of Alboin and took from it some of its ornaments, found an occasion for the vanity common to all men, as Paul quaintly puts it, in the boast that he had seen Alboin, "Alboin se vidisse jaetabat."

The chief authority for the life of Alboin, Paulus Diaconus, lived towards the end of the 8th century, in the last days of the Lombard monarchy; but as one of his ancestors served in the invading army, his account of the conquest may be more authentic than that of an annalist writing so long after the event would otherwise be. ALCHFLEDA, a daughter of Oswin, king of Northumbria, by his wife Eanfleda. She married Penda, king of the Middle Angles, in 653, he having become a Christian under the influence of her father and brother. Bede speaks of her as being implicated in the murder of Penda (Bede, H. E. iii. 21, 24). [S.]

ALCHFRITH (1) (ALCHFRID, ALHFRID, ALUCHFRID, EALFRID, ALFRID, ALCFRID). Son of Oswiu, king of Northumbria. He married Cyniburga, daughter of Penda, and was instrumental in bringing his brother-in-law Penda to baptism. He took part with his father in the battle of Winwæd, in which Penda fell, and seems to have been admitted by him to a share in the royal title and power. The period of his influence in Northumbria is marked by the rise of Wilfrid, who had been brought up in the household of Oswiu, and on his return from Rome in 658 was taken by Alchfrith for his chief friend and adviser. He bestowed on him lands at Estantorfe, and a monastery at Ripon which he had before given to Scottish monks. Alchfrith took a more decided part than his father in the change of the Paschal Custom at the council of Strenshall in 664, and the same year sent Wilfrid to France to be consecrated bishop. Some time after this probably, Alchfrith took up arms against his father (Bede, iii. 14) perhaps in alliance with his Mercian kinsfolk. He now disappears from history. Egfrith, his brother, succeeds Oswiu in 670; no mention being made of Alchfrith, whence we conclude that he was either dead or in exile. According to Simeon of Durham, Osric, who succeeded to the Northumbrian throne in 718, was a son of Alchfrith. As there seems to have been a tradition at Gloucester that Osric, king of the Huiecas, the founder of the monastery there, was identical with this king of Northumbria, it is not improbable that Alchfrith had taken refuge in Mercia. He must not be confounded with Aldfrith, another son of Oswiu, who became king of Northumbria in 685, who was an enemy of Wilfrid, and an upholder of the Irish learning. If Osric were the son of Alchfrith, Oswald, the founder of Pershore, and king of Huiecia, was another son and Kyneburga, abbess of Gloucester, a daughter. Alchfrith would thus be ancestor of the viceroys of the Huiecas, who were famous founders of monasteries in the 8th and 9th centuries (Bede, H. E. iii. 14, 21, 24, 25, 28, v. 19; Eddius, V. Wilfridi, cap. 7, 8, 9, 10, 12; Monasticon Angl. i. 542).

(2) (ALFRITH, EALFRITH). This name is borne by a disciple of Wilfrid, who was employed in his negotiations with Aldfrith, king of Northumbria, under the name of "Magister Alfridus," and who is probably the same learned teacher to whom Aldhelm wrote an epistle congratulatory on his return from Ireland (Edd. V. Wilfr. c. 56; Aldhelm, Ep. ad Ealfridum). [S.]

ALCHMUND (1) (ALKMUND, EALHMUND). The ninth bishop of HEXHAM; consecrated in 767 with archbishop Ethelberht of York, April 24. He died Sept. 7, 781, and was buried near his predecessor Acca. An account of his translation and of miracles attributed to him is given by Ailred of Rievaulx in his 'History of the Saints of Hexham.' (Sim. Dunelm. M. H. B. 663-665; Ailred, Saints of Hexham, in Raine's Memoirs of Hexham, I. 190-197; Mabillon, Acta SS. Ord. S. Ben. saec. iii. p. 1, pp. 214, 215).

(2) The thirteenth bishop of WINCHESTER: he attended the council of Clovesho in 803 with four abbots and two priests. His name is attached to several charters from 802 to 805. (Fl. Wig. M. H. B. 619; Kemble, C. D. v. 65, &c.)

(3) An abbot of this name attended the council of Clovesho in 803 amongst the clergy of the diocese of Leicester. He was evidently a person of mark, for he was present at the legatine council of 787, and attested charters of Offa and Kenulf of Mercia from 789 to 803. (Kemble, C. D. i. 187, v. 64; Spelman, Conc. i. 301, 325.)

(4) King of Kent, father of Egberht, king of Wessex.

(5) (ALHMUND, ALKMUND) The martyr. Of this saint, who is commemorated on the 19th of March, hardly anything can be positively stated. According to the hagiographers, he was the son of Alcred, king of Northumbria, who was put to death, as stated by Simeon of Durham, in 800, by the servants of Eardulf. (Sim. Dun. M. H. B. 671; Flor. Wig. 547.) His claim to the honours of martyrdom are not explained, but he must have become very early an object of veneration, as a church at Shrewsbury was founded under his dedication by Ethelfleda, the daughter of Alfred. According to the tradition which is given by Alban Butler from a MS. sermon in his own possession, Alkmund's remains were first buried at Lilleshull, and thence translated to Derby. The church founded by Ethelfleda was endowed as a college for ten prebendaries by king Edgar, but after the Conquest the college was suppressed, and the abbey of Lilleshull founded out of its revenues. Several churches in Derbyshire and Shropshire are dedicated to S. Alkmund (Acta SS. Boll. March iii. p. 47; Mon. Angl. vi. 262). [S.]

ALCHRED, king of Northumbria. He was son of Eanwin, a descendant of Ida, but not in the direct royal line. He succeeded Moll in 765, to the exclusion of his son. He married a wife named Osgearn or Ofgeofu, in 768. A letter from the royal couple to bishop Lullus is preserved among the letters of S. Boniface, in which they thank him for his presents and request his prayers, and his assistance to the ambassadors whom they had sent to king Charles. They present him with twelve "sagos" and a gold ring. Lappenberg has identified him with the king of Northumbria to whom S. Willehad applied for leave to go as a missionary to the Frisians. Alchred, according to the 'Life of Willehad,' assembled his bishops, and after mature deliberation sent him to the work. In 774 he was deposed by his nobles and banished. He took refuge first at Bamborough, and afterwards with Cynohht, king of the Picts. His son Alhmund is said to have accompanied him in exile. [ALCHMUND, (5).] (Sim. Dun. M. H. B. 663, 664; Bonifac. Ep. 119; Lappenberg, Hist. Eng. ed. Thorpe, i. 215, 216.) [S.]

ALCIBIADES, of Apamea, a propagator of heretical doctrines and trafficker in professed spiritual powers, who found his way to Rome from the valley of the Orontes (cf. Juv. Sat. iii. 62) in the time of Hippolytus, in the early part of the third century. If we are to accept the statement of Hippolytus, Alcibiades was led to Rome by what he had heard of the heretical teaching of Callistus, then bishop of Rome, and his school. On this ground-work he conceived the hope of erecting a more subtle philosophical system, composed of elements derived from the Ebionites, the Pythagoreans, Eastern Magicjans, and Jewish Cabbalists. He brought with him as his credentials "the book of Elchaisai" (or "Helesai," Euseb. vi. 38), received from the hands of an angel. The history of this volume and what we learn of its contents is in striking correspondence with the modern 'Book of Mormon.' Alcibiades was openly met and successfully resisted by Hippolytus, and his heresy appears to have been speedily and effectually crushed. See ELCESAITES. (Hippolytus, Philosophum. lib. ix. c. 8, 12; Euseb. H. E.

vi. 38; Theod. Haeret. Fab. ii. 7; Epip. Haer. xix. 5). The untrustworthy Nicephorus (H. E. v. 24) makes Alcibiades an opponent of the Elvcsaites. [E. V.]

ALCIMUS AVITUS. [AVITUS.]

ALCUIN (Ealwine, Alchwin, Alchuin, Alquinus, Flaccus Albinus); Alcuine (V. S. Willibrordi cap. xxxiv. "Carmiger indoctus cecinit hos Alcuine versus") Alcuinus ("Qui legat, Alcuinum, dicat rogo Christe, tuere. Epigr. 279"). Alcuin was born of noble Northumbrian parentage about 735. The exact date of his birth and the names of his parents are unknown, but the year 735 is accepted by the best authorities, Mabillon and Froben, as an approximation; and the position of his family is determined by his own words. He was, he tells us (V. S. Willibrordi, lib. i. c.1), the hereditary representative of the noble house from which S. Willibrord, the apostle of the Frisians, sprang. As such he possessed and ruled a little monastic society which had been founded by Willigis, the father of S. Willibrord, in honour of S. Andrew, on one of the promontories of the Yorkshire coast between the Humber and the North Sea.

He was brought up from infancy in the school founded by archbishop Egbert in connexion with the church of York. Here he received instruction both from the archbishop, himself the disciple and friend of Bede, and from Ethelberht, the master of the school, who became archbishop in 767. The nature of the education thus obtained is described by the biographer of Alcuin, who drew his information from Sigulf, a pupil in the same school, as beginning with grammar and leading up through the liberal discipline of literature and philosophy to the study of the Holy Scriptures. It involved certainly a fair acquaintance with the Latin poets, some knowledge of the Greek Fathers, handed down from Theodore and Adrian, and as much Hebrew as could be learned from the study of S. Jerome. The library of York contained books in all the three languages, including the works of Aristotle and Cicero (Alc. de Pontiff. vv. 1525-1562).

Alcuin was the favourite pupil of Egbert, who is said to have presaged great things for him, and who provided for his advancement in secular as well as theological learning. With Ethelbert, before his promotion, it is probable that Alcuin visited Rome, and on his journey spent a short time in study at one or two French monasteries.

He received the tonsure early in life, and was ordained deacon by Ethelbert soon after 767, on the feast of the Purification. A second visit to Italy, on a mission from Ethelbert to Charles the Great, falls probably between 767 and 780: on the occasion either of this or of the earlier visit Alcuin heard at Pavia a disputation between a learned Jew and Peter of Pisa, who was Charles's instructor in grammar. The king seems to have distinguished Alcuin with favour. It is uncertain whether Alcuin succeeded Ethelbert in the charge of the school of York when the latter became archbishop, or at a later period; but he was employed by him in conjunction with Eanbald in directing the architectural works proceeding at York, and when Ethelbert retired from the archbishopate in 780, was intrusted with his library. The new archbishop Eanbald sent Alcuin to Rome for his pall in 780. On this journey he fell in again with Charles at Parma, where he spent Easter 781, and was pressed by him to leave England and attach himself to his court. Having completed his errand, Alcuin obtained from his archbishop and king leave of temporary absence, and accepted Charles's invitation; joined his court about 782, and remained for eight years a member of his household, taking charge of the Palatine schools and being provided for by the gift of the monasteries of S. Lupus at Troyes, and Bethlehem at Ferrières, with the cell of S. Judoc on the coast of the Morini. During this period Alcuin was busily employed in teaching, in writing and revising books for educational and ecclesiastical uses, and in organizing schools on the model of the Palatine school, in which Charles might carry out his design of restoring the knowledge of the sacred languages, the text of the Bible and service books, and the moral rigour of ecclesiastical discipline. How laboriously Alcuin fulfilled the duties thus incurred, the list of his works will show: the extent of his influence is proved by his letters, and the success of his work by the literary history of the following century.

In 790 Alcuin returned to Northumbria, possibly with a view to the security of his property, and perhaps with credentials from Charles. Ethelred, who had after ten years of exile and imprisonment, just recovered his throne, attempted to retain him at his court, and the love of his country, which appears strongly in his letters, might have induced him to remain. But the necessities of the Church compelled him to return. The heresy of the Adoptianists under Felix and Elipandus on the one hand, and the conduct of the empress Irene on the subject of image worship, had roused the religious instincts of Charles. Alcuin rejoined him in 792 as the champion of orthodoxy, and in conjunction with other English scholars, acting also, according to Simeon of Durham, who repeats the words of an apparently contemporaneous historian, as the representative of the English bishops, he took a leading part in the important measures which were completed in the council of Frankfort. He never returned to England, but spent the remaining years of his life in the reformation of the religious houses which were intrusted to him by Charles, and in the cultivation of that learning and sanctity which have made him a bone of contention between the rival orders of monks and canons. He governed the monastery of S. Martin at Tours with the power and name apparently of abbot [Ep. 81, ed. Migne], although he was still a deacon; and although he was an admirer of the monastic ideal, he had never taken the vow of a true monk, he retained his monasteries of Ferrières and Troyes, and about the year 800 undertook the charge of another at Cormery on the Indre. Shortly before his death he founded a hospital for pilgrims at Duodecim Pontes near Troyes. As old age grew upon him he withdrew from work, and with the imperial permission divided his preferments among his disciples. He died on Whit Sunday, May 19, at Tours, and was buried by the archbishop within the church of S. Martin, not outside as he had desired.

This short notice comprises nearly all that can be said to be known of the chronology and sequence of events of Alcuin's life, and it is unnecessary to do more than mention the vexed questions regarding it which have been debated at great length by Mabillon, Chifflet, and Froben, but which, owing to the materials brought to light by their discussions and to the growth of a more critical chronology, are questions no longer. Such were the supposed identity of Alcuin with Albinus, abbot of S. Augustine's; and the notion that he was a disciple of Bede, which was maintained on the hypothesis that Alcuin lived to be a hundred years old, or that Bede lived until the year 760. The date of Alcuin's death has also been questioned, owing to mention made of him apparently as alive as late as the year 815, to which Mabillon was at one time inclined to give credit. But the evidence of contemporary annalists is conclusive, and the later mention must be set aside, as deficient in authority, or as referable to other persons of the name of Albinus. A question which has been debated with much more zeal and critical power, is whether Alcuin was a monk or a secular clerk. Mabillon and Froben argue that he was a monk, on the ground principally of his being a member of the church of York, which they assume to have been Benedictine, of the high admiration which he professed for monasticism, and of the position of abbot which he held in several monasteries. On the other side is arrayed the evidence of his biographer, who records him as standing to the order of canons in the same position in which Benedict of Aniane stands to the monks, and the fact that his disciples and successors in his several churches were chiefly canons. The positions of Mabillon and Froben are very questionable. The church of York was certainly not monastic or Benedictine in such a sense as to exclude secular clergy who were members of the archbishop's court and household; it was most probably a mixed society necessarily containing clerks, incidentally containing monks: there is no evidence for regarding Alcuin as a monk, much for regarding him as a secular deacon. Again, Alcuin's professions of admiration for monasticism are to be interpreted rather of an ideal which he felt himself too busy and too worldly to aspire to before he grew old. It is unnecessary to add that the office of ruler of a monastery could at this period be held by a secular, or even by a layman, and with or without the title of abbot. This title, although given him by Charles and others, Alcuin seldom if ever assumes. What however seems decisive as to his profession during the greatest part of his life, is the evidence of his letters that he retained and spent his private fortune in a way which would have been incompatible with a monastic character, even at a period when the rigour of monasticism was so far relaxed as to allow a layman to be an abbot. Still it is possible, and by no means improbable, that he, like many other noble Northumbrians, received the monastic tonsure in preparation for death; but there is no evidence that he did so. Froben is much less confident of his conclusion than Mabillon, but the matter would hardly have been so long debated without the spur of monastic zeal and jealousy. The question whether Alcuin was brother to Aquila, archbishop of Salzburg, is settled by Froben on very satisfactory grounds in the negative.

The position of Alcuin in the maintenance and development of medieval learning is capable of distinct definition. The schools of Northumbria had gathered in the harvest of Irish learning, of the Franco-Gallican schools still subsisting and preserving a remnant of classical character in the 6th century, and of Rome, itself now barbarized. Bede had received instruction from the disciples of Chad and Cuthbert in the Irish studies on the Scriptures, from Wilfrid and Acca in the French and Roman learning, and from Benedict Biscop and Albinus in the combined and organized discipline of Theodore. By his influence with Egbert, the school of York was founded, in it was centred nearly all the wisdom of the West, and its greatest pupil was Alcuin. Whilst learning had been growing in Northumbria, it had been declining on the continent: in the latter days of Alcuin, the decline of English learning began in consequence of the internal dissensions of the kings, and the early ravages of the Norsemen. Just at the same time the continent was gaining peace and organization under Charles. Alcuin carried the learning which would have perished in England, into France and Germany, where it was maintained whilst England relapsed into the state of ignorance from which it was delivered by Alfred. Alcuin was rather a man of learning and action than of genius and contemplation like Bede, but his power of organization and of teaching was great, and his services to religion and literature in Europe, based indeed on the foundation of Bede, were more widely extended, and in themselves inestimable.

It is probably owing as much to the unhappy condition of England during the 9th century as to the more important position occupied by Alcuin on the continent, that few names of his English pupils have been preserved, compared with the numerous French scholars who were indebted to him, for some part at least of their education. Many of his English scholars followed him to France, and found a more favourable field of work there than at home. His most famous English pupil was Eanbald II., archbishop of York. The names of Osulf, Calwinus, Witzo, Waldramn, Raganhard, and a few others, have come down to us. Fridugis, afterwards his successor at Tours, and, later, abbot of S. Bertin, was another. Sigulf, the priest of York, his successor at Ferrières, upon whose information the ancient life of Alcuin is founded, must have been rather a companion than a pupil. Amongst his scholars in the Palatine school were Charles himself, with his sons Charles, Pipin, and Lewis, his sister Gisela, and his daughter of the same name; Angilbert, afterwards abbot of S. Riquier, Adalhard, abbot of Corvey, Rigbod, archbishop of Trèves, Rictrudis, a noble nun of Chelles, and Gundrada, the sister of Adalhard. His most famous pupils during his later years at Tours were Rabanus Maurus, afterwards archbishop of Mentz; Hatto, abbot of Fulda; Haimo, bishop of Halberstadt; Samuel, abbot of Lorsch, and afterwards bishop of Worms; Adalbert, abbot of Ferrières; Aldric, bishop of Sens; and Amalarius, deacon of Metz. The connexion of Ferrières with the school of York was maintained as late as the middle of the 9th century, when we find abbot Lupus in correspondence with the archbishop and abbot of York.

A distinctive peculiarity of Alcuin's association with his pupils and friends is found in the assumed names under which they write to and about one another. Alcuin is himself Flaccus Albinus, the Horace of the society; Charles is David; Angilbert is Homer; Adalhard, Antony; Amalarius is Symposius; Hatto is Bonosus; Riculf is Damaetas; Archbishop Eanbald is Simeon; Fridugis, Nathanael; Aldrad of Milan is Peter; Rigbod is Macarius; another prelate is called Onias; another, an English one, Speratus. Some of the names are formed by a play on the proper name of the bearer. Arno, archbishop of Salzburg, is Aquila; Withso is Candidus; Rabanus is called Maurus, because of his swarthy complexion; Bruno is another Candidus, perhaps by antiphrasis; Hechstan is Alta Petra; Anthropos, Stratocles, Theophilus, Mopsus, and Gallicella, cannot be identified, but it would be easy to suppose the two first translations of Mann and Ludwig or Hereberht. Of the ladies, Gisela was Lucia; Rictrudis, Columba; and Gundrada, Eulalia.

The foregoing lists comprise the names of nearly all Alcuin's most regular and frequent correspondents; to them most of his letters are addressed, and several of his works dedicated. Besides them, however, we find amongst those to whom he wrote, Pope Adrian I., Ethelred and Eardulf, kings of Northumbria, Offa, Egferth, and Kenulf, kings of Mercia; the patriarchs George of Jerusalem and Paulinus of Aquileia; archbishops Ethelhard of Canterbury, Laidrad of Lyons, Nifridius of Narbonne, and Theodulf of Orleans, his great competitor in the restoration of learning in France; bishops Kinbert of Winchester, Ethelbert of Hexham, Higbald of Lindisfarne, Tidferth of Dunwich, Alheard of Elmham, and Remedius of Coire; abbots Benedict of Aniane, Moroald of Farfa, and Friduin of Wearmouth; the monks of Wearmouth, Jarrow, Lindisfarne, and Whithern; Colcu the reader, and Joseph, who was probably a clerk of York, and acted as Alcuin's agent in the management of his property.

Amongst the historical subjects on which light is thrown by Alcuin's letters may be enumerated the conquests of Charles, and the extension of the Church through them among the Germans, Wends, Slaves and Avars (Epp. 3, 33, 36, 39, 108, 129), the jealousy of Offa and Charles (Epp. 8, 47, 48, 49), the devastation of Lindisfarne by the Norsemen (Epp. 9, 13, 14, 15, 16), the archbishopric of Lichfield and the troubles of Ethelhard (Epp. 10, 57, 74, 75, 77, 78, 79, 114), the revolutions of Northumbria (Epp. 11, 47, 60, 61, 115, 116), the process of electing the archbishops of York (Epp. 54, 55), the introduction of Roman improvements into the service of the churches of England (Epp. 65, 1), his friendly relations with the imperial family (Epp. 120, 121), and with the Irish schools (Ep. 225), and the heresy of the Adoptianists.

The works of Alcuin are divided by Froben into seven classes, to which may be added those doubtfully and more erroneously attributed to him.

1. Of these the most important are the letters, of which much has been said above. The first attempt at the collection of these was made by Canisius, who printed 67 from a St. Gall MS. in his Lectiones; to these several were added by Ussher, Martene and Durand, Baluze, and D'Achery. Mabillon discovered and published 26 from a Ratisbon MS., in his Analecta; and a very large addition was made to them by abbot Froben from MSS. at Salzburg and elsewhere, which brings up the number in the editions of Alcuin's works to between two and three hundred. Several others exist still in MS. (especially in the Cotton collection), and among them some of considerable interest.

2. The exegetical works of Alcuin are principally compilations from the fathers. They are (1) on Genesis, addressed to Sigulf, and drawn from S. Jerome, S. Gregory, and S. Ambrose; (2) on the penitential and gradual Psalms, addressed to Arno; (3) on Canticles, to Daphnis; (4) on Ecclesiastes to Onias, Candidus, and Nathanael, chiefly from S. Jerome; (5) on Hebrew names to Charles, compiled from Bede; (6) on S. John, to Lucia and Columba, taken largely from Bede, Gregory, Augustine, and Ambrose; (7) on the Epistles to Titus, Philemon, and the Hebrews, from S. Jerome and S. Chrysostom, the latter through the translation of Mutianus; (8) on the Apocalypse, published for the first time by Cardinal Mai from a Vatican MS.

3. The dogmatic writings of Alcuin are—(1) De Fide Sanctae et Individuae Trinitatis, addressed to Charles, written about 802, and being a concentration of S. Augustine's works on the subject; (2) Twenty-eight questions on the Trinity, treated in the same way, and addressed to Fridugis; (3) on the procession of the Holy Ghost, addressed to Charles, a collection of testimonies from the fathers; (4) two works against Felix of Urgel, one in one book addressed to the abbots and monks of Septimania, composed of testimonies; the second in seven addressed to Felix himself, and containing much learning and independent argument; (5) Four books against Elipandus of Toledo, on the same subject and plan.

4. Alcuin's liturgical works are chiefly adaptations or recensions of the parts of the service books. (1) Liber Sacramentorum, from the use of Tours; (2) De Psalmorum usu, an arrangement of the psalms, and a few original prayers; (3) Officia per ferias; (4) De Baptismi caeremoniis. With these are associated three books or letters on moral and mental philosophy. (1) De virtutibus et vitiis, from Augustine, addressed to Count Wido; (2) De animae ratione, to Eulalia, also from Augustine; (3) De Confessione, to the scholars of Martin's at Tours.

5. The biographies of S. Martin, from Sulpicius; of S. Vedast, S. Riquier, and S. Willibrord. The latter is interesting from the fact of the relationship between Alcuin and the saint.

6. The poems of Alcuin are of a very varied character; they include prayers, hymns, inscriptions for churches, altars, and books; epitaphs, enigmas, and epigrams, triplets on Scripture history, and epistles to Leo III., Charles, Angilbert, Arno, and others of his correspondents.

The most important and longest of the poems is that De Pontificibus et Sanctis Ecclesiae Eboracensis, in 1657 lines, giving an account of the church of York and its great men from the foundation to the accession of Eanbald. The early part is based on Bede; but from the consecration of Egbert to the end, it is full of original information respecting the schools and library of York, the acts of the archbishops, and the career of the author. In a few particulars it agrees with the chronicle of the Northumbrians, which was used by Simeon of Durham for the early part of his chronicle, and it is the most ancient authority for the period of which it treats.

7. The Opera Didascalica consist of dialogues on the subjects of grammar, orthography, rhetoric and the virtues, and dialectic; a discussion on the course and phases of the moon, and a dialogue on miscellaneous subjects between Alcuin and Pipin.

8. The most important of the "Opera Dubia" is the Confessio fidei, the authorship of which was asserted to be Alcuin's by Mabillon, with considerable show of argument against Daille, who declared that it was later than the time of Auselm. Its bearing on the Eucharistic controversy, and on the doctrines of Calvinism, has imparted a sentiment of partisanship to all the criticism on the subject. Mabillon's argument was attacked by Basnage on internal evidence, but it was by no means satisfactorily refuted; and unless the statements of Mabillon as to the date of the MS. can be disproved, no sufficient argument from its contents can be adduced against him. The Disputatio Puerorum is a dialogue of the age of Alcuin, with no determinate marks of authorship. It is on religious matters generally.

Fifty-three propositions, ad acuendos Juvenes; a series of puzzles and arithmetical problems, are ascribed to Alcuin; but they appear among the works of Bede also, and there is nothing in them to determine the authorship. The rest of the "opera dubia" are poems of very much the same character as the authentic ones.

9. The "opera supposita" are—(1) The Liber de divinis officiis, a compilation of later date (as late as the 11th century), and unworthy of the reputation of Alcuin; (2) four Homilies, some of which are elsewhere ascribed to Paul the Deacon, Ambrosius Autpertus, and Bede; and a few verses.

The share of Alcuin in the composition of the Libri Carolini is another vexed question, into which the odium theologicum has intruded. It cannot be discussed here; but it may be said that all arguments against it, based on the lateness of the authority of Hoveden and Matthew of Westminster, are futile.

The bibliographical history of Alcuin's works would fill a volume. Many of the separate treatises were printed in the 16th century, but the first attempt at a collected edition was that of Du Chesne, Paris, 1617. After this was published, the Commentary on Canticles was printed by Patrick Young in 1638, and large accessions to the number of letters and smaller treatises were made. But the earlier editions were all superseded by the splendid edition published in 1777, by Froben, abbot of S. Emmeran's at Ratisbon, which contained all that Germany could supply in the way of additions to the edition of Du Chesne. To this Cardinal Mai added in 1837 the Commentary on the Apocalypse; and it is by no means improbable that, as is certainly the case with the letters, other small treatises may be still in MS. The edition of Alcuin in Migne's Patrologia contains not only all the works ascribed to him, but a great apparatus of critical and historical matter, reprinted from Du Chesne, Mabillon, Chifflet, and Froben.

The life of Alcuin was written during the century after his death by an anonymous author, who derived his information from Sigulf, the companion and disciple of Alcuin. This is printed in Mabillon, Acta SS. Ord. Bened. sac. iv. t. 1; in Surius, Vit. SS. May 19; in the Bollandist Acts, May iv. pp. 335-344; and in the editions of Du Chesne, Froben, and Migne. It is a good specimen of a second-rate medieval biography. Mabillon's Elogium and the life by Froben are both very good, and leave little to be desired in point of criticism. But there is no biography of Alcuin at all corresponding with the importance of his position, and the data existing for drawing a picture of the times. Among minor works on the subject are Lorenz, Alcuin's Leben, 1829, translated into English by Slee; and Mounier, Alcuin et son influence littéraire, religieuse et politique chez les Francs, Paris 1853. The article in the Histoire littéraire de la France, vol. iv. pp. 295, &c., is antiquated by Froben's edition. [S.]

ALDBERHT (1) One of the bishops of East Anglia at the period at which the History of Bede closes.

His name is omitted in the list of the bishops of Dunwich, to which it must have belonged, or else misplaced; for the fifth bishop, to whom the name of Aldberht is given must have been later than the time of Bede.

(2) The 9th bishop of Hereford in the ancient lists. He signs a charter of Offa as "electus" in 777, and as bishop in 781. He died before the Legatine Council of 787, which is signed by his successor Esne, or Aeine.

(3) An etheling of the West Saxons, who rebelled against or was persecuted by Ina. In 724 he was driven into Surrey and Sussex, whither Ina pursued him, and slew him in battle in 725. Chr. Sax. 724, 725. [S.]

ALDEBERT, ELDEBERT, ADELBERT, a celebrated impostor opposed by St. Boniface, condemned in the Council of Soissons in 744, and in that of Rome in 745. What is known of him is gathered entirely from St. Boniface's letters. He is described as a Gaul by nation, but of what parentage it is not stated. He is called a new Simon Magus, who, while he claimed the priestly office, was living an immoral life, and by his empty preaching leading people astray from the teaching of the Church. He used to set up crosses and oratories in the fields, and to persuade the people to leave the churches and frequent these places. He laid claim to such sanctity that he consecrated buildings in his own name, and gave his hair and nails to be honoured equally with the relics of St. Peter. He had received episcopal ordination from some bishops, whom he had deceived by his pretensions. After this he considered himself of equal rank with the Apostles; and when the people came and asked permission to confess their sins before him, he told them that they had no need to confess to him, since he knew all their sins before they disclosed them.

The acts of the Synod at Rome under Pope Zacharias, in which Aldebert, and another schismatic named Clement, were condemned, are found at length in Boniface's Epistles, No. 50. Though they had previously been condemned, deprived, and cast into prison in a provincial Synod at Soissons, they were still leading the people astray. The sentence of the Synod at Rome, signed by the Pope, seven bishops, and seventeen priests, confirmed the decision of St. Boniface, and threatened excommunication against Aldebert or any of his followers who persisted in spreading his errors. Some documents written by Aldebert, consisting of an autobiography, a letter, which he professed to have received from our Lord through the agency of St. Michael, and a prayer in which he invoked eight angels by name, were preserved by the Pope. Two years afterwards he wrote to St. Boniface, urging him to make further inquiry, if necessary, into the case of Aldebert, but his schism seems to have been then quite suppressed. Milman (Latin Christianity, Bk. iv. ch. 5) confesses that he cannot discern, with some Protestant writers of Germany, even M. Bunsen, in these obscure persons (Aldebert and Clement) "sagacious prophets and resolute opponents of Papal domination, which was artfully and deliberately established by Boniface—a premature Luther and Calvin. Neither the jealousies nor the politic schemes belong to the time. The respect of Boniface for Rome was filial, not servile."

For the original documents with respect to Aldebert consult S. Bonifatii Epist. in Monumenta Moguntina, Bibliothec. Rer. German. tom. iii. [C. D.]

ALDEGUNDIS, S. (Teut. "noble war,") born in Hainault about the year 630. She was of noble stock, her father being St. Walbert or Gualbert, nearly related to Clothaire, her mother St. Bertilla. When still a girl she devoted herself to a life of virginity. Being pressed by her parents to marry, she replied, "I desire a husband whose estates are heaven and earth and sea, whose farms will yield their crops for ever, whose riches increase daily, and will never diminish. If you can, mother, find me such a husband, not a man, sinful, wayward, and mortal."

Soon afterwards she left her home, found S. Amandus, bishop of Maestricht, at Haumont, and by him and St. Aubert, bishop of Cambrai, was admitted to the vows of a nun. She then retired to a waste place on the Sambre, called Malbode, now Maubeuge, where she built a convent, and instituted an order of canonesses, over whom she presided with great wisdom, though she was exposed to the attacks of her enemies, both men and demons. Her acts are detailed in three MS. lives given at length by the Bollandists, but they contain so much of the supernatural that the present age would give them little credit. There seems, however, no reason to doubt the principal facts. Her death took place, after much suffering from a cancer in the chest, on January 30, 684, though the date is questioned. On this day she is commemorated with a double office of the first class. She was translated a few years after her death to the Abbey of Maubeuge, again on June 6, 1161, and a third time on May 26, 1439. Accounts of the two latter translations by eyewitnesses are appended to the Bollandists' account. (See Act. SS. Boll. Jan. ii. 1034-1054; Mabillon, Act. SS. Ben. saec. ii. 807-815; Bibliothèque Sacrée, i. 415.) [C. D.]

ALDRITH, king of Northumbria. He was the son of Oswin; but as Bede (H. E. iv. 26, Vita Cuthb. c. 24) calls him Nothus, his mother was probably a concubine. He spent his early life in Ireland (according to William of Malmesbury, G. R. i. 52), or rather perhaps at Iona (Bede, V. Cuthb. 24, Anon. V. Cuthb. 28), where he acquired a love of learning and learned men.

In 685 he became king on the death of Egfrith; and by his pacific policy restored the condition of the kingdom, which Egfrith had ruined by his wars.

In 687 he was visited by Adamaan, abbot of Iona, who came to ransom some Irish captives, and presented his book on the holy places to him. Aldhelm, also, the abbot of Malmesbury, who had been a fellow-student with him, probably in Wessex, dedicated his work on Metres to Aldrith, under the name of Acircius. He was a friend and benefactor also of Benedict Biscop, and was himself very learned in the Scriptures, and such a lover of books that on one occasion he gave eight hides of land for a copy of the Cosmographi.

On his accession, he restored Wilfrid to his church at Hexham, and a little later to York; but in 692 he quarrelled with him, and restored the bishops whom Wilfrid had displaced. Some years after this he made an ineffectual attempt to be reconciled with him at the council of Ætswinapath, but, this failing, he maintained a hostile position towards him as long as he lived. It is not improbable that the division, although originating in the claims of Wilfrid on his church estates, was widened by the jealousies of the two schools in the Northern Church, the one of which, represented by Wilfrid and Aca, maintained the Roman as contrasted with the Irish learning, and the Roman as opposed to the Kentish supremacy; whilst the latter, represented by Benedict Biscop and Aldrith, with the bishops Cuthbert, Bosa, and Eata, retained many Irish sympathies, and was thoroughly at one with the comprehensive church policy of archbishop Theodore.

Of the administration of secular affairs by Aldrith, although Henry of Huntingdon calls him "strenuus in bellis," little is recorded, but the period of his death is referred to by Bede as the date of the decay of ecclesiastical purity in Northumbria. According to William of Malmesbury (G. R. i. 52), who only amplifies the statement of Bede (H. E. iv. 26) his dominions were much diminished by the successes of the Piets.

His last days were troubled by remorse for his behaviour to Wilfrid, and he left strict injunctions to his successor, whoever he might be, to come to an agreement with him (Eddius, c. 57).

Aldrith died Dec. 14, 705, at Driffield, in Yorkshire (Chr. Sax. ad 705), where a monument was shown as his in the time of Camden. Tradition asserts that he had been wounded in battle at Scamridge, and after taking refuge in a cave above Eberston, still called Alfrid's hole, was taken to Driffield to die. (Handbook of Yorkshire, 145.) He married Cuthburh, the sister of Ina, king of Wessex, from whom he separated before his death. She was the founder of the abbey of Wimborne. His successor was Eadwulf, who, after a reign of two months, was expelled by Osred, son of Aldrith. (Bede, H. E., Vita Abbatum, cap. 8, 12, Vita Cuthberti, cap. 24; Chron. Sax. ad 685, 705.)

(2) ALFRITH or AFRITH, the 10th abbot of Glastonbury in Malmesbury's list; dated 709. [S.]

ALDHELM was the son of Kenten or Kenter, a member of the royal family of Wessex. William of Malmesbury, whose life of Aldhelm is a fair specimen of his critical power, rejects the statement of Faricius, his earlier biographer, that Kenten was a brother of Ina, on the grounds of chronology. He was born about the middle of the 7th century, and educated under Maïldulf, an Irish scholar, who had settled on the spot afterwards called from him Maïldulf Burgus or Malmesbury. From Malmesbury Aldhelm went to Canterbury, where he studied under Theodore and Adrian, and learned, according to his biographers, not only Greek, but Hebrew. On his return to Wessex, he received the tonsure, and spent the following fourteen years under Maïldulf, with possibly an occasional visit to Canterbury. On Maïldulf's death, Aldhelm was appointed his successor, and the establishment at Malmesbury was placed under his charge as abbot, by Leutherius, who was bishop in Wessex from 670 to 676. The dates of Aldhelm's life, which are given by William of Malmesbury from doubtful or forged charters, cannot be depended upon.

In this post of abbot, Aldhelm greatly promoted the spread of Christianity in the West of England; founded two monasteries at Frome and Bradford, and was the chief adviser of Ina in the restoration of Glastonbury. He is said to have paid a visit to Rome during the pontificate of Sergius I. 687-701, whom he cleared from an imputation of being father of a nun's child, obtaining from the child, nine days old, the denial of his paternity.

For this visit to Rome there is no authority in his extant writings. The verses on the church of S. Peter and S. Paul, which have been thought to imply it, refer to the church of Malmesbury; and the lines of Virgil, quoted by William of Malmesbury as applied by Alcuin to himself, "Primus ego in patriam mecum, modo vita supersit, Aonio rediens deoacum vertice Musas," are seen by their place in the context to mean no more than that he was the first Englishman who studied Latin metres (Opp. ed. Giles, p. 327).

Whilst he was abbot, he wrote, at the request of a synod of bishops, a letter to Gerontius, king of the Damnonian Britons, on the subject of the Paschal cycle, which had the effect of bringing that monarch and his people over to the Roman usage. During this time, probably, it was that he formed the acquaintance of S. Wilfrid, to whom one of his letters is addressed.

In the year 705 the great diocese of Wessex was divided, and Aldhelm was appointed to the Western division of it, with his see at Sherborn, in Dorsetshire. He lived four years after his consecration, and died on the 25th of May, 709, at Dulting, in Somersetshire.

Aldhelm occupies a very important position in the history of English literature. He was the first Englishman who cultivated classical learning with any success, and the first of whom any literary remains are preserved. His extant writings by no means justify his claim to the character of a great scholar, but they show that he possessed considerable knowledge of books and great facility in writing very involved and elaborate Latin. His works, by both their style and subject, convey an idea of quaint and fantastic elaboration, which he derived, perhaps, from his Irish teaching.

His great merit must have been his exertion in the work of education, which made Wessex during the first half of the 8th century a rival of Northumbria, filling it with monastic schools, such as produced Boniface and his companions in the work of enlightening Germany. The success of these establishments was due, no doubt, in great measure, to bishop Daniel, who sat at Winchester from 705 to 745; but Aldhelm's character as a scholar has won for him the larger share of credit.

Although Aldhelm had himself been taught by an Irishman, his sympathies were clearly with the Kentish school, in which he had also studied; and in one of his letters (Opp. ed. Giles, p. 94) he expresses himself with some jealousy on the popularity of the Irish schools compared with those of Canterbury, although the latter were favoured by the presence of Theodore and Adrian. This jealousy of the Irish school, which was felt less strongly in the Northumbrian church, is a mark of the subsequent character of the West Saxon missions in Germany as distinguished from the Northumbrian.

William of Malmesbury has preserved a saying of king Alfred, that Aldhelm wrote a number of hymns in his native language, by which he tried to allure the country people to endure longer services in church, and to abstain from work on holy days. Some of these were still in common use in the days of Alfred, but none of the Anglo-Saxon poetry now in existence bears the name of Aldhelm. The extant works of Aldhelm are—

1. De laudibus Virginitatis, mentioned by Bede as written in imitation of Sedulius in both prose and verse. The prose version is addressed to Hildelida, abbess of Barking, and was a popular work in the middle ages. It was printed as early as 1512 at Deventer. It contains sixty chapters of stories in illustration of the subject.

2. The metrical treatise, De laudibus virginum, is a poetical treatment of the same stories, addressed "Ad Maximam Abbatissam," in hexameters.

3. Epistola ad Acircium, sive Liber de Septenario et de Metris, Aenigmatibus ac pedum regulis, an elaborate work on the Latin metres. Acircius is Aldfrith, king of Northumbria, whom Aldhelm had known probably in his exile. William of Malmesbury mentions a Scottish prince, Arcuilus, whom Aldhelm had instructed at Malmesbury, and whose name is not improbably a corruption of Acircius, although Ussher believed him to be a Scot. This work contains a quantity of enigmas, which were printed by Delrio in 1601. The body of the work was first published by Cardinal Mai in the fifth volume of the Auctores Classici.

4. The letter to Gerontius on the Paschal cycle, first printed among the letters of Boniface.

5. A few letters of singularly little interest, printed generally with those of Boniface, and a few others preserved by William of Malmesbury in his life of Aldhelm.

6. Some short poems, chiefly inscriptions for altars and churches.

The works of Aldhelm, which had appeared in the collections of Canisius, Del Rio, Wharton, and others, were collected and edited with his letters first by Dr. Giles, Oxford, 1844; and reprinted by Migne in his Patrologia, vol. lxxxix.

The life of Aldhelm was said to have been written first by S. Egwin, and after him by S. Osmund, and Eadmer (Mabillon, Acta SS. Ord. Ben. sæc. iii. p. 1, page 220). But the earliest existing biography is that by Faricius, printed in the Act. SS. Boll. May iv. pp. 84, &c., and also in Dr. Giles's edition of his works. This was superseded at an early date by William of Malmesbury, whose life of Aldhelm, illustrated by the records and traditions of his monastery, forms the fifth book of his Gesta Pontificum. Mr. Wright's account of Aldhelm in the Biograph. Brit. Litt. is full and good. [S.]

ALDHUN, an abbot in Wessex, who wrote a letter to St. Boniface (Ep. 160, ed. Würdtwein), proposing mutual intercession in prayer. Mabillon (Ann. O. S. B. ii. 10) supposes him to have been abbot of Wimborne. [S.]

ALDULF. (1) Son of Ethelhere, succeeded Ethelwald as king of the East Angles in 664. His mother, Hereswitha, was sister of St. Hilda, and of the royal family of Northumbria. He is mentioned by Bede as a contemporary, and as remembering the temple in which king Redwald had worshipped Christ, with his other gods, "more Samaritanorum." He was in the 17th year of his reign when the council of Hatfield (680) was held, and his name appears in a letter addressed by Pope Sergius to the kings of England on the election of archbishop Brihtwald in 692. His brother, Alfwold, succeeded him, but the date of his death is unknown (Bede, H. E. ii. 15).

(2) (Ealdwulf), the tenth bishop of Rochester, consecrated by archbishop Brihtwald in 726. He was one of the consecrators of archbishop Tatwine in 731, and is mentioned as bishop by Bede in his closing chapter. He attests a charter of Oshere in 736 (Kemble, C. D. i. 99), and an act of his own dated in 738 is still extant, requesting confirmation of a gift of land made to his church by Eadberht, king of Kent. He also had a grant from Ethelbald of the toll of one ship annually in the port of London, in 734. His death is placed by Simeon of Durham in 739, by Florence of Worcester in 741; but as it is mentioned in connexion with that of archbishop Nothelm in both places, it probably occurred in 739 (Bede, H. E.; Sim. Dun. M. H. B.; Flor. Wig. M. H. B.; Kemble, C. D. i.).

(3) A bishop whose consecration is recorded by Simeon of Durham to have taken place in 786 at Corbridge. Wharton, following a mistake of William of Malmesbury, supposes him to have been archbishop of Lichfield; but Aldulf of Lichfield was not bishop until after 800. He may, however, safely be identified with the bishop of Mayo in Ireland, "Aldulphus Myiensis Ecclesiae episcopus," who attended the Legatine council of the North in 787 (Sim. Dun. M. H. B. 666; Wharton, Ang. Sacr. i. 430; Spelman, Conc. i. 301).

(4) [EADULF.]

[S.]

ALDWIN. (1) Aldevini, brother of Ethelwin, bishop of Lindsey, and of abbess Ethelchild. He was abbot of Partney, in Lincolnshire, about the beginning of the 8th century (Bede, H. E. iii. 11).

(2) Ealdwine, also called Worr; was bishop of Lichfield at the time at which Bede finished his history. His name is found in charters as early as 727, so that he probably succeeded in 721 bishop Hedda, who died in that year (Ang. Sacr. i. 428); but if the act of the Council of Clovesho in 716 is genuine (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 300), he must have been a bishop five years earlier. He assisted at the consecration of archbishop Tatwine in 731, and signs charters of Ethelbald, king of Mercia, as late as 736. His death is placed by Simeon of Durham in 737. The diocese which he had held was divided at his death (Bede, H. E. v. 23; Sim. Dun. M. H. B. 659; Anglia Sacra, i. 428; Kemble, Cod. Dipl. i.). [S.]

ALEXANDER (ST.), archbishop of ALEXANDRIA, appears to have come to that see in 313, after the short episcopate of Achillas. He was an elderly man, of a kindly and attractive disposition; "gentle and quiet," as Rufinus says (i. 1), but also capable of acting with vigour and persistency. Accusations were laid against him by the malcontent Meletian faction, "before the emperor" Constantine (Athanas. Apol. c. Ar. 11: ad Ep. Aeg. 23), but apparently without result. He was involved in a controversy with one Crescentius as to the proper time for keeping Easter (Epiph. Haer. 70. 9). But in 319 he was called upon to confront a far more formidable adversary. Arius, the parish priest, as he may be described, of the church of Baucalis, the oldest and the most important of the churches of Alexandria, situated "in the head of the mercantile part of the city" (Neale, Hist. Alex. i. 116), was a man whose personal abilities enhanced the influence which he might gain from his official position; he had been thought of, to say the least, for the episcopal dignity at the last vacancy of the "Evangelical Throne," and may have consequently entertained unfriendly feelings towards its actual occupant. But it would be unreasonable to ascribe the opinions associated with his name to any motive of private resentment. It would seem rather that the habits of his mind, and a "temperament devoid of reverence" (Bright, Hist. Ch., p. 11), prepared him to adopt and carry out to their consequences, with a peculiar boldness of logic, such views as he now began to disseminate in Alexandrian society; that the Son of God could not be co-eternal with His Father; that He must therefore have come into existence at a very remote period, by the creative fiat of the Father, so that it might be truly said of Him that "once He was not;" that, therefore, He must be regarded as external to the Divine essence, and only a creature, although of all creatures the most ancient and august. [ARIUS.] The bishop, after hearing of these statements as current in Alexandria, tried at first to check the evil by remonstrance at an interview, but with no real success. Arius resumed the dissemination of his opinions, and expressed them with greater boldness than before. The agitation increasing, Alexander summoned a conference of his clergy; free discussion of the subject was allowed; and Sozomen's statement, that Alexander seemed to waver between the Arian and anti-Arian positions, is probably an exaggeration of the fact that he was anxious to secure for Arius and his adherents a fair and patient hearing. Ultimately, however, he spoke out, and asserted in strong terms the coequality of the Son; whereupon Arius took occasion to criticize his language^a as savouring of that Sabellian error [SABELLICUS] which had "confounded the Persons," and had been so repugnant to the mind of the church of Egypt. The conference, after another sitting, broke up. It was, perhaps, on one of these occasions that Arius presented (if St. Basil was rightly informed, adv. Eunom. i. 4) a doctrinal statement, couched in such simple language as might have sufficed before the discussion of the question, but was, under existing circumstances, disingenuously reticent. The movement increased, and Alexander himself was charged by impatient zealots with irresolution and excessive forbearance, or even with some inclination towards the new errors. It was then, apparently, that Colluthus, one of the city presbyters, went so far as to separate from his bishop's communion, and, on the plea of the necessities of the crisis, to "ordain" some of his followers as clergy. (See Valesius on Theod., i. 4, and Neale, i. 116. This ordination, as performed by a mere presbyter, was soon afterwards pronounced by the Egyptian episcopate to be null.) Alexander's next step was to write to Arius and his supporters, including two bishops, five priests, and six deacons, exhorting them to renounce their "impiety"; and the majority of the clergy of Alexandria and the Marcotis, at his request, subscribed his letter. The exhortation was in vain; and the archbishop felt himself obliged to bring the case formally before the synod of his suffragans, who were in number nearly a hundred. The Arians were summoned to appear: they stated their opinions; the Son, they held, was not eternal, but was created by the impersonal "Word," or Wisdom of the Father; foreign, therefore, to the Father's essence, imperfectly cognizant of Him, and, in fact, called into existence to be His instrument in the creation of man. "And can He then," asked one of the bishops, "change from good to evil, as Satan did?" They did not shrink from answering, "Since He is a creature, such a change is not impossible";^b and the council instantly pronounced them to be "anathema." Such was the excommunication of Arius, apparently in 320. It was as far as possible from arresting the great movement of rationalistic thought (for this, in truth, was the character of Arianism) which had now so determinedly set in. The new opinions became extraordinarily popular; Alexandrian society was flooded with colloquial irreverence. But Arius ere long found that he could not maintain his position in the city when under the ban of the archbishop; it may be that Alexander had power actually to banish him; and he repaired to Palestine, where, as he expected, he found that his representations of the case made a favourable impression on several bishops, including Eusebius of Caesarea. Some wrote in his favour to Alexander, who, on his part, was most indefatigable in writing to various bishops in order to prevent them from being deceived by Arius; Epiphanius tells us that seventy such letters were preserved in his time (Haer. 69, 4). Of these, some were sufficiently effectual in Palestine to constrain Arius to seek an abode at Nicomedia. He had secured the support of the bishop of that city, the able but unprincipled Eusebius (Theodoret, i. 5; Ath. de Syn. 17); and he now wrote (Ath. de Syn. 16) in the name of "the presbyters and deacons" who had been excommunicated, to Alexander, giving a statement of their views, and professing that they had been learned from Alexander himself; the fact being, probably, as Möhler thinks, that Alexander had formerly used vague language in an anti-Sabellian direction. He was now repeatedly urged by Eusebius to readmit Arius to communion; and the other bishops of Bithynia, in synod (Soz. i. 15), authorized their chief to send circular letters in his favour to various prelates. A Cilician bishop, Athanasius of Anazarbus, wrote to Alexander, openly declaring that Christ was "one of the hundred sheep"; George, an Alexandrian presbyter, then staying at Antioch, had the boldness to write to his bishop to the effect that the Son once "was not," just as Isaiah "was not" before he was born to Amoz (Ath. de Syn. 17), for which he was deposed by Alexander from the priesthood. Arius now returned into Palestine, and three bishops of that country, one of whom was Eusebius of Caesarea, permitted him to hold religious assemblies within their dioceses. This permission naturally gave great offence to Alexander. He had hitherto written only to individual bishops, as hoping that the controversy might be prevented from becoming an affair of the whole Church. But he now drew up (perhaps by the help of his secretary and "arch-deacon," Athanasius) his famous Encyclic to all his fellow-ministers, i.e., to the whole Christian Episcopate, giving an account of the opinions for which the Egyptian synod had excommunicated the original Arians, adducing Scriptural texts in refutation, and warning his brethren against the intrigues of Eusebius (Soz. i. 6). This letter, which he caused his clergy to sign, probably preceded the "Tome" or confession of faith which he referred to, as having been signed by some bishops, when he wrote to Alexander bishop of Byzantium the long and elaborate letter preserved by Theodoret, i. 4; in which, while using some language which in strictness must be called inaccurate, he gives an exposition of texts which became watchwords of the orthodox in the struggle (A.D. 323).

Another correspondent now appears on the

^a It is not easy to harmonize the accounts given by Socrates, i. 5, and Sozomen, i. 15; but, on the whole, the latter appears more full and satisfactory, and may be considered as narrating the facts from an earlier starting point than the one taken by the former. It is not likely that Arius would have suddenly attacked the bishop's discourse without having previously secured himself a following, nor that Alexander would have addressed his clergy on this mysterious subject without being constrained to do so by the spread of heterodox speculations.

^b They afterwards drew a distinction: "He was by nature capable of such change, but in fact He is incapable of it."

^c A comparatively late date for this encyclic appears necessary, on account of its allusions to Eusebius. See Neale, Hist. Alex. i. 127. Some identify the encyclic with the Tome.

scene. Eusebius of Nicomedia, who had a strong influence over the Emperor Constantine, persuaded him to write, or perhaps to adopt and sign, a letter to Alexander and Arius, in which the controversy was treated as a logomachy, and the disputants were blamed for disturbing the peace of the Christian community (of which the emperor, although unbaptized, regarded himself as a member), by wrangling about minute points of no real and vital importance (Euseb. Vit. Con. ii. 64 sq.; Soc. i. 7). The imperial epistle was entrusted to a prelate of very high position, Hosius of Cordova, whose stedfastness had been proved under Pagan persecution, but was destined long afterwards to give way under a different kind of pressure. He can have had but little sympathy with the tone assumed by the emperor; but he was charged not only to present the letter to Alexander, but also, as it seems, to inquire into the other troubles of the Egyptian church, caused by the Meletian schism and the new party of Colluthus, and to promote an agreement as to the Paschal controversy. The council held at Alexandria on his arrival decided one point very unequivocally; the ordinations performed by Colluthus, he being only a presbyter, were pronounced to be absolutely null. (Ath. Apol. 76.) And Hosius apparently took back with him from Egypt such stronger evidence of the magnitude of the dogmatic question at issue, and of the impossibility of establishing peace on the basis of indifferentism, that Constantine was induced to summon a general assembly of bishops to meet at Nicaea, in June 325. The proceedings of the First Ecumenical Council need not here be narrated. [NICAEA, COUNCIL OF.] It is enough to say that the Arians were condemned, and the Nicene Creed, in its original form, was drawn up. The Paschal question was dealt with by ruling that the Quartodeciman practice should be everywhere abandoned, and that the Alexandrian bishop should every year (by aid of Egyptian science) ascertain the Sunday on which Easter would rightly fall, and take steps for giving the necessary information to the whole Church (Leo, Ep. 121).

The Meletian schismatics were leniently dealt with: Meletius himself was allowed to retain the nominal dignity of a bishop; the bishops whom he had consecrated were to take rank after the regular prelates, and were even made capable of succeeding to vacant sees. The synodal letter which announced these resolutions to the Egyptian Church (Soc. i. 9), spoke of Alexander in the most respectful and cordial language. On his return to Alexandria, Meletius, as he was ordered to do, made out and presented a catalogue of his adherents (Athas. Apol. c. Ari. 71). The story told by Epiphanius, of severities used by Alexander towards the Meletians, and of a consequent petition addressed by them to Constantine, appears to be one of several misstatements which he adopted from some Meletian sources. Athanasius tells us expressly that Alexander died within five months after the reception of the Meletians into church communion in the Council of Nicaea (Apol. c. Ari. 59), and this, if strictly reckoned from the close of the Council, would place his death in January 326. It cannot be dated later than April 18 in that year. For the other circumstances connected with it, see ATHANASIUS.

CHRIST. BIOGR.

Athanasius mentions a circumstance of Alexander's local administration which furnished a precedent, on one occasion, for himself. Alexander was building the church of St. Theonas at Alexandria, which was to be on a larger scale than any of the existing churches; and he held congregations in it, for convenience sake, before it was completed. (Ap. ad Const. 15.) He is also said by tradition to have never read the Gospels in a sitting posture, and to have never eaten on fast days while the sun was in the sky. (Bolland. Act. SS., Feb. 26.) Two short fragments of a letter addressed by him to a bishop named Aeglon, against the Arians, are quoted in the works of Maximus the Confessor (in the Monothelite controversy), vol. ii. p. 152.

But a statement made respecting Alexander by Eutychius, patriarch of Alexandria, A.D. 933, in his "Contexture of Gems," or annals of the Alexandrian Church, deserves consideration. St. Mark, he affirms, appointed twelve presbyters to continue with the patriarch, and to fill up the vacant see by choosing one of their own body, on whose head the remaining eleven were to lay their hands, bless him, and appoint (or make) him patriarch; which custom lasted until the days of Alexander, who forbade any such appointment by presbyters for the future, and ordered that on the death of a patriarch the bishops should meet, and make a new one, who was not necessarily to be a member of the Alexandrian presbytery; "and so the old institution came to an end" (Eutychius, Annal. ed. Pocock, i. 331). On this we may observe (1) Eutychius was writing more than 600 years after the time referred to, and was capable of making the strangest blunders about the history of his own church.^d (2) The statement looks very like an altered and exaggerated form of one made by Jerome in his 146th letter, to Evagrius (or Evangelus), to the effect that at Alexandria, from St. Mark to Heraclab (bishop of Alexandria in 231) and his successor Dionysius, the presbyters used always to nominate as bishop one chosen out of themselves, and placed (by them) in a higher rank, just as an army might make an imperator, or deacons choose an archdeacon. Now (a) Jerome here dates the change of custom which he mentions, more than 60 years earlier than the date given by Eutychius. (b) He says nothing about ordination or consecration. One view of his meaning is, that there was actually no such rite in use at the appointment of Alexandrian bishops during that period; Morinus (de Sac. Ordin. iii. p. 30) considers his words to imply this. Yet one, at least, of his two illustrations would suggest the subsequent action of a higher authority, to sanction the presbyters' act of choice. "If the deacons," says Bingham (b. ii. c. 21, § 2), "had any hand in making the archdeacon, it must be understood to be under the direction of the bishop." And if he supposed a mere election to have sufficed for conferring the episcopate, he obviously differed from Eutychius,^e and, what is much more, it would be easier to think him in error than to believe so great an anomaly to have been the rule in so eminent a church.^f If he did not suppose that consecration was dispensed with, he must have supposed it to have been performed by bishops; as he himself asks in his next sentence, "Quid enim facit, exceptâ ordinatione, episcopus, quod presbyter non facit?" and a little further, "Omnes (episcopi) apostolorum successores sunt;" and the letter concludes with a parallelism between the three orders of high priest, priest, and Levite, and those of bishop, presbyter, and deacon. The probability is, therefore, that he was thinking simply of an old mode of choosing the Alexandrian prelates. (3) Nor is it certain, indeed, that Eutychius meant to ascribe the actual consecration to the twelve presbyters. His words have been understood of acts of voting, designation, or approbation (Echellensis, Eutych. Vindic., p. 40, 19), or of the presbyters' action in procuring the consecration of the bishop-elect (Renaudot, Lit. Orient., i. 381). If, indeed, he really thought that the presbyter had ordained the bishop, it is not too much to say that the existence of so great an anomaly in such a place, and, as Selden understands Eutychius, up to the time of the Nicene Council, is more than can be believed on the warrant of such a writer,^g and would hardly have found credit in modern times unless it had served a particular controversial object. It is especially to be observed that the proceedings of the Alexandrian Council of 324 could not have taken place as they did, if an institution so ancient and so venerable as this peculiar usage, by the hypothesis, must have been in the Alexandrian Church, had sanctioned the ordination, by presbyteral hands, not simply of presbyters, but of prelates, of the actual patriarch himself. Nor can one fail to see that if that usage had been changed by Alexander himself (as Eutychius' words literally import, although Selden

^d Bishop Pearson, Vind. Ignat. i. 294 (ed. Churton), quotes Eutychius as calling Origen a bishop in Justinian's time, and as building up a strange misstatement on a confusion between Achilles the patriarch and Achilles the Arian. Eutychius, indeed, has several absurd assertions about the two patriarchs, Alexander and Athanasius. No wonder that his authority has been called futile, or that he has been described as "remarkable for nothing so much as his credulity and the inconsistency of his narratives, not only with those of more authentic historians, but often with themselves." Skinner, Prim. Truth and Order, p. 298. See also Cave, Hist. Lit. ii. 97.

^e The attempts of Selden to harmonize the chronological statement of Jerome with that of Eutychius, and "exceptâ ordinatione" with his own theory, are far from felicitous.

^f Observe how Eusebius records the early Alexandrian successions in his ordinary style, as if he knew of nothing peculiar about them.

^g Three statements have been quoted to support it:—(a) Hilary the Deacon, on Eph. iv. 11, "Apud Aegyptum presbyteri consignant, si praesens non sit episcopus." But Echellensis challenges Selden to show a case in which "consignare" is used for "to ordain." The sense is, "to confirm" (Hooker, vii. 6, 4). (b) The author of some 'Questions' on O. and N. T. (appended to tom. iii. of St. Augustine) qu. 101: "In Alexandria et per totum Aegyptum, si desit episcopus, consecrat (al. consignant) presbyter." This appears to refer to the hallowing of the chrism used for confirmation. And both these statements, if they did refer to ordination, would simply contradict Eutychius, as Selden and others understand him; for they would deny the abolition of the ordaining powers of presbyters in the time of Alexander. (c) Cassian says (collat. iv. 1) that a certain Daniel was "a beato Paphnutio ad diaconii praelatus officium, and Paphnutius "cum presbyteri honore provexit;" but this may well mean, procured his ordination. See Bingham, b. ii. c. 3, s. 7.

takes them as referring to the 4th Nicene canon, passed, as he supposes, under Alexander's influence), the enemies of Athanasius would have made the novel mode of his appointment an element in their charges against him, whereas the Athanasian history contains no trace of such a complaint, although an anecdote in the 'Sayings of the Fathers' (Coteler, Monum. i. 611) makes certain heretics say that he had been ordained by presbyters. (4) Severus, the biographer of the Alexandrian patriarchs, who wrote some 30 years after Eutychius, and is quoted by Le Quien and Sollerius (Act. SS. Junii, vol. v. p. 8, seqq.), Echellensis, and Renaudot, asserts that (a) in some ante-Nicene elections of patriarchs, others beside the presbyters took part; (b) that the presbyters had electoral rights long after the time of Alexander; (c) that in two ante-Nicene cases (cf. Neale, Hist. Alex. i. 14, 16) the person elected was not one of the presbytery. (5) George Hormaidius, and the Mahometan writer Makrizi, both of whom wrote after Eutychius, are cited as understanding Eutychius' words not to imply an ordination by the presbytery. If, then, (b) it be asked how much of peculiar privilege was probably vested in the Alexandrian presbyters, we may suppose that by the ancient rule (which was not without exceptions) they alone were eligible to the bishopric of their own city,^h and that in such elections the presbytery took, as was natural, at least the prominent part. The supposition favoured by Le Quien, and to some extent by Neale (Hist. Alex. i. 11), that this early Alexandrian presbytery was an episcopal college, may be pronounced to be quite improbable. The statement of Eutychius that before the time of Demetrius (A.D. 189) the bishops of Alexandria were the only bishops in Egypt, is understood by Echellensis and Renaudot to refer to Egypt proper, or the Delta; but it may well be that the diocesan system was of very gradual growth in the country. [W. B.]

ALEXANDER, bishop of ANTIOCH, succeeded Porphyrius, A.D. 413 (Clinton Fast. Rom.), as the 38th bishop of the see. Before he was raised to the episcopate he had lived an ascetic life in a monastery. Theodoret praises him (H. E. v. 35) for the holiness and austerity of his life, his contempt of riches, love of wisdom, and powerful eloquence. The influence of his mild words and winning character were effectual to heal the schism between the remaining partisans of the unjustly calumniated and banished Eustathius and the main body of the Church, which had lasted 85 years. He led the way to another act of tardy justice by restoring the name of Chrysostom to the ecclesiastical registers. With this object he visited Constantinople, and excited the people to demand the restitution of their archbishop's name of the intruder Atticus (Theodor. l. c.: Niceph. H. E. xiv. 26, 27). He was succeeded by Theodotus A.D. 421. [E. V.]

ALEXANDER, bishop of APAMEA, in Syria Secunda, and metropolitan. He accompanied his namesake and brother metropolitan, Alexander of Hierapolis, to the Council of Ephesus, A.D. 431, and was associated with him in all the transactions taking place there detailed in that article. Apringius of Chalcis, one of the eight deputies sent by the Oriental party to the Emperor Theodosius, was commissioned to act as his proxy (Baluz. 577). The same prelate was afterwards deputed to perform the duties of the see of Apamea, perhaps during Alexander's suspension. He was probably the Alexander despatched by the Oriental bishops to Alexandria with one of the many vain attempts to overcome the obstinacy of Cyril (ib. 908). Towards Easter, 434, he wrote to Alexander of Hierapolis expressing his great desire for a long time to visit him, and his regret at having been hindered by illness and official duties. His object is not assigned, but it is likely that it was to endeavour to induce Alexander to admit John and Cyril to communion (ib. § 132, p. 834). [E. V.]

ALEXANDER, bishop of BASILINOPOLIS, in Bithynia. He was of a senatorial family of Cyrene, who in early youth embraced the monastic life, and was deemed worthy of receiving holy orders. Business brought him to Constantinople, where he made Chrysostom's acquaintance, who thought so highly of him that before 403 he ordained him bishop of the city of Basilinopolis, erected in Bithynia by Julian the Apostate, and named after his mother. He warmly espoused the cause of Chrysostom, and shared in his fall. He retired to his native country, and settled at Ptolemais, where Synesius found him, when made bishop of that city in 410. The malign influence of Theophilus of Alexandria caused him to be ill-treated by the priests of the district, who refused him communion or even ordinary intercourse. Even Synesius was afraid to receive him into his church, or appear with him in public, though in private he showed him all brotherly respect. Synesius wrote to Theophilus, asking how he was to treat him, but he received no reply. On the publication of the amnesty after Chrysostom's death, Alexander refused to avail himself of it, or leave Ptolemais, deeming the peace a false one. (Synesius, Epist. lvi, lxxii.) [E. V.]

ALEXANDER, (St.), presided over the see of BYZANTIUM, as the city was then called (Theod. Hist. i. 19) about 23 years, a stormy period owing to the Asian disturbances. His consecration is variously dated from 313 to 317 A.D. He was already 73 years old at the time (Soc. Hist. ii. 6; Soz. Hist. iii. 3). When Constantine after the defeat of Sicinius appointed a conference at Byzantium between the pagan philosophers and the bishop, Alexander is said to have silenced their spokesman by merely these words: "In the name of Jesus Christ I command thee to be silent" (Soz. i. 18). The anecdote is probably characteristic as indicating that Alexander was more eminent for goodness than for learning. He is highly praised by Gregory of Nazianzum (Or. 27), and by Epiphanius (Adv. Hæc. lix. 10). Theodoret also calls him an "Apostolic" bishop (Hist. i. 3, cf. Phil. 12).

In the commencement of the Arian troubles the co-operation of Alexander was specially requested by his namesake of Alexandria (Theod. i. 4); and he was present at the Council of Nicea (Soz. ii. 29). He opposed the Arians and Eusebians vigorously at Byzantium, although they had the influence of the court on their side (Soc. ii. 6). Constantine, induced by the Eusebians (Ath. Ep. ad Serap. Ruff. Hist. i.) and deceived by the equivocations of Arius (Soc. i. 37), commanded that Arius should be received to communion. But Alexander, though threatened by the Eusebians with deposition and banishment, persisted in his determination not to admit the archheretic to communion, and shut himself up in the church of Irene for prayer in this extremity. The sudden death of Arius on the following morning, Sunday, as he was proceeding in triumph to the cathedral, was regarded by the orthodox as an answer to these prayers (Soc. i. 37, 38; Soz. ii. 29; Ath. Ep. ad Serap.). Alexander did not long survive him (Soc. ii. 6; Theod. i. 19). On his deathbed he is said to have designated Paulus as his successor, and to have warned his clergy against the speciousness of Macedonius (Soc. ii. 6). According to Sozomen he commended the piety of Paulus and the tact of Macedonius (iii. 3). Alexander is commemorated by the Greek Church on Aug. 30th, and on the 28th by the Latin. [I. G. S.]

ALEXANDER of CONSTANTINOPLE. [ALEXANDER OF BYZANTIUM.]

ALEXANDER, bishop of HIERAPOLIS Euphratensis, and metropolitan. He is known to us as the uncompromising opponent of Cyril of Alexandria, and the resolute advocate of Nestorius in the controversies that followed the Council of Ephesus, A.D. 431. His dignity as metropolitan gave him a leading place in the opposition of which John of Antioch was the head, and his influence was confirmed by his personal character. Holy in life, sweet in intercourse, grave in bearing, decided in action, firm in his adherence to what he felt to be the cause of truth and justice, resolute in carrying out the right at any cost of personal rank, comfort, or safety, dauntless in the face of danger, few of his age inspire a higher admiration and a deeper regret than Alexander of Hierapolis.

Alexander may have commenced his episcopate as early as A.D. 404, when his uncompromising zeal for the orthodox faith caused him to erase the name of one Julian, a man famous for the sanctity of his life, but accused of Apollinarianism, which had found its way into the diptychs of one of his churches (Baluz. Nov. Coll. Conc. p. 867).

Alexander arrived at Ephesus in company with his brother metropolitan, Alexander of Apamea, on or about June 20, 431. A misconception immediately arose between him and Cyril. The latter was only too ready to interpret some words of Alexander's as conveying a request from John of Antioch that the council might open at once without waiting for him any longer. But as soon as the Alexanders discovered Cyril's intentions, they used all their efforts to prevent the opening of the council before John's arrival, and, June 21, united with the other bishops of the East in signing the formal act demanding delay (Labbe, Concil. iii. 552, 660, 662; Baluz. 697, 699). The council heeded them not, opened their sittings the next day, June 22, and soon did the work for which it had been summoned, in the condemnation of Nestorius. When the eagerly-expected John at last arrived, June 27, Alexander joined him in the counter-council held by him and the prelates of his party in his inn, and signed the acts cancelling the proceedings of the former council, deposing Cyril and Memnon bishop of Ephesus, and declaring Cyril's anathemas heretical. As a necessary consequence he was included in the sentence against John, and cut off from communion with Cyril and his party (Labbe, iii. 764; Baluz. 507). Correspondence passed between him and the venerated Acacius, the aged bishop of Berea, in which Alexander informed him of all that had occurred at Ephesus, and received his advice (Baluz. 714, 763). When, in the August of the same year, deputies were despatched by both parties to lay the disputed points before the Emperor, he deputed Theodoret his attached friend, who had probably been ordained by him, to represent him at Constantinople, and was the first to sign the absolute power given to him and the other seven deputies. He added the characteristic condition, "that the acts of John's council should be ratified, and those of their adversaries, and Cyril's anathemas rejected" (Labbe, iii. 725). He then returned to his see, where he received Theodoret's report of the bad success of their mission (ib. 732, 733). Anxious for more definite information he wrote to one Parthenius, an abbot at Constantinople, who sent him a lamentable account of the sufferings of those who still adhered to "the martyr Nestorius," and the heresy openly preached (Baluz. 853, 866). Alexander flew to meet the deputies on their return from Chalcedon and joined the council immediately held by John at Tarsus, which pronounced a fresh sentence of deposition on Cyril and the bishops who had acted as his deputies at Chalcedon (Baluz. 840, 843, 874); and that at Antioch in the middle of December, ratifying the former acts and declaring their adherence to the Nicene faith. He also signed the letter to Theodosius, entreating him to enforce their condemnation of Cyril's anathemas (Socr. vii. 34; Baluz. 906). Theodosius deputed the tribune Aristolaus to visit Antioch and endeavour to heal the schism. A meeting was held at Antioch early in 432, attended by Alexander, in which six alternative articles were drawn up, one of which it was hoped Cyril would accept, and so afford a basis of reconciliation (Baluz. 764). One, approved by Aristolaus, is preserved. This declares a resolution to be content with the Nicene Creed and to reject all the documents that had caused the controversy. The decision of the council was conveyed to Acacius by Alexander. Another council was summoned at Berea. Four more articles were added to the six, and the whole were despatched to Cyril. Cyril was well content to express his adherence to the Nicene Creed, but felt it unreasonable that he should be required to abandon all he had written on the Nestorian controversy (Labbe, iii. 114, 1151, 1157; iv. 666; Baluz. 786). Cyril's reply was accepted by Acacius and John of Antioch, and other bishops now sincerely anxious for peace, but not by Alexander or Theodoret (Baluz. 757, 782). The former renewed his charge of Apollinarianism and refused to sign the deposition of Nestorius (Baluz. 762-3). This defection of Acacius and John of Antioch was received with indignant sorrow by Alexander. It was the first breach in the hitherto compact opposition, which loosened the whole mass, and prepared for its gradual dissolution, leaving

Alexander in the almost solitary championship of what he felt to be the orthodox faith. He poured forth his feelings in a vehement letter to Andrew of Samosata. He forwarded him copies of all the documents he had received, and his answer to Acacius' letter; he bitterly complained of Acacius' fickleness, and protested that on the receipt of his letter he was ready to fly to the desert, and that he would rather resign his bishopric and cut off his right hand than recognise Cyril as a Catholic until he had repented his errors (ib. 764-5). The month of April, 433, saw the reconciliation of John and the majority of the Oriental bishops with Cyril fully established (Labbe, iv. 659; Cyril Al. Epist. 31, 42, 44). Alexander was informed of this in a private letter from John, beseeching him no longer to hinder the peace of the Church. Alexander's indignation now knew no bounds. He wrote in furious terms to Andrew and Theodoret, denouncing John as "no true bishop," and cutting himself off from communion with him (Baluz. 799, 800). The efforts of Theodoret and Andrew to soften his determination were fruitless. He put aside their letters—those of Theodoret are models of Christian wisdom, mild, courteous, and reverential—with a fixed determination to listen to nothing that could alter his resolution. His language became more and more extravagant, "they might do as they pleased; betray the faith if they so minded; hold communion with the Egyptian;" he would never be polluted by "the abomination of Egypt;" "exile, violent death, the beasts, the fire, the precipice, were to be chosen before communion with a heretic" (ib. 768, 775, 799, 800, 809-10). Theodoret in vain besought the resolute old man to attend the council he summoned at Zeugma, A.D. 433, to deliberate on terms of peace. His personal entreaties, his assurance that all would recognize him as a father and master, and that no opposition should be offered to his wishes, were fruitless. The terms he named were impracticable. The council was held without him, and though it adhered to the refusal to condemn Nestorius, because it recognized the orthodoxy of Cyril, his exasperation was only increased. He rejected all efforts at accommodation, turned a deaf ear to the firm, manly letters of Andrew of Samosata, and cut him off from his communion (ib. 804, 810, 816). Strengthening himself in his resolution to die rather than betray the faith, he at last refused to hold intercourse with, or read letters from, any who regarded Cyril more leniently than himself. He thanked Theodoret for his well meant endeavours. (If we accept the letter, Baluz. 868, as genuine, Theodoret even called in the mediation of Nestorius to effect his object.) "The four journeys he had taken on behalf of his miserable soul proved that he had the heart of the good shepherd. But it was labour thrown away. If he came again he could not see him. He had made a vow to avoid the sight, hearing, or even the remembrance of all who in their hearts turned back again to Egypt" (ib. 865). The condemnation of Cyril and all who recognized his orthodoxy, by the council held at Anazarbus by the bishop Maximin, chiefly by Alexander's influence, was but an unsatisfactory compensation for the defection of John of Antioch, and the powerful band of bishops who followed his lead, and the sanction received from Rome of all the proceedings of the Council of Ephesus. John's intrusion upon his privileges widened the alienation. Alexander's contumacy had been regarded as depriving him of his functions as metropolitan. John, as patriarch, stepped in, A.D. 434, and ordained bishops in the Euphratensian province. This act, of very doubtful legality, excited serious displeasure, and was appealed against by Alexander and six of his suffragans. "The crime of intrusion had been enhanced by culpable carelessness; some of the newly-ordained were known as men of infamous character; even branded for their offences" (ib. 830-833, 865). Another act of interference with his prerogatives was felt still more painfully by Alexander. A church had been built by him in honour of St. Sergius, at the cost of 300 lbs. of gold. To erect this he had impoverished his own see and burdened it with debt. A town had clustered round the church, called Sergiopolis. John, with reprehensible want of consideration, chose this time, A.D. 434, to place a bishop over the new church without any communication with the munificent founder. His choice was unlucky, the new bishop was accused, whether rightly or wrongly, of being one whose evil doings were known to all. An appeal to the Empress Pulcheria was despatched by the bishops of the province, but the issue is not known (ib. 837-8, 865). A formidable schism was thus created which was fomented by Alexander, and gained the adhesion of Theodoret, by whose conciliatory wisdom however it was healed, and, with some marked exceptions, the bishops returned to communion with John (ib. 859, 860, 865, 866).

The end was now near at hand. Pulcheria and Theodosius had been carefully supplied with representations, coloured by no friendly hand, of the evil to the faith resulting from the obstinate refusal of Alexander and the few who were left to support him, to communicate with those whose orthodoxy had been recognized by the Church. John had followed up the advantage gained, and had obtained imperial rescripts decreeing the expulsion and banishment of all bishops who still refused to communicate with him (Baluz. 876). This rescript was executed in the case of Dorotheus, Meletius of Mopsuestia, and other recusants. Alexander still remained. John expressed great unwillingness to take any steps towards the deprivation of his former friend and associate, the object of such well-merited veneration, now also weakened by age and gout. He commissioned Theodoret to use his influence with him. But he had again to report the impossibility of softening his inflexibility. But he begged John to be patient with the old man, "his obstinacy was caused by love of the truth. He taught nothing but what was orthodox, and held his peace on the subject of controversy both in speaking and writing. The consequences of severity might be disastrous. He was generally looked on as a champion of the truth; his courage was admired, his piety universally revered. A schism might ensue" (ib. 871). John, unwilling to resign all hope of bringing him to moderation, sent a deputation of prelates to confer with him. But the issue was equally ineffectual (ib. 883-886). John now, A.D. 435, felt it impossible to offer any further resistance to the imperial decrees. Four rescripts had been neglected; the law must be suffered to take its course. The imperial officers, Diouysius, "Magister Militiæ per Orientem," and the Count Titus, his deputy, both wrote in terms of reverential courtesy, begging Alexander to save them the pain of executing the emperor's orders by acquiescing in his demands. His reply, filled with violent charges against John, finally closed the door of reconciliation. He simply begged that he might have timely private information of the execution of the rescript, that he might be able to leave without exciting public commotion (ib. 879, 880-1, 884). Titus issued to Libyanus, the President of the Euphratensian province, his order for Alexander's removal, promising that he would come himself and support him by force if necessary (ib. 881). But no compulsion was needed, the noble old man obeyed the order with calmness, and even with joy at laying aside the burdens and anxieties of the episcopate. He went forth in utter poverty, not taking with him a single penny of his episcopal revenue, or a book or paper belonging to the church. His sole outfit consisted of some necessary documents, and the funds contributed by friends for the hire of vehicles to the place of his banishment (ib. 868, 881-882).

The banishment of their beloved and revered bishop overwhelmed the people of Hierapolis with the deepest grief. Fear of the civil authorities deterred them from any open manifestation of their feelings. But they closed the churches, shut themselves up in their houses, and wept in private, dwelling with loving remembrance on the holiness of his life—the purity of his conduct—the sweetness of his manners—the excellence of his instructions. The aspect of the city was so alarming to Libyanus that he deemed it necessary to apprise Titus of it, who desired him to take measures to calm the excitement, using force if necessary to recall the people to their ordinary avocations (ib. 879, 881-2). John of Antioch also thought it requisite to write an apologetic letter to the clergy and people, assuring them that the course he had taken was not dictated by any personal pique at Alexander's behaviour towards him, but was rendered necessary by Alexander's opposition to reunion. Even now if he would enter into communion, he would restore him with joy (ib. 883). Such a change was not to be looked for from one so inflexible. Alexander's place of banishment was the mines of Phamuthin in Egypt, where he died, sternly adhering to his anathemas of Cyril to the last. (Tillemont, Mém. Eccles. xiv. xv.; Labbe, Concil. vol. iii.; Baluz. Nov. Collect.) [E. V.]

ALEXANDER, bishop of JERUSALEM, was an early friend and fellow scholar of Origen at Alexandria, where they studied together under Pantaenus and Clemens Alex. (Eus. H. E. vi. 14). We know nothing more of his early life until we find him bishop of a city in Cappadocia (Eus. H. E. vi. 11); or, according to Valesius (Not. ad Euseb.) and Tillemont (Mém. Eccl. iii. p. 183), of Flaviopolis in Cilicia. He became a confessor in the persecution of Severus, A.D. 204, and was thrown into prison, where he continued some years. He was still a prisoner at the commencement of Caracalla's reign, A.D. 211, when he sent a letter by the hand of Clemens to congratulate the Church of Antioch on the appointment of Asclepiades as their bishop in the room of Serapion (Euseb. vi. 11). The next year he was released from prison, and, in fulfilment of a vow, and warned by a dream, visited Jerusalem, where, in obedience to a divine intimation, he was chosen coadjutor to the aged Narcissus, then bishop of that see. This being the first occasion of the translation of a bishop, as well as of the appointment of a coadjutor bishop, in apparent violation of the canons of the Church which forbade the transference of a bishop from one see to another, and ordained that there should not be more than one bishop in a city, it was deemed essential to obtain the sanction of the whole episcopate of Palestine. A synod was summoned at Jerusalem, and the assembled bishops gave their unanimous consent to the step, A.D. 213 (Hieron. de Script. Eccl.; Vales. Not. in Euseb. vi. 11; Socr. vii. 36; Bingham, Origines, bk. ii. § 4). On the death of Narcissus he succeeded him as sole bishop. Alexander's chief claim to celebrity rests on the library he formed at Jerusalem, and on the boldness with which he supported his former friend, Origen, against his bishop Demetrius of Alexandria. To the collection of ecclesiastical writings, especially the correspondence of the leading men of the Christian Church at the time, Eusebius expresses his grateful obligations in furnishing materials for his history (Euseb. H. E. vi. 20).

The charge brought against Origen by Demetrius was, that though still a layman, he had ventured at Caesarea to expound the Scriptures and preach publicly in the presence of bishops, c. 216. This he had done at the invitation of Alexander and Theoctistus, the bishop of the city. Origen's special offence was not that he taught being a layman, but that he taught when bishops, the authorised expounders of the Holy Scriptures, were present. On his remonstrance the two prelates wrote a joint letter to Demetrius, of which a fragment is preserved by Eusebius, in which they defend themselves, not by a plea of ignorance or exceptional circumstances, but by an appeal to the usage of the Church Catholic. They knew the custom to prevail at Iconium and other Asiatic churches, and they believed it to prevail elsewhere (Euseb. H. E. vi. 19. See Epiph. Haeres. lxiv. n. 2; Bingham, Origines, bk. xiv. c. 4). The cause of objection was finally removed by Origen's ordination as a presbyter by his friends Alexander and Theoctistus on his second visit to Palestine, c. 230. The friendship between Alexander and Origen was warm and lasting; and the latter bears public testimony to the remarkable gentleness and sweetness of character manifested in all Alexander's public instructions (Orig. Homil. I. in Lib. Reg. No. 1). Alexander was again thrown into prison at Caesarea in the Decian persecution, where he died A.D. 251 (Euseb. H. E. vi. 46; Hieron. Script. Eccl.).

Eusebius has preserved some fragments of Alexander's letters; of that to the Antinoites, H. E. vi. 11, to the Church of Antioch, ib.; to Origen, H. E. vi. 14, and to Demetrius, H. E. vi. 19. These have been published by Galland, Biblioth. Vet. Patrum, vol. ii. p. 201 sq. Clemens Alex. dedicated his Canon Ecclesiasticus to him (Euseb. vi. 13). [E. V.]

ALEXANDER of LYCOPOLIS, who wrote a short treatise against the Manicheans, printed in Galland's Biblioth. Veterum Patrum, IV. pp. 73-87. Its title is 'Ἀλεξάνδρου Λυκοπολίτου ἐπιστρέφαντος ἐξ ἔθναν, πρὸς τὰς Μανιχαίαν δόξας. Photius, Contra Man. i. 11, calls him the Archbishop of Lycopolis (ὁ τε τῆς πόλεως Λύκων τοῦ ἀρχιερατικοῦ ἐγκειρισμένος νόμου). He must have flourished early in the fourth century, as he says (c. 2) that he derived his knowledge of Manes' doctrines ἀπὸ τῶν γνωρίμων τοῦ ἀνδρός. The treatise is divided into 26 chapters. The author begins by stating that the philosophy of the Christians is simple and practical; leaving abstruse questions of ethics and metaphysics to those sciences, it endeavours with success (ὡς ἐκ τῆς πείρας ἐστὶ μαθεῖν) to make the mass of mankind virtuous. Its reticence had led to many heresies, as clever wits tried to push their inquiries further, each wishing to surpass his predecessor; and one of the most outrageous of these leaders was Manes. He gives in cc. 2-4 a sketch of the Manichean system; and then follows an interesting chapter (c. 5) on the difficulty of arguing with persons who had no fixed principle of proof, but relied on unsupported assertions. The remainder of the book is devoted to an examination of the different Manichean tenets by the accepted principles of Greek philosophy, and he shows one by one how all their ideas are inexact and contradictory when analysed scientifically. The treatise is interesting, as a calm but vigorous protest of the trained scientific intellect against the vague dogmatism of the Oriental theosophies. In c. 5 he remarks that "these myths might well attract those who accept doctrines without examination, since they have even misled some who have studied philosophy with us." It has been much disputed whether he was a Christian when he wrote the book, or even became one afterwards (cf. Beausobre, Hist. de Manich. I. pp. 235-237; Fabric. Bibl. Graeca, VII. pp. 323, 324); but Photius' testimony seems to settle the latter point. The book itself is written from a distinctly ethnic point of view, but the author is evidently favourably disposed to Christianity (comp. c. 1, and his remarks in c. 24, on the plausibility of the orthodox view of the Crucifixion as contrasted with the Manichean explanation of it.) [E. B. C.]

ALEXANDER I., bishop of ROME, is stated by all the authorities to have been the successor of Evaristus. Eusebius in his History (iv. 4) makes him succeed in A.D. 109, in his Chronicle, A.D. 111 (f. 89). He assigns him in both works a reign of ten years. [G. H. M.]

ALEXANDER, a VALENTINIAN with whom Tertullian enters into controversy on the Incarnation (De Carne Chr. 16 f.). [VALENTINUS.] Tertullian implies that he made an ostentatious use of syllogisms, and quoted as an authority certain Psalms of Valentinus. It is impossible to say whether he is identical with "Alexander the old heretic," whom Jerome names as a commentator on the Epistle to the Galatians (Praef. ad Gal.). The writings of an Alexander of Libya and other unknown authors are said by Porphyry

* This comma seems necessary, as the entire treatise refutes the idea that the author could have ever himself been a Manichean. See Fabric. Bibl. Graec. (ed. Harles.) vii. p. 323.

(V. Plot. 16) to have been used by the Gnostics contemporary with Plotinus, but there is nothing to show whether they were in any sense Christian productions. [H.]

ALFWOLD, or AELFUULD, or OSWALD, king of Northumbria, who succeeded Ethelred in 779, was present at the Legatine Northumbrian Council of 787, and was slain 789 (Anglo-Sax. Chron., Flor. Wig., Sim. Dun.), is reckoned among martyrs with much the same right as King Aedwini. A church was built in honour of him at the place where he was slain, and where a miraculous light is said to have shown itself (Sim. Dun.), viz., at Scytleecester near the Wall. [A. W. H.]

ALHEARD (Ealheard, Alchardus, Algeheard, Ealgeheard), a bishop of Elmham, omitted in Florence's list, unless Hunferth the seventh bishop has been substituted for him. He was present at the legatine council of 786, and at that of Clovesho in 803, the decree of which he signed with four priests and two deacons. He attests several charters drawn up in councils or Witenagemots, from 788 to 805, and he is doubtless the person called Alchbertus in the charter of Winchelcomb, granted at the consecration of that abbey in 811. Alcuin's 217th letter is addressed to him and Tidfrith of Dunwich, of whom he had heard from Lull, one of the abbots of the diocese of Dunwich (Kemble, C. D. i. 185, 187, 190, 193, 204, 226, 233, 247; Spelman, Conc. i. 301, 325; Alcuini Opp. i. 270). [S.]

ALHUN (Aelhun, Alfhun, Aelfhun) the eighth bishop of Dunwich: became bishop about 790. He subscribed several charters of Offa between that year and 793. He died in 797 at Sudbury, and was buried at Dunwich (F. Wig. M. H. B. 618; Kemble C. D. i. 193, 199; Chron. Sax. ad 797). [S.]

ALLOGENES.—I. Revelations of "Allogenes," as of Zoroaster and others, are mentioned by Porphyry (V. Plot. 16) as appealed to by the Gnostics contemporary with Plotinus. But it seems probable that he mistook for the name of an author the plural title of the following book.

II. An apocryphal book or series of books bearing this name (Ἀλλογενεῖς) is said by Epiphanius to have been used by the Sethians (Haer. 286c), Archontici (292c, 297d), and apparently the sect whom he calls "Gnostici" (ib.; cf. 89 b); all three being Ophite sects. Under this name were intended Seth and his seven sons (cf. Baur, Chr. Gnos. 201). The word is common in the Greek Bible to denote a "stranger," specially an alien, an inhabitant of Judea not being of Jewish birth. [SETHIANI; OPHITES.] [H.]

ALOGIANS, or ALOGI (from ἀ privative and Λόγος, deniers of the Logos, or at least of the strongest witness for the Logos; not from ἄλογοι, unreasonable), a heretical sect of disputed existence, who must be located in the latter half of the second century (about 170). Epiphanius invented the term (Haeres. l. 1, adv. Alogos, cap. 3) to characterize their rejection of the Divine Word preached by John (ἐπεὶ οὐκ τὸν Λόγον οὐ δέχονται τὸν παρὰ Ἰωάννου κηρυγμένον, ἄλογοι κληθήσονται). He traces their origin to Theodotus of Byzantium (Haer. liv. c. 1). According to his representation they denied, in ardent opposition to the Gnosticism of Cerinthus on the one hand, and to the Montanists on the other, that Jesus Christ was the eternal Logos, as taught in John i. 1-14; and rejected the fourth Gospel and the Apocalypse as productions of Cerinthus.^a Heinichen supposes that the Alogi rejected only the Apocalypse, and not the fourth Gospel; but this is in direct opposition to the assertion of Epiphanius, who says (l. ch. 3) that if they had rejected the Apocalypse only, there might be some excuse in consideration of the obscurity of that book; but since they rejected all the writings of John, they showed clearly that they belonged to those Antichrists spoken of 1 John ii. 18. (Comp. Huer. l. iv. 1, where he likewise attributes to them the rejection of the Gospel as well as of the Apocalypse of John.) That they attributed these books to Cerinthus, the doctist and enemy of St. John, shows their utter want of critical judgment. They tried to refute the Gospel of St. John by the Synoptic Gospels, but with very poor arguments. In opposition to the Montanists, they also denied the continuance of the spiritual gifts in the Church. It is not clear from Epiphanius whether the Alogi rejected only St. John's doctrine of the Logos, or also the divinity of Christ in any form. He calls them in his violent way (l. cap. 3) ἀλλότριοι παντάπασιν τοῦ κηρύγματος τῆς ἀληθείας; and says of their heresy (Haer. liv. c. 1) that it denied the Gospel of John and the God-Word taught therein (τὸν ἐν αὐτῷ ἐν ἀρχῇ ὄντα θεὸν λόγον). Yet he clearly distinguishes them from the Ebionites; and their opposition to Cerinthus implies that they believed in the real humanity of Christ. Dorner (History of Christology, i. p. 503, Germ. ed.) thinks it probable that they allowed no distinctions in the Godhead, and thought that the divinity of the Father dwelt in the man Jesus. But this would identify them with the Patripassians. Lardner (Works, iv. 190; viii. 627) doubts the existence of this sect, in consideration of the absence of other data, and the well-known tendency of Epiphanius to multiply and exaggerate heresies. But his testimony is essentially sustained by Irenaeus, who mentions persons who rejected both the Gospel of St. John and the prophetic Spirit (simul et evangelium et propheticum repellunt Spiritum; Adv. Haer. iii. c. 11, § 9).

ALPHEIUS, or ALYPIUS, bishop of APAMEA in Syria Secunda, attended the Councils of Neocaesarea 315, Nicaea 325, and Antioch 341; and was one of the bishops by whom Eusebius of Caesarea was elected to the see of Antioch. ALRIC, son of Wihfred, king of Kent, left according to Bede, coheir with his brothers

^a This, it may be remarked, is an argument against the criticism of the Tübingen school, which would bring the composition of the Gospel of St. John down to the middle of the second century; for Cerinthus was a contemporary of the apostle. Had the Alogi had any idea of the recent origin of St. John, they would have made much account of it.

Ethelberht and Eadberht, in 725. His name is attached to the act of Withred in the Council of Bacanceld before the year 700. William of Mahnesbury gives him a reign of 34 years, which computed from the death of Eadberht, who reigned twenty three, and Ethelberht who reigned eleven, would bring down his death to 791. But this is highly improbable. Florence of Worcester, who confounds Eadberht with Eadberht Pren, makes no mention of Alric, who is also omitted by Henry of Huntingdon in his list of the kings of Kent. But the condition of Kent during the second half of the century is obscure; and it appears from the charters that not less than five persons bore the royal title during the period ascribed to Alric, who is not mentioned in charters at all. William of Malmesbury ascribes to Alric the defeat inflicted by Offa on the Kentish king at Otford in 774; arguing probably from his chronology, for the authorities do not name him. It is, however, just possible that he lost his power at that time, and that some at least of the contemporary kings were Mercian viceroys. [S.]

ALTO, an Irish missionary of illustrious family, who arrived in Bavaria about the year A.D. 743. He lived for some time as a hermit in a forest about midway between Augsburg and Munich. His fame reaching the ears of Pepin, that monarch granted him a part of the forest for the purpose of erecting a monastery and a church. Alto undertook the work, and with the aid of the people of the neighbourhood cleared the ground, and erected the church which was dedicated by St. Boniface. The monastery he built was called from him Alto-Munster, which was afterwards corrupted into Alt-Münster. His memory was revered on the 9th of February, the anniversary of his death, the exact date of which is unknown. (Lanigan's Eccl. History of Ireland, iii. 189.) [G. F. M.]

ALUBERT. (1) Consecrated to the bishopric of the EAST SAXONS (Chron. Dunelm. MS.), or of the Old Saxons, in 767. Simeon of Durham calls him Aluberht, and makes him bishop of the Old Saxons of Germany. If this is true, he was the last bishop consecrated in England for Germany, and identical with the missionary Alubert. [ALUBERT.] But the authority of the MS. which was used by Hoveden and others is better. He is there called Alberht, and made bishop of Essex; he thus corresponds with Eadberht, the ninth bishop of London in the ancient lists, and with an Aldberht who signs various charters between 775 and 785. As however there were contemporary bishops, Aldberht at Hereford and Eadberht at Leicester, he cannot be identified with certainty; but is most probably the bishop Eadberchus, who attests the proceedings of the legatine council in 787 (Sim. Dun. M. H. B. 663).

(2) The fifth bishop of the SOUTH SAXONS at Selsea. He is known only by the appearance of his name in the lists; his date must fall between 747, when his predecessor Sigga was at the council of Clovesho, and 765, when his successor Osa signs (Flor. Wig. M. H. B. 618.) [S.]

ALUBERT, an eminent Anglo-Saxon missionary, who went over from England and joined GREGORY, the pupil of St. Boniface, in the superintendence of his school at Utrecht. Perceiving his fitness for the episcopal office, Gregory persuaded him to return to England with two other pupils, Sigibodus and Lindger, and seek consecration. Alubert went, and during the year he spent in England enjoyed the society of the celebrated Alcuin, then superintending his famous school at York. Having received consecration he returned, and continued for some time to assist Gregory in training missionaries for labour amongst the Frisians, and ordaining them to that high office. See the life of St. Liudger, Pertz, Mon. Germ. ii. 407. [G. F. M.]

ALWIG (Aluic, Alwih, Alowiochus, Alwine, Alhuuig). The fifth bishop of the Lindisfari, or people of Lindsey; consecrated by Tatwine, archbishop of Canterbury, in 733. He subscribed several charters from 736-747; and in 747 attended the council of Clovesho. His death is placed by Simeon of Durham in 750 (Flor. Wig. M. H. B. 625; Cont. Bedae, M. H. B. 288; Kemble, C. D. i. 99, 109; Will. Malmesb. G. P. i.). [S.]

ALYPIUS, bishop of CAESAREA in Cappadocia, one of the metropolitans to whom the Emperor Leo wrote respecting the Council of Chalcedon and the death of Proterius (A.D. 458). His answer is extant (Labb. Conc. iv. 1904 sq., ed. Coleti). He is also mentioned as assenting to the deposition of Lampetius, a Messalian, whom he had ordained and who was convicted of immorality (Phot. Bibl. 52). [L.]

ALYPIUS. [ALPHEIUS.]

AMANDUS, a native of Herbayne, in Aquitania, and of noble parentage, was at an early period of his life dedicated to the monastic calling. About the year A.D. 630 he was, at the command of Clothaire, consecrated a missionary bishop, and selecting the neighbourhood of Ghent and Antwerp as the scene of his operations, commenced his exhortations to the Frisian tribes to forsake the worship of trees and groves and adopt the Christian faith. Not contented, however, with exhortation, he obtained a commission from Dagobert, authorising him, if necessary, to baptise the pagans by force, and to call in the aid of the Frankish soldiers in carrying out the work. Such expedients naturally excited violent hostility, and the wild Frisians resolutely strove to thwart all his efforts.

At length, in a wiser spirit, he devoted himself to winning the affection of the rude warriors by redeeming and educating numerous captives. Before long a striking incident rendered easy what the edict of Dagobert had only retarded. A thief, who had been already cruelly scourged, was led forth to be hanged upon a gibbet. Amandus implored the chief of the district to spare his life, and when this was denied, took the body down from the gallows and conveyed it to his cell. There the man revived, and his restoration being regarded as a miracle, a considerable number of the Frisians came forward, offered to receive baptism, and voluntarily destroyed their temples, which Amandus diligently converted into churches and monasteries.

After an unsuccessful effort to attempt a mission among the savage Slaves of the Danube, he was appointed about the year A.D. 646 to the episcopate of Mästricht, and there devoted himself with unceasing energy to the visitation of all parts of his diocese and the work of evangelising the surrounding tribes. He died about the year A.D. 679. (Mabillon, Acta Bened. Saec. ii. 681.) [G. F. M.]

AMBROSIASTER, or PSEUDO-AMBROSIUS, is the name generally employed to denote the unknown author of the Commentaria in xiii Epistolas beati Pauli formerly ascribed to St. Ambrose and usually printed along with his works. The commentary itself contains no definite indication of its authorship. An incidental remark, however, on 1 Tim. iii. 15: "Ecclesia . . . cujus hodie rector est Damasus" shows that it was written during the pontificate of Damasus (366-384). It has been suggested, indeed, that this clause, which is not necessary to the sense of the passage, may possibly be an interpolation; but it seems even more difficult to account for its having been inserted subsequently than for its introduction at first. Other marks, negative and positive, point to the same period. The text which the writer uses is not the Vulgate, but one of the forms of the Latin version prior to the revision of Jerome. The ecclesiastical authors to whom he refers—Tertullian, Cyprian, Victorinus—belong to an earlier date. Among the heresies which he mentions he applies himself more especially and expressly to the confutation of those which prevailed in the fourth century—e.g. the errors of Arius, Novatian, Photinus—while the absence of allusion to later forms of error leads us to suppose that these had not yet emerged. He speaks of the Marcionites as on the verge of extinction ("quamvis pene defecerint," in Ep. ad Timoth. I. iv. 1.) All these circumstances seem to show that the work may most fitly be assigned to the latter half of the fourth century; although, in that case, it is certainly somewhat surprising that Jerome in his treatise De Scriptoribus Ecclesiasticis should not mention any other Latin commentator on the Pauline Epistles than Victorinus.

It was the generally received opinion in the middle ages that this commentary was the work of Ambrose, the bishop of Milan; from the ninth century onward we find passages from it frequently quoted in his name, and in numerous instances the authorship is expressly assigned to him. But this belief, which Erasmus was among the first to call in question, is now universally admitted to rest on no sufficient grounds. Cassiodorus, no doubt, mentions a report that St. Ambrose had left an exposition of all the Epistles of St. Paul, but he states at the same time that he had been unable with all his diligence to find it (Inst. Div. Litt. c. 8: "Dicitur etiam et beatum Ambrosium subnotatum codicem epistolarum omnium sancti Pauli reliquisse, suavissima expositione completum; quem tamen adhuc invenire non potui, sed diligenti cura perquiro.") At any rate the very marked difference in style between this commentary and the acknowledged writings of St. Ambrose is of itself sufficient to show that it is not the work of the bishop of Milan. Moreover, the views expressed by the commentator are in various points inconsistent with the known opinions of Ambrose; and even where they occupy common ground in the defence of catholic truth against Arian objections, it is remarked that their methods and arguments materially differ. It would appear also that the author of the commentary had little or no knowledge of Greek (at least he speaks as if dependent on others for information as to the readings of the Greek codices, in Ep. ad Rom. v. 14, "Ac si in Graeco non ita cautum dicitur; sic enim dicitur scriptum, xii. 11: tempori servientes. In Graeco dicitur habere sic: Deo servientes; quod nec loco ipsi competit"); whereas St. Ambrose was well acquainted with that language, and drew much of his theology from the Greek Fathers.

But, while there is a general consent among modern scholars in pronouncing the mediæval opinion to be unfounded, there is no such consent as to the probable author. Many conjectures have been hazarded on the subject. Some have regarded the work as wholly a compilation, the materials of which have been derived chiefly from Chrysostom and Jerome; but, as the Benedictine editors have observed, this view is not borne out by the facts of the case. While the commentary, as it has come down to us, presents many passages that seem to have been derived from these and similar sources (and the extant MSS., as well as quotations, exhibit its contents with considerable variety and discrepancy), its exegesis contains much that is independent and peculiar; and the amount of apparent agreement—where it is greater than might otherwise be expected in traversing the same ground—is explained by the circumstance that the work has been subjected in the course of its transmission to numerous and extensive interpolations. The hypothesis which ascribes it to Remigius is set aside by the fact that the portions of the commentary extant in his name are quite different from this one. From certain expressions which appear favourable to Pelagianism the work has been assigned by some to Julian of Aclanum; but, as Richard Simon has naïvely remarked, "if the writer does not always appear orthodox to those who profess to follow the doctrine of St. Augustine, it must be taken into account that he wrote before that Father had published his opinions." The expressions in question were probably employed without reference to the Pelagian controversy, and previous to its emergence, so that it is unreasonable to construe them as embodying the definite doctrinal positions of a later epoch; and, besides, they are accompanied by others which are entirely incompatible with the supposition of a Pelagian authorship (e.g. the statement in Ep. ad Rom. v. 12, "Manifestum est in Adam omnes peccasse quasi in massa"). More recently Tycho-nius, author of the Liber de septem regulis, has been suggested as the author, but without much probability.

The only positive statement as to the authorship is contained in the following passage of Augustine, Contra duas epistolas Pelagianorum, lib. iv. c. 7: "Nam et sic sanctus Hilarius intellexit quod scriptum est, in quo omnes peccaverunt: ait enim, 'In quo, id est, in Adam omnes peccaverunt.' Deinde addidit: 'Manifestum in Adam omnes peccasse quasi in massa; ipse enim per peccatum corruptus, quos genuit, omnes nati sunt sub peccato.' Haec scribens Hilarius sine ambiguitate commonuit, quomodo intelligendum esset, in quo omnes peccaverunt." As the words cited are found in this commentary, it may be reasonably assumed that the statement applies to it, and that Augustine reckoned Hilarius its author. But who was Hilarius? Of the persons of that name elsewhere mentioned by Augustine several, such as Hilarius of Syracuse to whom he writes in 414 (Ep. clvi.), Hilarius the bishop to whom he writes in 416 (Ep. clxxviii.), Hilarius apparently a layman whom he addresses de reliquiis Pelagianae haereseos (Ep. ccxxvi.), as well as Hilary of Arles, flourished considerably later than the time of Damasus; while Hilary of Poitiers on the other hand died almost immediately after Damasus' accession, and at any rate the diversity of style and of matter precludes the supposition of the work having proceeded from his pen. The only person otherwise known, to whom it can be assigned, is Hilarius the Sardinian, deacon of the Roman Church, who was sent by Pope Liberius in 354 (along with Lucifer of Cagliari and Pancratius) to the emperor Constantius after the Synod of Arles with a view to obtain the assembling of a fresh council and a reconsideration of the sentence on Athanasius, but, after suffering at this time stripes and banishment in the cause of orthodoxy, subsequently embraced the party of Lucifer and, on account of the zeal with which he urged the rebaptizing of converts from heresy, is sarcastically termed by Jerome "Deucalion orbis" (Dial. adv. Luciferianos, ed. Murtianay IV. ii. p. 305). By the greater number of modern scholars, accordingly, Hilary the deacon has been without scruple accepted as the author of the work, and it is frequently quoted in his name. But Petavius and others have urged with considerable force as objections to this view, (1) that Augustine was not likely to apply the epithet sanctus to one whom he must have known to be guilty of schism; (2), that the deacon Hilary was not likely to own allegiance to Damasus; and (3) that the language of the commentary, which strongly censures those who insist on rebaptism as derogating from the honour of the Saviour (in 1 Cor. i. 12.), is inconsistent with the fundamental principle of the Luciferian schism—the necessity of renewed baptism for heretics. To the latter objection it is replied that the Luciferians insisted on the rebaptism not of heretics in general so much as of the Arians in particular, who by their peculiar views as to the Trinity emptied the baptismal formula of its proper meaning. The two former objections are usually met by the suggestion that Hilary may have repented of his schism and become reconciled with the Church; but of this there is no evidence, and the language of Jerome (l. c.) seems to indicate the contrary. These difficulties as to Hilary the deacon have led the Benedictine editors to suggest as possibly the author Hilarius, bishop of Pavia, distinguished by his piety and zeal against the Arians (Ughelli, Ital. sac. tom. ii. part 2, p. 6); but this is, confessedly, a mere conjecture.

There can be little doubt that, whoever was the author of the work, it no longer retains its original form. The well-meaning zeal of copyists appears to have freely inserted comments from various sources, such as Augustine, Chrysostom, and Jerome; and in not a few passages there are literal coincidences with the language of the commentary which is printed at the end of the works of Jerome and is usually ascribed to Pelagius, so that the one work has evidently been supplemented from the other. These circumstances sufficiently account for the various forms of the text in MSS., and for the discrepancies and inequalities of treatment which are apparent in several parts.

There is, moreover, a marked affinity between this commentary and certain portions of the Quaestiones Veteris et Novi Testamenti usually printed with the works of St. Augustine. The similarity of ideas and, in various cases, identity of language can only be explained by supposing either that they have had a common author, or that the writer of the one work has borrowed largely from the other. The note of time in the Quaestiones—300 years after the destruction of Jerusalem—and some references to contemporary events suit the period of Damasus, and have induced many to ascribe this work also to Hilary the deacon. But the authorship of this, as of the other, remains uncertain. As the matter which is common to the two generally appears in the Quaestiones under a more amplified and diffuse form, it seems probable that the composition of the Quaestiones was subsequent to that of the commentary.

The commentary on the Pauline Epistles, notwithstanding its inequalities of treatment, is of great value, and is well characterized by Sixtus Senensis as "brief in words, but weighty in matter." Its expositions are generally concise and clear; and, although the writer is frequently carried away by his zeal into controversial discussion or exhortation, he seldom loses sight of the text from which he started, and speedily returns to the proper work of exegesis. In consequence of his use of the old Latin version and frequent reference to various readings his work affords important materials for the criticism of the text.

The commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews, which accompanies the others in some editions, but is omitted by the Benedictine editors, is now generally admitted to have no claim to such a place. It is a compilation from various Patristic sources, principally from Chrysostom.

The work of the Ambrosiaster is usually inserted in the editions of the works of Ambrose. [AMBROSIUS.] The commentary was also issued separately at Cologne in 1530 and 1532. [W. P. D.]

AMBROSIUS (Ἀμβρόσιος). (1) of ALEXANDRIA, a deacon according to Jerome (de Vir. Ill. 56), the disciple and friend of Origen, died c. 250.

It is not certain whether Ambrose was a Christian by birth; but he was of a noble and wealthy family (Orig. Exhort. ad Murt. 14, f; 49; Hieron l. c.), and probably occupied some office under the imperial government (Epiph. Haer. 64, 3: comp. Orig. l. c. c. 36). Endowed with an active and critical mind he at first neglected the simple teaching of the Gospel for the more philosophical systems of heresy (Orig. in Johann. Tom. v.). Some say that he attached himself to the Valentinians (Euseb. H. E. vi. 18), others to the Marcionites (Epiph. l. c.), others that he passed from the one sect to the other (Suidas, s. v.). However, when he met Origen he recognized his true teacher, and embraced the orthodox faith (Epiph. l. c.). From that time to his death Ambrose devoted his whole energy to encouraging his great master in his labours on Holy Scripture, and used his fortune to further them (Euseb. H. E. vi. 23). Origen in a fragment of a letter has drawn a striking picture of his devotion (Ep. l. Suidas s. v. Ὀριγένους. Jerome, however, refers the words to Ambrose of Origen, Ep. 43, 1): "He left no leisure, he writes, for meals or rest. Of the space from dawn to the ninth or tenth hour I say nothing. All students give that time to the investigation of the Divine oracles and reading." Thus we owe generally, it is said (Hieron. l. c.; Schol. ad Comm. in Johann. T. v.) nearly all the exegetic works of Origen to Ambrose's influence; and especially the commentary on St. John (in Johann. T. ii., init.). It was at his request, too, that Origen composed his greatest work, the answer to Celsus (In Cels. Praef.); and to him and Tatiana (perhaps his sister) he addressed the beautiful treatise on Prayer. In the persecution of Maximinus I., 236, his friendship for Origen, who had withdrawn to Cappadocia, exposed him in company with Protoctetus, a presbyter of Caesarea, to severe sufferings (Euseb. H. E. vi. 28), and Origen expressed his sympathy with the two confessors, who seem to have been taken into confinement to "Germany" (Orig. Echort. ad Mart. 41; Comp. Tillemont, Mémoires iii. 119), in his Ehortation to Martyrdom, which is made up almost entirely of passages of Holy Scripture with brief applications to their special position. "We the poor," he writes, with strange pathos, "must yield in the glory of such a trial to those who sacrifice glory, property, and love of children" (c. 15), for Ambrose was married, and had a family (Orig. Ep. ad Afric. s. f.). Of the later details of Ambrose's life little is known. After the death of Maximinus, 238, he was at Nicomedia (Orig. Ep. ad Afric. s. f.) with his wife (Marcella) and children, and Origen met him there. He is mentioned again in the dedication and close of the answer to Celsus, c. 249, and this is the last notice which remains of him. He died before Origen (Hieron. l. c.) and therefore he cannot have lived more than one or two years longer. The reproach which Jerome makes (l. c.) that he neglected to leave any provision for Origen is probably unjust. It is at least as likely that Origen was unwilling to receive anything. Ambrose left no writings of his own except some letters, but it is evident that he exercised a powerful influence upon Origen, who called him his "taskmaster," ἐργοδιώκτης (In Johann. T. v.), and it may have been through his zeal in "collation" (Orig. Ep. l.) that Origen undertook his critical labours. The one charge justly brought against him is a proof of mistaken devotion: he indiscreetly permitted the publication of some treatises of Origen which were unrevised and intended only for his own use (Hieron. Ep. 84, 10).

(2) "A chief man of Greece," and a "senator," "who became a Christian," and, according to the title of the Syriac translation, wrote the "Address to the Greeks" (Ἀδύρος πρὸς Ἑλληνας), which is published with the works of Justin Martyr (Cureton, Spicil. Syr. pp. xi. 61). There is no other trace of this tradition, nor is there the least ground for identifying him with Ambrose of Alexandria. [B. F. W.]

AMBROSIUS, bishop of MEDIOLANUM, from A.D. 374 to A.D. 397.

The chief materials for a life of St. Ambrose are to be found in his own works, which consist in great part of sermons, expository and special, and include an important collection of letters. Another source of information which promises to be of first-rate authority and value disappoints the reader's just expectations. This is a Life by Paulinus, his notarius or secretary, who had been with him at his death, and who wrote this work at the suggestion of St. Augustine. Paulinus begins by laying down the rules of the most modern historical criticism, declaring that he will relate nothing but what he has seen or heard himself, or what has been communicated to him by those who spoke from their own personal knowledge, amongst whom he names Ambrose's sister Marcellina; but the Life proves to be full of prodigies, and adds hardly anything to what we learn from the works. The letters have been reduced to a chronological order with great industry and care by the Benedictine editors of St. Ambrose's works, who have also digested the various particulars supplied by himself into a useful biography of their author.

Ambrose was the son of a father who bore the same name. The father was a Roman of the highest rank, and at the time of St. Ambrose's birth he was Praefect of the Galliae, a province which included Britain and Spain, and constituted one of the four great Praetorian prefectures of the empire. It is not known in which of the principal cities of this province the Praefect was residing when his son Ambrose was born; it may have been at Arles or Trèves or Lyons. The only datum for determining the year of Ambrose's birth is a passage in one of his letters, in which, writing to Severus, a bishop of Southern Italy, he happens to mention that he is fifty-three years old, and at the same time contrasts the quiet of Campania with the commotions by which he was himself surrounded. Nos autem, he says, objecti barbaricis motibus et bellorum procellis, in medio versamur omnium molestiarum freto (Ep. lix. 3). There are two periods to which this description would apply. In A.D. 387 Maximus, who had usurped the imperial authority in Britain, and after causing the Emperor Gratian to be assassinated had exercised that authority in the Gallic provinces for some years, invaded Italy and occupied Milan. A few years later a similar usurpation took place, followed by a similar invasion. Arbogastes, a count of the empire but a barbarian by birth, having killed Valentinian II., raised an obscure Roman named Eugenius to the imperial dignity, and in the year 393 the two crossed the Alps and entered Milan. On this occasion Ambrose left the city, and was absent for some time. In the following year, writing to Theodosius, he speaks of that emperor having rescued the Roman empire a barbari latronis immanitate et ab usurpatoris indigni solio (Ep. lxi. 1). This period would appear to agree rather better than the former with the passage in the letter to Severus. If we assume that Ambrose was fifty-three years old in A.D. 393, we shall place his birth in A.D. 340. On the other hand it might be thought desirable to make Ambrose an older man by seven years, especially as in letters ascribed to the year 389, when he would be forty-nine according to the one estimate and fifty-six according to the other, he speaks of himself as if he were an old man (Epp. 47, 48). This argument, however, has not weight enough to counterbalance the greater probability of the interpretation preferred above. The year 340 was the third after the death of Constantine, and Constans was the sovereign then acknowledged by the western part of the empire.

Paulinus begins his Life by relating how, when Ambrose was lying in his cradle, a swarm of bees came to his open mouth and flew in and out, as a prophecy of his future eloquence. The next incident he records is another prophecy, from his account of which a note of time has been extracted by the vigilance of the Benedictine editors. Afterwards, he says, when Ambrose was a youth and was living at Rome with his mother, now a widow, and his sister who was already a professed virgin, seeing his female relatives kiss the hands of priests, he offered them his hand to kiss, saying that he should one day be a bishop. In one of his books (De Virginitate, lib. iii. c. 1, 1), Ambrose happens to mention that Marcellina his sister had received the veil from the hands of Liberius Bishop of Rome on a Christmas-day. Liberius was made bishop in the middle of the year 352. It could not therefore be before the Christmas of that year that Marcellina became a professed virgin. In 353 Ambrose would either be thirteen or twenty years of age; and it cannot be doubted that a boy of thirteen would be more likely than a young man of twenty to do what Paulinus relates. If therefore Paulinus is here quite accurate, the later date for Ambrose's birth is strongly confirmed. Ambrose is said to have afterwards reminded his sister with a smile of this his boyish prophecy, an incident very likely to have been told by Marcellina to Paulinus.

After receiving a liberal education at Rome, Ambrose devoted himself to the profession of the law, which was then the usual path to the highest civil offices (see Gibbon, ch. xvii.). He practised at the court of the Prætorian Prefect of Italy, and so commended himself to Probus the prefect that he first advanced him in his court, and then gave him the appointment of "consular" magistrate of the provinces of Liguria and Aemilia. There is again a prevision of the bishop in Ambrose's history; Probus, in dismissing him to his post, gave him the parting advice, Vade, age non ut iudex, sed ut episcopus (Paulinus, 8).

It does not appear from our authorities how long this civil appointment was held by Ambrose. But it is certain that he made an admirable magistrate, and became known to the people of Milan, where he held his court, as a high-minded and conscientious and religious man. Whilst he was discharging his office, there happened the death of Auxentius, whom the Arian party had succeeded in foisting into the see of Milan. The Catholic party had now grown stronger, and a vehement strife arose with regard to the appointment of a successor to Auxentius. The consular came down to the church to keep the peace between the contending parties, and was addressing the people in his character as a civil magistrate, when a cry was heard, "Ambrose for bishop!" The voice was said afterwards to have been that of a child. Whose ever cry it may have been, in a moment it struck the whole multitude that here was a solution in which both parties might acquiesce without the sense of defeat. By the Catholics Ambrose was no doubt well-known as an orthodox believer; but the Arians also had respected him as a just and impartial man, and he had probably taken no active part in the great controversy of the age. The Catholics might reasonably hope that he would make a sound and good bishop; the Arians might think themselves better off with this layman than they had feared to be. His high rank went for something with all (see the letter of St. Basil written to Ambrose on his appointment as bishop, Ep. lv.). So there rose a unanimous shout, "We will have Ambrose for bishop!" It was a singular choice, even for those rougher and more tumultuous times, for Ambrose was not yet so much as baptized. But he was an earnest Christian in his belief, and had only been kept from seeking baptism by a religious awe, of which there were then many examples. He who had shrunk from being baptized naturally shrank from being made bishop. With undoubted sincerity, Ambrose made all the resistance he could to this popular nomination.

If we could implicitly trust Paulinus, Ambrose used curious means to repel the honour thrust upon him. He mounted a loftier tribunal, and "contrary to his custom he caused torture to be applied to persons on their trial." But the people were not deceived, and cried "Your sin be upon us." Then he went home and desired to "profess philosophy," but was diverted from this purpose. Then he caused publicæ mulieres to be publicly brought into his house, that this scandal might shock the people. But it was of no avail; they cried the more, "Your sin be upon us!" Then he resolved to escape by flight, and left Milan in the middle of the night to go to Ticinum; but he was again baffled, by finding himself in the morning after a long journey at another—the Roman—gate of Milan. Then the Milanese people took him into friendly custody, and sent a letter to the Emperor Valentinian to ask his judgment upon their election.

Whether these stories be literally true or not (and Paulinus's Life, as has been said, is full of prodigies), Ambrose himself frequently refers to the reluctance with which he had yielded to the call which made him a bishop. He was, he says, rajtus a tribunalius ad sacerdotium (De Officiis, i. 4.) What Paulinus next relates is probable enough. Whilst the messenger was gone to Valentinian, Ambrose again fled, and hid himself in the house of a friend named Leontius. When the answer of Valentinian was received, expressing his entire satisfaction with the people's choice, the vicarius or vice-prefect issued a notice calling upon any who knew where Ambrose was to give information. Leontius then gave up his friend, and Ambrose yielded. He was baptized, passed summarily through the intermediate ecclesiastical stages, and on the eighth day was consecrated Bishop of Milan. This was in the year 374 (a year after the death of Athanasius, and before the death of Valentinian I.), Ambrose being thirty-four years of age.

The vox populi was never more thoroughly justified. The consular magistrate was exactly fitted to become a great bishop. In any age he would have shone as a bishop, but that age was at least as favourable to the development of his episcopal qualities as any other could have been. The prophetic appreciation of the Milanese Christians was echoed, after a thorough experience, by the Emperor Theodosius in the saying,^b "I have known no bishop, except Ambrose." The foundation of his excellence was laid in a singular and unsullied purity of character; he had a natural love of teaching and governing, warm sympathies, eminent practical abilities, an undaunted courage stimulated by the ambition of martyrdom, and a religious spirit so devout and eager that the only faults with which he can be charged may be attributed to an excess of episcopal zeal. In the see of Milan Ambrose had found precisely his place, and he laboured indefatigably in the work of a bishop for twenty-three years until his death.

One of his first cares after his ordination was to divest himself of the charge of private property. As a member of a wealthy family he appears to have possessed both money and lands. What he did not give away to the poor or the Church or reserve as an income for his sister, he placed entirely under the management of a dearly loved brother named Satyrus. He was thus free to devote his whole energies to the work of his calling. His writings enable us to follow him in both his ordinary and his extraordinary occupations. He was wont to "celebrate the sacrifice" every day (Ep. xx. 15). Every Lord's-day he preached in the Basilica. His extant works consist mainly of addresses and expositions which had been first spoken in the church and were afterwards revised for publication. They bear traces of this mode of composition, in their simplicity and naturalness, and also in their popular character and undigested form. Ambrose had to begin, as he ingeniously declares, to learn and to teach at the same time (Discendum igitur mihi simul et docendum est, quoniam non vacavit ante discere. De Officiis, lib. i. cap. i. 4). He studied in order to teach, and he taught with a constant eye to edification. One would say that he was always thinking how he could give the best instruction to the flock committed to his charge, from the emperor to the lowest of the people, so as to train them in soundness of faith and purity of life. His intellect was quick and unresting, fertile in illustration, in apophthegms, in replies. He had a reputation for eloquence; but his cloquence was that of readiness and earnestness, rather than of flowing and imaginative utterance. He was also consulted as an authority in theology; but he has no pretensions to genius either as a theologian or as a writer. In doctrine he followed reverently what was of best repute in the Church in his time, carefully guarding his own and his people's orthodoxy from all heresy, and urging, but with wholesome if not always consistent qualifications, the ascetic religious perfection which the best Christians were then pursuing. The sacred books, for which he had a profound reverence, were to him,—what pastoral and didactic theology has always tended to make them,—verbal materials for edification, which was to be extracted from them by any and every kind of interpretation to which their letter could be subjected. His writings, therefore, or sermons, are chiefly of interest with reference to the history and character of their author; but they are lively and ingenious, full of good practical advice, and interspersed with gnomic sentences of much felicity.

One of the secrets of Ambrose's influence over the people was his admission of them into all his interests and cares. He had nothing private from the congregation in the Basilica. The sister Marcellina, and the brothers Satyrus and Ambrose (this was the order of their ages), were united together by a remarkable affection. The three loved one another too devotedly to think of marrying. Marcellina became early a consecrated virgin, but continued to feel the keenest and tenderest concern in her brothers' lives. When Ambrose became a bishop, Satyrus appears to have given up an important appointment in order to come and live with his brother, and take every secular care off his hands. These domestic virtues of Marcellina and Satyrus we learn from sermons of Ambrose. As soon as he became a bishop, he began to preach upon the excellence of virginity. His discourses on this subject became famous, and attracted virgins from distant parts to receive consecration at his hands. These discourses, in the third year after his ordination, he digested into three books, De Virginitibus, which were addressed in their new form to his sister, and which contain, besides much praise of Marcellina, the address made to her at her consecration by the Bishop of Rome. A year or two later occurred the death of Satyrus, in the flower of his age. In the depth of his grief Ambrose pronounced a funeral discourse upon his brother (De Excessu Satyri), in which he made his hearers partners of his domestic sorrow, and laid bare to them without reserve the inner life of this exemplary family. The sermon preached over the body of Satyrus was followed up seven days after by another upon the hope of a future life (De Fide Resurrectionis).

The relations of St. Ambrose with the sovereigns who ruled over Italy during his episcopate are the best-known feature of his life. The Bishop of Milan, exercising the authority of a patriarchate, and presiding over a city which was frequently the residence of the emperor, was a great dignitary. But we cannot fail to recognize the high reputation which Ambrose had won for himself personally, and in a surprisingly short period, when we observe the deference paid to him by the emperors of his time. He was certainly fortunate in the sovereigns with whom he had to do. The youths Gratian and Valentinian II., and the great Theodosius, were singularly virtuous and religious princes. From such persons Ambrose was likely to receive the honour which he deserved. Gratian was a boy of sixteen when the death of his father placed him on the throne, and in the year 377, the third of Ambrose's episcopate, he was two years older. In that year he was preparing to go to the assistance of his uncle Valens against the barbarian invaders by whom he was hard pressed; and desiring to be fortified against the arguments of the Arians whom Valens was favouring at Constantinople, he wrote to Ambrose, and asked him to furnish him with a controversial treatise in support of the orthodox faith. Ambrose, premising in accordance with his real disposition that he would rather exhort than dispute, complied with the pious youth's request by writing two books De Fide. In the following year Gratian wrote a letter, preserved with those of Ambrose, in which he requests another copy of that work, together with an additional argument upon the divinity of the Holy Spirit. In this letter he calls Ambrose parens. In the answer of Ambrose, which is the first of his extant letters, he begs that he may defer writing on the subject^e proposed to him. In the mean time he amplified his former treatise by adding three more books to the two he had already composed. This work De Fide was reckoned an important defence of the orthodox faith.

^b Once when Theodosius, at a celebration of the Eucharist, after bringing his offering to the altar, had remained within the rails of the sanctuary, Ambrose sent him word that that was the place for the clergy only, and Theodosius retired. Not long after, in the Basilica at Constantinople, he was invited by the officiating bishop to enter the same sacred enclosure; and he then observed, Episcopum, excepto Ambrosio, novi neminem.—(Theoloret. i. 18.)

The successes of the Goths which attended the defeat and death of Valens were the occasion of frightful calamities to the empire, and serve to bring out by a striking example the humanity of St. Ambrose. From Illyricum and Thrace, especially, an immense number of captives were carried off by the barbarians, and were exposed to sale by their captors. In ransoming these prisoners the whole available resources of the Church were exhausted by Ambrose; and when everything else had been taken, he did not scruple to break up and sell the sacramental vessels. He himself relates this fact with pride (De Off., lib. ii. 136). It was not that he did not hold these vessels to be sacred; his sacramental views were very high. But he held human beings to be more sacred. "If the blood of Christ redeemed their souls, should not the vessels which hold that blood be used to redeem their bodies?" (Ibid. 138). The act thus justified gives us a measure by which we may infer how deeply St. Ambrose was penetrated by that comprehensive and truly episcopal spirit of humanity, which afterwards shone so splendidly in the other great Archbishop of Milan, S. Carlo Borromeo.

We now begin to see Ambrose taking a zealous part in the general affairs of the Church, and acting by universal consent as the leading ecclesiastic of his time. In the document which summoned the Council of Aquileia in the year 381, he is described by Gratian as et vitæ merito et Dei dignatione conspicuus (Gesta Concilii Aquileiensis, inserted amongst Ambrose's letters after Ep. viii.). He presides in that Council, and questions the two Arianizing prelates who were put on their trial before it. Several letters addressed to the emperor at this time in the name of the Council of Aquileia or of the Italian episcopate on the general government of the Church, are preserved amongst Ambrose's letters (Epp. ix.—xii.). When Acholius died—the Bishop of Thessalonica by whom Theodosius had been baptized—his death was formally announced to Ambrose by the clergy and people of his diocese; and we have two letters in reply, one written to the Church, the other to Anysius the new bishop. The next two letters of the collection (xvii. xviii.) are addressed to the Emperor Valentinian, after the death of Gratian, to exhort him not to comply with a request of Symmachus. This eminent man, who was prefect of the city, had made an appeal to the boy-emperor in the name of the Senate, that he would replace the altar of Victory in the Senate house, and restore the funds for certain heathen ceremonies. Ambrose, whose influence was invoked by the Bishop of Rome, protested strongly against any such concessions to paganism; and Victory, as it was said, favoured in the result her enemy more than her champion.

The struggle between Ambrose and Justina, the mother of Valentinian II., which afterwards reached such a height at Milan, had been begun with a preliminary trial of strength about the appointment of a bishop at Sirmium. But when the usurpation of Maximus occurred (A.D. 383), and had been staid by the violent death of Gratian, Justina in her alarm had recourse to the great Catholic bishop, and persuaded him to go on an embassy to Maximus, to beg him to leave Italy untouched. Maximus had Theodosius to deal with behind the boy-emperor and his mother; and his first act, when Gaul had fallen into his hands, was to send to Theodosius and propose to him, instead of war, the partition of the empire. Theodosius was constrained by motives of policy to assent to the proposal; and Ambrose had the comfort of returning to Milan with the announcement that the new emperor would refrain from passing the boundary of the Alps. Allusions are made to this embassy in a letter of Ambrose (Ep. xxiv. 7), in which he reports the less successful issue of a later appeal to Maximus.

It has been one of the chief glories of Ambrose in the Church that St. Augustine ascribed to him his conversion, and sought Christian baptism at his hands. The circumstances of his intercourse with St. Ambrose (A.D. 383–387) are related by St. Augustine himself in his Confessions [AUGUSTINUS]. He tells us of the singularly eminent position of St. Ambrose (vi. 3), of his reputation for eloquence (v. 13), of the difficulty of getting an opportunity of conversing with him on account of his many engagements, and his habit of reading to himself when company was present (vi. 3), and of his method of expounding the Old Testament by finding under the letter a spiritual or mystical sense (vi. 4). As we pass from the one of these divines to the other, we cannot help wondering that the teaching of Ambrose should have been convincing and satisfying to Augustine; and we are inclined to attribute more to the previous internal history of the illustrious disciple, and to the Christian earnestness of the noble-minded pastor, than to the reasonings of the preacher's sermons. These sermons, with their profuse and arbitrary interpretations and their constant practical applications, seem more suited to interest and edify the staunch believer than to lead the doubter in his inquiries.

It was during this period, in the years 385–6, that Ambrose defended the churches of Milan so stoutly against the intrusion of Arian worship. Justina, who patronized the languishing Arian party, was bent on obtaining one of the churches at Milan for the use of her friends. Ambrose was not likely to make the concession. How in this matter he resisted the violent efforts of Justina, and the authority of her son (at this time 15 years of age), is described at length by Ambrose himself in letters to his sister Marcellina and to Valentinian, and in a sermon preached at the crisis of the struggle (Epp. xx. xxi., and the Sermo de Basilicis Tradendis which follows them.) There appear to have been two churches at Milan, the one without, the other within, the walls. The former, as of less importance, was first asked for. This being refused, some persons of the court came to Ambrose, and begged him to concede—probably for partial use only—the newer and larger basilica, and to exert his influence to prevent any popular disturbance. For it is important to observe that throughout the struggle the people were on the Catholic side. Ambrose replied loftily that the temple of God could not be surrendered by His priest. The next day, which was Sunday, as Ambrose was officiating in the principal basilica, news came that police-agents had been sent from the palace, who were hanging on the Portian basilica the curtains^d which marked a building as claimed for the imperial treasury. A part of the multitude hastened thither; Ambrose remained to perform mass. Then he heard that the people had seized on a certain Arian presbyter, whom they met on the way. Ambrose began to pray with bitter tears that the cause of the Church might not be stained with blood; and sent presbyters and deacons, who succeeded in rescuing the prisoner unhurt. Justina, in her irritation, treated the rich men of the city as responsible for a tumult, and threw many of them into prison. The imperial authority was being dangerously strained. Politic officials came to Ambrose and entreated him to give way to the sovereign rights of the Emperor; Ambrose replied that the Emperor had no rights over what belonged to God. A body of troops were sent to take possession of the Basilica, and there was great fear of blood being shed; but after mutual appeals between their officers and Ambrose, the soldiers withdrew, and Ambrose remained all day in the church. At night he went home, and on coming out the next morning he found that the church (the Portian) was surrounded by soldiers. But the soldiers were in awe of Ambrose, and, learning that he had threatened them with excommunication, they began to crowd in, protesting that they came to pray and not to fight. Ambrose took the lesson for the day as the subject of a sermon, and whilst he was preaching he was told that the imperial curtains were taken down. The Emperor was worsted by the Bishop, and was naturally angry. He sent a secretary to reproach Ambrose, and ask if he meant to make himself a tyrant. Soldiers continued to surround the church, and Ambrose remained there singing psalms with the faithful. The next day the soldiers were withdrawn, and the merchants who had been imprisoned were released. The struggle was over; but Ambrose heard that the Emperor had said bitterly to the soldiers, "If Ambrose orders you, you will give me up in chains." He records another saying, which drew from him a retort of characteristic felicity.

^d This is the interpretation given by Godefridus to the vela mentioned by Ambrose (Epp. xx. 4). Gibbon says, "the splendid canopy and hangings of the royal seat were arranged in a customary manner;" thus he adorns the two words "vela suspendentur." But it appears from the narrative that whilst Ambrose was inside the church, he was informed that the hangings were being taken down,—evidently on the outside.

The court chamberlain sent him a message: "Whilst I am alive, shall you despise Valentinian? I will take off your head." Ambrose answered: "May God grant you to fulfil what you threaten; for then my fate will be that of a bishop, your act will be that of a eunuch."

In the course of the following year the attempts of the Arian party, and of the Emperor as at this time governed by that party, were renewed. Ambrose was asked to hold a discussion with Auxentius, an Arian bishop, before chosen judges in the presence of the Court, or else to withdraw from Milan. He consulted such bishops and presbyters as were within reach, and in their name wrote a letter to the Emperor (Ep. xxi.), declining the discussion. An alarm was spread amongst the people that he was going to be taken away from Milan, and for some days, by night and by day, he was surrounded and watched by an immense concourse of his friends. He preached them a sermon (De Basilicis Tradendis), assuring them of his steadfastness, and encouraging them to confidence, and at the same time gave them hymns composed by himself to sing—hymns in honour of the Trinity—by which their fervour was greatly stimulated. Again the Court party found themselves worsted, and they appear to have given way without provoking a crisis.

The singing of hymns, by which this remarkable occupation of the Basilica was characterized, is described by St. Augustine as extremely moving (Confess. vi. 7), and is said by him to have been an imitation of Eastern customs, and to have been followed generally throughout the Church. Paulinus also observes that at this time "antiphons, hymns, and vigils, began to be performed in the Church of Milan, and had spread thence amongst all the Churches of the West (Vita, 13)." What was the precise mode of singing thus introduced is not known. But the reputation of St. Ambrose as a composer of hymns was such that many hymns certainly not his have been attributed to him, and amongst them the Te Deum. The Benedictine Edition gives twelve hymns, which there is some good authority for ascribing to Ambrose, the best known of which are those beginning Aeternae rerum conditor, Deus creator omnium, Veni, redemptor gentium, and O lux beata Trinitas. They have a brightness and felicity which have reasonably made them favourites in the Church from their author's day to the present.

We ought to take into account the state of mind to which the bishop and his flock must have been wrought up together by that protracted vigil in the basilica, when we read of the miracles into which their triumph over heresy blazed forth at last. We have a narrative from St. Ambrose's own pen, in a letter to Marcellina (Ep. xxii.), of the wonderful discovery of the remains of two martyrs, and of the cures wrought by them. A basilica was to be dedicated, and Ambrose was longing to find some relics of martyrs. A presage suddenly struck him. (This "presagium" is called a vision by St. Augustine, Conf. ix. 7, De Civ. Dei, xxii. 8). He caused the ground to be opened in the church that was consecrated by the remains of St. Felix and St. Nabor. Two bodies were found, of wonderful size (at prisca aetas ferebat), the heads severed from the shoulders, the tomb stained with blood. This discovery, so precious to a Church "barren of martyrs," was welcomed with the wildest enthusiasm. Old men began to remember that they had heard formerly the names of these martyrs—Gervasius and Protasius—and had read the title on their grave. Miracles crowded thick upon one another. They were mostly cures of demoniacs, and of sickly persons; but one blind man received his sight. It is nothing that Paulinus reports this miracle; for he relates many more wonderful things, for which we have no other authority but his. But Ambrose himself, for once, eagerly and positively affirms the reality of the cure; and Augustine, who generally held that the age of miracles was past, also bears witness to the common acceptance of the fact at Milan. Gibbon has some excuse for his note, "I should recommend this miracle to our divines, if it did not prove the worship of relics, as well as the Nicene Creed." The Arians, as we learn from Ambrose and Paulinus, made light of the healing of demoniacs, and were sceptical about the blind man's history. The martyrs' bones were carried into the "Ambrosian" basilica (now the Church of S. Ambrogio), and deposited beneath the altar in a place which Ambrose had designed for his own remains.

The memory of this conflict did not restrain Justina and her son from asking help shortly after of Ambrose. It was evident that Maximus was preparing to invade Italy; and as Ambrose had apparently been successful in his former embassy, he was charged with another conciliatory appeal to the same ruler. The magnanimous bishop consented to go, but he was unfavourably received, and having given great offence by abstaining from communion with the bishops who were about Maximus, he was summarily ordered to return home. He reports the failure of his mission in a letter to Valentinian (Ep. xxiv.) It is worthy of remark that the punishment of heresy by death was so hateful to Ambrose that he declined communion with bishops who had been accomplices in it (qui aliquos, devios licet a fide, ad necem petebant, Ibid. 12). These bishops had prevailed on Maximus to put to death Priscillian—the first time that heresy was so punished. [PRISCILLIANUS.]

Maximus was not diverted from his project. He crossed the Alps, and Justina, with her son, fled to Theodosius. It was not long before the vigour and ability of Theodosius triumphed over Maximus, who perished in the conflict he had provoked. Ambrose, who withdrew from Milan when Maximus came to occupy it, appears to have been near Theodosius in the hour of victory, and used his influence with him in favour of moderation and clemency, which the Emperor, according to his usual habit, displayed in an eminent degree (Ep. xl. 32). But we have now to mention an instance in which Ambrose unhappily prevailed upon Theodosius to abandon a course which his stricter sense of his duty as a ruler had prompted him to take. In some obscure place in the East, the Christians had been guilty of outrages, from which it had often been their lot to suffer. With the support of their bishop, they had demolished a Jewish synagogue and a meeting-house of certain Gnostic heretics. Theodosius, hearing of this violence, had ordered that the bishop should rebuild the synagogue at his own expense, and that the rioters, who were chiefly monks, should be punished at the discretion of the local governor. This order naturally affronted the party spirit of the Christians. Ambrose could not bear that his fellow-believers should be thus humiliated. He wrote a letter to the Emperor (who was at Milan, Ambrose being for the moment at Aquileia), entreating him most earnestly to revoke the order. With much that Ambrose says we can sympathize; but he lays down a principle fruitful in disastrous issues: Cedit oportet censura (the functions of the civil ruler) devotioni (Ep. xl. 11). Shortly after, he had the opportunity of preaching before the Emperor at Milan. In a letter to his sister he gives the sermon at length, with its conclusion, addressed directly to the Emperor, and begging of him the pardon of those who had been caught in a sin. When he came down from the pulpit, Theodosius said to him, De nobis proposuisti. "Only with a view to your advantage," replied Ambrose. "In truth," continued the Emperor, "the order that the bishop should rebuild the synagogue was too hard. But that is amended. The monks commit many crimes." Then he remained silent for a while. At last Ambrose said, "Enable me to offer the sacrifice for thee with a clear conscience." The Emperor sat down and nodded, but Ambrose would not be satisfied without extracting a solemn engagement that no further proceedings should be taken in the matter. After this he went up to the altar: "but I should not have gone," adds Ambrose, "unless he had given me his full promise" (Ep. xlii. 28).

About two years later (A.D. 390), the lamentable massacre at Thessalonica gave occasion for a very grand act of spiritual discipline. The commander of the garrison at Thessalonica and several of his officers had been brutally murdered by a mob in that city. The indignation of the Emperor was extreme; and after appearing to yield to gentler counsels, he sent orders, which were executed by an indiscriminate slaughter of at least 7000 persons in Thessalonica. This frightful vengeance shocked the humanity of the Christians in general, and Ambrose felt bound to protest against it in the name of God and of the Church. He had always acted on the principle that "nothing was more dangerous before God or base amongst men than for a priest not to speak out his convictions freely," and his lofty disinterestedness (non pro meis commodis faciebam, Ep. lvii. 4) gave him great power over a religious and magnanimous mind like that of Theodosius. Ambrose now wrote him a letter (Ep. li.), which Gibbon most unjustly calls "a miserable rhapsody on a noble subject," but which most readers will feel to be worthy of its high purpose. With many protestations of respect and sympathy, Ambrose urges his Emperor to a genuine repentance for the dreadful deed to which in an access of passion he had given his sanction. He intimates that he could not celebrate the Eucharist in the presence of one so stained with blood. Historians have not failed to make the most of this striking act of discipline. Gibbon in particular represents the behaviour of Ambrose as marked by a prelatical pomposity, of which there is no trace whatever in the only documents on which we can rely. In his own letter the bishop is most considerate and tender, though evidently resolute. He and Paulinus record simply that the Emperor performed public penance, stripping himself of his royal insignia, and praying for pardon with groans and tears; and that he never passed a day afterwards without grieving for his error (Paulinus 24; Amb. De Ob. Theod. 34). Theodoret (v. 18) adds that the Emperor refrained from coming to church for eight months, that then on Christmas Day he sought to enter the church, but that Ambrose met him, reproved him sternly, and would not allow him to be present at the Eucharist until he had done penance openly, and had further promised to make a law enacting that no criminal should be put to death till 30 days after the sentence: but no dependence is to be placed on Theodoret's accuracy. Those who have become impressed by the profound and affectionate respect which each of these noble-minded men felt for the other, will be disposed to believe as to this matter what they learn from Ambrose himself, and not much more.

In the course of the following year (391), Theodosius having returned to the East, the weak authority of Valentinian II. was overthrown by Arbogastes and his puppet Eugenius, and the unfortunate youth perished by the same fate as his brother. He was in Gaul at the time of his death, and Ambrose was at that moment crossing the Alps to visit him there, partly by the desire of the Italian magistrates, who wished Valentinian to return to Italy, and partly at the request of the Emperor himself, who was anxious to be baptized by him. In the next year (392), a funeral oration was delivered at Milan by Ambrose (De Obitu Valentiniani), in which he praises the piety as well as the many virtues of the departed. It appears that under the influence of Theodosius, Valentinian had learnt to regard Ambrose with the same reverence as his brother had done before him (Letter to Theodosius, Ep. liii. 2). He had died unbaptized; but Ambrose assures his sorrowing sisters that his desire was equivalent to the act of baptism, and that he had been washed in his piety as the martyrs in their blood (De Ob. Val. 51-53).

Eugenius held the sovereign power in the West for two or three years, and made friendly overtures to the great Italian prelate. But Ambrose for a time returned no answer; and when Eugenius came to Milan, he retired from that city. Shortly after this withdrawal, he wrote a respectful letter to Eugenius, explaining that the reason why he had refused to hold intercourse with him was that he had given permission, though himself a Christian, that the altar of Victory should be restored—the boon which Symmachus had begged for in vain being yielded to the power of Arbogastes.

When the military genius and vigour of Theodosius had gained one more brilliant triumph by the rapid overthrow of Arbogastes and Eugenius, Ambrose, who had returned^e to Milan (August,

A.D. 394), received there a letter from Theodosius requesting him to offer a public thanksgiving for his victory. Ambrose replies (Ep. lxi.) with enthusiastic congratulations. But the happiness thus secured did not last long. In the following year the great Theodosius died at Milan (January, A.D. 395), asking for Ambrose with his last breath (De Obitu Theod. 35). The bishop had the satisfaction of paying a cordial tribute to his memory in the funeral oration he delivered over his remains.

Ambrose himself had only two more years to live. The time was filled with busy labours of exposition, correspondence, and episcopal government; and according to Paulinus, with various prodigies. Unhappily this biographer spoils with his childish miracles what is still a touching account of the good bishop's death. It became known that his strength was failing, and the Count Stilicho, saying that the death of such a man threatened death to Italy itself, induced a number of the chief men of the city to go to him, and entreat him to pray to God that his life might be spared. Ambrose replied, "I have not so lived amongst you, that I should be ashamed to live; and I do not fear to die, because we have a good Lord."^f As he lay on his death-bed, some of his deacons were speaking together in whispers about his successor, and mentioned the name of Simplicianus; to their distress, they found the bishop had overheard them, for he said three times, "An old man, but a good man." For some hours before his death, he lay with his hands crossed, praying; as Paulinus could see by the movement of his lips, though he heard no voice. When the last moment was at hand, Honoratus, the Bishop of Verceilæ, who was lying down in another room, thought he heard himself thrice called, and came to Ambrose, and offered him the Body of the Lord; immediately after receiving which, he breathed his last breath;—a man, Paulinus says well, who for the fear of God had never feared to speak the truth to kings or any powers. He died on Good Friday night, 4th-5th April, 397, and was buried in the Ambrosian basilica, in the presence of an innumerable multitude of every rank and age; many Jews and Pagans joining with his flock to pay the last honours to the fearless and large-hearted bishop.

By the weight of his character St. Ambrose gave a powerful support to the tendencies which he favoured. But his influence upon opinion is not conspicuous except in one point—the growing exaltation of ecclesiastical over secular authority. He held without misgivings that the Church was the organ of God in the world, and that secular government had the choice of being either hostile or subservient to the Divine authority ruling in the Church. To passages already quoted which express this conviction may be added a remark let fall by Ambrose at the Council of Aquileia, "Sacerdotes de laicis judicare debent, non laici de sacerdotibus."^g—Gesta Conc. Aqu. 51. He was of strict Athanasian orthodoxy as against heresy of every colour.

^e During his absence, as Paulinus relates, St. Ambrose raised a little boy to life. Paulinus gives all the details. The child's name was Pansophius, his father an eminent Christian at Florence, named Decens. Ambrose first cured the child of an unclean spirit, and when he died a few days after, imitating exactly the proceedings of Elisha with the child of the Shunammite widow, raised him to life again. To this Pansophius he afterwards addressed a book of instruction. "He has not mentioned the fact in his writings, but by what feeling the omission was prompted it is not for me," says Paulinus, "to judge."—Life, § 28

^f St. Augustine went to express his peculiar admiration of this saying, with its elimata ac liberiora verba.—Possidius, Vit. Aug. c. xxvii.

His views of the work of Christ, in the Incarnation, the Passion, and the Resurrection, have in a marked degree the broad and universal character which belongs to the higher patristic theology on this subject. (For example, speaking of the resurrection of Christ, he says, "Resurrexit in eo mundus, resurrexit in eo coelum, resurrexit in eo terra," De Fide Res. 102.) With regard to religion and religious practices, he is emphatic in insisting that the worship of the heart is all-important (Deo enim velle pro facto est, De Fide Res. 115; Deus non sanguine sed pietate placatur, ibid. 98; non pecuniam Deus sed fidem quaerit, De Poen. ii. ix.); but at the same time his language concerning the two Sacraments is often undeniably that of materializing theology. Attempts have been made, chiefly on this account, to call in question the Ambrosian authorship of the treatises De Mysteriis and De Sacramentis; but their expressions are supported by others to be found in undoubted works of Ambrose. He praises his brother Satyrus for having tied a portion of the consecrated elements in a napkin round his neck when he was shipwrecked, and adds, that having found the benefit of "the heavenly mystery" in this form, he was eager to receive it into his mouth—"quam majus putabat fustum in viscera, quod tantum sibi tectum orario profuisset!"—De Exc. Sat. 43, 46. He argues for the daily reception of the Eucharist from the prayer, Give us this day our daily bread.—De Sacr. v. 25.

The strong commendations of virginity which are to be found throughout his works, but especially in several small treatises on this subject, are based, not on a theory of self-denial, but rather on one of detachment from the cares of the world and the troubles inseparable from matrimony and parentage. According to him, marriage is the more painful state, as well as the less favourable to spiritual devotion. Nevertheless, he did not expect or desire a large number to embrace the life which he so highly enlorged. "Dicit aliquis: Ergo dissuade nuptias? ego vero suadeo, et eos damno qui dissuadere consuerunt . . . Paucarum quippe hoc munus (virginity) est, illud omnium."—De Virginitate, I. vii. He and his sister used to press Satyrus to marry, but Satyrus put it off through family affection—"ne a fratribus divelleretur."—De Exc. Sat. §§ 53, 59. Fasting is commended, not as self-torture pleasing to God, but as the means of making the body more wholesome and stronger. A keen sense of the restraints and temptations and annoyances which reside in the flesh is expressed in Ambrose's remarkable language concerning death. It is a great point with him that death is altogether to be desired. He argues this point very fully in the address De Fide Resurrectionis, and in the essay De Bono Mortis. There are three kinds of death, he says, the death of sin, death to sin, and the death of the body (De B. M. § 3). This last is the emancipation of the soul from the body. He appeals to the arguments of philosophers and to the analogies of nature, as well as to Scripture, to show not only that such a deliverance may be hoped for, but that it must be a thing to be desired by all. The terrors of the future state almost entirely disappear. He admits now and then that punishment must be looked for by the wicked; but he affirms that even to the wicked death is a gain. "Non quia amara sit mors, sed quia impio amara; et tamen admirari vita quam mors. Gravius est enim ad peccatum vivere, quam in peccato mori: quia impius quandiu vivit peccatum auget; si moriatur, peccare desinit."—De Bono Mortis, § 28. There are two reasons why the foolish fear death: one, because they regard it as destruction; "altera, quod poenas reformident, poetarum scilicet fabulis terribi, latratu Cerberi, et Cocyti fluminis tristem voraginem, &c. &c. Haec plena sunt fabularum, nec tamen negaverim poenas esse post mortem."—Ibid. 33. "Qui infideles sunt, descendunt in infernum viventes; etsi nobiscum videntur vivere, sed in inferno sunt."—Ibid. 56.

The see of Milan was in no way dependent upon that of Rome; but Ambrose always delighted to pay respect to the Bishop of Rome, as representing more than any other the unity of the Church. His feeling towards Rome is expressed in the apology with which he defends the custom of washing the feet in baptism—a custom which prevailed at Milan but not at Rome. "In omnibus cupio sequi Ecclesiam Romanam; sed tamen et nos homines sensum habemus; ideo quod alibi rectius servatur, et nos rectius custodimus. Ipsum sequimur apostolum Petrum, . . . qui sacerdos fuit Ecclesiae Romanae."—De Sacramentis, III. §§ 5, 6.

As a writer, St. Ambrose left a multitude of works behind him, the general character of which has already been described. They show competent learning, a familiar acquaintance with Plato, Cicero, Virgil, and other classics, and much intellectual liveliness and industry. Their want of originality did not hinder him from obtaining for their author, through their popular and practical qualities, a distinguished reputation as a sound and edifying teacher. He is often mentioned with respect by his contemporaries, St. Jerome and St. Augustine (see especially the latter, De Doctrina Christiana, iv. 46, 48, 50). He came to be joined with them and Gregory the Great as one of the Four Latin Doctors of the Church. His writings may be classified under three heads, as (1) Expository, (2) Doctrinal or didactic, and (3) Occasional.

(1). The first class contains a long list of expositions, delivered first as sermons, of many books of Scripture. They begin with the Hexameron, or commentary on the Creation. Of this work St. Jerome says, Nuper S. Ambrosius sic Hexameron illius [Origenis] compilavit, ut magis Hippolyti sententias Basilique sequeretur (Ep. 41). It is in great part a literal translation from St. Basil. St. Augustine, as we have seen, was interested by the method of interpretation in which Ambrose followed Basil, Origen, and Philo Judaeus—the method of finding a spiritual or mystical meaning latent under the natural or historical. But the modern reader, who soon wearies of this method in Philo or Origen, is not likely to enjoy it in Ambrose. The Hexameron (6 books) is followed by De Paradiso, De Cain et Abel (2), De Noe et Arca, De Abraham (2), De Isaac et Anima, De Bono Mortis, De Fuga Saeculi, De Jacob et Beata Vita (2), De Joseph Patriarcha, De Benedictivus Patriarcharum, De Eliä et Jejunio, De Nabutha Jezraelita, De Tobia, De Interpellatione Job et Davit (4), Apologia Prophetæ David, Apologia altera Prophetæ David, Enarrationes in Psalmos (12), Expositio in Psalium cxxviii, Expositio Evangelii secundum Lucam (10).

(2). The second class contains De Officiis Ministrorum (3 books), De Virginitate (3), De Viduis, De Virginitate, Exhortatio Virginitatis, De Lapsu Virginis Consecratae, De Mysterioris, De Sacramentis (6), De Poenitentia (2), De Fide (5), De Spiritu Sancto (3), De Incarnationis Dominicae Sacramento. Of these the books De Officiis, addressed to the clergy (imitated from Cicero), and those De Fide, mentioned above, are the most important.

(3). The occasional writings, which are biographically the most valuable, are the discourses De Excessu Fratris sui Satyri (2), De Obitu Valentiniani Consolatio, De Obitu Theodosii Oratio, and the Epistles, 91 in number, with the Gesta Concilii Aquileiensis inserted amongst them.

Various ecclesiastical writings have been attributed to Ambrose, which critical examination has determined to be spurious. [AMBROSIASTER.] Most of these are given in the Benedictine edition; in that of Migne there is an additional appendix, containing some other compositions which have borne Ambrose's name, but are either manifestly spurious, or have no sufficient title to be considered genuine. Some of his genuine works appear to have been lost, especially one mentioned with high praise by St. Augustine (Ep. xxxi. 8) as written against those who alleged that our Lord had learnt from Plato.

Of the connexion of St. Ambrose with the liturgical arrangement which bears his name, we know nothing more than what has been quoted above from Paulinus. [See Dict. of Chr. Ant., art. LITURGIES; comp. AMBROSIAN MUSIC.]

There are three principal editions of Ambrose's works, that of Erasmus, the Roman, and the Benedictine. The first of these was preceded by some earlier tentative publications, between A.D. 1474 and 1506, the most considerable being that of Amerbach (Basle) in 1492. Erasmus's edition was also published at Basle, by Froben, in 1527. He divided the works into 4 tomes, with the titles, 1. Ethica, 2. Polemica, 3. Orationes, Epistolae, et Conciones, 4. Explanations Vet. et Novi Testamenti. This edition was followed by that of Costerius (published by Episcopius, at Basle), and that of Gillot (Merlin, Paris). The great Roman edition was the work of many years' labour, undertaken by the desire of Popes Pius IV. and Pius V., and begun by a monk who afterwards became Pope with the name of Sixtus V. It was published in 5 vols. at Rome, in the years 1580, 1, 2, 5. This edition superseded all others, until the publication of the excellent work of the Benedictines (du Frische and le Nourry) at Paris, A.D. 1686 and 1690. A small revised edition of the De Officiis and the Hexameron has been printed in the Bibliotheca Pat. Eccl. Latin. Selecta (Tauchnitz, Leipzig).

An elaborate life of St. Ambrose by Baronius, extracted from his Annales, is prefixed to the Roman edition. But this is improved upon by the more critical investigations of the Benedictine editors, who have laid the basis for all subsequent lives. [J. LI. D.]

AMBROSIUS AUTPERTUS. [AUTPERTUS.]

AMEN (Hippol. Haer. v. 26) [JUSTINUS, Gnostic]: (Iren. 67, 81) [MARCUS, Gnost.]. [H.]

AMETRITAE, the name given by 'Prædestinatus' (l. 77) to a "sect" who according to Philastrius (Haer. 115) followed various philosophers in believing that "there are infinite and innumerable worlds," appealing to apocryphal books of (? heathen) prophets. See Oehler's notes. [H.]

AMMIANUS MARCELLINUS. I. Authorities; II. Life; III. Works and style; IV. Character and relation to Christianity; V. Editions, &c.

I. Authorities.—The materials for the life of this historian are almost entirely supplied by himself. Of the epistles of Libanius, about 20 are addressed to persons bearing the names of Ammianus or Marcellinus, or mentioning one or other of them. Of these, all, except the first, of those addressed to Ammianus (nos. 215 (?), 230, 1090, 1150, 1151, 1152, 1543, ed. Wolf.), though of very slight importance may be conjectured to belong to our subject, as one addressed to Marcellinus (no. 983) certainly is; and another to Apollinarius and Gemellus, which mentions Ammianus (no. 234 Ἀμμιάνας ὁ καλός, cf. no. 1151), probably refers to him. Two laws in the Theodosian code of the same year 383 begin, one "Ad Ammianum Com. Rer. Priv." (C. Th. xi. 30, § 41), the other "Have Marcelline karissime nobis" (Id. ix. 27, § 5). Godefroy supposes the latter to be the historian. On the relation of Ammianus and Solinus, which has been variously regarded, the last edition of Solinus by Professor Mommsen (Berlin, 1864) may be consulted. The most striking parallels are Amm. xxii. 15 and 16, Sol. 32, 9-end and 34, 1, on Egypt; and Amm. xxiii. 6, § 85–88, Sol. 52, 23–28, on Pearls. Mommsen concludes that neither borrowed from the other, but both, as well as Apuleius, from a lost epitome of Pliny and Mela, with amplifications added by its unknown compiler. Hence no argument can be deduced as to their dates. Priscian quotes both (De viii Partit. Orat.), hence we conclude that they were read in the schools of his time (Prisc., lib. ix. Marcellinus rerum gestarum quarto decimo; tanquam licentia crudelitati indulta). The Marcellinus who wrote the life of Thucydides and the Illyrian Marcellinus mentioned by Suidas, are the first probably, the second certainly, different persons.

II. Life.—Ammianus Marcellinus was a Greek of Antioch (as is gathered from Lib. Ep. 983), and of a good family (ingenuus, xix. 8, § 6). In the early part of his life he must have received a good education, but we know nothing of him further till as a young man of perhaps 20 years he was attached to the General Ursicinus by the order of Constantius. He was with him in A.D. 353 at Nisibis and Antioch (xiv. 9, § 1), where the cruelty of Gallus had caused a sedition, and in the next year at Milan (xiv. 11, § 5). In 355 he had become one of the imperial body guard (protector domesticus), and followed Ursicinus on the hazardous expedition to supersede Silvanus in Gaul (xv. 5, § 21, 22). In 357 they were summoned to Constantius at Sirmium, and despatched to the East (xvi. 10, § 21). When Ursicinus was recalled in 359, superseded, and suddenly ordered back again, Ammianus was still with him (xviii. 4, § 7, 6, § 5), and returned to Amida through Nisibis, where he nearly lost his life in saving that of a boy. He was then detached on a mission to the satrap of Corduene, and had an opportunity of observing the whole barbarian force from a height (xviii. 6, § 20). He was present at the disgraceful rout near Amida, and was one of those who were shut up in the town. He describes with great vigour the siege and pestilence, and his own escape just after the capture to Antioch (xix. 1-8). We lose sight of him now at the disgrace of Ursicinus, till the time of Julian's invasion of Persia in 363, in which and in the retreat under Jovian he took part (xxiv., xxv., pass.). After the division of the empire in 364 he would seem to have remained in the East, perhaps in his native town, where his friend Libanius had taken up his permanent abode: at any rate he was present there in 371 at the punishment of the conspiracy of Theodorus under Valens (xxix. 1, § 24), and shared in the general terror so fatal to literature in the East, inasmuch as all books having the least suspicion of a relation to magic were destroyed by their owners for fear of delation (id. 2, § 4).

We do not know at what time he settled in Rome, nor whether he had any office there, as the identification of him with the "count of the private estate" is conjectural. One of the epistles of Libanius (no. 1150) addressed to Ammianus would make him governor of Syria Euphratensis, according to Sievers (Leben des Libanius, p. 272, app. 113), but this would be before his settlement in Rome. The rest are requests for favours, generally in behalf of his own pupils, or thanks for the same. From the same writer's letter to Marcellinus cited above (no. 983) we learn that he composed his history in the capital, and gave public recitations of it book by book with great applause. We know neither the date of his birth nor death. He was "adolescens" in 357 (xvi. 10, § 21, prob. under 28 years of age according to Isidore's definition), and mentions no event later than the consulship of Neoterius in 390 (xxvi. 5, § 14), while he speaks of the Serapeum as still standing (xxii. 16, § 12), which was destroyed in 391. From a mention of the famine which took place in 383 (xiv. 6, § 19) we are able to fix the composition or publication of books xiv.-xxii. between the years 383-391. The letter of Libanius (no. 983), written in 390 or 391, speaks of the work as still in progress, and this must refer to books xxiii.-xxxi., of which the date is uncertain, though it is probable that they were finished not many years later.

III. Works and style.—The histories of which we possess the most important part are the only works of this author that we know. They are in Latin, and were intended as a continuation of Tacitus from the reign of Nerva to the death of Valens, but the first 13 books are unfortunately lost. The 18 which remain contain the history of 25 years, 353-378, from the 17th year of Constantius. Though the narrative of the earlier books must have been on a much more contracted scale, we have cause to regret their loss, especially as the preface would doubtless have told us more of the author and of his general ideas of history; and an account of Constantine from his pen would have been only second in value to that of Julian. Those that remain, though not a complete record of events, are invaluable as the narratives of a man who was both an eye-witness and an actor in much that he relates, and a person of great cultivation. He claims to have striven throughout to tell the truth (xxxi. ad fin.), and his account of Julian and his satirical description of Roman manners (so well known from Gibbon, chap. xxxi.) prove that he was deterred neither by admiration nor desire of praise. No Latin historian except Tacitus puts us so much on the level of the age in which he wrote, and Ammianus, though less personally interesting and less of a politician than Tacitus, is perhaps on that account a more faithful narrator. His style is that of the period, and is clearer than that of the Theodosian code, less exaggerated than that of the panegyrists. The fact that he looked to immediate recitation may be counted a source of gain as well as of loss. He is inflated and redundant in expression, harsh in construction, full of Grecisms and quotations from Greek authors (almost always expressed in Latin), as well as of verbal parallels, allusions to and quotations from Cicero, Virgil, Livy, Tacitus, etc. His use of "hae volucres" (xviii. 3, § 1; cf. Varro, R. R. iii. 16, meum erat eas novisse volucres) for bees is a striking instance of this habit. His knowledge of ancient history was considerable, and references occur not unfrequently, understood or expressed, to Herodotus and Thucydides, from the latter of whom he borrows a good deal (see Vales. on xxi. 16, § 12). His obligations to Pliny have already been mentioned: that he owes much to A. Gellius may also be noticed. The badness of his style does not, however, often produce obscurity, as soon as the reader is used to it, though many difficulties arise from the corruption of the text; nor are the references to other authors, the digressions, &c., altogether tedious. His epigrams are sometimes fortunate, as that one on the eunuch Eusebins "apud quem si vere dici debeat multum Constantius potuit" (xviii. 4, § 3); and generally there is no lack of liveliness or interest in the narrative. The reader must, however, be on his guard, as in the case of other writers of this period, against the tendency to exaggerate and to use vague rather than precise language, which must be counteracted in Ammianus as far as possible by the comparison of one passage with another.

IV. Character and relations to Christianity.—Ammianus is one of those ambiguous characters which are not uncommon on the battle-ground between an old and a new belief. We should be glad to think that both he and Claudian were Christians, but we are not able to do so. Speaking pretty constantly, and without any apparent reserve, about religious and theological questions, he would have made it plain if he had been a Christian. He seems to have been a respectable and respected man, living a happy and moral life in a time of much social misery and corruption, with a mind apt for details, and strongly imbued with the detached thoughts and feelings of the past, judging the external actions of his contemporaries according to a high moral standard, without comprehending the principles working in the age itself. His account of Julian shows both his merits and his defects. It is truthful and interesting in a high degree, but the author does not seem to have realised the critical importance of his subject in the religious history of the world. Libanius understood it better. The fact also that Ammianus chose Rome for his residence is significant, as it was the seat of hereditary non-philosophic but cultivated heathenism, and of a more tolerant Christianity. The poet Claudian was there in 388 (Fl. Dexter. Chronol. sub anno) and later: the historian Victor, who was probably an old acquaintance of Ammianus (xxi. 10, § 6), was prefect of the city under Theodosius. Of the other heathen prefects he mentions the elder Symmachus (prefect in 364, xxvii. 3, § 3), Praetextatus (pref. in 367, xxii. 7, § 6; xxvii. 9, § 8; see Macrobius, Saturn.) and Olybrius (pref. in 368, xxviii. 1, § 8, 4, § 1) with great commendation. Of the Christian prefects Hypatius, brother of the Empress Eusebia, seems to have been his friend (xxix. 2, § 9, 16, &c.; cf. Greg. Naz., Ep. 96, ed. Caillaud). He does not speak of Gracculus, the predecessor of Hypatius in 378, who destroyed the Mithraeum, it would seem at the instigation of Damasus (Jerome, Ep. 107, vol. i. p. 678), nor of the younger Symmachus, the eloquent defender of paganism (pref. in 384). The direct mention which he makes of religious matters, heathen or Christian, coincides generally with our estimate of his character, as a practical man of literary tastes and common sense, without any strong religious convictions. The little that he seems to accept is on the authority of learned men, and is of a vague nature, such as the identification of Mercury with the soul of the world (velocior sensus, xvi. 5, 5; cf. xxv. 4, § 14), the assignment of a genius to each individual, for which various texts are quoted (xxi. 14, § 2), and the operations of Nemesis, to whom he gives the attributes of Fortune (xiv. 11, § 25; xxii. 3, § 10). He seems to have been a believer in an indefinite theism, under which he included, according to popular notions, a number of subordinate spirits (substantiales potestates, xxi. 1, § 8, cf. the first passage about Nemesis), by means of which he seeks to explain and to justify the arts of divination, which in other places he notes as open to criticism. He is content to accept auguries and oracles, and the interpretation of dreams as existing arts, supported by the authority of ancient names, and consistent with the benevolence of the divinity or the deserts of mankind, and no more to be despised because of misuse or failure than music or grammar. Hence he is not sparing in relating portents, such as appear in Livy or Tacitus, and though he condemns the recklessness of the prosecutions for magic, which were so frequent under Valens, he acknowledges in some cases the reality of the crime. The account already referred to of the trial of the conspirators at the beginning of Book xxix. is most interesting. He generally speaks of Christianity with respect, sometimes in order to criticise the inferiority of those who professed it to their faith. He says of Constantius "that he tainted the plainness and simplicity of the Christian religion by the admixture of anile superstition," and goes on to complain of the number of synods, the tumult of bishops hurrying to and fro, and the burden on the public service (xxi. 16, § 18). He speaks of George of Cappadocia as "forgetful of his profession, which counsels nothing but what is just and gentle, and turning aside to the atrocities of a delator" (xxii. 11, § 5), and a little further (ib., § 10), he defines martyrs as those "who, being urged by force to deviate from their religion, have borne torture and punishment, and passed with unsullied faith to a glorious death." He takes occasion, on describing the struggle of Damasus and Ursinus, to contrast the pomp and luxury of the bishops of Rome with the poverty and humility of some provincial prelates, which "commend them as pure and reverend to the everlasting deity and his true worshippers" (xxvii. 3, § 12-15). While he recounts with seeming approval Julian's experience that no wild beasts are so fatal to men as most Christian sects are to one another (xxii. 5, § 4), he twice condemns in strong terms his law that Christian professors should not teach grammar or rhetoric (xxii. 10, § 7; xxv. 4, § 19), and he does not at all seem to have shared his predilection for the Jews (xxii. 5, § 5). The following references also may be consulted as bearing on the history of Christianity. Liberius and Athanasius (xv. 7, § 6-10), nuns near Amida (xviii. 10, § 4), Christians accused of burning the Temple of Apollo at Antioch (xxii. 13, § 2), Christian priests used as ambassadors (xxix. 5, § 15; xxxi. 12, § 8).

V. Editions, &c.—The editio princeps was issued at Rome 1478, die 7 Junii, per Georg. Sachel et Barth. Golsch, and edited by A. Sabinius. It is faithfully printed from a very faulty MS., and contains only Books xiv.—xxvi. In 1533 appeared two critical editions, Accursius', with the last five books (Aug. Vindob. Otmar in May) and Gelenius' (Froben, Basel, in June), with all but the last book and the last page in Book xxx. Since then the most important have been, by Lindembrog, with notes (Hamb. 1609, 4); Henri Valois (Paris, Camusat, 1636, 4), the chief authority, in which the excerpts quoted as Anon. Valesii were first added; re-edited by his brother Adrian (Par. Dezallier, 1681, f.); Jac. Gronovius, cum notis varr. (Lug. Bat. 1693, f.); G. A. Ernesti, a text with glossary (Leipzig, 1773, 8); and the most complete by J. A. Wagner and C. G. A. Erfurdt (Leipzig, 1808, iii. 8), but wanting a revision of the text. A new edition of the text—which was much wanted—has been edited by Eysenhardt, 1871. A new commentary is also to be desired. The appendix B B in Sievers' Leben des Libanios (Berlin, 1868, 8) may be consulted further with respect to the relations of Ammianus with him. [J. W.]

AMMON. (1) Bishop of ADRIANOPLE, in Thrace, was a Egyptian by birth. He attended the synod held at Constantinople A.D. 394 to settle the rival claims of Agapius and Bagadius to the see of Bostra (Labbe, Concil. ii. 1151), and was again at Constantinople with Antoninus of Ephesus and other Asiatic prelates in Sept. 399. He was a warm friend of Chrysostom (Pallad. Dial. de Chrys. Vita).

(2) Bishop of LAODICEA κακαμένη, in Pisidia, who early in A.D. 404, took part in the council by which Chrysostom was deposed. He joined Leontius and his party in urging the application of the Antiochene canon, which deprived a deposed bishop returning without the authority of a synod, and, with Acacius of Beroea, demanded of the vacillating emperor that it should be put in force against Chrysostom (Pallad. p. 78; Soer. H. E. vi. 28).

(3) Bishop of PELUSIUM, an enemy of Chrysostom, charged by Palladius with having employed threats and bribes with the soldiers who were conducting Chrysostom's friends, Palladius, Demetrius, &c. into exile, to secure their maltreatment (Pallad. p. 200). Isidore of Pelusium, however, though a friend of Chrysostom, styles him ὁ αἰδοῖμος καὶ θέλει σοφίας ἐμπλεως. [E. V.]

AMMON (or AMON), Saint, the founder of the celebrated settlement of coenobites and hermits on and near Mons Nitria (Ruff. de Mon. 30); he is often styled the "father of Egyptian monasticism." He was contemporary with St. Antony, and filled the same place in Lower Egypt as Antony in the Thebaid. Being left an orphan by his parents, wealthy people near Alexandria, he was forced by his uncle to marry. But on the wedding-day he persuaded his bride to take a vow of celibacy, and for eighteen years they lived together as brother and sister: afterwards with her consent he withdrew to Nitria, and from that time only visited his wife twice a year (Pall. Hist. Laus. 8). A great multitude of zealous disciples soon gathered round him; so that Palladius not many years later found about five thousand monks, some living quite alone, some with one or more companions; while six hundred "advanced in holiness" (τρελείοι) dwelt apart from the rest in more complete isolation (Pall. 8). Several miracles are related of Ammon as of many other solitaries; and St. Antony, who died shortly after him, is said to have seen the soul of his aged brother in asceticism borne to heaven by angels (Soer. Hist. iv. 23; Soz. Hist. l. 14; Niceph. Hist. viii. 41). [I. G. S.]

AMMONIUS, a presbyter, said by 'Prædestinatus' to have written against the Eunomians. Probably not the Alexandrine writer of the 5th century, but an imaginary person. [H.]

AMMONIUS. (1) A disciple of Pambo, and one of the most celebrated of the monks of Nitria. Being of unusual stature, he and his brothers Dioscorus, Eusebins, and Euthymius were called the Tall Brothers (Soz. Hist. viii. 12). Ammonius himself was distinguished by the epithet παρωρῆς (Niceph. Hist. xi. 37) in consequence of having cut off one of his ears to escape being made a bishop (Pall. Hist. Laus. 12). In his youth he accompanied St. Athanasius to Rome, but could not be induced to visit any of the sights there, except the basilica of St. Peter and St. Paul (Soz. Hist. iv. 23; Pall. 12). He was a learned man, and could repeat, it is said, the Old and New Testament by heart, as well as passages from Origen and other fathers (Pall. 12). He never tasted cooked food (Pall. 12), and frequently gave up his cell to strangers, building himself another without a word (Ruff. 23.) He was banished to Diocæsarea in the persecution under Valens (Pall. 117). After being for some time high in favour with Theophilus of Alexandria, he and his brothers were accused by him of Origenism. Sozomen and Nicephorus ascribe the accusation to personal animosity on the part of Theophilus; the former because they had interfered on behalf of Isidorus (Hist. viii. 12), the latter because they had reproved the bishop for being too secular (Hist. xiii. 10). Socrates explains the accusation as an attempt to divert from himself the odium which he had incurred as an Origenist (Hist. vi. 7). Jerome, however, considers the accusation merited (Ep. ad Alex.). Driven from Egypt the brothers took refuge first in Palestine (Niceph. Hist. xiii. 11) and afterwards at Constantinople, where they were well received by Chrysostom (viii. 13). There they were protected also by the favour of the Empress Eudoxia (Soz. viii. 13), and even satisfied Epiphanius of Salamis, who came to Constantinople at the instigation of Theophilus to convict them of heresy (viii. 15). At the Synod "ad Quercum," which was held on the arrival of Theophilus, they were persuaded to submit to him, Ammonius being ill at the time. He died shortly afterwards. Theophilus is said to have wept on hearing of his death, and to have owned that Ammonius was one of the holiest monks of his time (viii. 17). Perhaps this Ammonius is the author of the Institutiones Asceticæ, of which twenty-two chapters are extant (Lambe. Biblioth. Vindob. iv. 155).

(2) An Egyptian bishop in the 4th century. At the age of 17 he was induced by hearing a sermon by Athanasius to become a monk, not having been as yet even baptized; and retired to Taberna. After passing two years there under Theodorus, and fourteen at Nitria (Gr. Inc. ap. Rosw. V. P. v. 7), he was as several other monks apparently made bishop by Athanasius (Ath. ad Mon. 305), and banished by George of Cappadocia (Ath. de Fug. 256). At the request of Theophilus he wrote an account of St. Theodorus (Acta SS. Maii 14; Cotel. Ecc. Gr. Mon. l.)

(3) Bishop of Pacnemunis, and in part of Elearchia, in the fourth century. Having been a monk he was made bishop by Alexander (Ath. ad Drac. 210, ad Mon. 305). He was sent with Serapion and other bishops on an embassy with Serapion from Athanasius to Constantius (Ath. ad Drac. 210; Soz. Hist. iv. 9); was banished shortly afterwards by the Arians (Ath. ad Mon. 305), and returned in 362, in which year he was present at the Councils of Alexandria (Ath. ad Ant. 615, 619), and of Sardica (Ath. c. Ar. 133).

(4) A solitary, near Canopus in the fourth century. In the persecution by Valens he fled to Palestine, and thence to Sinai. There he was an eye-witness of the devastation of the monasteries and hermitages by the Saracens. Combefis supposes him on returning to Egypt to have been ordained presbyter by Peter, and thus identifies him with the Ammonius martyred with that bishop (Eus. Hist. viii. 13). He thence escaped to Memphis, where he made himself a cell. His narrative, in which he mentions also a similar devastation at the same time at Raithi, is edited in Greek with Latin translation by Combefis (Xti. Mart. Triumphi p. 88). Cave and Tillemont give conclusive reasons against Combefis, who assigns an earlier date for supposing the Peter spoken of in this narrative to be the successor of Athanasius (cf. Soz. Hist. iv. 36; Soz. Hist. vi. 38). [I. G. S.]

AMMONIUS SACCAS. Next to nothing is known of this philosopher. That he obtained his name of Saccas (= σακκοφόρος) from having been a porter in his youth, is affirmed by Suidas (under Orienes) and Ammianus Marcellinus (xxii. 528). He was a native of Alexandria; Porphyry asserts that he was born of Christian parents, and returned to the heathen religion. Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. vi. 19, 7) denies the latter statement, but it would appear most probable that Eusebius confounded him with another Ammonius, the author of a Diatessaron, still extant.

That the founder of the Alexandrian school of philosophy (for such Ammonius Saccas) should have been at the same time a Christian, though not impossible, seems hardly likely. Moreover, the Ammonius of Eusebius wrote books; whereas, according to both Longinus and Porphyry, Ammonius Saccas wrote none. The most intimate pupils of Ammonius Saccas were Herennius, Origen, and Plotinus; according to Porphyry, he bound them by a promise not to reveal his doctrines. This promise was broken, first by Herennius, next by Origen. This story is regarded by Zeller (Die Philosophie der Griechen, v. 399) as apocryphal, and as invented to assimilate Ammonius to Pythagoras. The Origen above mentioned was a pagan; but the celebrated Christian of that name is also said to have listened to the lectures of Ammonius (Eusebius, l. c.). Plotinus is said to have been most strongly impressed with his first hearing of Ammonius, and to have cried out, "This is the man I was looking for!" (τοῦτον ἐζητοῦν) after which he remained his constant friend till the death of the elder philosopher. Of the other disciples of Ammonius are mentioned the celebrated Longinus, Heracles the Christian, Olympius, and Antonius. It is possible, however, that the Christians Origen and Heracles may have been the disciples of that Ammonius whom Eusebius confounds with Ammonius Saccas, and who was himself a Christian; but this cannot be certainly known. We may guess something concerning the philosophy of Ammonius Saccas from the fact that Plotinus was his pupil. For the rest, Hierocles (ap. Photius) affirms that his aim was to reconcile the philosophies of Plato and Aristotle. From this very probable account he would appear to have combined mysticism and eclecticism. Nemesius, a bishop and a Neoplatonist of the close of the 4th century, cites two passages, one of which he declares to contain the views of Numenius and Ammonius, the other he attributes to Ammonius alone. They concern the nature of the soul and its relation to the body. From Nemesius' words they appear to have been merely the traditional views of Ammonius, not any actual written words of his; and hence, as Zeller says, their authenticity must be considered doubtful, and not the less from their very close resemblance to the views of Plotinus; for it is hardly likely that Plotinus should have reproduced Ammonius with so little variation. The life and philosophy of Ammonius have been discussed by Vacherot, Hist. de l'École d'Alex. i. 342; Jules Simon, Hist. de l'École d'Alex. i. 204; Dehaut in his historical essay on the life and teaching of our philosopher, and Zeller in his Philosophie der Griechen, who also mentions other writers on Ammonius. [J. R. M.]

AMOENUS PRUDENTIUS, the supposed author of an Enchiridion or Manual of the Old and New Tests., called also Dittochaëon or Diptychon, in 196 Latin hexameters, which are divided into 49 tetrastichs, descriptive of the principal events and characters of Scripture. Nothing is known of him except his name, which was formerly confused with that of Aur. Clemens Prudentius, among whose poems the Enchiridion is printed in the older editions, and of whom the above designation is considered by some to have been a complimentary epithet.

Sichard, who discovered the name Amoenus prefixed to the work in a Strasburg MS., was the first to point out the error in his Scholia on Prudentius (Basil., 1537), and to assign an independent existence to Prudentius Amoenus. Although but little weight can be allowed to arguments derived from the supposed inferiority of the poem to the known works of Prudentius, or to the silence of that poet respecting it when enumerating his other works (Praef.), it would seem that Gennadius, on whose authority the manual was long attributed to Prudentius, is alluding to a different and more substantial work (De Vir. Illustr. c. 13). Amoenus is classed by Fabricius and similar writers among the poets of the 5th century, and is supposed by them to have been, like Clemens, a native of Spain. The Enchiridion was first printed as the work of Prudentius Amoenus, in the Fabrician Collection (Basil., 1562). Two other compositions are ascribed to the same author; a short hexameter fragment, entitled Aegyptius Deum Martini invocans tempestatis periculum effujit; and an acrostich ode, In Leontium episcopum Burdigalensi ecclesiae redditum, but upon what authority does not appear. (Migne, Patrol., vol. lxi.) [E. M. Y.]

AMOS, bishop of JERUSALEM (called by Nicephorus NEAMUS), succeeded John III. as 57th bishop, A.D. 594. According to Baronius, sub ann., who quotes Sophronius, Prat. Spirit. c. 149, he had previously been the abbot of a Syrian monastery. A letter of Gregory the Great to Amos is extant (lib. vii. Ep. 7, sub indict. i.), charging him to withhold communion with, and, if possible, to apprehend and send back to Rome a runaway acolyte named Peter. He was succeeded by Isaac A.D. 601. [E. V.]

AMPHILOCHIUS (ST.), archbishop of ICONIUM.

1. Sources of information. Of this great Catholic leader, who was regarded by his contemporaries as the foremost man in the Eastern Church after his friends Basil of Caesarea and Gregory of Nazianzus, very scanty information remains. The works ascribed to him are mostly spurious: and the life (Migne, Patr. Graec. xxxix. p. 14) is a later fiction, presenting the usual features of monkish hagiologies and wholly untrustworthy as a biographical record. The following references to the writings of his two great friends and contemporaries contain nearly all that is known of him and his family: Greg. Naz. Epist. 9, 13, 22-28, 62, 63, 171, 184, Test. ii. p. 203 sq., Carm. ii. pp. 1030, 1068, 1116-1120, 1148-1152; Basil. Epist. 150, 161, 163, 176, 188, 190, [191], 199-202, 217, 218, 231-236, 248, de Spir. Sanct. § 1 sq., § 79. The references here and throughout this article are to the Benedictine edition of Gregory completed by Caillau (Paris, 1840), and to Garnier's edition of Basil (Paris, 1730). Occasional notices which occur in other writers, such as Jerome, Theodoret, &c., will be given in their proper places. Of modern biographies Tillemont's alone deserves special mention (Mémoires ix. p. 617 sq., with the notes ib. p. 744 sq.). To this should be added the account of his family relations in the Benedictine life of Gregory, and the portions of Garnier's life of Basil relating to him. On the works genuine or spurious which bear the name of Amphilocheus, see Fabric. Bibl. Graec. viii. p. 373 sq., Tillemont, ix. p. 745 sq. They are included in Galland, Bibl. Vet. Patr. vii. p. 457 sq., and in Migne's Patr. Graec. xxxix, with the exception of the Iambics to Seleucus which appear in the editions of Gregory Nazianzen (e.g. Caillau, ii. p. 1088).

2. Parentage and connexions. Amphilocheus appears to have been a first cousin of Gregory Nazianzen, as the following genealogical table will show:—

This cousinship depends on the identification of Philtatius the maternal grandfather of Gregory (Carm. ii. p. 1146) with Philtatius the father of the elder Amphilocheus (ib. p. 1150). The identification is confirmed by the fact that the two Gorgonias are thus brought into connexion as grandmother and granddaughter; and though Gregory never distinctly calls Amphilocheus his cousin, yet the relationship seems to be implied in occasional expressions scattered through his writings (see Greg. Op. i. p. xlv sq.). Amphilocheus, the father, was a Cappadocian, a native of the small town of Diocæsarea (either identical with or close to Nazianzus), of which he was the pride. He was a forensic pleader and attained to high eminence in his profession. To his friends he afforded generous and ready help, and seems to have been as amiable in private life as he was famous at the bar. The Graces and the Muses,* wrote his nephew, united in him. He lived to see his son a bishop, and died in advanced age. Among the poems of Gregory are several touching epitaphs on his uncle, from which these facts are gathered (ii. p. 1148–1150). He had himself learnt the use of language from his uncle, and in celebrating his memory he was fulfilling a debt of gratitude and returning like for like (λόγφ λόγον . . . ἀντιχαρίζμενος). On the other hand Livia, the mother of Amphilocheus, died in the prime of life, “still bright with the bloom of youth.” Her gentleness and her wisdom were alike remarkable. At her death she left three children, two sons and a daughter, with their father Amphilocheus, to mourn her loss (ib. pp. 1116, 1118). The two sons, Euphemius and Amphilocheus, were devotedly attached to each other, “a holy pair, one soul, two bodies, in all things brothers, in blood, in renown, in wisdom . . . bright stars shining conspicuous among all the Cappadocians.” But “envy cast her fell glance on them both.” Death carried off Euphemius in the bloom of youth on the eve of his nuptials, and left but “half of Amphilocheus.” He appears from his cousin’s account to have been singularly handsome, amiable, and gifted in all ways. Gregory compares him to the lightning flash, dazzling with its brilliancy but quenched in a moment (ib. pp. 1118, 1120). The sister of Amphilocheus, whose name appears to have been Theodostia,^b survived many years, and earned the gratitude of her generation as the instructress of the famous St. Olympias. [OLYMPIAS.] She was a living pattern to her pupil in every word and deed (ib. p. 1068).

3. Early life. Whether Amphilocheus, like his father, was a native of Diocæsarea, does not appear. The language of Basil (Epist. 161) might seem rather to imply that he was born and lived in Basil’s own town, Caesarea. At all events, whether owing to distance or from other reasons, Gregory expresses regret that he did not see much of Amphilocheus during his earlier years (Epist. 13). Their intimate friendship commenced at a later date. Amphilocheus, like many other eminent Christian fathers, was educated for the bar. The letters of his cousin imply that he carried on his profession at Constantinople. It was apparently during his residence there that Gregory writes to recommend two friends, Euthalius (Epist. 9) and Nicobulus (Epist. 13), to his care.^c The former letter seems to have been written not long after the year 362, and the latter about 365. What was the age of Amphilocheus at this time we do not know; but as Basil and Gregory, who were born about the year 329, both speak of him as their “son” (Basil. Epist. 176, Greg. Naz. Epist. 22, 23, 184), he must have been somewhat younger than either, and therefore still a very young man. This agrees with the next incident recorded of him. About the year 369 he appears to have got into trouble about money matters, having allied himself to a knave through his inexperience and confiding disposition. What the nature of the transaction was does not appear; but Gregory writes on his cousin’s behalf to three persons of high station and influence at Constantinople, Sophronius, Caesarius, and Themistius, asking them to give him their advice and aid (Epist. 22, 23, 24). The last mentioned, the famous orator, though not a Christian, was a friend of the elder Amphilocheus; and on this ground Gregory appeals to him to protect the son, “my Amphilocheus,” as he calls him, adding that he is such as not to disgrace either his parentage or their friendship.

4. Retirement and dedication to God. It is not improbable that this trouble weaned Amphilocheus from his worldly pursuits and turned his thoughts inward. At all events we trace somewhere about this time a complete change in his mode of life. He has abandoned his profession, and is living in retirement at Ozizala, devoting himself apparently to religious exercises and to the care of his aged father. His cousin Gregory appears to have been mainly instrumental in bringing about this change. At least he says with honest pride, that "together with the pure Thecla"^d he had "sent Amphilocheus to God" (Op. ii. p. 1068); an expression which seems to refer rather to this retirement and self-dedication of Amphilocheus than to his later elevation to the episcopate. And now his closer friendship with Basil and Gregory begins. Ozizala was situated not far from Nazianzus, for Gregory's correspondence implies that they were near neighbours. On one occasion Gregory, who is expecting a visit from Basil, writes playfully to Amphilocheus asking him to send a stock of herbs in which Ozizala, otherwise barren, abounded, to regale their common friend; and on receiving what he affects to consider a very niggardly quantity, threatens to cut off his supply of corn (Epist. 25, 26, 27). A letter of Basil, apparently belonging to this period, is of a graver cast. He writes in the name of one Heraclidas, who, like Amphilocheus, had renounced the profession of the bar and devoted himself to a religious life. Heraclidas excuses himself from joining Amphilocheus, being lodged in a large hospital (πρωχοστροφείον) recently erected by Basil near Caesarea, where he enjoys the constant instructions of the bishop. He urges Amphilocheus to obtain leave from his father to visit Caesarea and profit by the teaching and example of the same instructor. Basil's great topic, he says, is the abandonment of all worldly riches (Epist. 150). This letter was written in the year 372 or 373 (see Garnier's Basil. Op. iii. p. cxxxiv).

* Χάριτες Μούσαισι μεμυγμεναι. There can be no doubt that the superscription of this poem (ii. p. 1150) ought to be read Εἰς Ἀμφιλόχιον ἄλλο (for ἄλλον).

^b Gregory calls her Θεοῦ δόσις (p. 1068), the nearest approach to her name which his metre allows. The name Θεοδόσις occurs in Boeckh, Inscr. 9607.

^c It is not always clear whether a letter is addressed to the elder or the younger Amphilocheus. In such cases the view which seems the more probable has been silently adopted.

5. Episcopate. This invitation to Caesarea appears to have been promptly accepted, and was fraught with immediate and important consequences. It does not appear that at the time of Basil's letter Amphilocheus was even ordained; yet at the very beginning of the year 374 we find him occupying the important see of Iconium. This sudden elevation has a parallel in his contemporary, Ambrose of Milan, who was nominated to the see while only a catechumen. Yet at this time Amphilocheus can hardly have been more than about 35 years of age. It is no surprise therefore to find that he undertook this important office with great reluctance. Amphilocheus had fled from him, writes Basil in a congratulatory letter, but had been caught in the inevitable meshes of grace and dragged into the heart of Pisidia. He might well say with David, "Whither shall I flee then from Thy presence?" His native country had lost him, but a neighbouring province had found him (Epist. 161). It would thus appear that Basil had destined him for some office in the Cappadocian Church. But however this may be, it was evidently the writer's influence, exerted in some way or other, which secured him for the more important position. The elder Amphilocheus, thus deprived of his son's care in his old age, complained of the cruelty of Gregory, through whom he had been taken away. Gregory, who at this moment was mourning the death of his own father, writes in reply to defend himself (Epist. 63). The loss of Amphilocheus, his good counsellor, the stay and the partner of his religious life, would be felt by no one, he says, more than by himself: nor indeed was he the offender; but, to tell the truth, he had himself been overpowered by the strong will of a common friend (ἡμᾶς τοὺς οὐδὲν ἀδικούντας ἀλλ', εἰ δεῖ τᾶληθὲς εἰπεῖν, τὰ ἴσα τυραννηθέντας ὑπὸ τῶν κοινῶν φίλων). When we remember the circumstances of Gregory's own life, we can hardly doubt that he here alludes to the iron will of his friend Basil, to whose fatal influence he himself was forced to succumb at a great crisis. And we learn from one of Basil's own letters that he did not lack the opportunity which this appointment implies. A few months before this time Faustinus, bishop of Iconium, had died, and the Iconians applied to the bishop of Caesarea to recommend them a successor (Basil. Epist. 138). Why there should have been this delay we do not know; but it is impossible not to connect this application to Basil with the ultimate appointment of Amphilocheus, the allusion in Gregory's letter forming a connecting-link between the two.

From this time forward till his death, which happened about five years afterwards, Basil holds close and affectionate intercourse with Amphilocheus, communicating with him again and again by letter, and receiving from him frequent visits. The first of these visits took place soon after his consecration, about Easter 374, and was somewhat protracted. His ministrations on this occasion made a deep impression on the people of Caesarea, who after his departure longed to see and to hear him again (Epist. 163, 176).

This, however, was not usually the season which he preferred for his visits. The great annual festival at Caesarea was the celebration of Euphrosyne and other martyrs in September. A few days earlier was the anniversary of Basil's poor-hospital (Epist. 94), which had a special interest for Amphilocheus as the place where he, with his friend Heraclidas, had lodged at the most momentous crisis of their lives, and which was connected with their most solemn thoughts. For this reason he seems to have chosen the autumn for his visits to his spiritual father. It was probably on the earliest of these annual visits, A.D. 374 (see Garnier, Op. iii. p. cxi.), that Amphilocheus urged Basil to clear up all doubt respecting his doctrine of the Holy Spirit by writing a treatise on the subject. This was the occasion of Basil's extant work, de Spiritu Sancto (see § 1), which, when completed, was dedicated to the petitioner himself and sent to him engrossed on vellum (Epist. 231). During this and the following year Basil likewise addresses to Amphilocheus his three Canonical Letters (Epist. 188, 199, 217), to solve some questions relating to ecclesiastical order, which the bishop of Iconium had propounded to him. At this same period also we find Amphilocheus arranging the ecclesiastical affairs of Isauria (Epist. 190), Lycania (Epist. 200), and Lycia (Epist. 218), under the direction of Basil. He is also invited by Basil to assist in the administration of his own diocese of Caesarea, which has become too great a burden for him, prostrated as he now is by a succession of maladies (Epist. 200, 201). The affectionate confidence which the great man—strong as ever in the strength of an unbending will, but weak through physical infirmity—reposes in his younger friend, is a powerful testimony to the character and influence of Amphilocheus, of whom otherwise so little is known.

After the death of Basil, the slender thread by which we trace the career of Amphilocheus is taken up in the correspondence of Gregory. Gregory writes with equal affection and esteem, and with more tenderness than Basil. He has been ill, and he speaks of Amphilocheus as having helped to work his cure. Sleeping and waking, he has him ever in his mind. He mentions the many letters which he had received from Amphilocheus (μυριάκις γράφων), and which have called forth harmonies from his soul, as the plectrum strikes music out of the lyre (Epist. 171).

The last of Gregory's letters to Amphilocheus (Epist. 184) seems to have been written about the year 383. Not long before (A.D. 381) Amphilocheus had been present with his friend at the Council of Constantinople, and had subscribed to the creed there sanctioned, as chief pastor of the Lycaonian Church, at the head of twelve other bishops (Labb. Conc. ii. p. 1135, ed. Coleti). At this council a metropolitan authority was confirmed to, rather than conferred on, his see of Iconium; for we find it occupying this position even before his election to the episcopate. During this sojourn at Constantinople he signs his name as first witness to Gregory's will (Greg. Op. ii. p. 204), in which the testator leaves directions to restore to his most reverend son the bishop Amphilocheus the purchase-money of an estate at Canotala (ib. p. 203). It was probably on this occasion also that Amphilocheus fell in with Jerome and read to him a book which he had written on the Holy Spirit (Hieron. de Vir. Ill. 133), as the great Latin father is known to have paid a visit to Gregory Nazianzen at this time (Hieron. Op. xi. 65 sq., ed. Vallarsi).

About two years later must be placed the well-known incident in which the zeal of Amphilocheus against the Arians appears (Theodt. H. E. v. 16).⁹ Obtaining an audience of Theodosius, he saluted the emperor himself with the usual marks of respect, but paid no attention to his son Arcadius, who had recently (νεοστί) been created Augustus and was present at the interview. Theodosius, indignant at this slight, demanded an explanation. "Sire," said the bishop, "any disrespect shown to your son arouses your displeasure. Be assured therefore, that the Lord of the universe abhorreth those who are ungrateful towards His Son, their Saviour and Benefactor." The emperor, adds Theodoret, immediately issued an edict prohibiting the meetings of the heretics. As Arcadius was created Augustus in the beginning of the year 383 (Clinton Fast. Rom. i. p. 504), and as Theodosius issued his edict against the Euno-mians, Arians, Macedonians, and Apollinarians in September of the same year (ib. p. 507), the date is accurately ascertained (see Tillem. Mém. Eccl. vi. pp. 627 sq., 802).

In this same year (383) also we find Amphilocheus taking energetic measures against heretics of a different stamp. He presided over a synod of twenty-five bishops assembled at Sida in Pamphylia, in which the Messalians [MESSALIANS] were condemned, and his energy seems to have instigated the religious crusade which led to the extirpation of this heresy (Photius Bibl. 52, Theodt. Eccl. Hist. iv. 10; comp. Labb. Conc. ii. 1209, ed. Coleti).

The date of Amphilocheus' death is uncertain. When Jerome wrote the work quoted above, he was still living (A.D. 592); and two years later (A.D. 394) his name occurs among the bishops present at a synod held at Constantinople, when the new basilica of St. Peter and St. Paul was dedicated (Labb. Conc. ii. 1378, ed. Coleti). On the other hand he is not mentioned in connection with the troubles of St. Chrysostom (A.D. 403 sq.); and as so important a person could hardly have failed to take part in the controversy, it is a fairly safe assumption that he was no longer living. The martyrologies have made Amphilocheus survive to a very advanced age, but he probably died in middle life. His day is given as Nov. 23 in both Greek and Latin calendars.

6. Works. The genuine works of Amphilocheus, still extant, are very scanty.

(1) Iambi ad Seleucum. An iambic poem addressed to Seleucus, the grandson of Trajanus (Tillemont, ix. p. 747), and nephew of St. Olympias. Its object is to instruct the young man in a godly life and to deter him from the prevailing vices of the age. Its chief present value however consists in the list of Canonical Scriptures with which it closes (see Westcott, Canon, pp. 396, 497). On the strength of a note added by some scholiast (ταῦτα δοκεῖ μοι τοῦ Θεολόγου τυγχάνειν φρενός, ὡς παρὰ Ἀμφιλοχίου γραφέντα, i. e. they seem to accord with the mind of Gregory the Divine, and to have been written by him in the name of Amphilocheus) this poem has been assigned by many editors to Gregory Nazianzen and generally appears among his works. Internal and external evidence alike are against this hypothesis. It is attributed to Amphilocheus in the MSS., and referred to as his by Cosmas Indic. vii. (ii. p. 292, Montf.), and Zonaras in Can. xxvii. Conc. Carth. (Beve-reg. Pand. Can. ii. p. 549); while it betrays another hand than Gregory's, as well in the style and versification as in the list of Canonical Scriptures (see Tillemont, ix. p. 746; Galland. Bibl. vii. p. xi). This poem is included in Combefis (p. 116 sq.), but not in Migne. It may be found in most editions of Gregory Nazianzen.

(2) Epistola Synodica (Migne, p. 94), on the Macedonian heresy. Its object is to explain why the Nicene fathers did not dwell on the doctrine of the Spirit, and to justify the ordinary form of the doxology. It is entitled Ἀμφιλοχίου Βασιλέως in one MS., but was certainly not written by Basil, who indeed is mentioned in the body of the letter. It was first published by Cotelier, Mon. Eccl. ii. p. 99 sq.

(3) Fragments, preserved in Theodoret, Damascene, and others. These consist of extracts from (i) Discourses on various texts, chiefly Christological, e.g. Matt. xxiv. 36, Luke ii. 52, John v. 19, &c. A large number of these texts are taken from St. John. (ii) Letters to Seleucus (the same to whom the Iambics are addressed), to Pancharius deacon of Sida, to the people of Syedra, all on dogmatic subjects. (iii) Controversial and other treatises; e.g. Against the Arians, On the Spurious Writings used by the Heretics, On Isaiah, On the Generation according to the Flesh, On the Son the Word. It is strange that no fragment is quoted from the work On the Holy Spirit, which Amphilocheus read to Jerome (see above).

Besides these genuine works, Combefis also published eight discourses bearing his name; but all or most of these seem to be spurious (see Tillemont, p. 747). Another, entitled In Mesopotemosten &c., was published by Matthaei (Gregor. Thessal. Archiep. x. Orat. &c., Mosquae, 1776: see Migne, p. 119); but this also belongs probably to the same category. A Life of Basil and a Life of Ephrem also bear his name, but are clearly not his productions; and the same is true of other works which it is not necessary to enumerate. Some of these may have been written by Amphilocheus of Sida (2) in the 5th, or Amphilocheus of Cyzicus in the 9th century (see Fabric. viii. p. 382).

7. Reputation and character. Of his ability and character as a theologian and a writer the extant fragments are wholly inadequate as a criterion; but his reputation with his contemporaries and with the later Church leaves very little ground for doubt. His contemporary Jerome, an eminently competent judge, speaks of the Cappadocian triad, Basil, Gregory, and Amphilocheus, as writers "who cram (refarciunt) their books with the lessons and sentences of the philosophers to such an extent that you cannot tell which you ought to admire most in them, their secular erudition or their Scriptural knowledge," Epist. 70 (i. p. 429). Theodoret, in the next generation, lavishes epithets on him, "the most famous" (πανεξόφητος), "the most wise," "the wonderful" (Ecll. Hist. iv. 10, v. 16); and he is quoted by Cyril of Alexandria and by later fathers. In the Council of Chalcedon his authority is cited with respect (Labbe, Conc. iv. 1145). In the Quinisextine Council his canons are approved (ib. vii. 1346); and in the 2nd Council of Nicaea (A.D. 787) he is more than once quoted (viii. 1133, 1444).

Of his character his intimate friends are the best witnesses. The trust reposed in him by Basil and Gregory appears throughout their correspondence. The former more especially praises his love of learning and patient investigation, addressing him as his "brother Amphilocheus, his dear friend most honoured of all" (de Spir. Sanct. §1); while the latter speaks of him as "the blameless high-priest, the loud herald of truth, his pride" (Carm. ii. p. 1068). He seems to have united the genial sympathy which endears the friend, and the administrative energy which constitutes the ruler, with intellectual abilities and acquirements of no mean order.

(2) Bishop of SIDA in Pamphylia. Like his more famous namesake of Iconium, he appears as an antagonist of the Messalians. He was urged, as one of the Pamphylian metropolitans, to take measures against them in encyclical letters written by two successive bishops of Constantinople, Atticus and Sisinnius (Phot. Bibl. 52), and seems to have prosecuted the matter with zeal. He brought forward the subject at the Council of Ephesus (A.D. 431) in conjunction with Valerianus; and in consequence of their representations the council confirmed the decrees of former synods against these heretics (Labbe, Conc. iii. 1331 sq., ed. Coleti). At this same council we find him assenting to Cyril's letter, and subscribing in very strong language to the condemnation and deposition of Nestorius (ib. pp. 1012, 1046, 1077, 1133).

His conduct on a later occasion was marked by great vacillation, if not insincerity. It is sometimes stated that he was present at the "robber's synod" (A.D. 449), and there committed himself to the policy of Dioscorus and the heresy of Eutyches (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 998). His name, however, does not appear in the list of bishops assembled there (Labbe, Conc. iv. 889 sq.), and the statement is quite unwarranted. At the Council of Chalcedon, however, (A.D. 451), he showed great tenderness for Dioscorus, and here his career of tergiversation began. He tried to defer the second citation of Dioscorus (iv. 1260); and when after three citations Dioscorus did not appear, he consented to his condemnation, though with evident reluctance (iv. 1310, 1337). At a later session too, he subscribed his assent to the Epistle of Pope Leo (iv. 1358, 1366); and we find his name also appended to the canons of the council (iv. 1715). Thus he committed himself fully to the principles of this council, and to the reversal of the proceedings of the Lutrocinium. But a few years later (A.D. 458), when the emperor Leo wrote to the bishops to elicit their opinions, Amphilocheus stated in reply, that, while he disapproved the appointment of Timotheus Aelurus, he did not acknowledge the authority of the Council of Chalcedon (Evagr. H. E. ii. 10). Yet, as if this were not enough, we are told that he shortly afterwards assented and subscribed to its decrees (Eulogius in Phot. Bibl. 230).

The possibility that some of the Homilies ascribed to Amphilocheus of Iconium may have been written by his namesake of Sida, has been already mentioned. [L.]

AMPHION (OR ALERION, OR AMPHITRION), bishop of EPIPHANIA in Cilicia Secunda, a confessor in the persecution of Maximin, attended the Councils of Ancyra and Neocaesarea, A.D. 314, and Nicaea, 325. (Labbe, Concil. i. 1505, 1518, ii. 56.) Athanasius mentions his having combated the Arian doctrines in his writings. (Athan. Disput. prima cont. Arian.) He is identified by Baronius with the Amphion translated to Nicomedia in place of Eusebius; but this is doubted by Tillemont. He appears in the Roman martyrology, June 12. [E. V.]

AMPULLIANUS, according to 'Prædestinatus' (i. 63), a "Bithynian heresiarch," who taught that all the wicked with the devil and evil spirits are purified by fire and restored to their primitive innocence; and when his doctrine was impugned by the Church, alleged the authority of Origen De Principiis. Possibly a fictitious person, as 'Prædestinatus' is fertile in the invention of orthodox councils and writers. Anpallianus is his only heretic not otherwise known. [H.]

ANACLETUS. [CLETUS.]

ANASTASIA, an Illyrian matron, first tortured by her husband and then burned by the judge in the island of Palmaria (Baron. Dec. 25; and see Tillemont, M. E. v. 327, 717). "Reliquiae S. Anastasiae pharmaceutriae," were brought from Sirmium to Constantinople by Pulcheria, before A.D. 450 (Niceph. xiv. 10). See Suidas s. v. χρυσόγονος; and Theodorus Lector ii. [A. W. H.]

ANASTASIUS, bishop of ANCYRA, one of the metropolitans to whom the Emperor Leo writes concerning the death of Proterius, A.D. 458. His answer is extant (Labbe, Conc. iv. 1921 sq., ed. Coleti). He was also present at the Council of Constantinople, A.D. 459 (ib. v. 49). [L.]

ANASTASIUS, a presbyter of ANTIOCH, celebrated in ecclesiastical history as the confidential friend and counsellor of Nestorius, who accompanied him on his elevation to the archiepiscopal seat of Constantinople, and by his bold uncompromising language aroused the storm which so long raged through the Christian world and swept Nestorius to destruction. Theophanes styles him the "Syncellus," or confidential secretary of Nestorius, who never took any step without consulting him, and being guided by his opinions. Nestorius having commenced a vexatious persecution against the Quartodecimans of Asia in 428, two presbyters, Antonius and Jacobus, were despatched to carry his designs into effect. They were furnished with letters commendatory from Anastasius and Photius, bearing witness to the soundness of their faith. These two emissaries of the Archbishop of Constantinople did not restrict themselves to their ostensible object, to set the Asiatics right as to the keeping of Easter, but endeavoured to tamper with their faith. At Philadelphia they persuaded some simple-minded clergy to sign a creed of doubtful orthodoxy, attributed to Theodore of Mopsuestia. This was strongly opposed by Charisius, the oecumenus of the Church, who charged Jacobus with unsoundness in the faith. His opposition aroused the indignation of Anastasius and Photius, who despatched fresh letters, reasserting the orthodoxy of Jacobus, and requiring the deprivation of Charisius. (Labbe, Concil. iii. 1202, sq., Soer. vii. 29.) It was in a sermon preached by Anastasius at Constantinople that the fatal words were uttered that destroyed the peace of the Church for so many years to come, and awoke the fiercest and most unchristian passions. "Let no one," said the fearless orator, "call Mary Θεοτόκος. She was but a human being. It is impossible for God to be born of a human being." These words were eagerly caught up by the enemies of Nestorius. They caused great excitement among clergy and laity, which was greatly increased when the archbishop by supporting and defending Anastasius adopted the language as his own. (Soc. H. E. vii. 32; Evag. H. E. i. 2.) [NESTORIUS.] In 430, when Cyril had sent a deputation to Constantinople with an address to the emperor, Anastasius seems to have made some attempt to bring about an accommodation between him and Nestorius. (Cyril, Ep. viii.; Mercator. vol. ii. p. 49.) We find him after the deposition of Nestorius still maintaining his cause and animating his party at Constantinople. (Lupus, Ep. 144.)

Tillemont identifies him with the Anastasius who in 434 wrote to Helladius, bishop of Tarsus, when he and the Oriental bishops were refusing to recognize Proclus as bishop of Constantinople, bearing witness to his orthodoxy, and urging them to receive him into communion. (Baluz. § 144.) [E. V.]

ANASTASIUS, patriarch of CONSTANTINOPLE, A.D. 703. His predecessor Germanus, whose pupil and "syncellus" he had been, had predicted that he would be calamitous to the Church (Theoph. Chron. 341 Par.; Zonar. Annal. iii.). He was promoted by the influence of the Emperor Leo Isaurus, after the abdication or deposition of Germanus. According to one account force was employed by the emperor to intimidate those who opposed the election; and when the populace, headed by some nuns, rioted against the new Patriarch for removing an image of Christ from the palace, the ringleaders were executed (Vit. Stephani Jun. ap. Analecta Gr. Bened. l.). Certainly Anastasius favoured the iconoclasts, which led to his excommunication by Gregory III. (Theoph. 343), and this is not unreasonably imputed to his obsequiousness to Leo and his son Constantinus Copronymus; for he was equally complaisant to Artabasds when he seized the throne for a time (Theoph. 348; Zonar. iii.). He was most ignominiously punished on the return to power of Constantinus, though allowed in mockery to retain his see (Theoph. 353), and died miserably of a loathsome disease, 753 A.D. By some chronologies he was made Patriarch in 728 A.D. [I. G. S.]

ANASTASIUS, bishop of NICAËA, present at the Council of Chalcedon (A.D. 451). At the earlier sessions he had not arrived, and was represented by two presbyters (Labbe, Conc. iv. 852, 1196, 1358, 1378); but later he appears and subscribes in person (ib. 1443, 1521, 1713, 1730). At the 13th session he was charged by Eumomius of Nicomedia with invading his metropolitan rights over the churches of Bithynia. The session was taken up in discussing this question, and the decision was given against Anastasius. The bishop of Nicaea was henceforth to retain the title without exercising the jurisdiction of a metropolitan (ib. 1627 sq.). [L.]

ANASTASIUS, bishop of NICAËA. He was present at the Synod of Constantinople in 518, and signed the letter to the patriarch John, condemning Severus (Labbe, Conc. v. 1137). His name also appears attached to the letter of the Synod of 520 to Hormisdas on the appointment of Epiphanius (ib. 657). And he took part also in the proceedings of the Council of Constantinople, A.D. 536 (ib. 1058, 1232). To this Anastasius of Nicaea is probably to be ascribed the Commentary on the Psalms, which is extant in MS. Bibl. Coisl. p. 389, and is quoted in the Catenae; see Fabric. B. G. x. p. 610, ed. Harles. Le Quien (Or. Christ. i. p. 644) postulates (for what reasons he does not state) a third and later Anastasius of Nicaea, to whom he assigns this commentary. [L.]

ANASTASIUS I., bishop of ROME, consecrated A.D. 398 ("Honorio IV. et Eutylichiano coss." Prosp. Aq. Chron.), and died in April, A.D. 402 (Anast. Bibl. vol. i. p. 62). According to Anastasius Bibliothecarius, he put an end to an unseemly strife between the priests and deacons of his church, by enacting that priests as well as deacons should stand bowing ("curvi starent") at the reading of the Gospels. Jerome calls him a "vir insignis," who was taken from the evil to come, i.e. who died before the sack of Rome by Goths, A.D. 410.

There is one letter by Anastasius still extant. Rufinus wrote to him shortly after his consecration (not later than A.D. 400, Constant. Epp. Pont. Romanorum, p. 714) to defend himself against the charge of complicity in the heresy which was ascribed to Origen. Anastasius replies (see Constant. loc. cit.) in a tone which, dealing leniently with Rufinus, explicitly condemns Origen.

Besides this, nine other letters are referred to:—1-5. Correspondence with Paulinus, bishop of Nola (Paulinus Nolanus, ep. 20). 6. To Anysius, bishop of Thessalonica, giving him jurisdiction over Illyria; referred to by Innocent I., in his 1st letter (Constant.). 7. To Johannes, bishop of Jerusalem. 8. To African bishops, who had sent him an embassy to complain of the low state of their clergy. 9. Contra Rufinum, an epistle sent ad Orientem. Hieron. (Apolog. lib. 3). [G. H. M.]

ANASTASIUS II., bishop of ROME, succeeded Gelasius I. in November, A.D. 496 (Clinton's Fasti Romani, pp. 536, 713). The next month after his accession Clovis [Chlodowig?] was baptized, and the new pope wrote him a letter, congratulating him on his conversion. Anastasius has left a name of ill-odour in the nostrils of the Western Church; but this is attributable to his having had the boldness to take a different line from his predecessors with regard to the Eastern Church. Pope Felix III. [FELIX III.] had excommunicated Acacius of Constantinople, professedly on account of his communicating with heretics, but really because Zeno's Henoticon, which he had sanctioned, gave the Church of Constantinople a primacy in the East which the see of Rome could not tolerate. Gelasius I. [GELASIUS I.] had followed closely in the steps of Felix. But we find Anastasius, in the year of his accession, sending two bishops (Germanus of Capua and Cresconius of Todi (Baronius) to Constantinople, with a proposal that Acacius' name, instead of being expunged from the roll of Patriarchs of Constantinople as Gelasius had proposed, should be left upon the diptychs, and no more should be said upon the subject. This proposal was in the very spirit of the Henoticon; and by this he gave lasting offence to the Western Church. After this it need excite no surprise to hear that he was charged with communicating secretly with Photinus, a deacon of Thessalonica who held with Acacius; and of wishing to heal the breach between the Eastern and Western Church;—for so it is that it seems best to interpret the words in the narrative of Anastasius Bibliothecarius—"voluit revocare Acacium" (vol. i. p. 83).

Anastasius died in November, A.D. 498, when he had almost completed the second year of his pontificate. But his memory did not die with him, for he was still remembered as the traitor who would have reversed the excommunication of Acacius; and Dante finds him suffering in hell the punishment due to one whom "Fotino" seduced from the right way (Dante, Inf. xi. 8, 9).

Two epistles written by him are extant: one in which he informs the Emperor Anastasius of his accession (Mansi, viii. p. 188); the other to Clovis, mentioned above (ib. p. 193). [G. H. M.]

ANASTASIUS SINAITA (Ἀναστάσιος Σιναΐτης). Three of this name are mentioned by ecclesiastical writers, among whom some confusion exists. Two were patriarchs of Antioch, and it has been reasonably questioned whether they were ever monks of Mount Sinai, and whether the title "Sinaita" has not been erroneously given to them from their being confounded with the one who really was so.

(1) Bishop of ANTIOCH, succeeded Dömnus III. A.D. 559 (Clinton, Fasti Romani). He is praised by Evagrius (H. E. iv. 40) for his theological learning, the strictness of his life, and his well-balanced character in intercourse with others. He resolutely opposed Justinian's edict in favour of the Aphthartodocetæ, and encouraged the monastic bodies of Syria who had applied to him for advice to maintain their ground against it, A.D. 563 (Evag. iv. 39, 40). Justinian, in consequence, threatened him with deposition and exile, but his death in 565 hindered his design, which was however carried into effect five years later by his nephew Justin II., A.D. 570. Fresh charges were brought against Anastasius of profuse expenditure of the funds of his see, and of intemperate language and action in reference to the consecration of John, bishop of Alexandria, by John, bishop of Constantinople, in the lifetime of the former bishop, Eutychius (Evag. v. 1; Valsius' notes, ibid.; Theophan. Chron.; Clinton, Fast. Rom.). He was succeeded by Gregory, on whose death, in the middle of 593 (Clinton), he was restored to his episcopate. This was chiefly due to the influence of Gregory the Great, who had pleaded his cause with the Emperor Maurice and his son Theodosius, adding the request that if not reinstated he might be allowed to reside at Rome (Evag. vi. 24; Gregor. Mag. Ep. i. 25, 27; Ind. ix.). Gregory wrote him a congratulatory letter on his return to Antioch (Ep. iv. 37; Ind. xiv.); and several epistles are preserved in the collection of his letters, relating to the claim the bishop of Constantinople was then making to the title of "universal bishop," and remonstrating with him on the milder view he was inclined to take of the assumption (Ep. iv. 36, Ind. xiii.; vi. 24, 31, Ind. xv.). Anastasius defended the orthodox view of the Procession of the Holy Ghost (Baren. Annal. Eccl. 593), and died at the close of 598 (Clinton, Fast. Rom.).

Five sermons, "De Orthodoxa fide," and five others, printed in a Latin version by Migne and others, are ascribed by some to this Anastasius. Oudin, Dupin, and others, refer them more probably to a later Anastasius. For a catalogue and description of the works assigned to him, either existing or lost, see Fabricius Bibl. Græc. vol. ix. pp. 332-336, and Migne.

(2) Succeeded the elder Anastasius as bishop of Antioch in the beginning of 599. We have a letter of Gregory the Great to him (Ev. vii. 48, Ind. ii.) acknowledging the receipt of one announcing his appointment, and declaring his adherence to the orthodox faith. Gregory had already written to him before 597 (Ep. vii. 3, Ind. i.), exhorting him to constancy under the persecutions of heretics. He translated Gregory's De Curá Pastoralí into Greek (ib. x. 22, Ind. v.). His death occurred in an insurrection of the Jews, Sept. 610 (Clinton, F. R.), by whom his dead body was horribly mutilated and burnt. Nicephorus (H. E. xviii. 44) confounds him with his predecessor.

(3) A priest and monk of the monastery of Mount Sinai, to whom, from his contemplative life spent in the sacred mountain, the title of Μωσῆς νέος, was given in later times. He has been erroneously confounded by Nicephorus and many modern writers with the two bishops of Antioch of the same name, and his writings have been attributed to the earlier of them; but it is plain from his Hodegos that he lived late in the 7th century. This Anastasius is scarcely known to us except from his works, which, though voluminous, are of little value. He was a zealous champion of the orthodox faith against the Monophysites, and leaving his monastery traversed Syria and Egypt with the view to controverting their doctrines. He held public disputations with the chiefs of their party at Alexandria (Hodegos, c. x.), and, according to his own statement, confuted them thoroughly, and roused the popular indignation against them so as almost to lead to their being stoned. A full catalogue and description of his writings may be found in Fabricius Bibl. Græc. vol. ix. pp. 313-322, printed also in Migne's edition of his works. The most noteworthy are the following—(1) Ὁδηγος, or "Guide to the true way," written against the Monophysites, especially those known as the Acephali, entering fully upon the erroneous views of Severus, the Monophysite patriarch of Antioch and his followers the "Phthartolatrac" (cc. vi.-ix. xx.), as well as of their opponents, the Gajanitæ (Aphthartolocetæ. Phantasiastæ), the adherents of Juliannus Gaiannus, bishop of Halicarnassus (cc. x. xxiii.). This work is very deficient in order and method, but some of the disputations show considerable subtlety. It has been probably interpolated. (2) "Questions and Answers on Holy Scripture" (Ἐρωτήσεις καὶ Ἀποκρίσεις) 154 in number. In these, various difficulties—historical, theological, moral—are propounded and answered, chiefly from the writings of the fathers. This work also has been much interpolated. (3) Twelve books of Anagogical Contemplations on the Creation of the World and Fall of Man, "Anagogicæ Contemplationes in Hexaemeron ad Theophilum," of which the first eleven exist only in a Latin translation, the twelfth also in the original Greek. This work gives an allegorical interpretation of Gen. i.-iii. and only deserves reading for its ingenuity. Several sermons are given in Migne's edition, and a "Disputatio adversus Judæos." [E. V.]

ANASTASIUS, bishop of TENEDOS, a staunch supporter of Nestorius. At the Council of Ephesus he joined in the protest to Cyril against commencing proceedings before the arrival of John of Antioch (Labbe, Conc. iv. 264). He also subscribed the synodical letter of the Oriental bishops to the people of Hierapolis (ib. 271). After the council he resigned his see of his own accord, and spent his time in visiting the exiles (ib. p. 445). Le Quien (Or. Christ. i. 949) confidently identifies him with Anastasius, the presbyter who was the ally of Nestorius; but of this there is no evidence. [L.]

ANASTASIUS. (1) Abbot of the Monastery of St. Euthymius, in Palestine, whose error in referring the Trisagion to the Son alone led Jo. Damascenus to write his letter De Trisagio. There is great difference of opinion as to his date. Oudin places him c. 740, Adelung c. 875, and Fabricius also in the 9th cent. (Cf. Fabricius, Bibl. Græc. tom. ix. p. 336.) He wrote a treatise against Judaism, published in Latin, Canis, Antiq. Lect. iii. i. p. 123, and in the Bibl. Patr. tom. xiii. (Cave, Hist. Lit. i. p. 628.)

(2) Bishop of JERUSALEM, succeeded Juvenalis as 48th bishop A.D. 458. According to Cyril of Scythopolis (Acta Sancti Euthymii Abbat.), he had previously been a presbyter of the church of Jerusalem, and keeper of the sacred vessels of the church of the Resurrection, and a chorepiscopus. He was a disciple of St. Passarion, and emulated his virtues. Being led by a desire to become acquainted with one so famous for his holiness, to visit St. Euthymius at his Laura, he was saluted by him immediately on his arrival as "Patriarch of Jerusalem." Euthymius being apprised of his error, and his attention directed to the silk robes of Anastasius, replied that he had seen him in vision clad in the white robe of the patriarch, and that he would certainly attain that dignity (Baronius, ad ann. 458). [E. V.]

ANATOLIUS became bishop of CONSTANTINOPLE, 449 A.D., through the influence of Dioscorus of Alexandria with Theodosius II., after the deposition of Flavianus by the "Robber-Council," having previously been the "apocrisarius" or representative of Dioscorus at Constantinople (Zon. Ann. iii.). After his consecration, being under suspicion of Eutychianism (Leo, Epp. ad Theod. 33 ad Pulch. 35), he publicly condemned the heresies both of Eutyches and Nestorius, signing the letters of Cyril against Nestorius and of Leo against Eutyches (Leo, Epp. 40, 41, 48). In conjunction with Leo of Rome, according to Zonaras (Ann. iii.), he requested the Emperor Marcianus to summon a general council against Dioscorus and the Eutychians; but the imperial letter directing Anatolius to make preparations for the Council at Chalcedon speaks only of Leo (Labbe, Conc. Max. Tom. iv.). Nicephorus adds a story (Hist. xv. 5) that after the council Anatolius suggested a miraculous ordeal, which proved successful, of the Eutychian heresy (cf. Zonar. Ann. iii.). In this Council Anatolius presided in conjunction with the Roman legates (Labbe, Conc. Max. iv.; Evagr. Hist. ii. 4, 18; Niceph. Hist. xv. 18). By the famous 28th canon, passed at the conclusion of the Council, equal dignity was ascribed to Constantinople with Rome (Labbe, iv. 796; Evagr. ii. 18). Hence arose the controversy between Anatolius and the Roman pontiff. Leo complained to Marcianus (Ep. 54) and to Pulcheria (Ep. 55) that Anatolius had outstepped his jurisdiction, by consecrating Maximus to the see of Antioch; and he remonstrated with Anatolius himself (Ep. 53). Though at first suspicious of Anatolius as a friend of Dioscorus, Leo had subsequently expressed satisfaction at his formal disclaimer of heresy (Ep. ad Pulch. 45), but now he accuses him of latinianism, and, in particular, of having removed Aetius, an adherent of Flavians from the office of Archdeacon, in order to promote in his stead Andreas, a man of Eutychian sympathies (Epp. 56, 57). Anatolius reversed this arrangement (Leo. Ep. 71), but he naturally resented this interference, and these reiterated charges of ambition, especially from such a quarter (Leo. Ep. 78). Anatolius died in 458 A.D.

On the whole, if we except the consecration of Maximus, Anatolius seems to have acted with prudence and moderation under very trying circumstances, particularly at the Council. In the commencement of his episcopate he wrote to Leo, on behalf of some clergy who repented of the part which they had been forced into taking in the "Robber-Council" (Leo, Epp. 41, 44, 46). After the Council of Chalcedon some Egyptian bishops wrote to Anatolius, earnestly asking his assistance against Timotheus, who was usurping the episcopal throne at Alexandria (Labbe, Conc. Mar. iv. iii. 23, p. 897). Anatolius wrote strongly to the Emperor Leo against Timotheus (Labbe, iii. 26, p. 905). The circular of the emperor requesting the advice of Anatolius on the turbulent state of Alexandria is given by Evagrius (Hist. ii. 9), and by Nicephorus (Hist. xv. 18). The crowning of Leo on his accession by Anatolius is said (Gibbon, iii. 313) to be the first instance of the kind on record (Theoph. Chron. 95 Par.). [I. G. S.]

ANATOLIUS, bishop of LAODICEA in Syria Prima, succeeded his fellow-countryman Eusebius A.D. 269, διάδοχος ἀγαθὸς ἀγαθοῦ. (Euseb. H. E. vii. 32.) They were both from Alexandria, where Anatolius was in high repute for the wide extent of his knowledge of the liberal arts. Eusebius attributes to him excellence in arithmetic, geometry, astronomy, dialectics, rhetoric, and physics. He was requested by his fellow-townsmen to open an Aristotelian school. Nor was his eminence confined to intellectual pursuits. His reputation for practical wisdom was so great that when the suburb of Bruchesium was besieged by the Romans during the revolt of Aemilianus, A.D. 262, the command of the place was assigned to him. Provisions having failed, and his proposition of making terms with the besiegers having been indignantly rejected, Anatolius obtained leave to relieve the garrison of all idle mouths, and by a clever deception marched out all the Christians, and the greater part of the rest, many disguised as women, and placed them under the protection of Eusebius. Having passed over to Palestine, he was ordained by Theotecnus, bishop of Caesarea, as bishop-coadjutor, with the right of succession. But going to Antioch to attend the synod assembled against Paul of Samosata, on his way through Laodicea, which had just lost its bishop, his old friend Eusebius, he was detained and made bishop in his room, A.D. 269.

Eusebius speaks of him as not having written much, but enough to show at once his eloquence and manifold learning. He specially mentions a work on the Paschal question, published in a Latin version by Bucherius, Doct. Temp., Antv. 1634. Some fragments of his mathematical works were published at Paris, 1543, and by Fabricius, Bibl. Graec. i. i. 462 (Hieron. Sc. Eccl. c. 73). [E. V.]

ANATOLIUS, patrician, Consul A.D. 440, and "Magister Militum" in the East, where his wise and just administration gained universal respect and esteem. His sympathies were with the orthodox portion of the Church, who owed much to his protection. During his residence in the East he was a frequent hearer of Theodoret, whom he regarded with sincere reverence, and with whom he formed a confidential intimacy. The mutual friendship that subsisted between Theodoret and Anatolius is evidenced by the letters of the former, after his powerful friend's removal to the seat of government. In any trouble affecting himself or his diocese, Theodoret at once invoked the aid of Anatolius, who on his part appears to have done his utmost to obtain what he desired. When, c. 444, through the false representations of a deprived bishop, perhaps Athanasius of Perrha, the taxes and imposts of some of the Eastern provinces, including Theodoret's own of Euphratensis, had been largely increased, to the great distress of the district, Theodoret wrote to Anatolius, testifying to the universal sorrow felt at his departure, and begging him still to watch over the interests of the province, and obtain a remission of their burdens. (Theodt. Ep. xiv.) When, early in 449, Theodoret received the emperor's prohibition to quit his diocese, he had immediate recourse to Anatolius to learn whether the rescript was an authentic document, and to entreat the emperor not to condemn him unheard. The calumnies circulated against him at Constantinople formed the subject of subsequent letters; and when his deposition by the Latrocinium had actually taken place, he sought leave through the same channel to visit Constantinople and lay his case before the bishops of the West. As an evidence of his own orthodoxy, he forwarded St. Leo's letters addressed to Flavian, then recently deceased. His restoration by Marcian in 451 called forth another grateful letter, acknowledging the share Anatolius had had in it, and requesting him to convey his thanks to the emperor and empress, and his request that they would summon a true Council. (Theodt. Ep. lxxix. xxi. cxix. cxxi. cxxxviii.) On the assembly of the Council of Chalcedon, Anatolius represented his imperial master, and took the lead in demanding the admission of Theodoret. (Labbe, Concil. 850, 874, 1443.) [E. V.]

ANDIBERIS, a layman of Cyrus, to whom Theodoret wrote during his banishment, begging him to endeavour to retain a certain Peter, presbyter and physician, whom he had induced to settle at Cyrus, but who was now proposing to quit the city on account of his exile. (Theodt. Ep. 114.) [E. V.]

ANDREAS CAESARIENSIS. [ARETAS.]

ANDREAS CRETENSIS, so called from having been archbishop of Crete, was born at Damascus, and passed some years at Jerusalem, from which he is known as Ἱεροσολυμίτης, ὁ Ἱεροσολύμων, though there is no ground for the supposition that he was ever bishop of that see. Theodoret, bishop of Jerusalem, deputed him to attend the 6th General Council, held at Constantinople A.D. 680, to support the orthodox faith against the Monothelites. A copy of iambic verses is printed by Combefis, Auctar. Nov. ii. and by Migne, in which he thanks Agatho, the archdeacon and keeper of the archives, for having communicated to him the acts of that council. At Constantinople he was ordained deacon, and appointed guardian of orphans. He subsequently became archbishop of Crete, whence it has been maintained by some, from a confusion of two persons bearing the same name, that he was transferred to Caesarea in Cappadocia (Oudin de Script. Eccl. Suppl. p. 190). Oudin and Papebroch have advanced reasons for supposing that the date usually assigned to Andreas is incorrect, and that he should be placed A.D. 840-850. But it is probable that here also a similarity of name has misled them, and that some of the works on which their arguments are based were by later namesakes. (See Cave, Hist. Lit. i. p. 453.)

The works which go under the name of Andreas Cretensis comprise Homilies and Canons, Triodia and other rhythmical compositions, from the latter of which he has derived his chief celebrity. He is famous in the Greek Church as the author of the Magnus Canon (of which Combefis says, "vix habuerunt Graeci augustius avitae pietatis monumentum"), still sung, "cum labore multo et pulmonum fatigatione," on the Thursday before Palm Sunday, known as "Festum τοῦ μεγάλου κανόνος." This ode, which is of prodigious length (occupying 28 columns in Migne) and considerable beauty, is of a deeply penitential character, in which the soul goes through a list of the chief sinners and saints of Holy Writ, likening itself to the one, and lamenting how far it falls short of the other. Migne's collection also contains a Canon on Lazarus, a Triodion for Palm Sunday, Idionela, &c. Of his Homilies, 21 have been published; 19 still remain in MS. Among the former are four on the Nativity of the B. V. Mary, one on the Annunciation (the earliest notice of that Festival), and three on The Sleep of the B. V. Mary. These are of interest, as illustrating the growth of the cultus of the Virgin, and as forming one of the earliest authorities for the legendary history of her parents, Joachim and Anna, and her own childhood. In them we find some of the first examples of the flowery and turgid language with which later developments have made us so familiar. Mary is styled "The Diadem of Beauty," "The Rod of Aaron," "The Sceptre of David," "The Mediatrix of the Law and Grace," "The Common Refuge of all Christians." There are also Homilies on St. George, St. Nicolas of Myra, St. Patapius, &c., full of miraculous legends.

The works of Andreas were first published by Combefis, in conjunction with those of Amphilo-chius and Methodius (Paris, 1644); as well as in his Auctarium Novum (Par. 1648, pp. 1290 sq.); and by Galland (Bibl. Patr. xiii. 689) and by Migne (Patrol. vol. xcvii.). A Computus Paschalis, ascribed to him, was published by Petavius (Doctr. Temp. vol. iii. p. 393). There is great reason to question the genuineness of some of the works attributed to him. A commentary on the Apocalypse, printed by Combefis, probably belongs to his namesake of Caesarea. (Fabr. Bibl. Graec. xi. 62; Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 453; Oudin, ii. 174-188; Schröckh, xx. 135 sq.; Gallandi, Bibl. Patr. xiii. 6; Combefis, Bibl. Concinat. i. 4.)

[E. V.]

ANDREAS SAMOSATENSIS, so called from being bishop of Samosata at the time of the Council of Ephesus A.D. 431. Sickness prevented his attending the council (Labbe, Concil. iii. 506); but he took a leading part in the controversies between Cyril and the Oriental bishops that succeeded it. Without identifying himself with the erroneous teaching ascribed to Nestorius, he showed himself his zealous defender, and remained firm to him when his cause had been deserted by almost all. For his zeal in the defence of an heresiarch he is styled by Anastasius Sinaita ὁ δρᾶκων. The reputation of Andreas for learning and controversial skill caused John of Antioch to select him, together with his attached friend Theodoret, to answer Cyril's anathemas against Nestorius. (Labbe, iii. 1150; Liberatus, c. iv. p. 16.) Cyril replied and wrote in defence of his anathemas, which called forth a second treatise from Andreas (Labbe, iii. 827). When Rabulas, bishop of Edessa, had gone over to the ranks of Cyril's supporters, and published an anathematization of Nestorian writings, he included Andreas by name. Rabulas's clergy did not share in the changed views of their bishop, who, with all the zeal of a new convert, appears to have made their lives so bitter to them, that they seriously entertained the question of separating from his communion. The question was referred by them to Andreas, who laid the matter before his venerable metropolitan, Alexander of Hierapolis, by whom it was sent on to his patriarch, John of Antioch. Of his decision we are ignorant. (Baluz. Nov. Collect. Concil. 748, 749.) In 453 Andreas accompanied Alexander and Theodoret to the council summoned at Antioch by Aristolous the tribune, in compliance with the commands of Theodosius, to consult how the breach with Cyril might be healed. (Ib. 764.) On the amicable reception by Acacius and John of Cyril's letter written in answer to the rescript of this council, Andreas fully sympathized with his aged metropolitan Alexander's distress and indignation. Alexander communicated to him copies of all the documents that had passed, and letters were interchanged in which Andreas laments the gradual weakening of the opposition. (Ib. 764, 765, 796.) These feelings were much heightened when peace was re-established between Cyril and the East. Andreas deplored the recognition of Cyril's orthodoxy by so many bishops, and desired to bury himself in some solitude where he might weep. (Ib. 784, 785, 796, 797.) This was before he had seen Cyril's letter. On perusing Cyril's own statement his opinions changed. What Cyril had written was orthodox. No prejudice against him ought to prevent his acknowledging it. The peace of the Church was superior to all private feelings. His alteration of sentiments exasperated Alexander, who refused to see or speak to his former friend. (Ib. 810, 811.) Andreas deeply felt this alienation of one he so much venerated, but it could not lead him to retrace his steps. He used his utmost endeavours in vain to persuade Alexander to attend the council at Zeugma, at which the orthodoxy of Cyril's letter was acknowledged. (Ib. 805.) Towards the end of the same year 433, Andreas undertook a journey to Edessa, partly to avoid the violent opposition raised against him in his own diocese, as a traitor to the faith, by one Gemellinus, probably one of his clergy; partly to become reconciled to Rabulas. On his way he was arrested by illness. From his sick-bed he wrote a wise and conciliatory letter to Alexander. The answer was as uncompromising as before. The reply of Andreas, manly but respectful, expresses his grief at Alexander's unchanged views. At the same time he wrote to the "Oeconomi" of Hierapolis declaring his faith, and his determination to adhere to the communion of Pope Sixtus, John of Antioch, and Rabulas. (Ib. 807-9.)

When Domnus assembled a council at Antioch, A.D. 444, to hear the cause of Athanasius of Perrha, Andreas was summoned to attend it; but was kept away by ill health. (Labbe, Concil. iv. 739.) The date of his death is unknown, but it must have been before 451, when Rufinus was bishop of Samosata. Theodoret speaks of Andreas with much affection and esteem, and praises his humility, and readiness to help the needy and distressed. (Theodoret, Epist. xxiv. p. 918.) His own letters give us a high idea of his sound, practical wisdom, his readiness to confess his error when convinced that he was in the wrong, and his firmness in maintaining what he believed to be right. [E. V.]

ANENOLETUS. [CLETUS.]

ANGELICI. Epiphanius (Haer. lxx. 505 f.) had heard of a sect bearing this name, but could obtain no further information. His conjectures do not deserve mention. For the name compare ARCHONTICI and ARCHON. [H.]

ANGELOLATRY. The tendency to pass from the feeling of reverence and love to that of adoration, is at once recognised, and rebuked in the well-known passages of Rev. xix. 10, xxii. 9. In Col. ii. 18, the θηρασκεία τῶν ἀγγέλων appears as fully developed, and as connected with wild dreams and visions. And it is noticeable that when that worship became prominent enough to call for distinct condemnation, it is in the same region, and accompanied by the same remnants of a Jewish thaumaturgic theosophy. The Council of Laodicea, A.D. 364, forbids Christians (c. 35), to "leave the Church of God and go away and ἀγγέλους ὀνομάζειν," and hold secret communions (συνάξεις)." It stigmatises the practice as a "secret idolatry," passes on in its next canon to condemn priests who are "magicians, or enchanters, or mathematici, or astrologers," or who make "phylacteries," and then, in c. 37-38, warns men against taking part in Jewish feasts, or receiving from Jews or heretics the paschal ἄζυμα. So, too, Theodoret (Comm. in Col. ii.) states that the heretics thus referred to, were Judaizers, who maintained that angels should be worshipped, as having been agents in revealing the law on Sinai. These practices, he says, had infested Phrygia and Pisidia for a long time, and throughout the whole district were to be seen Oratories dedicated to St. Michael, to which, apparently, people gave a preference over the usual places of assembly. The language of the earlier Fathers as to such a practice is uniformly that of deprecation. An ambiguous passage in Justin (Apol. i. 6) seems indeed to allow "worship and adoration," but whatever degree of reverence is sanctioned, is always distinguished from that which is to be paid to God. Irenaeus (ii. 57) speaks of the Church as "doing nothing by the invocation of Angels." Origen (c. Cels. viii. 57-58) protests against worshipping them "instead of God." Augustine (de Ver. Relig. c. 55) defines the limits of reverence, "Honoramus eos caritate, non de virtute, nec eis templa construimus," and in his Confessions (x. 42) condemns the practice as leading to "visions and illusions." The second Council of Nicaea, dealing with the larger question of the cultus that might be paid to images, included those of angels as worthy of προσκύνησις, but not of the λατρεία, which was due to God alone. [E. H. P.]

ANGELS. It will be necessary briefly to recapitulate the belief which the Church inherited from the writings of the O. T., and yet more from those of the N. T. as to the nature and functions of Angels. To trace the growth of that belief itself belongs to an earlier stage of inquiry; but to know what it actually was when it started on its new course, is a necessary condition of our being able to estimate rightly what forces acted, and what new accretions supervened, on it.

Men found then in Scripture the recognition of an undefined multitude of beings, who bore the name of the 'Angels' or 'Messengers' of God. They were the "host of heaven," the "Army" of the Great King. They are reckoned, like the armies of earth, by "legions." It was in relation to them, prominently, if not exclusively, that He was spoken of as the Lord God of Sabaoth* (2 Sam. vi. 2. et al.). They were known as "the Sons of God" (Job i. 6, ii. 1); they were λειτουργικά πνεύματα, worshipping in the Eternal Temple, with hymns of praise (Heb. i. 14; 1s. vi. 3; Ps. cxlviii. 2 et al.), sent forth to minister for the heirs of salvation (Heb. i. 14). They, even the highest who "behold the face" of God, watch over little children (Matt. xviii. 10). There is joy in their presence over "one sinner that repenteth" (Luke xv. 10). They had rejoiced in the work of creation (Job xxxviii. 7), they had appeared to Patriarchs, and Prophets, and Apostles. They watched over the unfolding of God's purpose in the events of the world's history (1 Kings xxii. 19; Dan. x. 12, 13). They were His agents in the work of pestilence and death; they were manifested on the night of the Nativity. One had brought the message of the Incarnation (Luke i. 26). They ministered to Our Lord after His Temptation and in His Agony (Matt. iv. 11; Luke xxii. 43). They announced the fact of the Resurrection to the sorrowing disciples (Matt. xxviii. 2; Luke xxiv. 4; Mark xvi. 5), and after the Ascension, told them that their Lord should come again as they had seen Him go (Acts i. 11). They were to come at that

* The writer of this article is compelled to differ from Mr. Grove, who in his art. 'Sabaoth,' in the Dict. of the Bible, limits the meaning of the word to the "armies" of earth. But 1 Kings xxii. 19, Ps. cxli. 21, cxlviii. 2, are decisive against such a limitation. The word is, of course, an inclusive one, and is used again and again of sun, moon, and stars as "the host of heaven" (Deut. iv. 19, xvii. 3; 2 Kings xvii. 16; Jer. xix. 15, et al.). It might, indeed, be legitimately contended that the meaning which Mr. Grove assigns as the only one is entirely subordinate. The God of the armies of Heaven is thought of by a natural analogy as the King who also commands the "armies" of His people.

* The words manifestly refer to some practice analogous to that of the Essenes mentioned under ANGELS.
CHRIST. BIOGR.

second Advent in the train of the Son of Man (Matt. 25. 31), and were to be His agents in the work of judgment (Mark xiii. 27). The "trump of the Archangel" is to be the signal of the general resurrection (1 Thess. iv. 16). Meantime they "desire to look into" the mysteries of the coming glory (1 Pet. i. 12), and the day and the hour of the παρουσία itself are hidden from them (Mark xiii. 32). An angel delivered Peter (Acts xii. 7), and smote Herod (Acts xii. 23) and appeared to Cornelius at Caesarea (Acts x. 3), and stood by St. Paul during his shipwreck (Acts xxvii. 23). When they were visibly manifested to men, it was as young men in long white garments, after the pattern i. e. of the dress of the Priests and Levites of the Temple (Mark xvi. 5; Acts i. 11). Like those Priests, they blow the trumpet, and offer incense (Rev. viii. 2-4). And in this great "host of God" there were orders and degrees. Pre-eminence was indicated by names like "captain of the Lord's host" (Josh. v. 14), "Michael, one of the chief princes" (Dan. x. 13), the Angel of the presence (i. e. Heb., the face), of God (Isaiah lxiii. 9), those that "stand in the presence of God" (Luke i. 19), and "behold His face" (Matt. xviii. 10). There are Archangels (1 Thess. iv. 16; Jude v. 9), Cherubim, Seraphim (whatever had been the original connotation of the words, they had come to be identified with angels in the first days of Christendom), "thrones, dominions, principalities, and powers" (Col. i. 16; Eph. i. 21). The number of these Archangels had been given in one of the books of the Canon of the LXX. as "seven" (Tobit xii. 15). To two of them names had been given in the Canonical Books, Gabriel ("the hero of God"), and Michael ("Who is like unto God?"). Another, Raphael ("the healing of God") appeared in Tobit (l. c.). There were tendencies in the Apostolic Age to a "worshipping of angels" (Col. ii. 18). The Apocalypse had at once recognised that worship as so natural that even the beloved Apostle was infected by it, and represented the angel himself as deprecating it, and describing his position as being simply that of a "fellow slave" of the Apostles and Prophets of the Church (Rev. xix. 10, xxii. 8). And there had also been angels that had not "kept their first estate" (Jude v. 6). They also had a captain of their host, a prince of demons (Matt. xii. 24). They too, while some were "kept in chains under darkness to the great day" (Jude l. c.) were, some of them, sent forth by their chief, the "prince of the power of the air" (Eph. ii. 2) to work evil, moral and physical, among men, sometimes in that work, though against their will, carrying into effect the counsels of the Supreme God.

We have now to trace the after-growths of speculation that gathered round what had thus been received as of divine authority. It is obvious that it was precisely in this region, where there was no sharply defined test of truth, that imagination was likely to be most active. Probably the language of the N. T. itself, does but represent a part of the floating belief of the time. Those who passed from Judaism to Christianity, and they were almost everywhere the nucleus of the Church, brought with them a full, one might almost call it a monstrous, angelology. The Essenes, whose influence cannot be excluded from the history of Christian dogma, made it one of the vows of their brotherhood, that those who were admitted to it should not disclose to others "the names of the Angels" (Joseph. B. J. ii. 8, § 7). And it is clear, so far as Christian speculations are traceable to an external source, that it is in this direction that we must look. The philosophy of Greece had nothing to contribute to them.^b It was only by insensible degrees that the superstitions of Polytheism crept into the Church, and attached themselves to ANGELOLOGY.

The love of dogmatic definiteness in all things, led men in this, as in other regions of thought, to ask manifold questions, and then to make answer to themselves—(1.) When were the Angels created? The silence of Gen. i., though they saw in it a wise reserve, guarding the Jews from the perils of creature-worship (Chrysost. Hom. i. in Gen. i. p. 81; Theodor. Quaest. in Gen. ii.; Pseudo-Athanas. Quaest. ad Ant. iv. vol. iii. p. 333), and therefore, confining the narrative to the creation of the visible universe (Chrys. in Ps. viii.), did not hinder them from "rushing" into the annals of the invisible. (a) Some held, with Origen, that their existence went far back "before the aeons," that even then they worshipped and obeyed (Origen. Hom. i. in Gen.; Hom. iv. in Isaian. Tract. ix. in Matth. De Princip. i. 5, 8). (b) Others, more moderately, were content to assert the priority of all the "unseen" creatures of God over the things that are "seen," and of the "spiritual" over the "material." Angels were created before the work of Gen. i. began. The LXX. translation of Job xxxviii. 7. ὅτε ἐγένετο ἄστρα, ἤνεσαν με πάντες ἄγγελοι μου, was naturally pressed into the service of this view (Greg. Naz. Orat. xxxviii. p. 617; Chrysost. Orat. πρὸς τοὺς σκανδ. c. 7). (c) Others, still seeking to satisfy the conditions of Job xxxviii. 7, placed this creation of angels on the first of the six days, as included in the word "heavens" (Epiphani. Haer. lxxv. p. 264; Theodoret Quaest. iv. in Gen.)

(2.) Then came the question: What was their nature? Had they bodies? Were they, with or without bodies, subject to the limitations of space? And here there were discordant answers. (a.) They were ἀσώματα καὶ νοερά (Iguat. ad Trall.; Euseb. Dem. Evang. iv. p. 105; Chrysost. tom. vi. Hom. xvii., tom. v. Hom. cvii.). Their forms were but phenomenal. They assume any shape that God wills. (b.) Others, baffled in their attempts to conceive individual existence, apart from material limitations, ascribe to them σώματα λέπτα (Macar. Aegypt. Hom. iv. p. 117), a body "sui generis" (Tertull. de Carne Christi, c. vi.), "like fire or air" (Caesarius Dial. i. Interr. 48). As the passage in Job was the battlefield of the first question, so here that which most occupied men's thoughts were the words of Gen. vi. 2, which state that "the sons of God"^c took to themselves wives of the daughters of men. Josephus, clearly expressing the prevalent

^b The question how far the angelology of Christendom is connected with that of the Zendavesta belongs to biblical, not ecclesiastical antiquity. If there were any such connection, it was clearly through Judaism as the intermediate link.

^c A touch of Platonism is perhaps traceable here.

^d It is clear from the quotations in the Fathers that many MSS. of the LXX. rendered the phrase by οἱ ἄγγελοι τοῦ θεοῦ (August. De Civ. Dei, xv. 23; Cyril. c. Julian. ix. p. 296).

belief of his countrymen, had identified them with the Angels (Ant. i. iv.). It kept its ground for the first four centuries, was asserted in the Apolog. of Justin (p. 130), and Athenagoras (Legat. p. 26), adopted by Clement of Alexandria (Paedag. iii. p. 222.; Strom. iii. p. 450); Tertullian (de Hab. Mulieb. ii. 17; de Cultu Femin. x.), and many others. Chrysostom (Hom. xvii. in Gen.) followed by Theodoret (Qu. xvii. in Gen.), and the Pseudo-Athanasius (Quaest. ad Ant. lvii.), resolutely opposed it, on the ground that the angels, being incorporeal, could not know corporeal appetites, and gave currency to what has since been the more commonly received interpretation, which identifies "the sons of God" with the descendants of Seth, ascribing the evil of the antediluvian period, to their intermarriage with the daughters of Cain's progeny.

Then came the question,—(3). How and when was it that the evil Angels fell. The answer most commonly given was that it was through pride, and that they followed their great chief (as in Milton's Paradise Lost) in a rebellious struggle for supremacy. Those who interpreted Gen. vi. 2, of "angels" made the fall of those there mentioned, the result of the admission of sensuous lust, following the apparent meaning of Jude iv. 6, 7, and, in that case, if they arranged events in a chronological order, must have looked on this as a second apostacy, adding to the number of the hosts of Satan.

(4). Men began to speculate even as to the statistics and polity of angel-life. The "twelve legions" of Matt. xxvi. 53, the "ten thousands" of the holy ones of Deut. xxxiii. 2, the "thousand thousands" ministering, the "ten thousand times ten thousand" standing, of Dan. vii. 10, the "innumerable company" of Heb. xii. 22, were taken as giving hints as to the number of the heavenly host. The parable of the lost sheep led Irenaeus (iii. 21 and 39), Origen (Hom. ii. in Gen.), Ambrose (Apol. Dav. c. 5), and others, to make the proportion of Angels to men, as 99 to 1. It became a current belief, that the gap made by the apostacy of the rebels, would be filled up with numerical exactness, by the saints gathered from the redeemed human race* (August. Enclis. c. 29). And in this immense multitude there was a hierarchy of orders, each with its appointed functions. The existence of such a hierarchy was asserted by the second Council of Constantinople, c. 2 and 14 (so also 2 Nicaen. iii. c. 4), and appeared in its fully developed form, stamped, through it, upon mediæval theology, in the treatise De Hierarchiâ, ascribed to Dionysius the Areopagite. Here the orders are nine in number, each with a character of its own, though human language fails to express the conception of each distinctly. So we have—

| | | 2. The Cherubim, with their many eyes, beholding God, and so excelling in knowledge. |

* A trace of this belief lingers perhaps in the prayer that God would "shortly accomplish the number of His elect" in the Church of England Burial Service. The thought was familiar to the Schoolmen. Comp. Roger Bacon, Comp. Studiï, c. 1; Pet. Lomb. ii. 9.

It will be seen, that in this classification (Dion. de Coelest. Hierarch. vi. et al.; comp. Mr. Westcott's article on 'Dionysius the Areopagite' in Contemporary Review, vol. v.), those that are strictly Angels—sent on the tasks which God gives them—are placed in the third or lowest group.

(5). The nature and extent of the guardianship exercised over individual men by Angels, was a region in which the imagination might wander freely. Reproducing, consciously or unconsciously, the thoughts and language of Jewish Rabbis (Jalqut. Kadesh. t. 147), Origen taught that the whole visible universe was in all its parts under their control. There were angels of the brute creation,^f angels even of the plants (Hom. xiv. in Num.: c. Cels. viii. p. 416). He warns men not to lead such a life as will bring them under the brute angels, but by prayer, to come into fellowship with Michael, who offers the prayers of the Saints, or by healing souls, into that of Raphael (de Princ. i. 8, iii. 3). Every converted soul, he teaches, has ten thousand holy powers praying with him unbidden (c. Cels. viii. p. 420). So, in like manner the idea of angelic presence was connected specially with the two great Sacraments. The font, or tank, of Baptism was thought to receive its regenerating power in part through their agency, and was accordingly known as the κολυμβήθρα (the allusion to John v. 2, is obvious), and the form of an angel was accordingly sculptured in most baptisteries. The presence of the Ter-Sanctus in all Liturgies, implies that from the very first, they were thought of in connexion with the Supper of the Lord, the praises of the Church in its most solemn act ascending with those of "Angels and Archangels," and gives some countenance to the interpretation of 1 Cor. xi. 10, which makes St. Paul urge their presence in the Ecclesia as a reason for decency and order. Women are not to go unveiled "because of the Angels."

The Names of Angels.—Two only, it will be remembered, are named in the Canonical Books, both appearing for the first time in Daniel. Gabriel (Dan. viii. 16, ix. 21; Luke. i. 19, 26), and Michael (Dan. x. 13, 21, xii. 1). The appearance of Raphael in Tobit (v. 4, 15), shews that that also was familiar during the Alexandrian period of Judaism. And these three names have kept throughout a pre-eminence, both in Jewish and Christian thought, over all others. They were looked on in the Talmud as the three that had appeared to Abraham in Gen. xviii. (Joma. f. 37; Pesach. f. 113). They only are recognised in the Liturgies of the Eastern and Western Churches. Uriel appears in 2 Esdras iv. i., x. 23, and was thought of as the Angel of Light, one of the chief Seven. To these, the Jews added Ruchael, the Angel of the Wind; Abdiel, the Servant of God; Sammael, the Angel of Death, and others: while the names of Jophiel, Chamuel, and Zadkiel appear in the more obscure Christian traditions. A full account of the development of Jewish angelology, may be found in Eisenmenger. Entd. Judenth. ii. c. 7; and in the art. Engel. by Böhmer in Herzog's Real-Encyclopädie. But the three above-named are all that connect themselves with Christian archæology, and the facts, connected with them, will be found under their respective names. (For the full scholastic developments of Angelology see Pet. Lomb. ii. 2-12, and Aquin. Summ. Theol. i. qu. 50-65, 106-113. ANIANUS (called also Adrianus by Sozomen), presbyter of Antioch, was ordained bishop of that church at the turbulent council of Seleucia, A.D. 359, in the room of Eudoxius, who, together with Acacius and others, had been deposed by the majority of the bishops present. The Acacian party immediately arrested the newly-made bishop, and delivered him into the hands of the civil authorities Leonas and Laurentius, by whom he was committed to a military guard, and then sent into exile. The consecrating bishops lodged a protest against these violent proceedings in the hands of the same authorities, and finding the step useless, proceeded to Constantinople to present their complaint to the Emperor Constantius. The subsequent fortunes of Anianus are not known. Nicephorus gives 4 years to his episcopate, but his numbers are not to be trusted (Soer. H. E. ii. 40; Soz. H. E. iv. 22; Clinton, F. R.) [E. V.]

ANICETUS, bishop of Rome, stated in Eusebius's History (iv. 11) to have succeeded Pius in A.D. 157, in his Chronicle a year earlier (f. 87). According however to Pearson and Dodwell's verification of the dates, the year of his accession would be A.D. 142. Anastasius Bibliothecarius singles him out as the pope who prescribed the tonsure for the clergy (Anast. vol. i. p. 13); and a forged letter upon this subject is given by Isidorus Mercator (Constant. p. 75). But the single reliable fact that is recorded of him has reference to the early Paschal Controversy (Euseb. H. E. iv. 24). He, like his four predecessors, did not allow the Jewish or Quartodeciman usage within their own Church, but communicated as freely as before with other Churches which did allow it. In A.D. 159, Polycarp visited Rome, with the intention of persuading Anicetus to adopt the Quartodeciman practice. But Anicetus was firm, even against the age and saintliness of Polycarp. As a mark of personal respect, he allowed him to celebrate the Eucharist in Rome; but they parted without agreement on this point, though with mutual cordiality. We are told that Anicetus was buried in the Calixtine cemetery on April 20th; the year would be A.D. 168, if we trust Eusebius's date (H. E. iv. 19): but Pearson fixes it A.D. 161, Dodwell A.D. 153. (Pearson, De serie et successione primorum Romæ epp. pp. 274-314; Dodwell, de Pont. Romanorum primatû successione, p. 221.) [G. H. ⁵ So Milton places him in the sun, as its guardian angel Par. Lost, iii. 618.

ANNA, king of the East Angles. He was the son of Eni, the brother of Redwald, and succeeded the kings Sigeberth and Egric, who were killed by Penda in 635. The conversion of the East Angles was carried out under Anna, by Fursej, whose monastery at Cnobharesburg was greatly embellished by him, and by the bishops Felix, Thomas, and Berhtgils, in connexion with the Kentish mission. The piety of Anna and his family was very famous, and little else is known about him. In 645 he received Cænwalh, king of Wessex, at his court, and gave him an asylum for the three years of his exile. Bede mentions of Anna's children, Sexberga, the wife of Earconbert, king of Kent, afterwards abbess of Ely:—Ethelberga, abbess of Farmoutier; and Etheldreda, abbess of Ely. To these Florence of Worcester adds Wihthburga, a nun at Ely; and the Liber Eliensis two sons Aldulf and Jurminus. But the latter authority confounds the family of Anna with that of his brother Ethelhere. The close connexion of Anna with the Christian powers in Kent, Northumbria and Wessex, and perhaps some pretension to the position of his brother Redwald, seems to have drawn on him the enmity of Penda, who in 654 attacked, defeated, and slew him (Bede, H. E. iii. 7, 8, 19; Liber Eliensis, ed. Stewart. p. 14, 15). [S.]

ANNE, ST. Anna (Heb. חַנָּה, grace, or prayer; Gr. Ἄρρα), the wife of Joachim and mother of the Virgin Mary.

The story of her married life and the wondrous birth of her daughter is found in three of the Apocryphal Gospels.

The narrative in the Evangelium de Nativitate S. Mariæ (Thilo's Codex Apocryphus, pp. 319 ff.), and in the Evang. de Nativ. Mariæ et Infantia Salvatoris (Thilo. pp. 337 ff.), is as follows:—

The virgin was born at Nazareth, to which city her father Joachim belonged; while Anna, her mother, was a native of Bethlehem. Joachim and Anna were pious and faultless before men, and their lives were plain and right in the sight of the Lord, and in this manner they lived more than twenty years without any children. Every feast in the year they went to the temple of the Lord, vowing that if blessed with any issue they would devote it to the service of God. At the feast of the dedication, Joachim with others of his tribe presented himself with his offering, and was reproached by the high priest with his childless condition. Overcome with shame, he took refuge with the shepherds in the pastures, not daring to return home and meet the taunts of his neighbours. After he had been there some time the angel of the Lord appeared to him with a prodigious light, and exhorted him to "Fear not, for his prayers were heard, and his alms had ascended before God." Then after referring to Sarah, Rachel, and the mothers of Samson and Samuel, he added that Anna also, though barren and advanced in years, should bear a daughter, whose name should be called Mary, from whom while yet a virgin should be born the Son of the most High God, Jesus, the Saviour of all nations. In token whereof, Joachim, at the golden gate of Jerusalem, would meet Anna his wife coming forth to meet him, much troubled that he had not returned sooner. The angel afterwards appeared to Anna, to whom he revealed himself as the angel who had offered up her prayers and alms unto God, and who was sent to tell her that a daughter should be born to her whose name was to be Mary; he also gave directions for the bringing up of the holy child, and foretold the glory reserved for her as the virgin mother of the Lord.

Anna was further instructed by the angel to go to the golden gate, where she would meet her husband, which she did accordingly, and they both praised the Lord "who exalts the humble." They then returned home, and "lived in a cheerful and assured expectation of the promise of God;" and in due time Anna brought forth a daughter, and "according to the angel's command the parents did call her Mary."

In the Protevangelium Jacobi (Thilo, pp. 161 ff.), the story of the Virgin's parents stands as follows:—

A certain man named Joachim, being very rich, made double offerings to the Lord, having resolved that his substance should be for the benefit of the whole people; that so he might obtain mercy, and the forgiveness of his sins. At one of the great feasts, when the children of Israel were presenting their offerings to the Lord, Joachim was repulsed by Reuben the high priest, who said it was not lawful for him to offer gifts who "had begotten no issue in Israel." In great distress of mind Joachim went to consult the registries of the twelve tribes, and found that all the righteous had raised up seed in Israel, and calling to mind that to Abraham in the end of his life Isaac had been born, he retired into the wilderness, where he pitched a tent, and fasted forty days and forty nights, resolving that prayer should be his meat and drink until the Lord should look down upon him.

In the mean time, Anna, his wife, was bewailing her widowhood and her barrenness. Troubled by the words of her maid Judith, who reproached her mistress with being under God's curse, in that she was not a mother in Israel, she went into her garden and sat under a laurel tree. While there she prayed unto God to regard her prayer and bless her, as He had blessed Sarah in giving her Isaac her son. Looking up she perceived a sparrow's nest in the laurel, and bemoaned her barrenness, which made her accursed before the children of Israel, and caused her to be derided in the temple of God; nay, which placed her below the brutes,—the waters of the sea,—the very earth itself. Then an angel of the Lord stood by her, and told her that God had heard her prayer, that she should bring forth, and her progeny should be spoken of in all the world. Anna immediately vowed that her offspring, whether male or female, should be devoted to the Lord. Two angels then appeared, announcing the approach of Joachim with his shepherds. When Anna saw him coming, she ran and hung about his neck, giving thanks to God who had removed from her the double curse of widowhood and barrenness. Joachim abode the first day in his house, and on the morrow brought his offerings, praying that the plate on the priest's forehead might make it manifest that the Lord was propitious unto him. The desired token was granted, and he went down from the temple of the Lord justified, and he went to his own house. In due time Anna was delivered of a child, and said to the midwife "What have I brought forth?" who answered, "A girl." Then Anna said, "The Lord hath this day magnified my soul"; and when the days of her purification were accomplished she gave suck to the child, and called her name Mary.

It is obvious that there are in this narrative traits derived from the histories of the births of Isaac and Samuel, of Samson and the Shunammite's son; a more exact parallel still is the birth of St. John the Baptist. The cultus of the Virgin (more especially the growing enthusiasm for the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception) supplied the motive, and these instances of miraculous birth recorded with Divine authority supplied the ready pattern for the construction of such a legend.

Notwithstanding the wide currency of the legend in later times, no mention of the Virgin's parents occurs in the fathers of the first three centuries. Epiphanius, who was made Bishop of Salamis in Cyprus, in 368, is the first to mention them, speaking of the Virgin Mary as "the daughter of Anna and Joachim" (Hæres. 78, 17, p. 1042), and they are also named by Gregory Nyssen. In the teeth of these authorities Pellicia (Eccles. Politia, iv. 11, § 6) asserts that the names of the Virgin's parents are not mentioned earlier than the 7th century, when they occur for the first time in the Chronicon Paschale.

John of Damascus, writing early in the 8th century, gives the story of her barrenness and of her prayer for a child; and when her prayer is granted, he says, "Itaque Gratia (= Anna) peperit Dominam," and he seems to hint his own faith in the story by calling her "lectissimam illam et summis laudibus dignam mulierem."

In the Bollandist account the author of the commentary on the Hexahemeron^a is quoted for assigning a supernatural character to the birth of the blessed Virgin; and it is implied, but not expressly stated, that her birth was not due to natural causes.

More than one church has claimed the distinction of possessing her head, and many have boasted of less important relics. About the time of Charlemagne, the legend of St. Anne, and the circulation of stories and extracts from the Apocryphal Gospels, made her name familiar to the churches of the West; and she soon attained a wide celebrity in the Latin Church, and, in Spain especially, became the patron saint of many churches.

It was not until the year 1584 that the observance of her festival was imposed by authority on the Western Church, but long before that time the feast of St. Anne had become general and popular; and her place in early and in later religious art corresponds very nearly with the date of this authoritative recognition of her as a saint, for up to the end of the 15th century the parents of the Virgin appear only as subordinate to the Virgin herself,^b that is, they form one group only of the series of figures associated with her life. Later on St. Anne appears in devotional art not merely as an historical personage but as occupying an independent position, and as herself the object of reverence or of worship. Kuper, the Bollandist, gives a long list of the miracles wrought in her name and by her relics, in a history of her life, her legends, her cultus, and her miracles, which occupies more than sixty folio pages of close print.

A story in curious contrast with the highly-wrought legend quoted above attaches to her name, and is embodied in five Latin lines quoted in a sermon on the Nativity by De Gerson (who was chancellor of Paris early in the 15th century), and their quaint suggestion makes it worth while to repeat them here.

"Anna tribus nupsit Joachin, Cleophae, Salomaeque, Ex quibus ipsa viris peperit tres Anna Marias Quas duxere Joseph, Alphaeus, Zebedaeusque, Prima Jesum; Jacobum Joseph cum Simone Judam
Altera dat; Jacobum dat tertia datque Joannem."

The Bollandist writer (July, vol. vi. p. 250) answers the statements contained in these verses, and then proceeds to refute all objections which can be urged against her monogamy. [E. C. H.]

ANNIANUS (St.), the first bishop of ALEXANDRIA, 63-86, said to have been appointed by St. Mark, after he had wrought a miracle upon him (Euseb. H. E. ii. 24, iii. 14, 21; Const. Ap. vii. 46; Chron. Orient. 89; Tillemont, Mem. Eccl. ii. 42, &c.). He is commemorated in the Roman martyrology with St. Mark on April 25. [W.]

ANOMOEANS (from ἀνόμοιοι, dissimilar), one of the appellations of the radical Arians who, in opposition to the Athanasian or Nicene doctrine of the consubstantiality (ὁμοουσιό), and the semi-Arian view of the likeness (ὁμοιουσία), of the Son to the Father, taught that the Son was dissimilar, and of a different substance (ἑτεροουσιόσιος). ANSO, monk and abbat of Laube, or Lobbes, in Belgium, and author of the lives of SS. Ursmar and Erminius, his predecessors, succeeded the abbat Theodulfus in 776, and died in 800. He is described by one of his successors, Fulcuin, who died in 990, as a good and holy man, and a sincere and moderately elegant historian. The life of St. Ursmar, dedicated to Theodulfus, was compiled, as Anso states, from the metrical life of this saint, which St. Erminius, his immediate successor in 713, had written, with the addition of some miracles, detailed by eye-witnesses. It may be seen in Mabillon, Act. SS. Ben. iii. p. 1, 246; Act. SS. Boll. April ii. 560. It is interesting as containing evidence of certain points of ecclesiastical discipline, such as the use of holy water. The life of St. Erminius, or Erminio, who died in 737, was written before 768. It is marked by the same conciseness of detail and style as the preceding life, and is found in Mabillon, ut supra, p. 564; Act. SS. Boll. April iii. 375. (See Histoire Lit. de la France, iv. 203, 204; Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 637.) [C. D.]

ANTENOR, a Gallican bishop about 720, is known only as the biographer of St. Silvius, bishop of Terouanne, who died probably in 717. His intimate friendship with the saint commended, while his bad style and method detracted from the value of his work. The defects induced an anonymous author of the 9th century to retouch the work, "not altering the sense, but arranging with greater clearness passages which seemed confused and irregular." This interpolated edition only has survived, and may be seen, illustrated with notes and observations, in Act. SS. Boll. Febr. iii. 24-32; Mabillon, Act. Ben. iii. 1. 295-299. Baillet's criticism of this revised life (Vies des Saints, Février, col. 235) seems gratuitously severe. (See Histoire Lit. de la France, iv. p. 49; Cave, Hist. Lit. p. 622.) [C. D.]

ANTEROS, bishop of Rome; succeeded Bishop Pontianus November 21, A.D. 235 ("Ordinatus xi. Kal. Decembr. coss. Severo et Quintiano," catalogue quoted by Anast. Biblioth., vol. ii. p. 183), but only survived him one month, dying January 3rd, in the next year ("Dormit iii. non. Januar. Maximino et Africano coss." loc. cit.) [G. H. M.]

ANTHEMIUS, a Byzantine official of high rank and character, one of the most celebrated and most highly commended magistrates of his day for his wisdom and administrative power. He regarded Chrysostom with the greatest respect, which was fully returned by the archbishop. At the time of the disturbances that accompanied Chrysostom's deposition, Easter, 404, Anthemius held the place of "magister officiorum." The saint's enemies demanded of him a troop of soldiers to disperse the crowd. At first he positively refused. Subsequently he yielded to their importunity, somewhat weakly throwing the responsibility of the consequences on them (Pallad. p. 83). In 405 Anthemius was made Consul, and very shortly afterwards Prefect of the East (Cod. Theod. Chronol. p. 148). Chrysostom wrote to him in warm terms (Ep. cxlvii.). The title of Patrician is given him in the law of Ap. 28, 406 (Cod. Theod. Chron. p. 149). He held his prefecture till A.D. 417, and was prime minister to Theodosius the younger (Soz. H. E. vii. 1). He was the grandfather of the Emperor Anthemius by his daughter married to Procopius. He assisted at the reception at Constantinople of the relics of the prophet Samuel (Chron. Alex. p. 714; Theod. Lect. ii. 64; Tillemont, Empereurs, vi. p. 2.) [E. V.]

ANTHEMIUS, bishop of SALAMIS, or Constantia, in Cyprus, at the beginning of the Emperor Zeno's reign, c. 474. He successfully asserted the independence of his see of that of Antioch against Peter the Fuller, aided by the lucky discovery of the body of S. Barnabas buried under a carob-tree, proving the apostolical origin of the church. Theodorus Lector. lib. ii. ad init. [E. V.]

ANTHEMIUS, bishop of Zorapassa (or Coropassus), on the borders of Isauria and Armenia Minor attended the Council of Nicaea. (Labbe, Concil. ii. 58.) [E. V.]

ANTHEON, bishop of Arsinoe, fl. about A.D. 484, the author of a letter to Peter the Fuller, condemnatory of his additions to the Trisagion. (Concil. iv. p. 1112; Cave, Hist. Lit. i. p. 457.) [E. V.]

ANTHIMUS (Trapezuntius) was raised from the see of Trapezus to the patriarchate of Constantinople, 535, A.D., through the influence of the Empress Theodora, who favoured the Monophysites (Theoph. Chron. 183 Par.; Niceph.

Hist. xvii. 7). In the next year, Agapetus arrived from Rome, and persuaded the emperor Justinian to cause the accusations which several archimandrites and others (Niceph. xvii. 9) brought against the orthodoxy of Anthimus to be submitted to a Synod at Constantinople (Theoph. 184). Agapetus died before the conclusion of the synod; but Anthimus was condemned as Eutychian, and as having been uncanonically translated (Conc. Colet. v. 974). Nicephorus adds (xvii. 9) that Anthimus, though repeatedly summoned, was afraid to present himself before the Council. According to Evagrius (iv. 11) he was induced by Severus of Antioch, the leader of the Monophysites, to resign the see for conscience's sake. There seems no authority for Baronius' statement, that Anthimus was deposed from the priesthood. The sentence of the synod was ratified by the emperor, and Anthimus was banished (Conc. v. 1239), his name being classed with those of Arius, Eutyches, and other notorious heretics. It seems, however, from Nicephorus (xvii. 9), as well as from the acts of the Council, that Anthimus professed to accept the Council of Chalcedon; but that he omitted (Conc. v. 1051) the name of Leo from the diptychs. He was deposed from the episcopate 536 A.D. [I. G. S.]

ANTHIMUS, bishop of TYANA, an ambitious and contentious prelate, a contemporary of St. Basil, with whom he appears first on friendly terms (Basil. Ep. 58). In the year 372 he joins with Basil in subscribing a circular letter addressed by the Oriental bishops to those of Italy and Gaul (Ep. 92). But immediately after discussions broke out between them. On two several occasions we find Anthimus in a position of antagonism to Basil. (1) When the province of Cappadocia was divided and Tyana became the capital of the second division, Anthimus insisted that the ecclesiastical arrangements should follow the civil, and claimed metropolitan rights over several of Basil's suffragans. Though a man of advanced age, he carried out his ambitious design with vigour and alacrity. At the same time he was assisted by the disaffection which prevailed in Basil's province. He coaxed some bishops into submission, threatened and overawed some, and expelled others who continued recalcitrant from their sees. He was even bold enough to attack Basil on a journey, and plunder a train of mules laden with supplies of money and provisions for the bishop of Caesarea. This quarrel led to the one act in Basil's life which his friend Gregory never forgave nor forgot. He consecrated Gregory bishop of Sasima, a see which lay not far from Tyana and over which Anthimus claimed metropolitan rights, thinking thus to establish an invincible outpost against his aggressive antagonist. So long as Gregory remained there, he staunchly resisted alike the enticements and the menaces of Anthimus; but he soon resigned the see which he had so unwillingly occupied, and which he could only have maintained by force [GREGORY NAZIANZEN]. A peace, however, was patched up between Basil and Anthimus, apparently by the intercession of Gregory. This happened in the year 372 (Greg. Naz. Or. xliii. i. p. 813 sq.; Ep. 47, 48, 49, 50, ii. p. 42 sq.; Carm. ii. p. 696 sq.) (2) Soon afterwards a second feud broke out between the two, in which Anthimus was again the aggressor. A certain Faustus had applied to Basil to consecrate him to an Armenian see; but, as he did not produce the proper authority, the consecration was deferred. He immediately applied to Anthimus, who at once complied with his request, thus setting canonical rules at defiance (Basil. Ep. 120, 121, 122). A reconciliation, however, seems to have been effected, as we find Basil afterwards speaking of Anthimus in very friendly terms (Ep. 210, τὸν δμόψυχον ἡμῶν). Except in connexion with Basil and Gregory, nothing is known of this prelate. (See Tillemont, Mem. Eccl. ix. p. 174 sq., 196 sq.; Garnier Vit. Bas. Op. iii. p. cxi. sq., p. cxxiii. sq. [L.]

ANTHROPIANI. This name occurs in three short lists of representative heresies in Latin authors (Cypr. Ep. 73 ad Juv. § 4; Lact. Inst. iv. 30; Crescon. ap. Aug. c. Cresc. Don. iv. 75 "in omnibus MSS." [Bened.]). Grabe supposes the heretics intended to be the section of Valentinians briefly noticed by Irenaeus (59), who called the First Principle of the universe "Man." Schliemann (Die Clementinen 475 f.) with better reason understands the Symmachians, i.e. the Ebionites of N. Africa, sometimes called Homuncionitae. They are probably also, as he suggests, the Anthropolatrae of the interpolated Ignatian epistle Ad Trall. 11, where the old Latin version adds Hebionitus to illos Iominis Cultores. [H.]

ANTHROPOLATRAE (Ἀνθρωπόλατραι), a nickname given by the Apollinarians (c. A.D. 371) to the Catholics, on the assumption that the union of "perfect God" with "perfect Man" necessarily involved two Persons in Christ, and therefore that the Catholic exposition of the doctrine implied the worship of a man: an inference assumed to be avoided by the special Apollinarian dogma. See APOLLINARIS (the Younger). The nickname in question is mentioned by St. Greg. Naz. Orat. li, who retorts that in truth, if any one is to be called by a name of the kind, the Apollinarian ought to be called "σαρκολάτρης." [A. W. H.]

ANTHROPOMORPHITAE (ANTHROPOMORPHISM), (ἄνθρωπος, m-m, and μορφή, form). Terms applied to those who ascribe to God human shape and form. We must distinguish two kinds of anthropomorphism, a doctrinal and a symbolical. The former is heretical, the latter Scriptural, and necessarily arises from the imperfection of human language and human knowledge of God. The one takes the Scripture passages which speak of God's arm, hand, eye, ear, mouth, &c., literally; the other understands and uses them figuratively. Anthropomorphism is always connected with anthropopathism (from ἄνθρωπος and πάθος, passion), which ascribes to God human passions and affections, such as wrath, anger, envy, jealousy, pity, repentance. The latter, however, does not necessarily imply the former. All forms of idolatry, especially those of Greece and Rome, are essentially anthropomorphic and anthropopathic. The classical divinities are in character simply deified men and women. The Christian, Jewish, and Mohammedan religions teach that God is a Spirit, and thus elevate him above the reach of materialistic and sensual conceptions and representations. But within the Christian Church anthropomorphism appeared from time to time as an isolated opinion or as the tenet of a party. Tertullian is often charged with it, because he ascribed to God a body. (Adv. Prax. c. 7:—"Quis enim negabit. Deum corpus esse, etsi Deus spiritus est? Spiritus enim corpus sui generis in effigie.") But he probably identified corporeality with substantiality, and hence he maintained that everything real had a body of some kind. (De Carne Chr. c. 11:—"Omne quod est, corpus est sui generis, nihil est incorporale, nisi quod non est.") The pseudo-Clementine Homilies (xvii. 2 sq.) teach that God, in order to be an object of love, must be the highest beauty, and, consequently, have a body, since there is no beauty without form; nor could we pray to a God who was mere spirit. (Comp. Baur, Vorlesungen über die Dogmengeschichte, vol. i. p. 412.) In the middle of the 4th century Audius, or Audaus, of Syria, a bold censor of the luxury and vices of the clergy, and an irregularly consecrated bishop, founded a strictly ascetic sect, which were called Audians or Anthropomorphites, and maintained themselves, in spite of repeated persecution, till the close of the 5th century. He started from a literal interpretation of Gen. i. 28, and reasoned from the nature of man to the nature of God, whose image he was (Epiphanius, Haer. 70; Theodoret, H. E. iv. 9; Walch, Ketzerhistorie, iii. 300). During the Origenistic controversies towards the close of the 4th century, anthropomorphism was held independently by many Egyptian monks in the Scetic desert, who, with Pathomius at their head, were the most violent opponents of the spiritualistic theology of Origen, and were likewise called Anthropomorphites; they felt the need of sensual conceptions in their prayers and ascetic exercises. Theophilus of Alexandria, formerly an admirer of Origen, became his bitter opponent, and expelled the Origenists from Egypt, but nevertheless he rejected the Anthropomorphism of the anti-Origenistic monks (Epist. Pastr. for 399). In the present century Anthropomorphism has been revived by the Mormons, who conceive God as an intelligent material being, with body, members, and passions, and unable to occupy two distinct places at once. [P. S.]

ANTHUSA, mother of St. Chrysostom. [CHRYSOSTOM.]

ANTICHRIST.—1. The word (Ἀντίχριστος) appears for the first time in 1 John ii. 18, iv. 3. It must be noted, however, that the Apostle does not use it as a new word. Those who read his Epistle had already heard that "Antichrist should come." It is open, therefore, to conjecture, that it had been first uttered in the period of the great burst of Apocalyptic utterances, of which we find traces in St. Paul's Epistle to the Thessalonians, and in those of St. Peter, St. Jude, St. John, in the Apocalypse itself. The sharp precision with which St. Paul had pointed to "the man of sin," "the lawless one," "the adversary," "the son of perdition," led men to dwell on that thought rather than on the many ψευδόχριστοι, of whom Christ himself had spoken (Matt. xxiii. 24, Mark xiii. 22). All Jewish uses of the word, which appears in later Rabbinic writings in Hebrew characters אַנְטִיכְרִיִּם Abarbanel, in Eisenmenger, Entd. Judenth. ii.

p. 747) are obviously derived from Christian writings.

2. The word, on this its first appearance on the stage of human thought, hovered between two meanings, possibly included both of them. The analogy of ἀντίθεος (Hom. Il. xxi. 594), ἀντιλέων (Aristoph. Equit. v. 1041), perhaps also ἀντίλυτρον (1 Tim. ii. 6) would lead us to the idea of substitution implied in the preposition, and so the Antichrist would be a "false Christ," claiming to be the true. But every such claim involves rivalry, and therefore antagonism; and the stress laid by St. Paul on his being ὁ ἀντικείμενος (2 Thess. ii. 4) might naturally blend that thought also with the other, and might, in course of time, come to supersede it. Speaking generally, the tradition of early patristic writings is in favour of the former, that of later schools of interpretation in favour of the latter view.

3. The exegesis of the passages which speak of Antichrist in the N. T. does not fall within the scope of this paper. But it is difficult to trace what does so fall—the successive phases of men's thoughts about Antichrist in the first eight centuries of the Church—without going back to the origines out of which they sprang. And these are to be found (a) in the prophecies of Daniel, of which all the Apocalyptic utterances of the N. T. are more or less reproductions. Whatever view we may take of the date and authorship of those predictions, they led men in the first century to think not only of the "fourth beast," which might symbolise, like the other beasts, a kingdom, but of the "little horn" with "the eyes of a man," and a "mouth speaking great things" (Dan. vii. 8, 20, viii. 9), "making war against the saints," which could hardly be understood of other than an individual ruler. The more detailed prophecies of Dan. viii. 23, xi. 36–39, which spoke of the king of "fierce countenance" who should "destroy the mighty and holy people," and "stand up against the Prince of princes," who should "exalt himself, and magnify himself above every god," and "speak marvellous things against the God of Gods," pointed in the same direction. In the time of the Maccabees they seemed to find a fulfilment in the person of Antiochus Epiphanes, but the words remained in their dim, dark awfulness, as if still waiting for one who should embody them more completely. The sayings in which Our Lord claimed for Himself the name of the Son of Man, and spoke of His coming as such "in the clouds of Heaven," and referred to the "abomination of desolation" (Matt. xxvi. 64, xxiv. 15), drew men's thoughts to the passages of Daniel in which they were named (Dan. vii. 13, 14, ix. 27), and so to those others in which the enemy of the Messiah and the holy people had been portrayed. (b) Partly in the recorded prophecies of the N. T. already referred to, partly in the unrecorded utterances of the prophets who in every Church were telling their true or false visions of things to come, the thought of a personal Antichrist, the rival and enemy of the true Messiah, took shape and grew. Men either identified or connected him with the "man of sin," the "lawless one" of 2 Thess. ii., with the "beast" of Rev. xiii., with the "false prophet" of Rev. xvi. 13, xix. 10, xx. 10. There was enough in all this at once to excite and to baffle curiosity. We cannot wonder that it should have been fruitful in hot thoughts and fevered dreams. (c) The influence of Jewish traditions about Antichrist on the current belief of the Christian Church must be looked on as infinitesimally small. The wild and obscene legends cited by Eisenmenger (ii. p. 707 et. seq.), about an Armillus who is to present himself to the Edomites (=Romans=Christians), and be received by them as a Messiah, who is to be a terrible monster, with red hair and green feet, twelve ells in height and the same in breadth, first slaying the true Christ, and then slain by Him on His return from Heaven, does not go further back than the 15th century, and even if it be supposed to embody traditions of an earlier date, the total absence of any reference to such views in patristic literature may be accepted as a proof that the Christian conjectures, however fanciful, were not derived from Judaism.

4. Three ways of dealing with the name of Antichrist are traceable in patristic literature. (1) As St. John, while pointing to the Antichrist, had yet spoken of "many" who might so be called, and had given, as a characteristic note of Antichrist, the denial of "the Father and the Son," the denial, also, that "Jesus Christ was come in the flesh" (1 John ii. 18, 22, iv. 3), so later writers did not shrink from applying the term to the heretical teacher with whom they happened for the time being to be in controversy. So Tertullian applies it to Marcion (Adv. Marc. iii. 8), Athanasius to Constantius (Epist. ad Solit. Vit. Agent. pp. 842, 852). Gregory the Great sees at least the "forerunner of Antichrist" in John the Faster, the Patriarch of Constantinople, because he claimed, as others had done before him, the title of "Universal (οἰκουμενικός) Bishop" (Epist. vii. 33). This was, of course, more or less rhetorical, as men talk now of the "footfalls of the coming Antichrist," and did not tie those who used it to any definite identification. We shall find (infra) the same writers speaking of the Antichrist as still future. (2) The two great writers of the Alexandrian School seem to turn away altogether from this and other regions of apocalyptic study. Clement makes no mention of the Antichrist at all; Origen, after his fashion, passes into the region of generalizing allegory. The Antichrist, the "adversary," is "false doctrine;" the temple of God in which he sits and exalts himself, is the written Word; men are to flee when he comes, to "the mountains of truth" (Hom. 29 in Matt.). Gregory of Nyssa (Orat. xi. c. Eunom.) follows in the same track. So far as this showed more than a general shrinking from the whole question, it involved the assumption that what others had spoken rhetorically was in fact the application of a true exegesis to a particular instance.

5. Neither of these methods however, was calculated to satisfy those who looked to the Apocalyptic language of the N. T. as a real unveiling of the future, and we have to note accordingly (3) the various conjectures that appeared from time to time as to the origin and characteristic features of the individual Antichrist. (a) Foremost among these is that which identified him with Nero. Many elements of thought probably entered into this conjecture. The attempt of Caligula to set up his statue in the Temple of Jerusalem, the tendency to the deification of dead and even of living Emperors, had led men to look in that quarter for the appearance of the last great rivalry with the living God. Even the very title of Augustus in its Greek form Σεβαστός, would suggest that it implied an exaltation of him who claimed it over every other σέβασμα. And the impression left by Nero's monstrous vices, as well as by his persecution of the Christians, on the minds of men, led them, as they read of one who "was, and is not, and yet is," of one who was "wounded to death," but whose "deadly wound was healed" (Rev. xvii. 8, xiii. 3), to expect his return from the grave, armed with a mightier power for evil. Incompatible as the notion was with any systematic interpretation of the Apocalypse, it took root, and only slowly died out. It appears in its fullest form in the commentary on the Apocalypse ascribed to Victorinus of Pettau (A.D. 290). Nero was to rise from the dead, was to be accepted by the Jews as the Messiah ("Christum qualem meruerunt"), was to try to lead the saints, "non ad idola colenda, sed ad circumcissionem" (Bibl. Mar. iii. p. 420). The uncertainty which hung over the burial-place of Nero, the Sibylline verses which had spoken of the coming of a "matricide" tyrant and persecutor, tended to deepen the impression (Lactant. De Mortib. Persecut. c. 2). Perhaps the belief that St. John, the Seer of the Apocalypse, was himself not dead but sleeping, reserved to rise again as one of the two prophets of his own vision, or in addition to the two that were identified with Enoch and Elijah (Rev. xi.), in order that he might bear his witness against the risen Nero, risen with mightier power and more monstrous claims, fell in with the popular belief. Such a belief could not, of course, be a lasting one. Lactantius speaks of it as held only by "deliri quidam" (l. c.). Jerome (Comm. in Dan., xi. 17) and Augustine (De Civ. Dei, xx. 13) mention it as still held by "many." Other interpretations were, however, scarcely less fantastic. (b) Starting partly from the omission of the tribe of Dan from the list of the tribes of Israel "sealed" in the Apocalypse (Rev. vii.), partly from the words which spoke of him as an "adder" and a "serpent" (Gen. xlix. 17), men came to dream that the Antichrist would be born of that tribe (Hippolytus, p. 7 ed. Lagarde; Arethas, Cat. in Rev. vii.; Pseudo-Athanas. Quaest. ad Antioch. 108; Theodoret, Qu. iii. in Num. p. 142). Cyril of Jerusalem, who gives the greater part of one of his Catecheses (xv.) to the subject, though seeing, after the fashion of his time, "forerunners of Antichrist" in the Arian teachers, declares, as speaking in the name of the Church, (giving, i. e., the accepted interpretation of his time), that the Antichrist himself will be a magician, who, starting with being one of eleven claimants to it, should, by his enchantments, seize on the Roman Empire, take the title of Christ, deceive the Jews, assume a tone of philanthropy, and finally show himself murderous and cruel towards all men, and especially towards the Christians. He is to come when Jerusalem shall be utterly destroyed, and is to present himself as the son of David who is to rebuild it, and in that Temple will he sit claiming and receiving the worship which is due to God. This shall go on for the appointed time of three years and a half, and then he shall be slain by the Sou of God, on His second advent from Heaven (Catech. xv.). The Pseudo-Athanasius (Quaest. ad Antioch. 108), while adopting the notion that the Antichrist would come from Dan (quoting, as a proof, Deut. xxxiii. 22), and identifying "Bashan" there spoken of with Scythopolis, and therefore looking to Galilee as the place of his appearing, mentions, as an "old wife's tale," which he thinks it worth while refuting, the belief that he would appear in Egypt, and have but one hand and one eye, and with them work miracles, the one miracle of raising the dead excepted. (c) The line taken by Chrysostom and the commentators who follow in his track, is, on the whole, less wild. As they interpret Scripture, the Antichrist is not to lead men either to idolatry or Judaism, but to simple Atheism. He will claim homage as the mightiest man, will sit, not in the temple at Jerusalem nor in any local building, but in the whole Ecclesia, as demanding worship (Chrysost. and Theophylact. in 2 Thess. ii.). (d) Theodoret, however, goes a step further, and sees in Antichrist an absolute incarnation of $\delta \alpha \nu \tau \iota \theta \epsilon \omega \varsigma \delta \alpha \iota \mu \omega \nu$, born as man in the tribe of Dan, and calling himself the Christ (Epit. Divin. Decret. c. xxiii. p. 300, Qu. iii. in Num. p. 142). [E. H. P.]

ANTIDIKOMARIANITAE ($\text{Αντιδικομαριανίται}$ = Adversaries of Mary, Eriphan. Haer. lxxxix.). The name given to those in Arabia in the latter part of the 4th century, who (in opposition to the Κολλοριδιάνιδες) maintained the novel supposition advanced at that time by Bonosus of Sadica, and by Helvidius, that "our Lord's Brethren" were children born by the Blessed Virgin to Joseph after our Lord's birth. The controversy arose out of the then prevailing reverence for virginity, which in its extreme form had led certain women, originally from Thrace, but dwelling in Arabia, to celebrate an idolatrous festival in honour of the Virgin, by taking certain cakes (κολλούριδες) about in chariots, and then solemnly offering them to her and consuming them, in imitation of the Lord's Supper, or (more probably) of the pagan worship of Ceres. The reaction from this superstition led to the existence of the sect spoken of in this article, which, contemporaneously with the controversy carried on by St. Jerome and by others against Helvidius and Bonosus, the literary supporters of the hypothesis, was led to endeavour to cut away all pretence for the Collyridian superstition by adopting their view and so denying its very groundwork. The question respecting that controversy itself is discussed in the Dictionary of the Bible, under BROTHERS and JAMES. And for its literary history, see under BONOSUS, HELVIDIUS, HIERONYMUS. [A. W. H.]

ANTIOCHUS. (1) Bishop of PTOLEMAIS, flourished c. 401 A.D. The reputation he gained as a preacher in his provincial city awoke in him the desire of displaying his oratorical powers in a wider field. He accordingly left Ptolemais and settled at Constantinople, where his fine voice and appropriate action, together with the eloquent and perspicuous character of his discourses, soon attracted large auditories, by whom, like his great contemporary John, he was sur-named "The Golden-mouthed." Having amassed considerable wealth, he returned to his deserted see, where he employed his leisure in composing a long treatise "against avarice." He took a zealous part in the proceedings against Chrysostom, and is reckoned by Palladius among his bitterest enemies. He died in the reign of Arcadius, before A.D. 408, and, according to Nicephorus, his end, in common with all the enemies of Chrysostom, was miserable. Besides the treatise "against avarice," already mentioned, a homily on "The Cure of the Blind Man" is mentioned. With the exception of a sentence quoted by Theodoret, Dial. 2, and a longer fragment given in the Catenæ on St. John xix. p. 443, his works have perished (Socr. vi. 11; Soz. viii. 10; Niceph. xiii. 26; Gennadius in Catalog.; Pallad. Dialog. p. 49; Fabr. Bibl. Graec. ix. 259).

(2) A monk of the monastery of St. Saba; born at Medosaga, 20 miles from Ancyra in Galatia (Lambec. iii. p. 140). He flourished in the reign of the Emperor Heraclius, and witnessed the capture and sack of Jerusalem by Chosroes A.D. 614, when the true Cross was carried away into Persia as the noblest trophy of conquest (Homil. cvii.; Exomolog. sub fin.). There is still extant, "if what no one reads may be said to be extant" (Gibbon, c. xlvi.), a voluminous work of his entitled $\text{πανδέκτης τῆς ἁγίας γραφῆς}$, divided into 130 homilies, each enforcing some definite moral duty confirmed by passages from Scripture and the writings of the fathers. The epistle dedicatory to Eustathius, provost of the monastery of Attalia, near his old home of Ancyra, contains an account of the sacking of the monastery of St. Saba, and the cruelties perpetrated by the Saracens on the monks. It closes with an Exomologesis or prayer that God would turn away his wrath from Jerusalem (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. lib. v. c. 34. Cave, Hist. Lit. i. p. 572.) [E. V.]

ANTIPATER, governor of Cappadocia, a friend of St. Basil. When Antipater enters upon his province (A.D. 373), Basil writes to excuse his attendance on the ground of illness, and to recommend Palladia to his correspondent's protection (Ep. 137). At a later date some playful letters pass between them (Ep. 186, 187). [L.]

ANTIPATER (Αντίπατρος) flourished about 460 A.D. He succeeded Constantine, who was present at the council of Chalcedon 451, as bishop of Bostra in Arabia. He was the author of a Refutation of Eusebius' Apology for Origen, entitled ἀντίρρησις . Some fragments of the first book of this are extant in the acts of the second Nicene council (Labbe, Concil. vii. 367), and more copiously in the Ἱερὰ παράλληλα of Joannes Damascenus. This work was of such authority that it was ordered to be publicly read in churches, in the hope of checking the growth of Origen's doctrines (Cotelierus Monument. Eccl. Graec. vol. iii. p. 362). Sermons are attributed to him on the first chapter of St. Luke, of which a Latin translation is printed in Combes' Biblioth. Concion. vol. vii. p. 106, on τὰ ἅγια Θεοφάνεια , and on the woman with the issue of blood, which is also quoted in the acts of the same council (Labbe, Concil. vii. 208; Cave, Hist. Litt. i. p. 447; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. x. p. 274). [E. V.]

ANTIPOPES, claimants to the popedom in opposition to the lawful popes. There were eight such during the first eight centuries, some owing their elevation to the existence of conflicting parties at Rome, others intruded into the see by the civil power. A fuller account of them, with the authorities, is given under their respective names.

1. NOVATIANUS, elected and consecrated in the middle of the 3rd century, after the Decian persecution, in opposition to Cornelius, by the party called Cathari (the opponents of the re-admission of the lapsi into the Church), and through the influence of Novatus of Carthage, who was then at Rome. Hence originated the sect of the Novatians. [CORNELIUS; NOVATIANUS.]

2. FELIX, intruded into the see of Rome by the Emperor Constantius, after the banishment of Liberius, A.D. 355, and apparently retaining his position as a rival bishop, supported by his party, after the return of the latter. Though appearing in the Roman Calendar as a lawful pope, a saint and martyr, his place, according to all ancient historical evidence, is properly among the antipopes. [LIBERIUS; FELIX.]

3. URSINUS (or Ursicius), a deacon of Rome, elected and ordained as Pope, on the death of Liberius, A.D. 366, probably by the party who had supported that Pope, in opposition to Damasus, elected and ordained by the party of Felix. After much riot and bloodshed, the party of Damasus prevailed, though Ursinus, banished by Juventus, the prefect of the city, in 366, recalled and again banished by the Emperor Valentinian in 367, continued to agitate Rome through his partisans during the life of his rival, whom he survived. The claim of Damasus to be the true Pope rests upon the supposed priority of his election and consecration, which is asserted by the contemporary Jerome and Rufinus, and by Socrates, his claim being recognized also by St. Ambrose, by councils held twelve years afterwards at Rome and in 381 at Aquileia, and by the general subsequent consent of the Church. It should be observed, however, that the two noted contemporary Luciferian presbyters, Marcellinus and Faustinus, in their detailed account of these events, represent Ursinus as having been elected first, and hence Damasus as the antipope, as well as responsible for the ensuing tumult and bloodshed. But their testimony, due possibly to party feeling against Damasus (of persecution under whom they complained) is greatly outweighed by that on the other side. [DAMASUS; URSINUS.]

4. EULALIUS, elected and consecrated simultaneously with Boniface I. in December, A.D. 418, as successor to Pope Zozimus. The disputed election was eventually settled by a rescript of the Emperor Honorius in the April of the following year, banishing Eulalius, and putting Boniface in possession of the see. [BONIFACE; EULALIUS.]

5. LAURENTIUS, elected and consecrated on the same day with Symmachus, as successor to Anastasius II., Dec. 22, A.D. 499. The circumstances of the time in this case intensified the feuds usual on the election of a pope. It was the period of the forty years' schism between Rome and Constantinople due to the excommunication of Acacius by Pope Felix, in connexion with the Monophysite controversy. Laurentius was supported by the party, headed by Festus or Faustus Niger, the Patrician, which favoured the conciliatory attitude towards the East assumed by the deceased Pope; Symmachus was supported by the party of rigid orthodoxy. Tumults and bloodshed, as was usual in such cases, followed the double election, till the matter was finally settled by the intervention of the Gothic King Theodoric, himself an Arian, who decided in favour of Symmachus, on the ground both of majority of votes and priority of election. [SYMMACHUS; LAURENTIUS.]

6. DIOSCORUS, a deacon of Rome, elected by his party and consecrated on the same day with Boniface II., as successor to Pope Felix III. (or IV.), Sept. 21, A.D. 530. Happily his death on the 14th of October prevented in this case the customary riots, leaving Boniface undisputed Pope, who excommunicated his deceased rival. The anathema was revoked by the next Pope Agapetus. [BONIFACE II.]

7. VIGILIUS, intruded by the imperial power into the see of Rome, while canonically full. Belisarius, having got possession of Rome, A.D. 537, was commissioned by the Empress Theodora to depose the reigning Pope Silverius, and put the deacon Vigilius, in his place; which was accordingly done. Silverius having lived nearly a year after his expulsion, thus uncanonically effected, Vigilius is properly regarded as a mere antipope during that period, whatever his claim to the lawful possession of the see afterwards. [SILVERIUS; VIGILIUS.]

8. EUGENIUS, elected and ordained Pope in September, A.D. 654, during the lifetime of Martin I., the reigning Pope (who had been in the previous year violently deposed by the Emperor Constans), and hence, like Vigilius, to be reckoned an antipope at the commencement of his reign. The reason of Martin's deposition was his resolute opposition to the Monothelite heresy, then dominant at Constantinople, and favoured by the emperors. His death in September, A.D. 655, left Eugenius in undisputed possession of the see, his acceptance by the clergy and people being considered to have supplied the place of a regular election. ANTITACTAE. This name is given by Clement of Alexandria (Strom. iii. 526-9) to an obscure libertine sect, apparently of Gnostic origin. God, the Creator of the universe, they said, is our Father by nature, and all things that He has made are good; but one of those who owed their existence to Him afterwards sowed the tares and engendered evil; and by entangling us all in evil he set us in opposition to God. For this reason, they declared, "in order to avenge the Father, we too oppose ourselves to the will of the second [maker] (cf. Ep. Plat. ii. 312 E); and since he said 'Thou shalt not commit adultery,' we commit adultery in order to break his commandment." Other particulars may be gleaned from the refutation which follows. The Antitactae claimed to obey "the Saviour" alone. They strung together verses picked out of the prophets, interpreting, Clement says, in a literal manner what was written allegorically. The instance given is singular. They appropriated to themselves the words of the murmurers in Mal. iii. 15, "They opposed themselves to God and were saved," interpolating before "God" the epithet "shameless" (τῶ ἀναιδέϊ: but? ἀνελεεῖ, merciless). Clement further accuses them of "perverting the Scriptures to their own pleasures by the tone of their voice," "altering certain accents and stops."

The ascription of creation to the "good" "Father" would dissociate the Antitactae from all properly Gnostic sects, did not Clement twice give the name "Creator" (Demiurge) to the being to whom they professed to oppose themselves. This being somewhat resembles "the evil one" of the Clementine Homilies (ii. 38 ff.), at least in his relation to the Old Testament; but the libertine theory of morals recalls rather the Cainite section of the Ophites.

Clement begins his description with the words "Certain others whom we also call Antitactae;" and the name may have been extemporised to denote the favourite idea of the sect, "opposition." Clement himself uses the verb (ἀντιτάσσομαι) often in the preceding pages for the "opposition" to the Demiurge cultivated by the ascetic group of Gnostics. Theodoret (Haer. Fab. i. 16: cf. v. 9, 17) chiefly copies Clement, and evidently had no other authority for his account of the Antitactae. [H.]

ANTITRINITARIANS. [MONARCHIANS.]

ANTONIANUS, a bishop who wrote, A.D. 252, to Cyprian, to assure him of his adherence to him and to Cornelius against Novatian; but who was afterwards much shaken by a letter from Novatian justifying the purity of his doctrine and accusing the laxity of the pope Cornelius. Cyprian (Ep. 55) takes great pains to show him the excellence of Cornelius's life and policy and the danger of Novatian's rigour, apparently with success, as Antonian appears in Ep. 70 as one of the Numidian bishops to whom that synodical letter (Conc. Carth. sub. Cyp. de Bap. 1) is addressed. [E. W. B.]

ANTONINUS, surnamed HONORATUS, by Gennadius (De Script. c. 95), a bishop of Constantia in Africa, fl. about A.D. 437, during the persecution of the orthodox by Genserich. He was the author of a Consolatoria et Exhortatoria ad Labores pro Christo ferendos Epistola, addressed to a certain Arcadius, who, having been previously a friend of Genserich's, had been banished for the faith, and was afterwards martyred. This letter breathes a truly Christian heroism, and deserves perusal. (Bibl. Pat. Colon. 1618, tom. v. p. 640; Baron. Ad Ann. 437; Cave, Hist. Lit. i. p. 426.) [E. V.]

ANTONINUS, M. AURELIUS. [AURELIUS.]

ANTONINUS PIUS, Emperor, A.D. 138–161. The character of this prince as loving righteousness and mercy, choosing rather, in his own noble words, "to save the life of one citizen than to slay a thousand foes," showed itself, as in other things, so also in his treatment of the Christians of the empire. Hadrian had checked the tendency to persecution by imposing severe penalties on false accusers (Just. Mart. Apol. i. c. 68). In some way or other, Antoninus was led to adopt a policy which was even more favourable to them (Xiphilini, Epit. Dion. Cass. l. 70, p. 1173). Melito, writing his Apologia to Marcus Aurelius (Euseb. H. E. iv. 26), speaks of edicts which Antoninus had issued to the people of Larissa, Thessalonica, Athens, and to the Greeks at large, forbidding any new and violent measures (μηδὲν νεωτερίζειν) against the Christians. A more memorable proof of his tolerance is found, if the document be genuine, in the decree addressed to the General Assembly of the proconsular province of Asia, at a time when the Christian Church was exposed to outrages of all kinds (πρὸς τὸ κοινὸν τῆς Ἀσίας). It speaks in admiring terms of the innocence of the Christians, declares the charges against them to be unproved, bids men admire the steadfastness and faith with which they met the earthquakes and other calamities that drove others to despair, ascribes the persecution to the jealousy which men felt against those who were truer worshippers of God than themselves. Unfortunately, however, the weight of evidence preponderates against the genuineness of the edict. The two texts which are found, one in Eusebius (H. E. iv. 13), the other appended to the First Apology of Justin, differ in many points. Eusebius, who ascribes it to Antoninus Pius, gives a copy which purports to come from Marcus Aurelius, and that attached to the Apologia is clearly an addition by a later hand. Melito, whom Eusebius represents as referring to this edict (H. E. iv. 26), in reality fails (as Neander observes) to quote it and falls back upon others far less directly to his purpose than this would have been, had he known it. And internal evidence, too, tends to the same conclusions. It is too good, too Christian, to have come from a heathen emperor. On the whole, therefore, we are compelled to follow Scaliger, and Reimar, and Dodwell and Thirlby, and Jortin and Milman, and Neander and Gieseler, and a host of others, in rejecting it as the forgery of some Christian of the latter half of the 2nd century, trying to embody in his own high-coloured language the substance of decrees which had really been issued in favour of the Christians, rather than Tillemont and Lardner in accepting it as really coming from Antoninus, or Valesius, the editor of Eusebius, in assigning it to Marcus Aurelius. The last supposition is indeed the most improbable of all, as it is absolutely inconsistent with the general policy of that emperor [AURELIUS]. The fullest discussion of it is to be found in Lardner's Works, vol. vii. p. 383; Testimonies of Ancient Heathens, ch. xiv. In any case it is natural to connect the more lenient policy, which there is no doubt that Antoninus adopted, with the memorable Apologia which Justin addressed to him. Confining ourselves to its bearing on the character of the emperor, we note (1) that there had been at least the threat of persecution even unto death (c. 68); (2) that it is written throughout in a tone of manifest respect as to men not unworthy of the epithets that were attached to their names ("Pius" to Antoninus, "philosopher" to Verissimus and Lucius); (3) that the mere fact of the dedication and, apparently, presentation of such an address implies a tolerance which had not been often found in preceding emperors; (4) that even the forged document, if it be such, shows that there was a certain verisimilitude in the ascription of such a document to him. [E. H. P.]

ANTONINUS, 27th bishop of JERUSALEM, succeeded Maximus II. between A.D. 136 and A.D. 190. His name appears in the Chronicon of Eusebius, and is given by Georgius Syncellus and Nicephorus; but though it is necessary to complete the total number of bishops named by him, it is omitted in the History of Eusebius, v. 12, probably through an error of the transcribers (Clinton, Fasti Romani; Valesius, ad Euseb. H. E. l. c.) [E. V.]

ANTONIUS, bishop of GERMA in the province of the Hellespont. Instigated by Nestorius, he proceeded against the Macedonians with such severity, that, finding their position intolerable, they assassinated him. The emperors in consequence deprived them of their churches (Soer. vii. 31). [L.]

ANTONIUS, St. (Abbas), is termed by Athanasius "the founder of asceticism" and his life a "model for monks" (Praef. Vit. St. Ant.). In this aspect as typical of the eremitic life, his name deserves more than a passing mention, especially as we have a tolerably complete biography of him by Athanasius, derived in part from his own recollections, in part from others who had known him, as well as frequent mention of him by the ecclesiastical historians. The life by Athanasius is probably interpolated.

Antony, as he is commonly called in England, was born about 250 A.D., at Coma, on the borders of Upper Egypt (Soz. Hist. i. 13). By his parents, who were wealthy Christians, he was trained in pious habits; but though docile and diligent, he showed no taste either for learning or for boyish games (Ath. Vit. S. Ant.; Aug. de Doct. in Prol.). Six months after the death of his parents, being then 18 years of age, he chanced to hear in church the words "If thou wilt be perfect," &c., and resolved to obey the precept literally, reserving only a small portion for his sister. Returning into the church he heard, "Take no thought for the morrow." On this he resolved to commend her to the care of some devout woman, and gave away all his property, without exception, to the poor (Ath. cf. Soz. i. 13).

At that time cells of Anchorites (μοναστηρια) were very rare in Egypt, and none far from the habitations of men. Antony retired by degrees farther and farther from his native village, till he fixed his abode first in a tomb, afterwards in a ruined castle near the Nile. Here he remained some 20 years, shut up for months at a time with only bread and water (the bread of the country is said to be good for keeping), and issuing forth only to instruct the multitudes who flocked to see and hear him; at other times communication was prevented by a huge stone at the entrance. During the persecution of Maximinus (311 A.D.), in which their bishop had fallen, he went to comfort the Christians of Alexandria; and though the presence of monks at these trials was forbidden as encouraging the martyrs in their disobedience to the emperor's edict, he persisted in appearing in court. When the storm had ceased he withdrew, though now an old man, to a more complete isolation than ever, near the Red Sea; and here, to save his disciples the trouble of bringing him food, he made a small field of wheat, which he cultivated with his own hands, working also at making mats. From time to time he revisited his former disciples in the Thebaid, always, however, declining to preside over a convent. About 335 A. D. he revisited Alexandria at the urgent request of Athanasius to preach against the Arians (Theod. Hist. iv.

27), and there was followed by crowds as "the man of God." But he soon returned to the congenial seclusion of his cell, and there died, at the great age of 105, in the presence of the two disciples, Amathas and Macarius, who had ministered to his wants during the last 15 years. They describe him in his last moments as one who "saw and welcomed the approach of friends." He had always expressed a dread of being embalmed, as was still customary in Egypt; and the place of his sepulture was kept secret by the two eye-witnesses of his death. To them he bequeathed his hair-shirt; and the rest of his worldly goods, his two woollen tunics and the rough cloak on which he slept, to bishop Serapion and St. Athanasius (Ath. Vit. S. Ant.).

The fame of Antony spread rapidly through Christendom; and the effect of his example in inducing Christians, especially in the East, to embrace the monastic life is described by his biographers as incalculable. In the next century he began to be venerated as a Saint by the Greek Church, and in the ninth by the Latin. He is said to be the author of Seven Epistles to certain Eastern monasteries, which have been translated from the Egyptian into the Greek (Hieron. de Script. 88), and are now extant in Latin (Cave, Hist. Lit.). Though by all accounts far from being a learned man (Soz. Hist. i. 13; Niceph. Hist. vii. 40; Ath. Vit. S. Ant.), it is hardly consistent with the discourses ascribed to him to suppose that he was altogether illiterate. To a pagan philosopher, wondering at his want of books, he replied, "My book, oh philosopher! is Nature" (Soz. Hist. iv. 23). His influence was great even at the court of the Emperor. Constantine the Great and his sons wrote to him as a father (Ath.), and when Athanasius was contending with the Meletians, Antony wrote from his cell to the Emperor in behalf of his friend (Soz. ii. 31). He wrote boldly also to Balacius, sub-prefect of Alexandria, a partisan of the Arians, remonstrating against the persecution of the orthodox, and the sudden death of Balacius soon afterwards when riding was considered a judgment for his disregard of this letter (Ath.). Persons of rank often sought in vain to allure him from his hermitage. His reply was, "As a fish dies out of water, so a monk out of his cell." The only chance of obtaining an interview with him was to claim his intervention for some one in distress. His austerities were extraordinary, his food was only bread and water; as a rule he fasted till sunset, sometimes for four days together. Of sleep he was equally sparing. His coarse rough shirt is said to have lasted him for a lifetime; and his only ablutions seem to have been involuntary in wading occasionally through a river. Yet he lived to an unusual age, robust, and in full possession of his faculties to the last. In fact nothing less than a constitution of iron could have endured such privations. He was not morose to others. He is described as invariably cheerful in look and manner; with something in his presence which, notwithstanding his low stature, attracted the attention of strangers even in a crowd; not like a wild man of the woods, but urbane and social (πολιτικός οὐδ' ἄγριος. Ath.). Only to heretics he was austere and repulsive; refusing to hold any intercourse with them even for a moment. He was careful always, though so universally revered, not to

Antony was evidently a man, not merely of strong determination, but of ability, and the discourses, if indeed they are his, which his disciples record as addressed to themselves and to the pagan philosophers who disputed with him, show that if he read little he thought much. He met objections against the doctrines of the Incarnation and the Resurrection as mysterious by the retort that the pagan mythology, whether in its grossness as apprehended by the vulgar or as the mystical system of philosophers, was equally unreasonable. From their dialectical subtleties he appealed to facts; to a Christian's contempt of death and triumph over temptation; and contrasted the decay of pagan oracles and magic with the growth of Christianity in spite of persecutions. He is said also to have challenged his opponents to heal some demoniacs who were standing by (Ath.). Similarly his exhortations to his disciples, if we may trust the account which Athanasius seems to have received from them, were rich in Scriptural texts, and show an acquaintance with Greek philosophy. The excellence of the soul, he taught, consists in its intelligence being in its state of nature; and this, he added, depends on the intention. He insisted on practical morality; and, in particular, on strictness of self-examination, with an especial injunction of charity and humility (Ath.): warning his hearers that austerity alone was worthless without discretion. But, as is usual with solitary ascetics, he fostered by his teaching and example a morbid self-consciousness, recommending that a diary should be kept even of secret thoughts; and the basis of his arguments for self-improvement is that eternal life is worth buying (ἀγοράζεται, Ath.) at any price. He taught also, that prayer to be perfect must be ecstatic (Cass. Coll. ix. 31). Mingled too with sound and practical advice are strange stories of his visions, in which he describes himself as engaged continually in deadly conflict with evil spirits manifesting themselves not infrequently in forms more ludicrous than terrible. Such narratives appear simply childish and preposterous to a less imaginative age; and may be imputed not without probability to the morbid action of a restless intellect in the silence and loneliness of the desert. Still they may fairly be taken as an expression, however grotesque, of latent truths, as an attempt to realise the insidious force of evil tendencies. In one passage Antony draws a striking and beautiful contrast between the uproar of the demons who assailed him and the awful stillness of the angel hovering over the host of Sennacherib by night (Ath.).

Beyond the personal encounters with demons, and a special faculty of exorcising them from others, it is not clear how far and in what manner Antony believed himself able to work miracles. To Martianus, a military prefect, who came praying for his assistance, he answered, "Ask not of me; ask of God in Christ, and thy child shall be healed." "Any pure heart," he said on another occasion, when addressed as a prophet, "can foretell things to come:" and he warned his disciples against paying any attention if evil spirits offered to predict the rising of the Nile. Miraculous powers, however, were ascribed to him by his admirers, sometimes of a very puerile sort; as when he is said to have detected on board-ship a person possessed by an evil spirit through a bad smell. The water found in answer to his prayers by himself and his companions as they journeyed through the desert, need not be regarded as supernatural; and the voice which guided him in the Thebaid may only mean the voice of conscience. It would indeed be strange, if so lonely an existence did not breed many involuntary and unconscious illusions; still more strange if those whose eyes were dazzled by the almost more than human self-abnegation of the great eremite had not been almost irresistibly led to exaggerate his prophecies viewed through a deceptive haze. Among the many in whom the marvellous experiences of Antony awoke a longing to renounce the world was Augustine himself (Aug. Conf. viii. 6, 12).

Such a life as this is no subject for indiscriminate eulogy, still less for supercilious sneers. There is much to regret; misdirected zeal, talents not made useful as they might have been, and a morbid dread of contact with the material world. But the single minded steadfastness with which Antony acted up to his sense of duty ought to command admiration; and the circumstances of his age had much to do in determining the course which his devout aspirations followed. He is commemorated on January 17th. The other writings attributed to him, beside the Septem Epistolae already mentioned are probably spurious. [I. G. S.]

ANUPH (St.) (Anub, or Nub), a monk of Scetis in the fourth century, brother of St. Poemen. (Tillemont, Ecc. Hist. vii. 192, distinguishes this Anuph from the brother of Poemen, apparently without cause.) When the monasteries there were devastated by the Mazici, a Moorish tribe, he retired with his brother to Tereuthi. As a proof of his asceticism, it is recorded that he and his brother refused to see even their own mother (Ruff. de Mon. 10, de Verb. Sen. 199; Pall. Hist. Lavs. 58; Gr. Inc. ap. Rosw. V. P. v. 4, 15, vii. 42; Soz. Hist. iii. 14; Nic. Hist. ix. 14). [I. G. S.]

ANYSIUS, bishop of THESSALONICA, succeeded his master Ascholius, appointed his vicar in Illyria, by Pope Damasus, 383—an office continued to him by Popes Siricius, Anastasius, and Innocent (Holstenius, Collect. Roman. Romae, 1662, pp. 43, 45). On his appointment, Ambrose wrote both to him and the clergy of Macedonia, expressing his joy that there had not been a moment's doubt as to Ascholius' successor (Ambrose, Ep. xv. xvi.). On Chrysostom's condemnation, Anysius assembled the Macedonian bishops and drew up a synodical letter to Pope Innocent, detailing all that had been done, and declaring his resolution to abide by the decision of the Roman Church, ἐμμενεῖν τῇ κρίσει τῶν Ῥωμαίων (Pallad. 26). He wrote to Chrysostom early in 405, expressing his disapprobation of all the acts of his enemies. Chrysostom sent letters in return to him and to the orthodox bishops of Macedonia, early in 406, by Evethus, commending the vigour and courage with which he had acted (Chrys. Ep. clxii. clxiii.). Anysius was canonized, and stands in the Roman martyrology Dec. 30. [E. V.]

AORATUS (Iren. 55 f.; cf. 54). [VALENTINUS; EPIPHANES.] [H.]

APATOR (Iren. 24). [VALENTINUS.] [H.]

APELLES, a Gnostic, the most famous and original of Marcion's disciples. According to Tertullian (De Praescr. 30; cf. De Carne Chr. 1) he had to "withdraw from the presence of his most holy master," evidently at Rome, owing to an act of incontinence, and went to Alexandria. After some years, the statement proceeds, he returned and attached himself to a virgin named Philumene, who subsequently became a prostitute. Tertullian's avidity in accepting scandal, especially of an unclean kind, when the subject is a heretic or a pagan, must throw some doubt on this account; and it might be suspected that there is some confusion with the similar story of Marcion at Sinope [MARCION], with which Tertullian was not acquainted. On the other hand he had good opportunities of knowing the recent history of Roman Christianity; and there is a clear reference to the same occurrence in the anonymous [Ps. Tert.] Libellus c. Omn. Haer. 19, which is one of the authorities (17) for Marcion's misconduct. As nothing to the discredit of Apelles is recorded by Epiphanius or Philastrius, the author of this little treatise probably had here independent information; and there is sufficient evidence (cf. R. A. Lipsius, Zur Quellenkritik d. Epiph. 33 f.) that he was a Roman churchman contemporary with Tertullian. Yet a local tradition more than half a century after the event, though doubly attested, must be received with hesitation when it records a scandalous story unsupported by other evidence. Apelles' partial "desertion" of Marcion's doctrine ("Apelles discipulus et postea desertor ipsius," Tert. De Carne Chr. 1; "Apelli ceterisque desertoribus Marcionis," Adv. Marc. iii. 11) would help to build up the tradition, which may well have a base of fact, however distorted.

The imputation cast on Philumene and her relations with Apelles is set aside by abundant negative evidence. Rhodon, a younger contemporary of his own, and an antagonist of all branches of Marcionism, as quoted by Eusebius (H. E. v. 13) represents him merely as "following the utterances of a possessed virgin (ἀποφθέγμασι παρθένου δαιμονώσης), Philumene by name;" mentioning at the same time that he "presumed on his character and his old age" (τῆ πολιτεία σεμνυόμενος καὶ τῆ γῆρα); and Rhodon, though an Asiatic by birth, had spent some of his earlier years at Rome. At a later time Hippolytus, a Roman ecclesiastic, calls her "a certain Philumene, whom he [Apelles] deems a prophetess" (adv. Haer. x. 20): the Lib. adv. Omn. Haer. uses identical language. Other passages of Tertullian (De Praescr. 6; De Carne Chr. 6; cf. adv. Marc. iii. 11; De Anima 36) state more distinctly that Apelles believed her to be the bearer of revelations from an angel, and a worker of miracles:—"signs and conjuring tricks" (praestigiis) he calls them, referring the agency to an evil spirit ("angelum seductionis" De Praescr. 6; "cuius emergente circumventus" ib. 31; cf. Rhod. l. c.). Jerome's similar report (Com. in Gal. i. 8; cf. Ep. exxxiii. 4) expressly refers to Tertullian. Bunsen (Hippol. i. 379) calls Philumene "a clairvoyante." The appropriateness of the term is well illustrated by a curious passage printed in the early editions of Augustine's book On Heresies (24) as part of the article on the "Severians." It is wholly wanting in all the MSS. known to the Benedictine editors, and is evidently misplaced. The article on the Severians, which follows that on Apelles, owes its place and its information exclusively to Epiphanius. Whether Augustine be responsible for the doubtful paragraph or not, it can come only from an ancient author, and must refer to Apelles. The following is the passage:—"He moreover used to say that a certain girl named Philumene was divinely inspired to predict future events. He used to refer to her his dreams, and the perturbations (aestus) of his mind, and to forewarn himself secretly by her divinations or presages." [Here some words appear to be missing.] "The same phantom (phantasmate)," he said, "shewed itself to the same Philumene in the form of a boy. This seeming boy sometimes declared himself to be Christ, sometimes Paul. By questioning this phantom she used to supply the answers which she pronounced to her hearers (ea respondere quae . . . diceret)." He added that she was "accustomed to perform some miracles, of which the following was the chief: she used to make a large loaf enter a glass vase (ampullam) with a very small mouth, and to take it out (levare) uninjured with the tips of her fingers, and was content with that food alone, as if it had been given her from above (divinitus)."

Apelles lived to old age, as appears from the statement of Rhodon (l. c.), with whom he had an oral controversy. Rhodon is placed by Eusebius in the reign of Commodus, 180-193. The manhood of Apelles therefore probably began not many years before or after 130. About 146 Marcion had for some time been teaching at Rome (Just. Mart. Ap. i. 26).

Apelles attributed to a book of Manifestations (Φανερώσεις) of Philumene special authority (Hipp. l. c.), and even, it would seem, had lessons from it read publicly (Ps. Tert. l. c.: the passage is obscure). When Tertullian says that he wrote it (de Praescr. 30: cf. Theodoret, Haer. Fab. i. 25), the meaning probably is that Philumene dictated to him her oracles. He wrote in his own person a book or series of books called Reasonings (Συλλογισμοί), directed against the Mosaic theology (Ps. Tert.). To this work doubtless belonged three questions cited by Ambrose (de Parad. 5 § 28 f.), probably following Origen, from "his thirty-eighth tome," on subjects connected with Gen. ii. The numeral explains a statement of Eusebius (l. c.: cf. Hipp.) that Apelles "committed countless impieties against the law of Moses, blaspheming the divine words in a multitude of books" (διὰ πλείων συγγραμμάτων). As we have seen, he was answered by Rhodon. Tertullian too appears himself to have devoted to some of his doctrines a special treatise (de Carne Chr. 8).

Whatever cloud may be thought to rest upon the youth of Apelles, the picture which Rhodon unwittingly furnishes of his old age is pleasant to look upon. We see a man unwearied in the pursuit of truth, diffident and tolerant, resting in beliefs which he could not reconcile, but studious to maintain the moral character of theology. Always a Marcionist, though conscientiously (Philast. 47) departing so widely from the system of Marcion that he was said to have founded a new sect (Orig. Hom. in Gen. ii. 2; c. Cels. v. 54, &c.), he appears to have held a curiously intermediate position in the movements of the time. Origen, while constrained to pronounce him a heretic, yet singles him out from the other great Gnostics as a heretic only in a subordinate sense (on Tit. iii. 10, 11: not so Firmilianus in Cyp. Ep. lxxv. 5). The nature, however, of his approximation to the Church and his doctrines in general will be best considered with those of his master [MARCION]. [H.]

APELLES, a monk and priest near Acoris in the Heptanomis in the fourth century. He had been a smith; and a legend, similar to that of St. Dunstan, is related of his chasing the devil with a red-hot iron. He was famous for miracles (Ruff. de Mon. 15; Pall. Hist. Laus. 60; Soz. Hist. vi. 28; Niceph. Hist. xi. 34). [I. G. S.]

APHTHARSIA (Iren. 107 f.). [OPHITES]. [H.]

APHTHARTODOCÆTÆ (from ἄφθαρτος, incorruptible, and δοκέω, to think), a sect of the Monophysites, which arose in the 6th century. They were also called Phantasiastæ, because they appeared to acknowledge only a seeming body of Christ, and to border on Docetism, and Julianists, from their leader Julian, Bishop of Halicarnassus, and his contemporary Xenajas of Hierapolis. They argued, from the commingling (σύγχυσις) of the two natures of Christ, that the body of our Lord, from the very beginning, became partaker of the incorruptibility of the Logos, and was subject to corruptibility merely κατ' οἰκονομίαν. They appealed in proof especially to Christ's walking on the sea during his earthly life. Their opponents among the Monophysites, the Serericus (from Severus, Patriarch of Antioch), maintained that the body of Christ before the resurrection was corruptible, and were hence called Phthartolatræ (Φθαρτολάτραι, from φθαρτός and λάτρης), or Corrupticolæ, i. e. Worshipers of the Corruptible. Both parties admitted the incorruptibility of Christ's body after the resurrection. The word φθορά was generally taken in the sense of corruptibility, but sometimes in the sense of mere frailty. This whole question is rather one of scholastic subtlety, though not wholly idle, and may be solved in this way: that the body of Christ, before the resurrection, was similar in its constitution to the body of Adam before the fall, containing the germ or possibility of immortality and incorruptibility, but subject to the influence of the elements, and was actually put to death by external violence, but through the indwelling power of the sinless spirit was preserved from corruption and raised again to an imperishable life, when—to use an ingenious distinction of St. Augustine—the immortalitas minor became immortalitas major, or the posse non mori a non posse mori.

The Aphthartodocetæ were subdivided into Ktistolatræ, or, from their founder, Gajanitæ, who taught that the body of Christ was created (κτιστόν), and Aklistetæ, who asserted that the body of Christ, although in itself created, yet by its union with the eternal Logos became increate, and therefore incorruptible. The most consistent Monophysite in this direction was the rhetorician Stephanus Niobes (about 550), who declared that every attempt to distinguish between the divine and the human in Christ was improper and useless, since they had become absolutely one in him. An Abbot of Edessa, Bar Sudailli, extended this principle even to the creation, which he thought would at last be wholly absorbed in God.

APHTHONIUS. (1) Bishop of Zeugma at the close of the 4th century. He passed his early years as a monk in the monastery of St. Publius, on whose death he received the abbacy in conjunction with his brother monk Theotecnus, who ruled over the Greek-speaking monks, Aphthonius taking the oversight of the Syrians. After governing the monastery for 40 years, he was chosen Bishop of Zeugma, but made no difference in his dress or ascetic mode of life. In the earlier part of his residence at Zeugma he became acquainted with S. Chrysostom, who wrote to him, together with his brother monks, Chæraes and Theodotus, from Arabissus, A.D. 405, 406 (Chrys. Ep. lxx. xciii.; Theod. Rel. Hist. c. 5).

(2, 3) There were two leading laymen of this name at Zeugma, to whom Theodoret wrote commending their zeal for the true faith. (Theod. Ep. 125, p. 997.) [E. V.]

APHTHONIUS (Ἀφθόνιος), one of Manes' twelve disciples. The Greek form of abjuration (ap. Cotelier's Patres Apost. i. p. 544), Petrus Siculus (Hist. Man. xvi.), and Photius (Contra Man. i. 14), name Aphthonius, Hierax, and Heraclides as the three interpreters and commentators of Manes' works (τοὺς ὑπομνηματιστὰς καὶ ἐξηγητὰς τῶν τούτου συγγραμμάτων). Philostorgius (Hist. Eccl. iii. 15) relates that Aphthonius was the leader of the Manicheans (τῆς τῶν Μανιχαίων λύσεως προεστώς), in Alexandria, and enjoyed a great reputation for wisdom and eloquence, until Aetius came from Antioch to oppose him. Aphthonius was defeated in the discussion, and died a week afterwards. [E. B. C.]

APION. The name is properly Egyptian (see Procop. Pers. i. 8; Ross. Inscr. fasc. 2, p. 62) and derived from the god Apis, after the analogy of Anubion, Serapion, etc. Thus the form Apion seems to be more correct than Appion (as often written), and it is also better supported (Cotelier on Clem. Recogn. x. 52; see however Otto on Justin (?) Coh. ad Gent. § 9).

(1) The son of Poseidonius (Justin (?) Coh. ad.

Gent. § 9; Africanus in Euseb. Pr. Ev. x. 10, p. 490), a grammarian of Alexandria in the first century. Though a native of the Oasis, he concealed his Egyptian origin (Clem. Strom. i. 21) and affected Greek descent (Joseph. c. Ap. ii. 3). By his great diligence he acquired the sobriquet μόχθος (Suidas s. v.; cf. Africanus l. c.), while his many literary triumphs won for him the epithet πλειστονίκης^a (Plin. N. H. xxxvii. 19; A. Gell. v. 14; Clem. Hom. iv. 6, xx. 11; Clem. Strom. i. 21, p. 378). Owing to his somewhat noisy celebrity the emperor Tiberius named him "cymbalum mundi" (Plin. N. H. 1 præf.), though as Pliny adds, the inordinate and unblushing vanity for which he was noted (Joseph. c. Ap. ii. 12; A. Gell. l. c.) would have better entitled him to be called "proprie famae tympanum." He appears to have been profligate, unscrupulous, and sophistical (Joseph. c. Ap. ii. 1, 13; Clem. Hom. v. 3 sq.); and his lying stories surpass the inventions of the most mendacious fabulists (A. Gell. vi. 8; Plin. N. H. xxx. 6; Aelian, H. A. x. 29; xi. 40, εἰ μὴ περατεύεται). The pretty tale of Androclus and the lion rests on his authority, or, perhaps we should say, on his invention (A. Gell. v. 14). The great reputation which he enjoyed (ἀνὴρ δοκιμώτατος, Tatian, ad Græc. 38) was chiefly due to his critical labours on Homer, which gained for him a most triumphant reception in Greece (Senec. Ep. 88; see Fabric. Bibl. Græc. i. 503 sq.). These however do not fall within the scope of the present work, nor would he have been entitled to a place here, if he had not been found in conflict with Jews and Jewish Christians.

1. His hostility to Judaism was deep, persistent, and unscrupulous (Joseph. c. Ap. ii. 1-13; Clem. Hom. iv. 24, v. 2, πάνυ Ἰουδαίους δι' ἀπεχθείας ἐχόντα, v. 27, 29 δ' ἀλόγως μισῶν^b τὸ Ἰουδαίων κ. τ. λ.; Clem. Strom. i. 21). As Josephus has preserved direct extracts from his writings, besides giving the substance of much more, we are in a position to say that these descriptions of his attacks are not overcharged. These attacks were contained in two works especially; in his Egyptian History (Αἰγυπτιακά) comprised in five books (A. Gell. v. 14; Tatian, ad Græc. 38), of which the third (Joseph. c. Ap. ii. 2) and fourth (Tatian l. c.; Clem. Strom. i. 21; Justin (?) Coh. ad Gent. 9; Africanus l. c.) contained misrepresentations respecting the origin of the race and the circumstances of the exodus; and in a separate treatise Against the Jews (κατὰ Ἰουδαίων βίβλος, Justin. (?) l. c.; Africanus l. c.)^b According to Josephus the grounds of his attack were threefold: (1) That the Jews were of Egyptian origin and were expelled under highly discreditable circumstances; (2) that they were the great disturbers of the peace at Alexandria; and (3) that their rites were bloodthirsty and absurd. Under this last head he gave the story of the worship of the head of an ass in the temple at Jerusalem (ii. 7), which is repeated by Tacitus (Hist. v. 4), and which by a not uncommon confusion in early times was transferred from Judaism to Christianity (Minuc. Felix, 9, 28), and thus suggested the famous graffito of the Palatine barracks. He also gave currency to the calumny that a Greek fattened up for sacrifice was discovered in the temple by Antiochus, when he took the city (ii. 8). In the first part of the second book of his treatise On the Antiquity of the Jews (Euseb. H. E. iii. 9 περὶ τῆς Ἰουδαίων ἀρχαιότητος) Josephus, apologizing for taking any notice of attacks so scurrilous and base, exposes the ignorance, mendacity, and self-contradictions of Apion. The second title of this treatise, Against Apion, by which it is generally quoted, has inferior external authority (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. v. 7, ed. Harles), and is obviously incorrect; for the refutation of Apion is only subsidiary to the main object of the work, though it occupies much space. This work is translated and annotated Frankel's Monatschrift, i. 7 sq., 41 sq., 81 sq., 121 sq.

Nor was the hostility of Apion confined to writing. It was he who headed the famous embassy of the Alexandrians to Rome, sent with the view of exasperating the emperor Caius against the Jews, as instigators of rebellion and as having refused to worship the imperial image (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 8, 1). Among the ambassadors sent by the Jews to counteract these machinations, was the famous writer Philo, who has left an account of the proceedings (Legat. ad Cai. ii. 545 M), though he does not mention his chief opponent by name.

2. It is not surprising that the spent wave of this antagonism should have overflowed on Judaic Christianity. Whether Apion actually came in contact with any members of the new brotherhood is more than questionable. His early date (for he flourished in the reigns of Tiberius, Caius, and Claudius) renders this improbable. But in the writings of the Petro-Clementine cycle he holds a prominent place as an antagonist of the Gospel. In the Clementine Homilies he appears in company with Anubion and Athenodorus among the satellites of Simon Magus, the arch-enemy of St. Peter and St. Peter's faith. True to the character which genuine history assigns to him, he figures there as the representative of philosophic or rather of sophistical Hellenism. Besides this he is portrayed as dealing in the magical arts of the Egyptians (v. 3-8). To this latter feature in the portrait Ewald (Gesch. vi. 83) objects as unhistorical; but Pliny (N. H. xxx. 6) tells us distinctly that Apion boasted of having raised ghosts and conversed with them himself, and in his book Περὶ Μάγαν he seems to have professed an entire belief in the power of magic (see Müller Fragm. Hist. Græc. iii. 515). But though the character of the man as given in the Clementines is mainly historical, the incidents are fictitious. He is the friend of Clement's father (iv. 6 sq., xx. 11, 15), and Clement relates at length how at Rome Apion would have encouraged the worst passions of his youth, alleging as an example the profligacy of the gods of Olympus, but was outwitted and outargued by his more moral pupil who shows that they were no gods but tyrants (v. 3-30). When at a later date he falls in with Clement at Tyre, he takes up a different line. Undertaking the defence of the Hellenic mythology, he explains all the absurd and immoral stories of the deities, as allegories involving physical truths (iv. 24, 25, vi. 2-11). Thus Cronos is time, Rhea flowing water, &c. This tendency to allegorizing (the word occurs frequently) is in keeping with his Alexandrian education. Clement retorts that they are demons or magicians (vi. 18 sq.). The conversations with Apion thus occupy three books, iv, v, vi. At the close again (xx. 11 sq.) he reappears, but takes no prominent part. The Clementine Recognitions contain nothing corresponding to the disputes of Clement and Apion in the 4th, 5th, and 6th books of the Homilies; but at the close of this work (x. 52), as at the close of the Homilies, he is introduced as a subsidiary character in the plot. Eusebius (H. E. iii. 38; cf. Photius Bibl. 113) mentions yet another work (if it be another) belonging to the same cycle, in which he appears, "long and wordy compositions" purporting to have come from Clement, and "containing dialogues of Peter forsooth and Apion." This last expression, as generally interpreted, is taken to imply that Apion there disputed not with Clement but with Peter (e. g. Uhlhorn Die Homil. u. Recogn. p. 70, Lehmann Die Clem. Schrift. p. 470); but in the not very exact language of Eusebius it might well denote conversations which Clement held with Peter and with Apion severally, and thuc refer to the extant Homilies or to some recension of them.

^a Rufinus (Clem. Recogn. x. 52) erroneously translates it Appionem Plitonicensem, as though it were the name of his country. Suidas calls him δὲ Πλειστονίκου, and accordingly some modern critics take it as a patronymic; but this seems to be incorrect.

^b Perhaps these two were parts of a more comprehensive work, Ἱστορία κατ' ἔθνος, mentioned by Suidas, but not otherwise quoted: see Ewald, Gesch. vii. 83. In Clem. Hom. v. 2, it is stated that he had written many books (πολλὰ βιβλία) against the Jews, but this is probably an exaggeration.

The fragments of Apion will be found in Müller's Fragm. Hist. Græc. ii. 506 sq., where there is also a notice of the man and his writings. But no reference is there made to the Clementines. For the part which Apion plays in the Clementines, the treatises on these writings by Schlie-mann, Uhlhorn, Hilgenfeld, Lehmann, and others may be consulted.

APOCALYPSES (APOCRYPHAL). Abundant as is the literature of apocryphal Gospels and Acts produced in the first centuries of the Christian Church, the more meagre appears that of apocryphal Apocalypses current under Apostolic names, and derived from the same periods of ecclesiastical history. Apocalyptic literature of a certain kind was indeed as familiar to primitive Christianity as it was to the later Judaism, but the traditional forms into which writings of that kind were cast, required the employment of Old Testament names of authorship, such as Moses, Henoch, Elias, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezra, Daniel, Eldad and Modad, &c., the custom being to assign the office of announcing the future fortunes of the Church not to Apostles of the New Testament but to prophets of the Old. The Revelation of the Apostle St. John is the solitary representative in the New Testament of this branch of literature; but when in the course of the 2nd century Montanism began to assert its new prophetic claims, and to demand for its utterances Divine authority, the prophets of the sect such as Montanus, Prisca, Maximilla, Alexander, came forward each in his own name without deeming it necessary to seek to conceal themselves under any artificial pseudonym. An exception to this statement must be made in respect to the "Shepherd" an (orthodox) work produced about the middle of the 2nd century, and in the time of the Roman bishop Pius, which selected Hermas, a contemporary of Clemens Romanus (Vis. ii. 4), and therefore an apostolic man (cf. Rom. xvi. 4) for the recipient of its pretended revelations. But in this case there was a special motive furnished by the purpose for which the work was written for thus antedating its prophecies by some fifty years. That purpose was to announce a second term of repentance vouchsafed by the Divine mercy, out of indulgence to the infirmities of the faithful, and available for every one who should receive the revelation, but at the same time to cut off any future hope of pardon for sins into which the baptized might hereafter fall, by announcing the near approach of the Second Advent of Christ. A somewhat similar phenomenon meets us in another work of the latter half of the 2nd century (which, however, does not pretend to apostolical authorship), the Book of Elxai (Pseudorigenes, Refut. omn. Haer. ix. 15; Epiph. Haer. 19), likewise antedates its own composition, and assigns it to the third year of the emperor Trajan. Whether on the other hand the Judaistic Gnostic Cerinthus did really, as he is accused of doing by the Roman presbyter Caius (ap. Euseb. H. E. iii. 28), publish his pretended revelations under a celebrated apostolic name, is more than doubtful. The reference is in all probability to the Revelation of St. John which Caius rejected, and on account of its Millenarianism attributed to Cerinthus. At any rate, all that Caius reports of the alleged work of Cerinthus may well apply to the Book of Revelation; and we may also gather from his own words δι' ἀποκαλύψαν ὡς ὑπὸ ἀποστόλου μεγάλου γεγραμμένων (and especially from the singular ἀποστόλου), that it is not to several books of revelations, but only to several revelations or visions (which might all be collected in one book), to which he is referring.

The only other Apocalypse claiming apostolic authorship which appears for any length of time to have obtained in the Church, and so in any measure to have rivalled in position the Revelation of St. John, was the "Apocalypse of Peter." Of this only a few fragments remain (ap. Hilgenfeld, Novum Testamentum extra canonem receptum, fasc. iv. 74 sq.). In the Muratorian Fragment it is enumerated along with the Revelation of St. John among the canonical Scriptures of the New Testament, the author of the fragment at the same time remarking that opinions varied in the Church as to its authority (Apocalypses etiam Joannis et Petri tantum recipimus quam quidem ex nostris legi in ecclesia nolunt). Clemens Alexandrinus reckons it among the Antilegomena (Clem. Hypotyp. ap. Euseb. H. E. vi. 14); the ἐκ τῶν προφητικῶν ἐκλογαὶ preserved among the works of Clemens, cite it without hesitation as a genuine Petrine work (Eclog. ex Proph. sectt. 41, 48, 49, p. 1000 sq. ed. Potter); Methodius of Tyre (cir. 312) likewise seems to have reckoned it among θεόπνευστα γράμματα (Methodius, Sympos. 11, 6, p. 16 ed. Jahn). So also the ancient Catalogue of the Books of Scripture at the end of the Codex Claramontanus assigns it a place among the canonical writings and determines its length as extending to 270 στίχοι. Eusebius of Caesarea appears in one place (H. E. iii. 3) to deny it any degree of ecclesiastical recognition or authority, while in another (H. E. iii. 25) he reckons it among the so-called Antilegomena, or rather among spurious writings of the better class separated from them by a very uncertain line of demarcation (such as the πράξεις Παύλου, the Shepherd of Hermas, the Epistle of Barnabas, and the διδαχαὶ τῶν ἀποστόλων). Sozomen (H. E. vii. 19), who together with St. Jerome (Cat. Vir. Illustr. c. 1) likewise pronounces it to be spurious, relates nevertheless that it was in his time publicly read once a year in some churches of Palestine (οὕτω γοῦν τὴν καλουμένην ἀποκάλυψιν Πέτρου ὡς νόθον παντελῶς πρὸς τῶν ἀρχαίων δοκιμασθεῖσαν ἐν τισιν ἐκκλησίαις τῆς Παλαιστίνης εἰσέτι νῦν ἀπαξ ἐκάστου ἔτους ἀναγιωσκομένην ἔγγυωμεν ἐν τῇ ἡμέρᾳ Παρασκευῆς, ἣν εὐλαβῶς ἄγαν ὁ λαὸς νηστεύει ἐπὶ ἀναμνήσει τοῦ σωτηρίου πάθους). Further, the Catalogue of Anastasius Sinaita contains it in the Appendix to the New Testament, and its title is found in the Stichometry of Nicephorus among the Antilegomena immediately after the Revelation of St. John. The long recognition of the book in orthodox circles, proves that it could not have had a Gnostic origin, nor otherwise contained what was offensive to Catholic Christians. The reference to it in the Muratorian Canon, proves that its production must fall within the 2nd century. As to its contents, the few fragments of it that remain are hardly sufficient to warrant any conjectures. According to Hilgenfeld (p. 75), it described the afflictions impending on the Church, and the same scholar conjectures (p. 77 sq.) that the prophetic passages cited by Hippolytus in his work De Antichristo (p. 8 l. 8 sqq. ed. Lagarde) including the prophetic quotation at Eph. v. 14, were taken from the Apocalypse of Peter.

Of Gnostic Apocalypses but few traces remain. Epiphanius (Haer. 38, 2) mentions as current among the Cainites (Καινοί), a sect of Ophites, and among the so-called "Gnostics" proper an ἀναβατικὸν Παύλου which seems to have been a fiction founded on 2 Cor. xii. 2 sqq. Whether this be the work to which Dionysius of Alexandria alludes with blame (ap. Euseb. H. E. vii. 25) must remain uncertain. The notice of it in the Byzantine Chronicler, Michael Glykas (ap. Fabric. Cod. Apocryph. N. T. tom. ii. p. 944) is derived from Eusebius, and cannot therefore be regarded as independent testimony. St. Augustine and Sozomen likewise mention an Apocalypse of Paul, but having in view a much later work which is still in existence. It must therefore remain doubtful which book is referred to in the Decretum Gelasii (ap. Credner, zur Geschichte des Kanons, Halle, 1847, p. 219) as Revelatio Pauli apocrypha. Immediately after this Apocalypse of Paul, two other apocryphal Apocalypses are mentioned in the Decretum, one the Apocalypse of Thomas (Revelatio quae appellatur Thomae apostoli apocrypha), the other the Apocalypse of Stephen (Revelatio quae appellatur Stephani apocrypha). The close neighbourhood in which all three Apocalypses are brought to the Gnostic transitus Mariae makes the conjecture seem probable that assigns to them likewise a Gnostic or heretical origin. In fact, according to the testimony of Sixtus Senensis (Bibl. Sacr. ii. 142), Serapion is said to have asserted in his book against the Manicheans that the Apocalypse of Stephen stood with that sect in high estimation. But meanwhile the citation has not again been verified (cf. Fabricius, l. c. p. 965).

Of much later origin is a series of Apocalypses, several of which have been recently printed by Tischendorf (Apocalypses apocr. Leipsic, 1866). First among these is the Apocalypse of Paul (Tisch. p. 34 sqq.) mentioned by St. Augustine (Tractat. in Joann. 98) and by Sozomen (H. E. vii. 19), which must be carefully distinguished from the older Ascensio Pauli already spoken of. This Apocalypse was probably the fabrication of some monk of Palestine in the time of the emperor Theodosius the Great, and was according to Sozomen in much esteem with the monks of his day. Later ecclesiastical writers make frequent mention of it. (See the passages in Fabricius, l. c. p. 947 sq., and Tischendorf, Proleg. p. xv). Elie du Pin (Prolegg. Bibl. ii. 49) asserts that it still exists in a Coptic version: Arabic and Syriac MSS. containing versions of it were found by Assemani in the Vatican (Catalog. Bibl. Orient. Clem. Vat. tom. iii. pars 1, p. 282), and a Syriac MS. of the Nestorians in Urumija has been recently published with an English translation by Perkins (Journal of Sacred Literature and Biblical Record, edited by B. H. Cowper. London, 1866, p. 372 sqq. Reprinted from the Journal of the American Oriental Society, vol. viii. 1864). For the history of the New Testament apocalyptic literature this late fabrication has no value whatever. The same may be said of the spurious "Apocalypse of John" (ap. Birch, Auctarium Cod. apocr. Fabriciani, 1804, and in a better text ap. Tischendorf, p. 70 sqq.). The first citation from it is found in the Scholia to the Grammar of Dionysius Thrax, which dates from the 9th century, and it is at any rate of still later origin than the last mentioned. There exist, further, in MS., and as yet unprinted, an "Apocalypse of Peter" (which appears to have nothing in common with the older celebrated Book bearing the same name) and an "Apocalypse of Bartholomew." The former, which introduces itself as written by St. Clement of Rome, and is also called liber perfectionis, now exists only in Arabic. It had been seen already by Jacobus à Vitriaco, as he himself reports in his epistle to Pope Honorius III., A.D. 1218. Some Vatican MSS. of this Apocalypse are mentioned by Assemani (loc. cit.) and Nicoll has published an abstract of it from a MS. preserved in the Bodleian (Catal. codd. MSS. Orient. bibl. Bodleian. 1821. P. II. i. 49 sqq.; cf. also Tischendorf, prolegg. p. 49 sqq.).^a Finally, of the Apoca-

^a From the information thus given us of its contents the date at which this Apocalypse was written may be approximately determined, viz. some time during the reign of the Byzantine emperor Constantinus Copronymus (A.D. 711-775), who is alluded to, c. 46, as calulus Leonis (son of Leo). The date of his accession is marked as being 72 great and 76½ little weeks (= 504 + 246½ years) before Second Advent of Christ.

The narrative in this Apocalypse refers also to other contemporary events, such as the rise of Muhammed in the year 923 of Alexander the Great = A.D. 612; the lypse of Bartholomew nothing has been discovered hitherto beyond a fragment of the Sahidic version, which Dulaurier has published with a French translation (Fragment des révélations apocryphes de S. Barthélémy, &c. Paris. 1835. The French text is also reproduced by Tischendorf in his Apocal. Apocr. prolegg. p. xxiv sqq.). [R. A. L.]

APOLLINARIS or APOLLINARIUS CLAUDIUS (Ἀπολλινάριος: so spelt in the most ancient manuscripts of the Greek writers who refer to him; Latin writers generally use the form Apollinaris), bishop of Hierapolis, in Phrygia, A.D. 171 and onwards (Euseb. Chron.), one of the most active and esteemed Christian writers of the day. He is praised by Photius for his style (Phot. Cod. 14). Jerome enumerates him among the ecclesiastical writers who were acquainted with heathen literature, and who made use of this knowledge in the refutation of heresy (Ep. ad Magnum, iv. 83, p. 656). Theodoret also mentions his knowledge of heathen literature (Theod. Haer. Fab. Compend. iii. 2). Only a few fragments of his works have been preserved. Eusebius (H. E. iv. 27) gives the following list of those which had fallen into his hands; and his list is repeated by St. Jerome (De Vir. Ill. cap. 26) and Nicephorus (H. E. iv. 11). (1.) An apology addressed to Marcus Aurelius, probably written after A.D. 174, since it is likely that it contained the reference to the miracle of the Thundering Legion elsewhere quoted by Eusebius from Apollinaris (H. E. v. 5). (2.) Five books πρὸς Ἑλληνας written according to Nicephorus in the form of a dialogue. (3.) Two books περὶ ἀληθείας. (4.) Two books πρὸς Ἰουδαίους: these are not mentioned by St. Jerome, and the reference to them is absent from some copies of Eusebius. (5.) Writings against the Phrygian heresy, published when Montanus was making the first beginning of his heresy; that is to say, according to the Chronicon of Eusebius, about A.D. 172. These writings which were probably in the form of letters, are appealed to by Serapion, bishop of Antioch (Euseb. H. E. v. 19); and Eusebius elsewhere (H. E. v. 16) describes Apollinaris as raised up as a strong and irresistible weapon against Montanism. The situation of his see sufficiently accounts for the prominent part taken by Apollinaris in this controversy. We are told indeed by an anonymous writer who probably wrote at the end of the 9th century (Auctor Libelli Synodici apud Labbe et Cossart, i. 599), that Apollinaris on this occasion assembled twenty-six other bishops in council, and excommunicated Montanus and Maximilla, as well as the shoemaker Theodotus. The same writer ascribes to Apollinaris a statement that Montanus and Maximilla committed suicide; probably supposing him to be the author of an anonymous work against Montanism [ASTERIUS URBANUS], fragments of which are preserved by Eusebius (H. E. v. 16), and in which the suicide of these prophets is mentioned as a common rumour. But if Apollinaris had been the writer founding of the dynasty of the Benû-'l-Abbâs, successors of Muhammed, in the year 750 A.D. (cc. 47, 48); and the efforts of the emperor in the year 755 to frustrate the intervention of Pipin in Italy (c. 51).

For the indication of these historical references the writer is indebted to his friend Professor von Gutschmid.

it is likely he would have been able to speak more positively; and besides Apollinaris, who wrote (Euseb. H. E. iv. 27) at the very beginning of the Montanist heresy, could scarcely have been the author of a work purporting to be written fourteen years after the death of Maximilla, whose prophesying there is every reason to believe continued for many years. Besides the works mentioned by Eusebius, who does not give his list as a complete one, Theodoret (Haer. Fab. ii. 21) mentions (6) that Apollinaris wrote against the Eucratites of the school of Severus (πρὸς τοὺς Σεουρητιανῶν Ἐγκρατίτας). (7.) Photius (Cod. 14) makes mention of having read of Apollinaris his work πρὸς Ἑλληνας, καὶ περὶ ἀληθείας καὶ περὶ εὐσεβείας. It has been questioned whether (a) by this work πρὸς Ἑλληνας we are to understand a new work of Apollinaris not mentioned by Eusebius; or (b) whether the words περὶ ἀληθείας καὶ περὶ εὐσεβείας describe a single work, the same as that described by Eusebius as περὶ ἀληθείας: against this Ruth (Rel. Sac. ii. 171) urges the repetition of the πρὶ; or (c) whether the work περὶ εὐσεβείας may not be identical with the apology addressed to Marcus Aurelius (λόγος ὑπὲρ τῆς πίστεως); or lastly (d) since it is the habit of Photius to give a separate paragraph to each work he reads, whether the whole description relates to the single work πρὸς Ἑλληνας which is further described by its subject καὶ περὶ ἀληθείας καὶ περὶ εὐσεβείας. So Donaldson, History of Christian Literature iii. 243. The works πρὸς Ἑλληνας and περὶ ἀληθείας, however, are plainly distinguished by Eusebius. (8.) In the preface to the Alexandrian Chronicle a work περὶ τοῦ πάσχα is attributed to Apollinaris, from which two extracts are furnished which have given rise to much controversy.

The main point of controversy is whether (assuming the fragments to be genuine) Apollinaris wrote on the side of the practice of the Roman Church, or on that of the Quartodecimans of Asia Minor. In support of the former view is urged the similarity of the language of these fragments with that of Clement of Alexandria and of Hippolytus, who advocated the Western practice; and gain the fact that Apollinaris is not claimed as a Quartodeciman by Polyocrates, bishop of Ephesus, in his letter to Victor of Rome, in which he defends the use of his Church by the authority of some other less eminent men. On the other side it is urged that Apollinaris speaks of his antagonists as "some who raise contention through ignorance," language which would rather convey the impression that Apollinaris was writing against the opinions of some small sect than that he was combating the belief of the whole Church of Asia Minor to which he belonged; and it is further urged that if Apollinaris had been the first to defend in the East the practice which ultimately prevailed, it is incredible that Eusebius or some other early writer should make no mention of this early champion of the Catholic practice.

Socrates the historian (H. E. iii. 7) names Apollinaris, together with Irenaeus, Clement, and Serapion as holding the doctrine that our Lord when He became man had a human soul (ἐμψυχον τὸν ἑνανθρωπήσαντα).

Apollinaris had been set down as a Chiliast on St. Jerome's authority (De Vir. Ill. cap. 18); but Routh (Rel. Sac. i. 174) has given good reason for thinking that the Apollinaris intended is the younger Apollinaris, of Laodicea; since Jerome speaks of Irenaeus and Apollinaris as the first and the last of the Greek Millenarians (lib. xi. Comm. in Ezech. cap. 36 iii. 952), and also states that Apollinaris answered Dionysius of Alexandria (Prooem. in lib. xviii. Comm. Esaiæ iii. 478).

The martyrologies commemorate the death of Apollinaris on the 7th of February. Of the year, or of the place and manner of his death nothing is known. Only that it was before the end of the 2nd century may be inferred from the language in which he is described in the letter of Serapion written about that time (Καλωνίου Ἀπολλιναρίου τοῦ μακαριωτάτου γενομένου ἐν Ἱεραπόλει τῆς Ἀσίας ἐπισκόπου). APOLLINARIANISM, APOLLINARIANS, APOLLINARISTS. [See APOLLINARIS THE YOUNGER.]

APOLLINARIS (ST. and MART.), first bishop or archbishop of Ravenna, perhaps from 50-78. According to the life written by Agnellus in the 9th cent. (Li'er Pontificalis, ap. Muratori, Rev. It. Script. ii. part i.), St. Apollinaris was a native of Antioch, well instructed in Greek and Latin literature, who followed St. Peter to Rome, and was sent by him to Ravenna. On his way he healed the son of Irenaeus who was blind, and did other miracles. At Ravenna he baptized in the river Bidens, and raised the daughter of the patrician Rufus to life; he was imprisoned by the heathen near the capitol, and was there fed by angels. Afterwards being expelled from the city, he preached in Dalmatia, Pannonia, Thrace, and Corinth. After three years he returned and suffered new persecutions, and did new miracles, one of which was to destroy a statue and temple of Apollo by his prayers. He was martyred under Vespasian, after an episcopate of rather more than 28 years.

Other lives such as that in the Acta Sanctorum are more full of miracles, but do not add anything else of importance. The day of his death is agreed upon as July 23rd; the year is uncertain, but may have been 78. From a sermon of St. Peter Chrysologus in the 5th cent. (No. 128, p. 552 sq. ed. Migne), it appears that St. Apollinaris was the only bishop of Ravenna who suffered martyrdom, and that he, strictly speaking, can only be called a confessor. He did not die, it would seem, a violent death, though it may have been hastened by the persecutions he underwent. It is probable that like his successor Aderitus he died in the port-town Classis, where he was buried. A new church, still existing, was built about the same time as that of St. Vitale, and into this his body was translated by St. Maximianus about 552. The mosaic over the apse seems to realize the words of St. Peter Chrysologus (ut supra), "Ecce vivit, ecce ut bonus pastor suo medius assistit in grege." As early as 575 it was the custom to take solemn oaths upon his relics (St. Greg. Magn., Ep. vi. 61). His body was moved from place to place in the church at various times, and was taken to Ravenna in 1515 for the sake of safety, but restored to it in 1655 (see authorities in Acta Sanctor. for July 23). This most interesting basilica, with the vacant monastery adjoining ing, is now the only remnant of the town of Classis. [J. W.]

APOLLINARIS (or, according to Greek orthography, APOLLINARIUS) the ELDER, of Alexandria, was born about the beginning of the 4th century. After teaching grammar for some time at Berytus in Phoenicia, he removed, A.D. 335, to Laodicea, of which church he was made presbyter. Here he married and had a son, afterwards the bishop of Laodicea. [See foll. art.] Both father and son were on intimate terms with the heathen sophists Libanius and Epiphanius of Petra, frequenting the lecture-room of the latter, on which account they were admonished and, upon their venturing to sit out the recitation of a hymn to Bacchus, excommunicated by Theodotus, bishop of Laodicea. They were however restored upon their subsequent repentance (Socr. Eccles. Hist. iii. 16; Sozom. vi. 25).

The elder Apollinaris is chiefly noted for his literary labours. When the edict of Julian, A.D. 362, forbade the Christians to study Greek literature, he undertook with the help of his son to supply the void by reconstructing the Scriptures on the classical models. Thus the whole biblical history down to Saul's accession was turned into 24 books of Homeric hexameters, each superscribed, like those of the Iliad, by a letter of the alphabet. Lyrics, tragedies, and comedies, after the manner of Pindar, Euripides, and Menander, followed. Even the Gospels and Epistles of the New Test. were made to adapt themselves to the form of Socratic disputation. Two works alone remain to us as samples of their indomitable zeal; a tragedy entitled Christus Patiens, in 2601 lines, which has been edited among the works of Gregory Nazianzen; and a version of the Psalms, in Homeric hexameters. The opening of the tragedy, which is an obvious cento from the Medea of Euripides, goes far to betray the secret of their omni-representative energy. Throughout the work the virgin-mother is made to vent her sorrows, now in the fierce ravings of Medea, now in the hypocritical vauntings of Clytemnestra, and now in the dreariest of platitudes, which cannot be traced to their original. The Greek of the play, where it is the author's own, is no better than the sentiment. The most that can be said of the Homeric Psalter is that it is better than the tragedy, and that as a whole it fully bears out the reputation of the poet (Basil. Ep. 273, 406) that he was never at a loss for an expression. What share in the great reproduction was undertaken by each of the Apollinariii we cannot say. Sozomen (v. 18) speaks only of the son's poetic power; and that in terms which provoke a smile; but Socrates, who is the more trustworthy of the two historians, ascribes the Old Test. poems directly to the father (iii. 16), and adds that the son as the greater rhetorician devoted his energies to converting the Gospels and Epistles into Platonic dialogues. He likewise mentions a treatise on grammar compiled by the elder Apollinaris, χριστιανικῆ τύπη. The passage is worth reading for its quaint unconscious humour. For the different opinions which have been held as to the authorship of father and son, cf. Vossius, de Hist. Græc. ii. 18; de Poet. Græc. c. 9; Duport, Praef. ad Metaph. Psalm. Lond. 1674.

The Metaphrasis Psalmorum was published at Paris 1552; by Sylburg, at Heidelberg, 1596; and subsequently in various collections of the Fathers. The latest edition is that in Migne's Patrologia Græca, xxiii. [E. M. Y.]

APOLLINARIS the YOUNGER, bishop of Laodicea, flourished in the latter half of the 4th century, and was at first highly esteemed, even by Athanasius and Basil, for his classical culture, piety, and adhesion to the Nicene Creed during the Ariau controversy, until he brought out a Christological heresy which is called after him, and which in some respects prepared the way for Monophysitism. He assisted his father in composing the Christian works in imitation of the style of Homer, Menander, &c., mentioned in the preceding article. He also wrote in defence of Christianity against Julian and Porphyry; of orthodoxy against the Manichæans, Ariaus, Marcellus, Eunomius, and other heretics; biblical commentaries, and other works, of which only fragments remain. Jerome enjoyed his instruction, A.D. 374. He did not secede from the communion of the Church and begin to form a sect of his own till 375. He died about 392. After his death his followers, who were not numerous, were divided into two parties, the Polemians and Valentinians. His doctrine was condemned by a Synod of Alexandria (without naming him), by two Synods at Rome under Damasus (377 and 378), and by the second Oecumenical Council (381). Imperial decrees prohibited the public worship of the Apollinarists (388, 397, 428), until during the 5th century they were absorbed partly by the orthodox, partly by the Monophysites. But the peculiar Christology of Apollinaris has reappeared from time to time, in a modified shape, as an isolated theological opinion.

Apollinaris was the first to apply the results of the Nicene controversy to Christology proper, and to call the attention of the Church to the psychical and pneumatic element in the humanity of Christ; but in his zeal for the true deity of Christ, and fear of a double personality, he fell into the error of a partial denial of His true humanity. Adopting the psychological trichotomy of Plato (σώμα ψυχή, πνεύμα), for which he quoted 1 Thess. v. 23 and Gal. v. 17, he attributed to Christ a human body (σώμα) and a human soul (the ψυχή λογος, the anima animans which man has in common with the animal), but not a rational spirit (νοῦς, πνεύμα, ψυχή λογική, anima rationalis), and put in the place of the latter the divine Logos. In opposition to the idea of a mere connection of the Logos with the man Jesus, he wished to secure an organic unity of the two, and so a true incarnation; but he sought this at the expense of the most important constituent of man. He reached only a θεὸς σαρκοφόρος, as Nestorianism only an ἄνθρωπος θεοφόρος, instead of the proper θεῖον ἄνθρωπος. He appealed to the fact that the Scripture says, "the Word was made flesh,"—not spirit; "God was manifest in the flesh," &c. To which Gregory Nazianzen justly replied that in these passages the term σάρξ was used by synecdoche for the whole human nature. In this way Apollinaris established so close a connection of the Logos with human flesh, that all the divine attributes were transferred to the human nature, and all the human attributes to the divine, and the two merged in one nature in Christ. Hence he could speak of a crucifixion of the Logos, and a worship of his flesh. He made Christ a middle being between God and man, in whom, as it were, one part divine and two parts human were fused in the unity of a new nature. He even ventured to adduce created analogies, such as the mule, midway between the horse and the ass; the grey colour, a mixture of white and black; and spring, in distinction from winter and summer. Christ, said he, is οὔτε ἄνθρωπος ὅλος, οὔτε θεός, ἀλλὰ θεοῦ καὶ ἀνθρώπου μίξις. On the other hand, he regarded the orthodox view of a union of full humanity with a full divinity in one person—of two wholes in one whole—as an absurdity. He called the result of this construction ἀνθρωπὸ-θεός, a sort of monstrosity, which he put in the same category with the mythological figure of the Minotaur. But the Apollinarian idea of the union of the Logos with a truncated human nature might be itself more justly compared with this monster. Starting from the Nicene homousion as to the Logos, but denying the completeness of Christ's humanity, he met Arianism half-way, which likewise put the divine Logos in the place of the human spirit in Christ. But he strongly asserted his unchangeableness, while Arians taught his changeableness (τρεπτότης).

The faith of the Church revolted against such a mutilated and stunted humanity of Christ, which necessarily involved also a merely partial redemption. The incarnation is an assumption of the entire human nature, sin only excluded. The ἐσαρκώσις is ἐνανθρώπησις. To be a full and complete Redeemer, Christ must be a perfect man (τέλειος ἄνθρωπος). The spirit or rational soul is the most important element in man, his crowning glory, the seat of intelligence and freedom, and needs redemption as well as the soul and the body; for sin has entered and corrupted all the faculties.

Athanasius, the two Gregories, Basil, and Epiphanius combated the Apollinarian error, but with a certain embarrassment, attacking it rather from behind and from the flank than in front, and were unprepared to answer duly its main point, that two integral persons cannot form one person. The later orthodox doctrine surmounted this difficulty by teaching the impersonality of the human nature of Christ, and by making the personality of Christ to reside wholly in the Logos.

Apollinarianism opened the long line of Christological controversies, which resulted in the Chalcedonian symbol.

LITERATURE.—Of the writings of Apollinaris, περὶ σαρκώσεως, περὶ πίστεως, περὶ ἀναστάσεως, κατὰ κεφάλαιον, and other polemical and exegetical works and epistles, only fragments remain in the answers of Gregory of Nyssa and Theodoret, in Leontius Byzant., in the Catenæ, and in Angelo Mai's Nova Bibliotheca Patrum, tom. vii. (Rom. 1854), pars ii. pp. 82-91. Against Apollinaris are directed Athanasius's Contra Apollinarianum, or rather περὶ σαρκώσεως τοῦ Κυρίου ἡμῶν 'I. X. (Opera, ed. Bened. tom. i. pars ii. pp. 921-955), written about 372 without naming Apollinaris; Gregory of Nyssa, Λόγος ἀντιβηρτικὸς πρὸς τὰ Ἀπολλινარიῶν, first edited by Zaccagni, Rom. 1698, and then by Gallandi, Bibl. Vet. Patr. vi. 517-577; Basilus M., Epist. 265 (Opera, ed. Ben. iii. ii. 591 sqq.); Epiphanius, Haer. lxxvii.; Theodoret, Fabulae Haer. iv. 8, v. 9. APOLLINARIUS. [APOLLINARIS.]

APOLLONIA, M., a virgin burned at Alexandria A.D. 249 (Epist. S. Dion. Alex. in Euseb. H. E. vi. 41). [A. W. H.]

APOLLONIUS of EPHEBUS, so called on the doubtful authority of the writer of Prædestinationis, edited by Sirmond, who styles him bishop of Ephesus, but the silence of Eusebius and all other earlier testimony makes it difficult to lay much stress on this statement. He wrote a work in five books against the Cataphrygian or Montanist heresy. Fragments of the first three books are extant in Eusebius (H. E. v. 18), and contain much that is curious and valuable with regard to the unsaintly lives and characters of Montanus, the prophetesses Priscilla and Maximilla, and their followers. Jerome also devotes an article to Apollonius, Vir. Illust. c. 50, in which he calls him ἀνὴρ ἑλλογιώτατος, the author of a μέγα καὶ ἐπίσημον τεύχος, and quotes his authority for the statement that Montanus and his prophetesses put an end to their lives by hanging. The book professes to be written forty years after the commencement of Montanus' pretensions to prophecy. Taking for the rise of Montanism the date given in the Chronicon of Eusebius (A.D. 172) this would give about A.D. 210 for the date of this work. Eusebius mentions also that Apollonius cites the Revelation of St. John, that he relates the raising to life of a dead man at Ephesus by the same John, and that he makes mention of the tradition quoted also by Clement of Alexandria (Strom. vi. 5 sub finem) from the Apocryphal "Preaching of Peter" that our Lord commanded His Apostles not to leave Jerusalem for twelve years after His ascension. This work of Apollonius was thought sufficiently important by Tertullian to demand an answer. The seventh book of his lost work, De Ecclasi, was devoted to a refutation of his assertions. (Hieron. De Vir. Ill. c. 50; Euseb. H. E. v. 18; Cave, Lit. i. 86; Tillemont, Hist. Eccl. ii. 426; Dupin, i.) [E. V.]

APOLLONIUS OF TYANA. The life of this philosopher, as related by Philostratus, is as follows. He was born at Tyana, a Greek city of Cappadocia. His birth was accompanied by wonderful signs; the god Proteus appeared to his mother when pregnant with him, and in answer to her question, "Whom shall I bring forth?" replied, "Thou shalt bring forth me." Again, she went out into a meadow, when near the time of her delivery (being warned to do so in a dream); while there, she fell asleep, and a flock of swans surrounded her, singing and flapping their wings, being roused by which she gave birth to her son. At the same time a thunderbolt which seemed about to fall rose into the air and disappeared.

Apollonius grew up beautiful, and of extraordinary intelligence. When fourteen years of age he was taken to Tarsus and placed under the charge of Euthydemus, a rhetorician; but disliking the idle and luxurious habits of the place, he removed with his master to the neighbouring town of Aegae, where was a temple of Aesculapius. Here he became the pupil of a philosopher of the name of Euxenus, who professed himself a Pythagorean, but was in reality a lover of good living, and, as Philostratus says, understood the precepts of Pythagoras no more than a parrot understands the words which it has been taught to repeat. Apollonius, however, respected Euxenus, and gave him a garden with fountains, saying, "Live you as you please, but I will live after the manner of Pythagoras." In accordance with this declaration, he began to abstain from animal food and wine (without, however, entirely condemning the use of the latter), and rejected all garments made from living creatures. He let his hair grow, and spent most of his time in the temple of Aesculapius, where he excited the wonder of all, and became famous through the whole country. The god himself favoured him conspicuously, giving him supernatural knowledge into the characters of those who came to the temple, whereby some were cured of their diseases, others being wicked were sent away without gaining their requests. When in his twentieth year, he returned to Tyana in consequence of his father's death, and divided the property with his brother who was three years his senior; but presently with the view of reforming his brother, who lived a dissipated life, he gave him half his own share, and partly by kindness, partly through his own example, led him to a better way of living. After this he gave away the greater part of what remained of his fortune, reserving only a small portion for himself. He then declared his intention of never marrying, and kept the five years term of silence which was required of the disciples of Pythagoras. His silence, however, did not exclude him from the use of signs to express his meaning, and on several occasions during this period he repressed popular tumults in the cities of Pamphylia and Cilicia by his dignity of manner, and a few written words. His style of speaking, when his term of silence had elapsed, was brief and simple.

During the next twenty years we hear nothing of Apollonius. But between his fortieth and fiftieth year he resolved to travel to India, and disclosed his intention to his disciples, who were seven in number. In spite of their remonstrance he persisted, and finally set out with only two attendants. At Nineveh he met with Damis, the biographer from whom Philostratus professes to have taken the greater part of his history, and who offered himself to Apollonius as a guide and interpreter; but upon Apollonius saying that he already knew the way and the languages of all the people who lived on it, and moreover even the thoughts of men before they were spoken, Damis was struck with awe, and considered him as a god. (In the sequel of the narrative it appears, not without inconsistency on the part of Philostratus, that Apollonius did not always despise the aid of an interpreter.) Damis still accompanied him, and put down all his sayings and doings, in a rude and inelegant style.

From Nineveh Apollonius goes to Babylon, which, contrary to all authentic history, he finds in its ancient state of imperial magnificence. Both on his way there, and while in the city, he gives numerous proofs of his supernatural knowledge, and gains a profound and instantaneous reverence from all whom he meets. From Babylon he crosses the Caucasus to India; though how this feat, that confounds all geography, is performed, Philostratus does not explain. The conversation which Apollonius has with Dumis on the top of the Caucasus is more interesting than most of those recorded, as indicating the gradual change from a superstitious awe of the mountains into a real though slight knowledge of their phenomena. Damis ingenuously confesses that he expected to have come down the Caucasus wiser than he went up, considering it the dwelling of the gods; whereupon Apollonius replies, "The prospects from the mountains do indeed display the heavens of a deeper azure, the stars of a greater magnitude, the sun rising out of the darkness, sights familiar to the shepherds and goatherds; but neither Athos nor the famous Olympus will shew to those who climb them what care the Divine Being takes of men, nor how it pleases him to be worshipped by them; nor can these things be known but by the pure contemplation of the soul." In general, the conversations that Apollonius holds with Damis shew much more of the straining after point, eloquence, and wisdom, than the real presence of these qualities. Damis plays very much the part of a Simmias, and Apollonius that of a Socrates; and as in his descriptions of the countries one may conjecture Philostratus to have had Xenophon before his eyes, so in these dialogues he very probably imitated Plato—with not much success, it is to be admitted.

The adventures of Apollonius in India, though full of prodigies, are of slight interest till he meets with the wise men, the Brachmans; and here for the first time he confesses himself inferior to those whom he meets. He learns from them the doctrine of metempsychosis, and having learned it, presently remembers and narrates some of his own previous states of existence. He is extremely astonished at hearing from them a full account of himself and his parents; an astonishment that might have been mitigated had he not chanced to forget his own remarkable powers in this line. He asks them, what they think of themselves. Jarchas, their chief, answers, "We are gods." "And why gods," asks Apollonius. "Because," said Jarchas, "we are good men"; an answer not unworthy of being remembered. He finds these sages pay no special regard to the numbers esteemed by Pythagoras, and are not afflicted, though their own number is one so undistinguished in every way as eighteen. Jarchas expounds to Apollonius his cosmogony, which agrees with that of the Stoics in so far that the world is considered as endued with life, but differs from them in not identifying the Divine Being with the world; indeed, throughout the whole of this work a very pure monotheism is taught, though a place is also left for inferior deities. Jarchas after this both relates and performs numerous prodigies, which need not be recapitulated here.

Returning from India, Apollonius comes at length to Ephesus, where the plague was raging.

He discovers it to be due to a demon in the form of an old beggar, who winked in an extraordinary manner; and the beggar having (by his direction) been stoned, the plague is stayed. After the stoning, a large and wild dog appears where the body of the beggar ought to have been. At Pergamus Apollonius heals many sick people; at Athens he casts out a devil from a youth who was possessed, rebuking him, and commanding him to give some sign of his departure; the devil answers, "I will make that statue fall" (pointing to one in a royal portico), which accordingly happens. At Corinth he opens the eyes of a young man to an Empusa, or vampire, whom he is on the point of marrying, and causes the marriage feast to vanish. This, Philostratus says, was one of Apollonius's most celebrated performances; yet there was only a general tradition of it at Corinth. The "Lamia" of Keats will occur to every one. At Sparta, he rebukes the effeminate manners of the people, and recalls them to their ancient customs. At Rome, Apollonius delivers himself from a charge of treasonable language against Nero, by causing the writing of the indictment to vanish from the paper. He then raises from death a young girl who was being carried to burial. He next visits the pillars of Hercules, where he gives his explanation of the tides, which is, that the ocean is moved by subterranean winds; from thence he proceeds to Syracuse, where from the prodigy of a monstrous birth, he prophesies the events that happened at Rome after the death of Nero. He contemns the mythical account of Enceladus being buried under Aetna, and gives his own explanation of the eruptions. At Alexandria he meets with Vespasian, who receives him with honour, and begs him to make him emperor; Apollonius answers, "It is already done; I have just prayed to Heaven for an emperor upright, generous, wise, and venerable, and you are he." Hence came his quarrel with the Stoic philosopher Euphrates, who wished to restore the Roman republic. Philostratus says, Euphrates was jealous of him. Apollonius then gave Vespasian some good but rather commonplace advice on the duties of an emperor. But a misunderstanding took place between Apollonius and Vespasian, upon the latter depriving the Greeks of their liberty.

With the Gymnosophists of Ethiopia, whom he next visits, Apollonius does not altogether agree so well as he had done with the Indians. They (having previously been prejudiced against him through the machinations of Euphrates) do not treat him with equal respect; he on his part does not think them equally wise; and though after a time they endeavour to propitiate him by causing an elm-tree to salute and address him courteously, they do not escape without a long lecture from the philosopher. On his return from Ethiopia he receives a letter from Titus (who was then emperor) requesting him to come to Argos, and give him some advice. Apollonius readily embraces the opportunity, and is received with more than cordiality. But upon Domitian's accession, he falls under the suspicion of that tyrant; not, as appears, altogether without reason, for, according to Philostratus, he had in some degree joined in conspiracies against him. Be that as it may, he was imprisoned and fettered at Rome; whereupon he gave Damis a proof of his miraculous power by taking his leg out of the fetter and putting it in again. When brought before Domitian, after some conversation and bandying of repartees with the emperor and the accusers, he vanished; and appeared the same day to Demetrius and Damis at Puteoli. Philostratus, however, gives a long speech that he had composed in his defence. After this he retired to Greece, where he was received in a most flattering manner; entered the cave of Trophonius; and being at Ephesus, announced the death of Domitian at the moment when it actually occurred. Of the death of Apollonius different accounts were given; some said he entered the temple of Minerva at Lindus, and disappeared; others that it was in the temple of Diana Dictynna, and that voices of young maidens were heard, singing, "Leave the earth, come up to heaven," after which he was not seen again. After death he is said to have appeared to a young man who was sceptical as to the immortality of the soul (and who had prayed to him for enlightenment), and to have assured him of it, at the same time bidding him to leave off curious discussions.

Such is a brief abstract of the life of Apollonius, by Philostratus. The entire fabulousness of it hardly needs to be pointed out. If any other proof were needed than the nature of the story itself, the prodigies, the anachronisms and geographical blunders, it would be found in the entire absence of authority for the facts stated. Philostratus does indeed profess to find what he writes on "the records of cities and temples, and his own (Apollonius') epistles to the Eleans, Delphians, Indians, and Egyptians;" but the cities and temples are nameless, and the genuineness of any collection of letters of those times, till proved, must always be considered more than doubtful, from the great prevalence of forged letters and treatises in the first centuries after Christ. Assuredly Philostratus was not the man accurately to distinguish the genuine from the spurious. (Concerning the collection of letters attributed to Apollonius and now extant, undoubtedly not the same, though in some points coinciding, with that possessed by Philostratus, we shall have more to say presently.) Of the other authorities of Philostratus, Maximus of Aegae and Moeragenes may be accepted as real men; but the former only related the doings of Apollonius at Aegae, and besides gave a transcript of his will: while the latter, as we know from Origen (contra Cels. vi. 41), represented Apollonius as a magician, and in other ways gave so humble an account of him as moved Philostratus to shew considerable anger. If the account of Moeragenes had survived, we should probably know much more about Apollonius than we do now. On the other hand, Damis is manifestly a fictitious personage, and the book of which he was the reputed author, which (as Philostratus says) Damis gave to a relation, and which through this relation was introduced to the knowledge of the empress Julia, who handed it on to Philostratus to edit, cannot be held as of any historical value whatever.

What, then, can we really be said to know of Apollonius of Tyana? That he was born at Tyana, that he was educated at Aegae, that he professed Pythagoreanism, and that he was a very well known man of his day for what by the common people were taken to be magical arts, are the only facts that rest on altogether unexceptionable authority. The account of his opposition to the Stoic Euphrates may perhaps also be taken as authentic. His reputation as a magician is confirmed by the double authority of Moeragenes and Lucian (Pseudomantis, ch. 5), and the great number of the pretenders to this kind of power in the first century, A.D., takes away all a priori improbability from the supposition that he belonged to the class. Yet we are not altogether without reasons for believing that he was more than a mere magician, and even a philosopher of some considerable insight. Eusebius (Praep. Ev. p. 150 b) quotes a passage from his book "On sacrifices" (with the reservation "Apollonius is said to write as follows"), which if really his is certainly remarkable. The passage may be loosely translated as follows: "This, then, is the manner in which the Divine Power may best be revered and propitiated; to God, that God whom we first spoke of, who is one in himself and separate in nature from all, to whom all the rest (the other gods) must be reckoned subordinate; to him must neither sacrifice be offered, nor fire kindled, nor anything named of those things which are discerned by the senses; for of these things he has no need even at the hands of those who are greater than ourselves, nor is there any plant or animal that is not unclean before him; but he must be approached by that word which is best, the word which does not proceed through the lips; so must one entreat him. And the word I speak of is the reason, that needs no organ of communication." Both Kayser and Zeller are inclined to allow the authenticity of this extract, which is further corroborated by the fact that Plutarch (Numa, ch. 8) attributes a similar doctrine to Pythagoras; for Plutarch would naturally gain his ideas of the doctrine of Pythagoras from the neo-Pythagoreans of his time.

All the authorities after Philostratus that speak of Apollonius base their account of him on the life by Philostratus; except Origen, who quotes Moeragenes. Hierocles, indeed, mentions Maximus of Aegae and Damis, but it does not appear that he knew of them except through Philostratus. But we must now come to the consideration of the only other authority from which it is possible that we may learn anything about Apollonius; and that is, the collection of letters still extant which are attributed to him. Professor Jowett (in the Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Biogr.) does not appear to consider it altogether impossible that these letters may be, at any rate in part, genuine; but Kayser and Zeller reject them in a summary manner, and by most writers on Apollonius they are barely mentioned. Zeller goes so far as to say, that they are obviously composed to suit the life by Philostratus. We do not think that this opinion can be held by any one who attentively compares the letters with the biography; and we think the probability is greatly in favour of the supposition, that the letters, whether genuine or not, were composed before the work of Philostratus, and hence from the earliest and best authority respecting Apollonius that we have. In the first place, if the letters were composed by one who had the work of Philostratus before him, how comes it that there is no trace in the collection of such remarkable letters as that alluded to by Philostratus in v. 22, in which Apollonius is said to have rebuked the Athenians for their gladiatorial shows, and refused to attend them; or that in v. 2, where he explains the phenomena of the tides; or that to Nerva, in vi. 27? Again, there are in the collection several consecutive letters to Scopelianus, but there is not that given by Philostratus in i. 24. Again, Philostratus at the very outset of his work declares that Apollonius wrote many letters to the Eleans, Delphians, Indians, and Egyptians, on the subject of their deities, countries, morals, and laws: surely a most tempting subject for the composer of letters to dilate upon. Yet when we look at the collection, these four peoples have not much more than a letter a-piece, and those neither long nor important. The brother of Apollonius is mentioned in the biography as a dissolute man, who was brought to better ways by the influence of Apollonius, and to whom Apollonius is said to have given half his patrimony. Now in the collection there are several letters inscribed "To his brother Hestiaeus," and one "To his brother Apollonius," but in none of them is there the smallest hint at the events recorded by Philostratus, and from only one could it be at all inferred that Hestiaeus was inclined to luxury. On the contrary, it would appear from at least one of the letters to Hestiaeus, that Apollonius had been accused of quarrelling with his brother on money matters. Again, in the biography by Philostratus the Sardians are barely mentioned; in the collection there are many letters vehemently attacking them for their vices, and we are much mistaken if there is any mention at all in the biography of Lesbonax, Crito, Gordius, Diotimus, Phercucianus, Valerius, or the magistrates of Caesarea and Seleucia, to all of whom letters are found addressed in the collection. But the most remarkable difference between the letters and the biography, is the almost entire absence of any miraculous element in the former. In one of the letters to Euphrates, Apollonius says that he "takes away pain, and heals diseases" (σωμάτων δδύνας ἀφαιρεί, καὶ πάθη παύει); in another he says, "Some men think me a god;" but these are the only possible allusions to any supernatural power. Nor are there more than one or two of the letters from which it would be at all inferred that Apollonius was an extensive traveller. The great majority of them are addressed to Greeks or Greek communities. It should be added, that about nine of the letters are identical in the biography and in the collection; among them are the letters of Phrastes and Apollonius to Jarchas, and also those to Vespasian and Titus. It is, however, almost certain that Philostratus must have got these letters from some document prior to his own time; their brevity is in strong contrast to the longwinded talk which he himself puts into the mouth of his characters. Kayser, indeed, adduces the dry and abrupt style of the letters in the collection as a proof of their spuriousness. Apollonius, he thinks, would certainly have written better. But surely the inference is rather the other way, that a composer of forged letters would have written in a rhetorical style.

There are some among these letters that one would certainly wish to have been really written by Apollonius. The most remarkable perhaps are these: one to Euphrates, describing the life of a Pythagorean philosopher; one to the magistrates of Seleucia, which begins with a remarkably Christian mode of expression, "Straton has departed from among men, having left all his mortal part here on earth. But it behoves us who are still in a state of punishment, that is who still live, to have some care of his affairs;" a third to his brother Apollonius, which ends in a very natural and affecting manner. It is to console him on the death of his wife, and after producing different topics of consolation, some of which sound rather strange to our ears, he adds, "I could not write more than this for my tears" (ὕπὸ δακρῶν οὐχ οἶδς τε ἐγενόμην πλείονα γράψαι), "but these are the most pressing things I have to say." A fourth is to Valerius, on the death of a son, and is noticeable for its arguments on the immortality of the soul.

If one is to take any portion of these letters as genuine, one must conclude that Apollonius was a man of passionate and affectionate temperament, a real philosopher and religious reformer, and of extensive influence in Greek cities; but at the same time chargeable with arrogance and anger towards his opponents, with something of a mysterious and dogmatic air, and the beginning of a pretence towards supernatural power. And perhaps this is not altogether an improbable view of his character; and it is easy to see how, as time went on, the magical view of his history would gain greater predominance. If none of the letters be considered genuine (and some of them are to say the least very suspicious, though it should be noticed that those which are identical in this collection and in the biography do not of themselves imply the marvellous history which Philostratus tacks on to them) then the few bare facts mentioned above are all that can be considered certain about Apollonius; and it must in this case be left doubtful, in what proportion he was a philosopher, and in what proportion a magician. To call him sans phrase an impostor, as is done by many writers, is at any rate premature.

We must now come to the question, which is that which has attracted so much attention to the history of Apollonius,—what was the moving cause of Philostratus' biography? what was his aim? had he, more especially, any view of attacking Christianity by setting up a rival to Christ? Hierocles, at the end of the 3rd century, was the first person who actually applied the work of Philostratus to this purpose, as is said expressly by Eusebius, who replied to him. The Deists of the 18th century, both in France and England, renewed the argument in the same sense, but with this difference; that whereas Hierocles would have had no objection to admit the miracles both of Christ and of Apollonius, Voltaire and Lord Herbert had an equal disbelief in both. Naturally, none of these writers held that Philostratus wrote in direct imitation of the Gospels, as it would have marred their point to do so. But equally naturally the orthodox writers, beginning with Huet, bishop of Avranches, and coming down through Bishop Douglas and Paley to Dr. Réville in our own day, have considered Philostratus a direct though concealed antagonist of Christianity. This view has been opposed in Germany by Meiners, Neander, Buhle, and Jacobs, and in our own country by Mr. Watson (Contemporary Review, February 1867). An intermediate view is held by Baur (in his Apollonius von Tyana und Christus, Tübingen, 1832), which in its main outline will we think commend itself as by far the most probable account. According to this view Philostratus wrote with no strictly polemical reference to Christianity, but, in the eclectic spirit of his time, strove to accommodate Christianity to the heathen religion. It might indeed still be questioned, even if this view were granted, how far Philostratus directly aimed at such an accommodation, or whether it was an indirect endeavour, an object that insinuated itself into his work, rather than its immediate purpose. We are ourselves disposed to believe, that, without attributing to Philostratus any formal design either of opposing or assimilating Christianity, he was yet most strongly influenced by its ideas and history.

What is the central aim of this biography of Apollonius? Surely it is this: the setting forth, not merely of wise precepts in the abstract, but of an example of supreme wisdom for humanity to imitate. It is not implied by this that Philostratus considered Apollonius as entirely and necessarily unique among men; but it is implied that he considered him as more than a mere teacher of doctrine, as a pattern to men in his own person, as one in whom wisdom and truth were incorporate. He wished men to honour Apollonius himself, and not merely to study or believe certain truths delivered by Apollonius. This cannot, we think, be doubted by any one who reflects on the whole tone of the book. Apollonius is called "divine;" his disciples stand in an altogether different relation to him from that in which the disciples of Socrates stand to Socrates; they do not argue with him as equals with an equal; they follow him, listen to him, are rebuked by him. His miracles, again, do not result from his being in possession of any secret communicable to other men, but arise from his own nature and wisdom. Such a character must remind us, however different in some respects, of the Christ of the Gospels. But can it be shewn that any character like this, or approaching to this, was drawn by any heathen writer before Christ, or in the 1st century after Christ? We think not. Philosophy and magic, the search after knowledge and the search after power, were familiar to men who had never heard of Christianity; but this ideal is different from either, and from both of them united. Those who affirm that Philostratus never thought of the Christian history in his work, say that he intended Apollonius as a rival to Pythagoras. That he did connect Apollonius and Pythagoras, is certain, for he puts them together at the outset of his work. But this only puts the question a stage farther back. For by whom was Pythagoras portrayed, we do not say merely as the hero of a marvellous history (for this is a subordinate part of the matter), but as this superhuman ideal? Not certainly by any writer of the centuries before Christ. Even Plutarch (Numa, ch. viii.) only knows of marvellous events occurring to or connected with Pythagoras; he knows of no miracles actually performed by him, much less does he set him up as an ideal exemplar. Is it possible that the age of Caracalla and Severus, so eclectic, so traditional, so unoriginal, can of its own mere motion have gone off into this new and unheard-of line? Unheard of, that is, unless we suppose it to have been borrowed from Christianity. We hold it certain, therefore, that it was borrowed from Christianity.

But of course it admits of a question, whether it was Philostratus himself, or the author whom he adapted and refined, that had the chief hand in this borrowing. But it seems to us probable, that Philostratus was at any rate conscious of the imitation. First, the Christians were not in those days by any means an unknown sect; so well known were they, that Alexander Severus (with a singular parallelism to the supposed conduct of Philostratus) placed Christ with Abraham, Orpheus, and Apollonius himself, among his household gods. Secondly, the resemblance to the Gospel histories is in particular instances very broad indeed. The miraculous birth of Proteus, and the circumstances attending it; the healing of demoniacal possessions, (was the idea of such possessions in any way familiar to the Greeks?) the raising of the dead; the appearance of Apollonius to two of his disciples after his deliverance from Domitian; his ascent to heaven, and appearance after his death; these are points of similarity that cannot be evaded: and taken together with the central idea of the book, they seem to imply that Philostratus was not an unconscious copyist of one who had taken the Gospels as his model, but was himself aware of the imitation.

It is, however, a question of quite subordinate importance, what was the intention of Philostratus personally in his book, what portion of his mental horizon was occupied by Christianity. And in order to dismiss him as soon as possible, we may remark, that if he had had any very direct purpose in relation to Christianity, the application of it could hardly have been deferred till the time of Hierocles and Eusebius. The analogy of Porphyry, at once the author of a marvellous life of Pythagoras and a vehement opponent of the Christians, might indeed suggest a similar combination in Philostratus; but this is not a suggestion that can stand in the place of proof, which here is entirely wanting; and Porphyry himself, vehement, fiery, and mystical, was an utterly different man from the easy, gentlemanly, courtierlike Philostratus, who, one may guess, would have thought it a lowering of his dignity to meddle with a class so distinctly belonging to the inferior classes of society as did the Christians of his time.

The real point of interest, however, lies in the inquiry whether the main idea and outline of these wonderful histories of Pythagoras and Apollonius were borrowed from the Christian records, or not. To this question we have already replied decidedly in the affirmative. It should be noticed, that the very striking resemblances between the biography of Apollonius and the Gospels are resemblances in externals; the inner spirit of the two is entirely different. It would take us too long here to enter upon a detailed comparison of them in this respect; it must be sufficient to remark, that in the one we find the temperate, self-contained philosophic spirit, striking even in its dilution, and amid all the rhetoric and tawdry marvels with which Philostratus has dressed it; in the other, the spirit of the insufficiency of self.

Besides the collection of letters, and the treatise Τελεταί ἢ περὶ θναίων, mentioned above, there are ascribed to Apollonius the following works; a hymn to Memory, a life of Pythagoras (mentioned by Porphyry and Iamblichus as the work of "Apollonius," by Suidas as the work of "Apollonius of Tyana"), a book entitled Πυθαγόρου δόξαι, a treatise περὶ μαντείας ἀστέρων and Χρησμοί.

Those who wish to examine the whole question respecting Apollonius at length should consult Baur's Apollonius von Tyana und Christus (Tübingen 1832); Kayser's Philostratus, and Zeller's Philosophie der Griechen. Other writers on the subject have been noticed in this article, or are to be found in the books above mentioned.

[I. R. M.]

APOLLONIUS, an Egyptian monk of the fourth century, famed for humility and as an exorcist. Several of his sayings are recorded (Ruff. de Verb. Sen. 25; Gr. Inc. ap. Rosw. V. P. v. 5, 4). Possibly this is the Apollon who, being one of the monks raised to the episcopacy by Athanasius, is spoken of by him as an Egyptian bishop, present at the Councils of Tyre and Sardica (Ath. Ap. c. Ar. 133, 154), who is mentioned below. [APOLLOS.] [I. G. S.]

APOLLONIUS, a Roman senator, who being accused of being a Christian c. A.D. 186, wrote and delivered in full senate an apology for the faith, for which St. Jerome reckons him second in order of time among the Latin Fathers. He was nevertheless beheaded as one that persisted in the faith, although his accuser was put to death for accusing him (Euseb. H. E. v. 21; S. Hieron. de Script. Eccl. 42; Act. SS. April 18, and Ruinart 73 sq.). [A. W. H.]

APOLLONIUS. (1) An imaginary bishop of Corinth, referred to by "Prædestinatus" (i. 23). (2) An imaginary bishop of Ephesus (V. 26-27) [See APOLLOS, p. 135.] (3) A "companion" of one of the Antonines, who vainly tried to persuade BARDEISAN to abjure Christianity (Epiph. Haer. 477). [H.]

APOLLONIUS. (1) A correspondent of Theodoret's, probably not a Christian, to whom he wrote commending the excellence of his natural endowments, and urging an acknowledgment of the Giver. (Theodt. Ep. 73.)

(2) Count, Praefect of the East in 442, and great chamberlain, to whom Theodoret wrote with reference to the calumnies spread against him at Constantinople. (Theodt. Ep. 103.) He was in office at the Council of Chalcedon, 451. (Labbe, Concil. iv. 851, &c.) [E. V.]

APOLLOS (or -onius), St., a famous Egyptian monk of the 4th century. He embraced the monastic life when only fifteen years old, and after many years of utter seclusion established himself in the Thebaid at the head of five hundred ascetics. By his reputation for sanctity and for miraculous powers he made many converts, and among others a notorious robber-chief, and had great influence with the pagans. Though most austere to himself, he was courteous and hospitable to others. He lived to a great age (Ruff. de Mon. 7; Pall. Hist. Lxv. 52; Soz. Hist. iii. 14. Niceph. Hist. ix. 14.)

Perhaps this is the Apollon a disciple of Pachomius (Vit. Pachom. ap. Rosw. V. P. c. 18), and there are curious coincidences in detail which make it probable that this is also the Apollon (not the Apollonius) mentioned in Soz. (Hist. vi. 29) and in Niceph. (xi. 34). If, as is not unlikely, he was one of the monks consecrated by Athanasius, he may be identified with the Apollon (Ath. ad Drac. 210), Egyptian bishop, present at the councils of Tyre and Sardica (Ath. Ap. c. Ar. 133, 154), and exiled by George of Alexandria (Ath. ad Mon. 306). He is commemorated on Jan. 25. [I. G. S.]

APOLOGISTS. I. General view of the Apologists and their work. Under this name are included the earlier Christian writers against Paganism and Judaism, though it applies more properly to the former. Their work was rather the defence of Christians than of Christianity. A faith active and aggressive, zealous to overturn the religion with which the associations of the people and the institutions of the State were entwined, sparing neither popular vices nor popular amusements, provoked a hatred which at once justified and strengthened itself by blackening the character of the Christians. Refusing to sacrifice to the gods, they were thought a community of atheists, capable of any crime. All sorts of wickedness were therefore attributed to them; and out of distorted accounts of their fraternal love, secret assemblies, worship, and sacraments, were made up horrible tales of incest, child murder, and cannibalism. Influenced by these slanders, and regarding opposition to the state religion as seditious, the authorities, if they did not excite the violence of the populace, were little solicitous to check it; and though the calumnies against the Church were not the prime causes of persecution, yet since they were ever put forward as its reason and justification, the Christians could not but feel that, were these refuted, there would be some chance of that fair hearing and common justice, which were now denied them; and that, if the emperor could be once made conscious of the cruel wrongs perpetrated in his name, he might be induced to interfere. The first Apologies, therefore, are mainly intended as vindications of the Christians from the false accusations brought against them; but such a defence naturally passed into the offensive; especially when the worst deeds invented by the calumniators were told in the mythologies of the very gods, for rejection of whom the Christians were counted atheists. The Apologists were thus led to contrast their own and their persecutors' religion; the one holy and worthy of God, embodying and setting in order the noblest conceptions of all philosophy; enforcing every virtue, and forbidding even the thought of sin, and that under the most tremendous sanctions: the other so gross and senseless as to shock some amongst the heathens themselves; self-contradictory and degrading, ascribing to its divinities such immorality that it seemed only framed to countenance vice. The one offered a holy and reasonable service, the other a dark and cruel worship, stained with lust and blood. No less opposed were the fruits which each bore in its votaries; the slandered Christians leading lives of patience purity holiness and love, exalted courage, and heavenly wisdom; while the heathen neither truly feared their own gods, nor regarded man; living in malice and wickedness, hateful, and hating one another. Nor did Gentile philosophy pass uncensured; its pretensions were great, its performances small, its doctrines mutually contradictory, and supported on no better evidence than the dicta of its respective schools: its morality was often most defective, and its professors not unfrequently the wickedest of men. Whatever of truth it might contain was but taken at secondhand from Revelation, and might there be found in purity and fulness, built on the infallible authority of God Himself. That authority is, with the Apologists, always the ultimate foundation of faith; the philosophical arguments which they use being but introductory and illustrative, or designed to remove prejudices and show that the Christian dogmas are not irrational.

II. Apologetic writings against Paganism. 1. Of these the earliest are appeals in behalf of the suffering Christians, addressed to the emperor, the senate, or other public authorities. The first recorded are those of Quadratus (of which but a single fragment remains) and Aristides (wholly lost, but described as referring largely to the Gentile philosophers), both of which are said to have been delivered to Hadrian during his stay in Greece, A.D. 131. Next come the Apologies of Justin Martyr, about A.D. 160 (according to Cave, Life of Justin, c. 8); an Apoloogy addressed by Melito, bishop of Sardis, to M. Aurelius Antoninus, about A.D. 170 (on the "Oration of Meliton the Philosopher to Antoninus Cæsar," Cureton, Spicileg. Syr. p. 7; see MELITO); and that of Athenagoras, A.D. 176-180. Amongst the Latins, we have Tertullian's Apologeticus adversus Nationes, between A.D. 178 and 202, followed by his smaller treatise, Ad Nationes; and Cyprian's Letter to Demetrianus, A.D. 246. This series may be not unfitly closed with the thanks addressed by Lactantius, at the beginning of his Institutiones Divinæ (A.D. 320) to Constantine, for the rest which his accession had brought to the Church.

2. Treatises apologetic or polemical, in the form of letters, explanations, or replies addressed to individuals. Of this sort are the Letter to Diognetus (q. v.), and the three books of Theophilus Ad Autolyicum, about A.D. 181. The Latin dialogue of Minucius Felix (beginning of 3rd cent.), called Octavius from one of its interlocutors, may belong to this class of works, supposing this Octavius to have been a real person, and the dialogue actually intended for his use. We may add Cyprian's short work On the grace of God, addressed to the neophyte Donatus (that On the Vanity of Idols is closely connected with the Octavius, and with Tertullian's Apologeticus); and finally the poetical letter of Paulinus of Nola to his former friend Ausonius.

3. Polemical, hortatory, or didactic works intended for the educated public, with no special or individual inscription. These may include the treatise of Athenagoras On the Resurrection, the four works of doubtful authorship, usually published with those of Justin, viz. De Monarchia, Oratio ad Graecos, Cohortatio ad Graecos, and the fragmentary treatise On the Resurrection: Tatian's Oration to the Greeks, probably written in the reign of Marcus Aurelius; the Liber Adhor- tatorius ad Graecos of Clemens Alexandrinus, about A.D. 190; the Irrisio Gentilium Philosophorum of Hermias, about the same date; Hippolytus' Philosophumena (3rd cent.), and two apologetic works of Athanasius, supposed to date about A.D. 319, Oratio contra Gentes, and De Incarnatione Verbi.

4. Writings against individual defenders of heathenism. One of the first of this class is the vigorous work of Origen Against Celsus, published about A.D. 249, long posterior to Celsus' True Account, which called it forth. The 15 books of Porphyry against the Christians produced a great number of replies, according to Lucius Dexter at least 30; some of the most important of the writers being Methodius, bishop of Patara (whose work, according to Jerome, Ep. ad Magnum, was in verse); Eusebius of Caesarea; and Apollinaris of Laodicea, of whom only a small fragment remains (4th cent.). Philostorgius in his Ecclesiastical History, x. 10, mentions a work of his own against Porphyry. To these may be added the 8 books of Diodorus of Tarsus (died A.D. 394) Against the Fatalists,—assailing Plato, Aristotle, and Porphyry, of which some fragments remain. The strange admissions found in Porphyry's own writings, concerning the character of some of the gods, the oracles, &c., furnished many arguments against his own cause; which have been used by Theodoret, De Curandis Graecorum Affectibus, Sermon. 3; by Eusebius, Præparatio Evangelica, iv. cc. 7, 16, and by Augustine, De Civit. Dei, x. cc. 26, 27. Eusebius also in his work Against Hierocles assails on external and internal grounds the parallel which that writer sought to draw between Christ and Apollonius Tyanaeus. The books of Julian, now lost, in defence of paganism, which occupied him till the Persian war, A.D. 363, had many answers; among which we may notice that of Cyril addressed to the emperor Theodosius, On the pure Religion of the Christians (end of 4th cent.), Gregory Nazianzen's Invectives against the Emperor Julian, about A.D. 363, and the Sermon of Chrysostom On S. Babylon and against Julian, preached about A.D. 383, consequently 20 years after Julian's death.

5. The course of apologetic and polemical writings in the Eastern Church closes with the work De Curandis Graecorum Affectibus, directed by Theodoret, bishop of Cyrus, (who died A.D. 457) against the false views of Christianity prevalent in the heathen world; summing up and arranging the argument of foregoing apologists. Several Latin works of like sort belong to the time when the Christian faith began to triumph; they justify the change that was coming over the Empire, and deal the last blows to heathenism, which, though no longer favoured, and at last actually opposed by the State, yet found some adherents and defenders. The seven books of Arnobius Contra Gentes fall in the period of the last persecution, preceding the accession of Constantine—probably between A.D. 297 and A.D. 303; and the Institutiones Divinæ of Lactantius appear to have been published about A.D. 320. Both of these authors gather up and systematize what had been already said against the old superstition; the former commencing with an answer to the then common objection, that Christianity was the cause of all the calamities of the times. With these, on account of its similar scope, we may place the greatly inferior work of Firmicus Maternus, De Errore Profanarum Religionum, addressed to the sons of Constantine about, or subsequently to, the year A.D. 350. Several minor pieces follow: as, the letter of Ambrose to Valentinian, against the restoration of an altar of Victory petitioned for by Symmachus, A.D. 380; that of Paulinus of Nola to Jovius, on Providence, against the philosophical theories of fate and of chance: besides a poem Adversus Gentiles, by one Antonius, of whom nothing seems to be known, but for whose name Fabricius appears to have read that of the poet Ausonius, whom he supposes to have embraced Christianity. The concluding name among the Western Apologists is that of Augustine, the bishop of Hippo, whose 22 books, De Civitate Dei, form a complete polemical treatise, opening like that of Arnobius with a reply to the pagans' favourite charge, that the Christians were ruining the State; and proceeding to contrast the Church, as the Divine commonwealth, with the kingdoms of this world, particularly with the Roman Empire.

III. Writings against the Jews. 1. Greek. The earliest of these is the so-called Epistle of St. Barnabas upon the types of the Law, of not later date than A.D. 110—probably of the time of Vespasian: next came a lost Dialogue of Jason and Papiscus, before the middle of the 2nd cent., mentioned by Origen, Eusebius, and Jerome, and by Maximus ascribed to Aristo Pellaeus; Justin Martyr's Dialogue with Trypho, probably written not long before his death; the Demonstratio adversus Judaeos of Hippolytus (died A.D. 230), chiefly upon Ps. lxxix.; Eusebius' Demonstratio Evangelica; of Gregory of Nyssa (died A.D. 395), Testimonia adversus Judaeos; of Chrysostom (died A.D. 407), Demonstratio adversus Judaeos et Gentiles (in proof of Christ's divinity), and seven Homilies against the Jews, in great measure against Judaizers within the Church. Of Philippus of Tida, contemporary of Chrysostom, there remains a Narrative of a Disputation concerning Christ held in Persia between Christians, Jews, and Heathens: and under the name of Cyril of Alexandria there passes a short piece Against the Jews, containing the solution of eight questions on supposed difficulties in the Law. It is extant only in the Latin. Gregentius, archbishop of Taphra (6th cent.) has left a Disputation with Herbanus, a Jew. Besides these more directly controversial works (to which we may add the answers of Origen in the two first of his books against Celsus, to the objections put by that writer into the mouth of a Jew), replies to various arguments and expositions of Scripture put forward by the Jews, are to be found in the Commentaries of Origen, Eusebius on the Psalms and Isaiah, Chrysostom, Theodoret on Daniel, and elsewhere.

2. Latin writings. Of Tertullian there is a work Against the Jews, composed on the occasion of a dispute between a Christian and a Jewish proselyte; of Cyprian, Testimonia adversus Judaeos; with a work under his name, but of uncertain authorship, in answer to the Jewish attacks upon Christ. Novatian, whose schism dates from A.D. 251, has left a letter On Jewish Meats; and of Ambrose's Letters, the 72nd, 73rd, 74th, and 75th treat of the relation between the O. T. ordinances and the Gospel. Expositions of prophecy, &c., specially directed against the Jewish interpretations are to be found in Augustine, de Civ. Dei, and in the exegetical works of Jerome. We may include in this list such attacks upon Judaism as occur in the Institt. Divin. of Lactantius.

Of these writers, Greek and Latin, most have expounded or vindicated the Christian interpretation of prophecy and types. Justin, Tertullian, Irenaeus, defended the supernatural birth of Christ; and Justin, Tertullian, Cyprian, Eusebius, and Augustine His Divinity. The three first of these asserted the abolition of the Law; the pseudo-Barnabas, Justin, Tertullian, Origen, Novatian, Ambrose, Augustine, and Epiphanius treat of its spiritual import and interpretation.

IV. The Apologists and the popular religion. Various theories were extant, amongst the heathens, of the origin and right interpretation of their mythology. The Stoics taught that it was allegorical of truth, natural or moral: others, in accordance with the suggestion of Euhemerus, looked on its gods as men deified by their posterity, and sought an historical groundwork in its legends; which others, again, received as literally true, but descriptive of the acts of certain demons, intermediate between gods and men (cf. Plato, Sympos. c. 23, p. 202 D; Plutarch, Isis and Osiris, c. 25). The first of these views the Apologists reject, remarking by the way, that if the gods only represented the elements and powers of nature they were not proper objects of worship, nor was there any need to have expressed these in allegories so gross and immoral. The second and third they adopt either combined or as alternative solutions; inclining on the whole to the last. They were accustomed to hear the myths treated as realities by the people, and accepted the idea the more readily, as they identified these demons with the fallen angels of the Scriptures, or with the souls of the antediluvian giants, whom they conceived to have sprung from the union of the evil angels with human wives. These wicked spirits were the authors of all the prodigies and supernatural powers ascribed to the images of the gods; and the inventors and maintainers of the system of paganism; a system, with which the Apologists did not deny that some truth was mixed: remarkable coincidences were to be found, between certain legends and some parts of Christian teaching; but these had been introduced by the demons themselves to add speciousness to their lie, and, by forestalling, to lessen the effect of the truth. The poets themselves show at times a trace of the pure primitive faith in the one, holy, almighty God; the best amongst them, as well as amongst the philosophers had revolted at the character of some myths, which they denounced as slanders upon the Godhead. It was not the Christians, for following their example, but the heathen, for suffering such tales to be told of their gods, who were properly to be charged with impiety.

The grossness and folly of these fables supply the Apologists' chief weapon of offence; and they attack Polytheism as it appears in mythology, rather than in the abstract. The Unity of God is maintained by Athenagoras (Apol. c. 8) from the definition of the Deity as an Essence self-existent, simple, and perfect, the Maker and Container of the universe: by Origen (Against Celsus, l. 23), Athanasius (contra Gentes, cc. 37-39), Lactantius (Instt. Div. i. 3), from the unity and harmony of Creation; by Minucius Felix (Octavius, c. 8), and Cyprian (De Idolorum Vanitate, c. 5) from the necessity of an undivided supreme government; by Gregory of Nyssa (Oratio Catechetica, Proem.) upon the ground that perfection excludes plurality, since all perfect beings would be coincident or identical; and also by Magnes (v. Pitra, Spicil. Solesm. i. 308).

Another specially vulnerable point in Paganism was the nature of its worship—its images and sacrifices. To the Christian attacks upon idolatry the heathens gave the answer, common still, that the statue was not regarded as the god, but only as his representation, and the proper way of access to him; but how, ask the Apologists, does this defence serve, when the statue is that of some man, not long deceased, to which you yet ascribe miracles? (Athenag. Apol. c. 18, c. 23 sq.). It must be here the image with which you connect the wonders; for dead men do no prodigies; and of these the real cause is Satanic power. Your idols, of necessity more modern than the art of statuary, are absurd innovations; and these you honour with a service no less absurd—the slaughter of beasts,—whether for your gods' food or amusement does not appear. Fitter worship for a spiritual God is the Christian's self-dedication in holiness, his reasonable and unbloody sacrifice!

The persecutions suffered by the Christians in earlier times, and the disasters which befell the empire after its conversion were sometimes urged as objections to the truth of their religion, as if, had theirs been the true God, He must have protected his servants: to which it is usually replied, that the Christians' portion being in heaven, earthly troubles did not touch it, nor seriously harm them, but often the reverse. The calamities of that day had nothing which marked them as any more special tokens of divine wrath, than those of former times; besides, as earthly evils were to heathens far more terrible things than to Christians, why should the gods, provoked by the sins of the latter, punish them with visitations which fell most heavily on their own worshippers?

V. The Apologists and the Philosophers. Gentile philosophy was a subject that gave room for great differences of opinion among the Christians, of whom some, as Hermias (Irisio Gent. Phil.), Tertullian (Apologet. cc. 46, 47), and notably Tatian (Oration to the Greeks, cc. 1-3), treated it as a medley of folly contradictions and hypocrisy; whilst others, e.g. Athenagoras (Apol. c. 7, p. 8 A), and Justin (in reference to Plato, Ap. 1, c. 59) well-nigh claim the best of the old sages as fellow champions for the truth. The milder view found perhaps most favour, at least with the more learned Christians; but none thought the light of philosophy really comparable to that of revelation, or the adherents of its opposing sects all equally honest seekers after truth. Like Socrates, some of our writers call attention to the contradictory schemes by which it sought to explain the phenomena of the outward world; and then proceed to its mutually destructive ethical theories, of which one selected as the chief good what another denied to be a good at all:—pleasure, virtue, knowledge, conformity with nature, had all found assertors; and at last a sect arose which denied the possibility of knowledge, and so cut away the foundations of philosophy altogether. If an ignorant man had to choose the right instructor amid all this strife, he needed, in order to make the choice, to be at starting wiser than all the philosophers themselves.

The Christian estimate of the comparative merits of the several schools—where any merit at all is acknowledged—seldom varies. The earlier natural philosophers, e.g. the Atomists, seem to be regarded as idle and atheistical speculators, whose disagreement showed them to have all missed the truth. Pythagoras does not find much favour, though sometimes adduced as a witness for the unity of God, and his fate taken as an instance of the persecution which the good have always suffered (Athenag. Apol. c. 31, p. 35 A); for his doctrine of the transmigration of souls into the bodies, it might be, of beasts, was revolting to those who looked for a resurrection to immortality. The Sophists are scarcely noticed, save in Tertullian's odd mistake of Hippias the tyrant for his philosophic namesake (Apologet. c. 45). But Socrates and still more Plato occupy a position of exceptional favour. The life and moral teaching of Socrates, his opposition to the popular religion, and his martyr-like death commanded the admiration of the Christians; but as they seem to have distinguished the real Socrates from the representation of him given by Plato, his great disciple attracted more of their attention. They were moreover offended by the "δαίμωνιον" or "divine intimation" of which he speaks, and which they, like Apuleius, took to mean "familiar spirit;" and, singularly enough, so high was their estimate of the enlightenment which he possessed, that they almost censured his compliances with the state religion, as apostasy. The highest place amongst philosophers was accorded to Plato, in consequence of his teaching concerning God as the supreme and essential God, the "Logos," or divine intelligence seen in Creation, the distinction between objects of thought and of sense, the essence of the soul and other spiritual beings, and the nature of true happiness, unaffected by outward ills; and, perhaps most of all, for his emphatic condemnation of the mythology. In the Letters ascribed to him (Platonic Épp. ii. 312 E) he was believed to express his faith in somewhat like a Trinity; his genuine works themselves being probably read in the light of Philo's philosophy, and, by the later Apologists, in that of New Platonism, which put upon its master's words a sense that brought them into still nearer accord with Christianity. The Christians, however, condemned his doctrines on the eternity of matter (as being moulded only, not created by God); and on the relation of the sexes, as brought out in the Republic. The Apologists, whose views we are considering, approve in great measure his account of the soul's nature, but utterly reject the idea of its pre-existence, which he regarded as essential to its immortality (on the principle that whatever has had a beginning must also have an end): and maintain on the contrary, that the power and will of God which gave the soul being at the first, still maintain it in existence; whence they have been represented as teaching that the soul is not naturally immortal. Their scanty mention of Aristotle is somewhat surprising. Amidst the Platonism of the eclectic Athenagoras, we recognise the Aristotelian doctrine of the mean (Resurr. c. 21, p. 64 B), and by the same Apologist he is cited as holding the Unity of God; but he displeased the Christians by his views of providence, and by making the supreme good consist in happiness; happiness, too, for the attainment of which various outward advantages were indispensable. His philosophy was so strongly physical, as to lie in great part out of the Christians' range of thought; and the ethical systems with which they came most in contact were those of the later schools. The Peripatetics, doing little more than elaborate Aristotle's opinions, are also little noticed; and seldom but in reference to objectionable tenets ascribed to particular adherents of the school. The Academics are chiefly cited for their scepticism, as witnesses against all philosophy. The Epicureans were far more prominent, and receive unqualified condemnation, as subverters of all piety and morals; although the distinction between their view and that of the Cyrenaics, on pleasure as the chief good, is not overlooked (Athen. Resurr. c. 19, p. 62 B). The opposing sect of the Stoics, celebrated as it was amongst the ancients for its ethics, is not very favourably regarded by the Christians. Its pantheistic allegorizing of the myths, its denial of a particular providence and of any intelligible rewards and punishments in a future life, its sanction of suicide, and its cold proud spirit, conspired to produce an aversion which the high moral tone of individual Stoics could not remove. The definition of a virtuous life as "according to nature" was not always understood, being sometimes taken to mean an imitation of the beasts; and now and then we find doctrines charged on the Stoics which can hardly be reconciled with their known principles. It must be allowed that the high pretensions of this school, contrasted with the lives of some of its adherents, laid it open more than other sects to the charge of hypocrisy, alike from the satirist and the Christian.

We thus see that educated Christians did not regard Gentile philosophy as wholly in the wrong, but rather as having attained, in certain schools, to some measure of truth. This was partly attributed to Divine illumination—not indeed that the philosophers were thought to have had prophetic inspiration (though this was certainly believed of the Sibyl), but to have been more or less aided by the Holy Spirit's grace; and some Christians thought that use had been made of the Jewish Scriptures by Plato; whom they even supposed, by an anachronism which Augustine exposes, to have been a hearer of Jeremiah in Egypt. Satanic thefts and parodies of revelation were also surmised here, as in the mythology.

VI. The Apologists and the Jews. In reasoning with Jews, the first matter of importance was to show that the Christians had not forgotten the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. For they were encountered at once with the objection, that while professing to serve Him, they had discarded all observance of His law. The Apologists' reply is, that the law was not of eternal obligation, but intended from the first as a temporary dispensation, preparatory to one more perfect—the type and shadow of those spiritual blessings, which were to be seen in their reality in the Christian Church. There (Aug. de Civit. Dei) was to be found the true circumcision of the heart. The law had in all things ended in Christ, and the fleshly been replaced by the spiritual Israel—the new commonwealth antitypical to the former one, and foretold from the very first in the promise to Abraham, and Jacob's blessing upon Judah, besides many prophecies of the fruitfulness of the barren and the desolate; its relation to the old polity was symbolized in the histories of Sarah and Hagar, Isaac and Ishmael, Jacob and Esau, Hannah and Peninnah, and the houses of Saul and David. The law had not been needed by the saints who lived before it was given (Tertull. against the Jews); and a new law, lawgiver, priesthood, and sacrifice were spoken of in the Scriptures (Cyprian, Test. adv. Jud.) as succeeding it.

In answer to the next Jewish objection, that the Christians worshipped other gods besides Jehovah, reference was made to such records of Divine words or acts as implied a plurality of Persons in the Godhead; or described the manifestations of One who was at once Jehovah and Jehovah's Messenger, e.g. to some of the visions, &c., mentioned in Genesis and Exodus. This is the favourite ground of the earlier writers, Justin, Irenaeus, and Tertullian; and it is also taken by Epiphanius. Augustine, however, abandons the idea that the Person seen in these visions was the Divine Son Himself, the views of the Alexandrian school having by this time been supplanted by the expositions of Jerome and others. Another argument was drawn from passages in the poetical and prophetic books of Scripture, which speak of the Word, Spirit, and Wisdom of God, of the Lord and Son of David, the Lord the Messenger of the Covenant, and the like. For such interpretations a way had been prepared in the Jewish mind by the speculations of Philo and the Alexandrians, in which is found some conception, if not of the divinity, yet of the personality and sonship of the Word (Logos), the "first begotten of the Father," the "archangel of many names," by whom was effected the work of creation. This idea, though far removed from the Christian doctrine, which at once made the Word the coeternal and coequal Son of the Father, and identified Him with the looked-for Messiah, yet approached nearly enough to admit of something like a common terminology, and doubtless much lessened the difficulties of the Apologists.

The Jews expected that the "Anointed One," for whom they looked, would be a mere man, and for their conceptions Jesus was at once too lowly and too exalted. The name "Son of God" was not unknown as a title of Messiah, but they had never thought of interpreting it so strictly as the Christians did. Hence the Apologists had the double task of shewing that the Messiah was to be a Divine and supernaturally-born Person, and also that of Him, great as He was, were prophesied not only the kingdom of glory but also a life of humiliation and suffering, and a death of shame, exactly like the life and the death of Jesus. For the former of these assertions they referred to the question of Isai. liii. 8, to the stone of Nebuchadnezzar's dream (Dan. ii. 35, compared with Isai. xxviii. 16), together with some passages of a typical nature; but laid most stress on the prophecy of the Virgin's Son, Isai. viii. 10–16 (Justin and Irenaeus), meeting the Jewish rendering of "girl" for "virgin" by an appeal to the LXX. and to the context as implying that the birth, being called a "sign," must be an event of extraordinary nature. Irenaeus (cont. Haer. iii. 21) contends that the restitution of mankind when fallen could only have been effected through One whose body, like Adam's, was formed anew and of virgin-earth. Another mode of proving the divine personality of Messiah, was by shewing that the Scriptures identified Him with the Word, to Whom, as had already been argued, were given the incommunicable names of Jehovah, Lord, and God. That this Divine Messiah was to be despised and crucified, the Apologists maintained by applying to Him many passages which the Jews of earlier times would probably have allowed to be Messianic, wherein they pointed out His descent from David, 1 Chron. xviii. 4, 11, Isai. xi. 1; His birth in Bethlehem; His humiliation and sufferings, Isai. lxx. 3, Jer. xi. 19, Deut. xxviii. 66, Zeph. i. 7, &c.; and His resurrection, Ps. xvi. 10 and Ps. xxxi., Hos. vi. 2, Ex. ix. 10, &c.; besides which they adduced various types, e.g. the offering of Isaac, the sale of Joseph, the elevation of the brazen serpent (on a cross as they believed), and the sacrifices of the Law, specially those of the Day of Atonement. And further to reconcile the Jews to the idea of a crucified Messiah, they shewed that the curse on him "that hangeth on a tree" was upon Him for others' sins, not His own, besides being specially predictive of the rejection which it should procure Him from the people of Israel. Moreover, the lowliness of Jesus was no way contrary to the prophecies of His glorious kingdom, for these were to be fulfilled at His second advent; and His present exaltation to the right-hand of the Father was attested by the conquering progress of His Church, in spite of every effort for its destruction, and by the spiritual gifts and powers with which He continued to endow it; while not only had prophecy, once possessed by the Jews, ceased among them, but their temple and city were destroyed, their worship was at an end, and they were suffering the very judgments which had been threatened of old as the penalties of apostasy from God. The Apologists do not remain wholly on the defensive, but charge the Jews with carnal conceptions of God (Just. Dial. c. Tryph. c. 141, p. 341 D—so Origen, Eusebius, and Cyril), and of His worship; with trusting to their descent from Abraham and knowledge of the Law, for pardon of sin (Dial. c. Tryph. c. 141, p. 370 D); and with the allowance of polygamy by their teachers.

VII. Evidences of Christianity adduced by the Apologists. Of all these, most stress is laid upon the argument from prophecy: the Christians proclaimed certain facts and doctrines concerning the Lord Jesus and His Church, all which appeared to be the fulfilment and explanation of predictions uttered ages before by men of the Hebrew nation. But God alone could thus foretell the future; it was He, therefore, who by His prophets had at once revealed and attested the mission of His Son. It was easy to shew that the predictions in question were really anterior to the event; as for this purpose it was only necessary to refer to the known date of the Septuagint translation. Some of the Apologists, however, go more fully into this subject, in order, further, to meet the objection that Christianity was a novelty (Theophilus, ad Autol. iii. c. 16 sqq.; Tatian, Or. ad Graec. c. 31, p. 18 sqq.).

Modern readers are surprised to see how seemingly slight allusions are seized by the Apologists, and construed with the utmost confidence as types or prophecies of Christ. Accustomed to regard the purpose of God in Christ as the centre of all His dealings with men, they believed that every ray of divine revelation must converge upon it, or upon the truths concerning God and His nature made known by Christ. Hence they saw in every angel who spoke in the Lord's name a manifestation of the Angel of the Covenant, in every sacrifice that of Christ, in every mention of an anointed king a prediction of Messiah's reign. The extent of this belief is illustrated by the titles prefixed to the Psalms in the Syriac and other very early versions, which often assign without hesitation a Messianic import to psalms, wherein few would now see any such allusion. We may perhaps trace in all this a reminiscence of Apostolic days, when the light of Christian prophecy shone upon the ancient scriptures, revealing their typical and Messianic significance throughout; a light which even in the days of the earliest Apologists was almost quenched, and no longer sufficed for any accurate application of details. Yet what had once been seen by it could not soon be wholly forgotten; and hence may have originated some of the Apologists' general ideas on the reference of all the law and the prophets to Christ; although in particulars it is evident that little else than individual fancy can have been their guide.

Miracles, according to the Apologists, are not, alone, a sufficient evidence of Divine mission (Justin, Apol. i. c. 30, p. 72 A), but only in conjunction with the doctrine purpose and character of those who work them (Dial. c. Tryph. c. 7, p. 225 A). There is a very marked distinction between the use which ancient and modern writers make of the argument from miracles. The latter have to prove the fact of miraculous agency; the former, chiefly, its degree and character. The early writers, moreover, appeal, not only to the miracles wrought by the Lord himself when on earth (which they commonly adduce as fulfilments of prophecy), but also to miracles and supernatural gifts of various kinds, still remaining amongst believers.

The Apologists dwell much on the internal evidence of Christianity, comparing its view of God, and of the service which He would accept, with the conceptions of paganism, and the lives of Christians with those of heathens. Frequent reference is made to the power which the Gospel possessed of changing the life and character of those who received it, however ignorant and vicious they might have been before; whereas philosophy gave up such cases as hopeless, and never so much as attempted to influence the poor and unlettered masses, which Christianity was winning over by thousands to wisdom and holiness.

As the doctrine of a general resurrection was of all Christian tenets the most new and startling, several Apologists treat this subject by itself; meeting the objections that the scattered atoms of one human body might afterwards become parts of another (Athenagoras, Resurr. cc.

4-8), and that the body was essentially the clog and prison of the soul, which could only be perfect when freed from it. To the former they answered (l. c.) that everything once taken in as food was not necessarily assimilated and made a permanent constituent of the body; particularly if, like human flesh, it were a revolting and unnatural aliment; and to the latter, that the Creator's purpose in making man embraced his whole being, and could only be fulfilled by its permanence as a whole; and that it was only this mortal body that hindered the soul; that of the resurrection would be its apt instrument for good. By way of illustration we find allusions to the Stoic doctrine of the recurrence of all things in endless cycles (Tatian, Or. ad Graec. c. 6, p. 145 D), to the resuscitated heroes of mythology (Theophilus, ad Autol. c. 13, p. 77 C), and to various returnings, renewals, and alternations in natural things, e. g. of the seasons, day and night, waking and sleeping; also to the phenomena of birth and growth in animals and plants (Theophilus and Athenagoras; see also Just. Fragm. de Resurr. c. 2, p. 589 A).

VIII. Doctrine, &c. The doctrine of the Trinity is stated by the Apologists in its bearing on creation and redemption, and so guarded as not to appear a denial of the unity of God, a caution most needful in dealing with polytheists. Theophilus (ad Autol. i. c. 3, p. 71 A; ii. c. 15, p. 94 D) speaks of the Son as the Power and Word (or Reason), and the Holy Ghost as the Wisdom, of the Father; under which abstract terms a real Trinity of Persons is certainly intended, as appears from the enumeration of the Three, of Whom the First and the Second are necessarily Persons, in Theophilus (l. c.); cf. Athenag. Apol. c. 10, p. 10; where we are also told, that the assumption by the Son of the office of Word or Revealer of the Father was not His coming into existence, for that He had existed in God from eternity; and so, it is implied, did the Holy Spirit, the Wisdom of God; forasmuch as God was possessed of Wisdom from all eternity. In reference to God's dealings with His creatures, the Son is He who manifested Himself and the Father to men (Justin, Dial. c. Tryph.), the Blessed Spirit, He Who inspired the prophets (id. c. 87 sqq.). Rightly to apprehend the Apologists' meaning, on this and other essential tenets of Christianity, it is important to study them in connection with the known ancient beliefs of the Church, and not in isolation, as if each had reasoned out for himself an independent creed.

The person born of the blessed Virgin is always, according to the Apologists, the Divine Word Himself (cf. the later term "Theotokos," or "Mother of God"); the divine and human natures, however, being distinguished; for when Jesus died on the cross, the Godhead died not (Minucius Felix, Octavius, c. 29; Arnobius, adv. Gentes, i. 62). Of the purpose of the Incarnation, they say in general terms, that He came to raise up man from the Fall and put away sin; that salvation, for men of all generations, depended on Him, and on His death; that His Blood washed away sin (Just. Dial. c. Tryph. c. 11, p. 338 C), and was applied by faith (ib. c. 13, p. 229 D) and in baptism (ib. c. 14, p. 231 C; Apol. i. c. 61, p. 94 C; Theoph. ad Autol. ii. c. 16, p. 97 B). In this remission they include release from the guilt, power, and punishment of sin; in justification, the imputing and the imparting of Christ's righteousness. The sacrificial character of Christ's death is directly stated by Justin (Dial. c. Tryph. c. 40, p. 259 C), but more often indicated by its being made antitypical to the sacrifices of the law.

The hope of the second Advent is largely insisted on, sometimes with allusions to the Apocalyptic 1st and 2nd Resurrections and Millennium following it (Justin, Dial. c. Tryph. c. 80, and Tertullian and Lactantius), and to the terrible sufferings to be endured previously by the Church, under Antichrist, who was not to appear so long as the Roman empire stood; a belief referred to by Tertullian (Apol. c. 32) as a reason why Christians could not be disloyal subjects.

Justin alone gives any details of Christian worship and observances. By him great prominence is given to Baptism and the holy Eucharist, the one as admitting believers to the benefits of the New Covenant, the other as the Church's spiritual sustenance and greatest act of worship. In the other writers such notices are incidental only; but, so far as they go, these indicate no dissimilarity of view. When baptism is spoken of, that of a convert is almost always intended; its administration to Christians' children is not mentioned. Eucharistic worship seems to be the only observance of the Lord's Day to which the Apologists allude.

The earlier Apologists assert the freedom of the will, both in angels and in men, as the only possible foundation of moral responsibility. Their view of man's natural condition we gather from their account of the degradation of heathenism, the helplessness of philosophy without revelation, and the power possessed by Satan over mankind: from this condition baptism frees us (Justin, Apol. i. c. 61, p. 94 C).

A growing asceticism is very apparent (vid. Hele's Beiträge, vol. i. lect. 2): second marriages are strongly condemned; celibacy is highly commended, and often mentioned, by way of contrasting the Christians' real moderation, even in lawful things, with the excesses ascribed to them by their enemies. The horror, not only of gladiatorial shows, but of all bloodshed, expressed by Athenagoras, leads one to suppose that he would have thought the profession of arms unlawful; but this was not a universal scruple (Tertull. Apoloq. c. 42). Slavery was not disallowed by the Christians of this period.

IX. Remarks. The Apologies properly so called, such, for instance, as those of Justin and Athenagoras, are mostly of Greek authorship, almost the only works of exactly similar character amongst the Latins being those of Tertullian. Of books against the Jews the East was naturally rather more prolific than the West; while the Latins contribute the larger portion of those treatises which were written near the time when Christianity became the faith of the Empire, and which collect and systematize the entire argument against paganism. In the Greek Apologists we seem to distinguish an earlier stage of Christian thought, with language as yet unfixed by the controversies with heretics, and sometimes nearly the phraseology of Scripture (e. g. Theophilus), sometimes that of the old philosophy (Athenagoras). The Greek is often still the philosopher, become Christian indeed, but retaining the old garb and style; the Latin, often in the set style of the rhetorician, criticizes, favourably or otherwise, the Gentile philosophy as already become almost a thing of the past. The distinction which there had been between Grecian and Roman philosophy seems to hold, at least in some measure, between the Christian Apologetic of the East and that of the West.

Of the effect of these efforts to allay persecution very little is known. Jerome, indeed, represents those of Quadratus and Aristides as having concurred with a letter of Serenus Gracianus, in producing the rescript of Hadrian to Minucius Fundanus, which is given at the end of Justin's second Apology. The rescript, however, does not appear in any way more favourable to the Christians than was that of Trajan to Pliny. Tertullian's fierce attacks upon heathenism, far from bettering the condition of the Christians, would rather seem to have provoked the hostile edict of Septimius Severus, promulgated A.D. 202, just after their publication, by which conversion to Christianity was forbidden. Perhaps, though addressed to the authorities, the Apologies may have found more response from the people, and even when unsuccessful in averting persecution may have helped to swell the number of those who encountered it under the banner of the Cross.

APOSTLES. The history of the Apostles after the New Testament period is given under ACTS OF THE APOSTLES, APOCRYPHAL.

APOSTOLICAL CANONS AND CONSTITUTIONS. [See DICTIONARY OF CHRIST. ANTIQ. s. vv.]

APOSTOLIC FATHERS. 1. Definition of the term. The adjective Apostolicus (ἀποστολικός) is used to denote either morally or doctrinally accordance with the Apostles, or historically connexion with the Apostles. In this latter sense it is especially applied to Churches founded directly by Apostles, or to persons associated with and taught by Apostles. The former are Apostolicae ecclesiae; the latter Apostolici viri, or Apostolici simply. See especially Tertull. de Praescr. 32, "ut primus ille episcopus aliquem ex apostolis vel apostolicis viris, qui tamen cum apostolis perseveravit, haberit auctorem et antecessorem. Hoc enim modo ecclesiae apostolicae census suos deferunt, sicut Smyrnaeorum ecclesia Polycarpum ab Ioanne collocatum refert, sicut Romanorum Clementem a Petro ordinatum itidem," with the whole context. Cf. also de Praescr. 20, 21; adv. Marc. i. 21, v. 2; de Carn. Chr. 2; de Pudic. 21. Hence among the Evangelists, while St. Matthew and St. John are Apostoli, St. Mark and St. Luke are Apostolici (adv. Marc. iv. 2). In accordance with this usage the term Apostolic Fathers is confined to those who are known, or may reasonably be presumed, to have associated with and derived their teaching directly from some Apostle.

Thus it has been used with more or less latitude, in accordance with the historical views of the writer who employs it. In its widest range it will, in the present state of criticism, include Barnabas, Hermas, Clemens, Ignatius, Polycarp, Papias, and the writer of the epistle to Diognetus. At an earlier stage the works of Dionysius the Areopagite would have claimed a place among the writings of the Apostolic Fathers, but these are now universally condemned as spurious. The same is the case with other Apocryphal works, which for the same reason may be neglected from our consideration. But though the writings ascribed to the persons whose names are included in the above list may all be accepted as genuine, yet in some instances they fail to satisfy other conditions, which alone entitle to a place among the works of the Apostolic Fathers. Thus the "Shepherd" of Hermas has been placed in this category, because it was supposed to have been written by the person of this name mentioned by St. Paul (Rom. xvi. 14; see Origen ad loc. Op. iv. 683); but a more authentic tradition ascribes it to the brother of Pius, who was bishop of Rome a little before the middle of the 2nd century (Canon. Murat. p. 58, ed. Tregelles; see pseudo-Tertull. Poem. adv. Marc. iii. 294, in Tertull. Op. ii. 792 ed. Oehler). Thus again the claim of Papias to be considered an Apostolic Father rests on the supposition that he was a disciple of St. John the Evangelist, as Irenaeus apparently imagines (Haer. v. 33. 4); but Eusebius has pointed out that Irenaeus was mistaken, and that the teacher of Papias was not the Apostle St. John but the Presbyter of the same name (H. E. iii. 39). Again, there is some uncertainty about the Epistle to Diognetus. Its claim is founded on an expression which occurs in § 11, and which has been interpreted literally as implying that the writer was a personal disciple of one or other of the Apostles. But in the first place, the context shows that this literal interpretation is out of place, and the passage must be explained as follows: "I do not make any strange statements nor indulge in unreasonable questionings, but having learnt my lessons from the Apostles (lit. having become a disciple of Apostles). I stand forward as a teacher of the nations" (οὐ ξένα ὀμιλῶ οὐδὲ παραλόγως ζητῶ, ἀλλὰ ἀποστόλων γινόμενος μαθητῆς γίνομαι διδάσκαλος ἐθνῶν); and secondly, this is no part of the Epistle to Diognetus proper (§§ 1-10), but belongs to a later writing, which has been accidentally attached to the Epistle, owing to the loss of some leaves in the MS. This latter fact is conclusive. If therefore the Epistle has any title to a place among the Apostolic Fathers, it must be established by internal evidence; and, though the internal character suggests an early date, perhaps as early as about A.D. 117 (see Westcott, Canon p. 79), yet there is no hint of any historical connexion between the writer and the Apostles. Lastly, the so-called Epistle of Barnabas occupies an unique position. If the writer had been the companion of St. Paul, who bore that name, then he would more properly be styled, not an "apostolic man," as he is designed by Clement of Alexandria (Strom. ii. 20, p. 489, ὁ ἀποστολικὸς Βαρνάβας), but an "apostle," as the same Clement elsewhere styles him (Strom. ii. 6, p. 445; ii. 7, p. 447) in accordance with St. Luke's language (Acts xiv. 14). But, if the writer be not the Apostle Barnabas, then we have no evidence of any personal relations with the Apostles, though such is not impossible, as the Epistle must have been written at some date between the age of Vespasian and that of Nerva.

After these deductions only three names remain, Clement, Ignatius, and Polycarp; and in none of these cases is there reasonable ground for hesitation. Though the identification of this Clement with the person named by St. Paul (Phil. iv. 3) is less than probable, though the authority of the Clementine romance is worthless to establish his connexion with St. Peter, yet the tradition that he was a disciple of one or both of these Apostles is early, constant, and definite; and it is borne out by the character and contents of his genuine Epistle. See especially Irenæus (iii. 3. 3), who speaks very definitely to this point, and yet says nothing of his identification with the Clement of the Epistle to the Philippians. Again, the early date of Ignatius and his connexion with Antioch, a chief centre of Apostolic activity, render his personal connexion with the Apostles probable; and tradition more especially represents him as a disciple of St. John, though it were to be wished that we had some early authority for this statement less questionable than the doubtful Martyrdom of Ignatius (§§ 1, 3). Lastly, Polycarp's claim to the title seems indisputable, since his own pupil Irenæus states that he was a scholar of the beloved disciple, and that he himself had heard from his master many anecdotes of this Apostle, which he had carefully stored up in his memory (Epist. ad Florin. in Euseb. H. E. v. 20; cf. Haer. iii. 3, 4).

2. Form of their writings. All the genuine writings of these three Apostolic Fathers are epistolary in form, modelled more or less after the pattern of the Canonical Epistles, especially those of St. Paul, but called forth by pressing temporary needs. In no case is any literary motive prominent. A famous teacher writes in the name of the community over which he presides to quell the dissensions of a distant but friendly Church. An aged disciple on his way to martyrdom pours out a few parting words of exhortation to the Christian brotherhoods with whom he is brought in contact during his journey. A bishop of a leading Church, having occasion to send a parcel to another brotherhood at a distance, takes the opportunity of writing, in answer to their solicitations, a few plain words of advice and instruction. Such is the simple account of the letters of Clement, Ignatius, and Polycarp respectively.

And even if we extend the term "Apostolic Fathers," so as to include the two other writings which alone have any claim to this title, the same form is preserved. The Epistle of Barnabas and the Letter to Diognetus are no departure from the rule. But, though the form is preserved, the spirit is somewhat different. They no longer represent the natural outpouring of personal feeling, arising out of personal relations; but are rather treatises clothed in an epistolary dress, the aim of the one being polemical, of the other apologetic. In this respect they resemble the Epistle to the Hebrews more than the letters of St. Paul.

3. Their character. "The Apostolic Fathers," says De Pressensé, "are not great writers, but great characters" (Trois Premiers Siècles, ii. 384). Their style is loose; there is a want of arrangement in the topics, and an absence of system in their teaching. On the one hand they present a marked contrast to the depth and clearness of conception with which the several Apostolic writers place before us different aspects of the Gospel, and by which their title to a special inspiration is established. On the other, they lack the scientific spirit which distinguished the Fathers of the 4th and 5th centuries, and which enabled them to formulate the doctrines of the faith as a bulwark against unbridled speculation. But though they are deficient in distinctness of conception and power of exposition, "this inferiority" to the later Fathers "is amply compensated by a certain naïveté and simplicity which forms the charm of their letters. If they have not the precision of the scientific spirit, they are free from its narrowness." There is a breadth of moral sympathy, an earnest sense of personal responsibility, a fervour of Christian devotion, which is the noblest testimony to the influence of the Gospel on characters obviously very diverse, and which will always command for their writings a respect to which their literary merits could lay no claim. The gentleness and serenity of Clement, whose whole spirit is absorbed in contemplating the harmonies of nature and of grace; the fiery zeal of Ignatius, in whom the one over-mastering desire of martyrdom has crushed all human passion; the unbroken constancy of Polycarp, whose protracted life is spent in maintaining the faith once delivered to the saints:—these are lessons which can never become antiquated or lose their value.

4. Their relation to the Apostolic Teaching and to the Canonical Scriptures. If we had to describe briefly the respective provinces of the Apostolic Fathers, we might say that it was the work of Clement to co-ordinate the different elements of Christian teaching as left by the Apostles; and of Ignatius to consolidate the structure of ecclesiastical polity, as sketched out by them; while for Polycarp, whose active career was just beginning as theirs ended, and who lived on for more than half a century after their deaths, was reserved the task of handing down unimpaired to a later generation the Apostolic doctrine and order thus co-ordinated and consolidated by his elder contemporaries—a task for which he was eminently fitted by his passive and receptive character.

The writings of all these three Fathers lie well within the main stream of Catholic teaching. They are the proper link between the Canonical Scriptures and the Church Fathers of the ages succeeding them. They recognise all the different elements of the Apostolic teaching, though they combine them in different proportions. "They prove that Christianity was Catholic from the very first, uniting a variety of forms in one faith. They show that the great facts of the Gospel narrative, and the substance of the Apostolic letters, formed the basis and moulded the expression of the common creed" (Westcott, Canon p. 55).

But when we turn to the other writings for which a place among the Apostolic Fathers has been claimed, the case is different. Though the writers are all apparently within the pale of the Church, yet there is a tendency to that one-sided exaggeration—either in the direction of Judaism, or the opposite—which stands on the very verge of heresy. In the Epistle of Barnabas and in the Letter to Diognetus, the repulsion to Judaism is so violent, that one step further would have carried the writers into Gnostic or Marcionite dualism. On the other hand, in the "Shepherd" of Hermas, and possibly in the "Expositions" of Papias (for in this instance the inferences drawn from a few scanty fragments must be precarious), the sympathy with the Old Dispensation is unduly strong, and the distinctive features of the Gospel are darkened by the shadow of the Law thus projected upon them. In Clement, Ignatius, and Polycarp, both extremes alike are avoided.

For the relation of these writers to the Canonical Scriptures the reader is referred to the thorough investigation in Westcott's History of the Canon, pp. 19-55. It will be sufficient here to state the more important results to which we are led: (1) The Apostolic Fathers do not, as a rule, quote by name the Canonical writings of the New Testament. The exceptions however are just what we should expect to find. Clement, writing to the Corinthians, refers to St. Paul's Epistle to that Church (§ 47); Ignatius, addressing the Ephesians (if the shorter Greek be accepted as genuine), speaks of their having been initiated in company with St. Paul, and refers to the letter (or letters) in which the Apostle mentions them (§ 12 ἐν πάσῃ ἐπιστολῇ, which has been differently interpreted); Polycarp, writing to the Philippians, in like manner calls attention to the instructions which St. Paul had given them by letter (§ 3 ἀπάν ὑμῶν ἐγράψεν ἐπιστολὰς κ. τ. λ.). But (2), though (with these exceptions) the books of the New Testament are not quoted by name, fragments of most of the Canonical Epistles lie imbedded in the writings of these Fathers, whose language is thoroughly leavened with the Apostolic diction. In like manner the facts of the Gospel history are referred to, and the words of our Lord given, though for the most part not as direct quotations. For (3) there is no decisive evidence that these Fathers recognised a Canon of the New Testament, as a distinctly defined body of writings; though Barnabas once introduces our Lord's words as recorded in Matt. xx. 16, xxii. 14, with the usual formula of Scriptural citation, "As it is written (ὡς γέγραπται)". But (4) on the other hand they assign a special and pre-eminent authority to the Apostles which these distinctly disclaim for themselves. This is the case with Clement (§§ 5, 7) and Ignatius (Rom. 4), speaking of St. Peter and St. Paul; and with Polycarp (§ 3), speaking of St. Paul—the only Apostles that are mentioned by name in these writings. (5.) Lastly: though the language of the Canonical Gospels is frequently not quoted word for word, yet there is no distinct instance of an allusion to any Apocryphal narrative. The Apocryphal quotation in Barnabas, § 4, disappears in the Greek original (ὡς πρὸς τοὺς θεοῦ) and arises out of a corruption in the Latin text ("sicut dicit filius Dei" for "sicut deceit filios Dei"); a second supposed instance in this same writer (§ 7) seems to be due to a misinterpretation of the formula φησὶν, "he saith," which is intended to introduce, not a quotation, but an interpretation, according to its usage elsewhere in this same Epistle (§ 10, 11). If the Epistle to the Smyrnaeans were genuine, we should have a more probable example in Ignatius (Smyrn. 3); but this Epistle is not found in the Syriac, and even here, as has been suggested, we possibly have "a traditional form of the words recorded in Luke xxiv. 19."

LITERATURE.—The following are the most important editions of the Apostolic Fathers: SS. Patrum qui temporibus Apostolicis floruerunt, etc. Opera, J. B. Cotelerius, Paris 1672 (Barn. Herm. Clem. Ign. Polyc.), reprinted with additional matter by J. Clericus, Antwerp 1698 and Amsterdam 1724; Bibliotheca Patrum Apostolicorum Graeco-Latina, L. T. Ittig, Leipsic 1699 (Clem. Ign. Polyc.); Epistolae SS. Patrum Apostolicorum, J. L. Frey (Clem. Ign. Polyc.), Basle 1742; SS. Patrum Apostolicorum, etc. Opera Gemina, etc., R. Russel, London 1746 (Barn. Herm. Clem. Ign. Polyc.); Patrum Apostolicorum Opera, C. J. Hefele, Tübingen, 1st ed. 1839 4th ed. 1855 (Barn. Clem. Ign. Polyc. Herm.); S. Clementis Romani, S. Ignatii, S. Polycarpi, Patrum Apostolicorum, quae supersunt, W. Jacobson, Oxford, 1st ed. 1840, 4th ed. 1863 (Clem. Ign. Polyc.); Patrum Apostolicorum Opera, A. R. M. Dressel, Leipsic 1857 and 1863 (Barn. Clem. Ign. Polyc. Herm.). They may also be read in the principal Patrologies, more especially Galland's Bibliotheca Veterum Patrum, vol. i. Venice 1765, and Migne's Patrologia Graeca, vols. i. ii. v. Paris 1857. Fuller information respecting the editions and their contents will be found in Jacobson's Patres Apostolici, i. lxiv sq. An account of the editions of the several Apostolic Fathers singly will be found under their respective names.

Special works on the Apostolic Fathers are Die Apostolischen Väter, A. Hilgenfeld (1853), The Apostolical Fathers, J. Donaldson (1864), being the 1st vol. of A Critical History of Christian Literature and Doctrine; but the student will also obtain much information from the standard works on Patristic Literature generally, e.g. Cave, Dupin, Fabricius, Lumper, Möhler, &c. as also from works on Church History, and more especially on the history, institutions, and doctrine of the early centuries. From the last class, which is very numerous, we may single out De Pressensé, Histoire des Trois Premiers Siècles de l'Église Chrétienne; A. Ritschl, Die Entstehung der Altkatholischen Kirche; R. Rothe, Die Anfänge der Christlichen Kirche; E. Reuss, Histoire de la Théologie Chrétienne au Siècle Apostolique; J. A. Dorner, Entwicklungsgeschichte der Lehre von der Person Christi; B. F. APOSTOLICI, one of the names adopted by an ascetic sect in Phrygia, Cilicia, and Pamphylia. Their leading principle seems to have been the rejection of private property. They are also said to have resembled Tatian, the Encratites, and the "Cathari" (Novatians), in that they refused to admit offenders to communion, and condemned marriage. They appealed chiefly to the apocryphal Acts of Andrew and of Thomas. They entitled themselves Apotactici, i. e. "Renunciants." What little is recorded about them beyond the name we owe to Epiphanius (Haer. lxi. 506-513), who apparently knew them only by vague oral report. Their place in his treatise would naturally assign them to the 3rd century; and they evidently had not ceased to exist in the 4th. "Encratites, Saccophori, and Apotactites," described together as "an offshoot of the Marcionites," are associated with Novatians by Basil in a letter answering queries from Amphilocheus of Iconium (cxix. can. 47: cf. clxxviii. can. 1), written in 375, when Epiphanius had begun and not completed his work. A law of Theodosius against the Manicheans in 381 (Cod. Theod. XVI. v. 7; cf. 11 an. 383) alleges that some of these heretics endeavoured to evade the existing severe legislation by calling themselves "Encratites, Apotactites, Hydroparastatae, or Saccophori." Any true historical connexion however between the Apostolici and either the Marcionists or the Manicheans is highly improbable. [H.]

APOSTOLORUM ACTA. [ACTS OF THE APOSTLES.]

APOTACTICI. [APOSTOLICI.]

APOTACTITAE. [MANES.]

APPHIANUS, or APPIANUS, or AMPHIANUS, M., a son of rich parents at "Pagae" (probably Araxas) in Lycia, educated in the schools of Berytus, who being not 20 years old interrupted the governor at Caesarea when sacrificing, by an exhortation to desist from idolatry, and who was accordingly, after horrible tortures—among others by his feet being wrapped in a tunica molesta of flax steeped in oil and set on fire—finally martyred by drowning, April 11, A.D. 306 (Euseb. de Mart. Palaest. iv.; Syriac Acta in Assemani, Act. Mart. ii. 189 sq.). He was brother of AEDESIUS. [A. W. H.]

APPION. [APION.]

APRINGIUS, bishop of CHALCIS in Syria Prima, a leading member of the Eastern party at the Council of Ephesus, 431, who supported John of Antioch in the deposition of Cyril, &c., and was deputed as one of the commissioners to the emperor at Constantinople as proxy for the metropolitan, Alexander of Apamea. He shared in the ultimate reconciliation between Cyril and the East. (Labbe, Concil. iii. 1127, 1183; Baluz. Coll. Nov. Concil. 497, 507, 577, 714, 720.) [E. V.]

AQUILA (Ἀκύλας), the author of a translation of the Old Testament into Greek, which was held in much esteem by the Jews and was reproduced by Origen in the third column of the Hexapla, seems to have belonged to the earlier half of the 2nd century. Little is known regarding his personal history beyond the fact that he was, like the Aquila associated with St. Paul, a native of Pontus, and probably, according to the more definite tradition, of Sinope. We learn also from Irenaeus, in whom we find the earliest mention of him (Adv. Haer. iii. 24), that he was a proselyte to the Jewish faith—a statement confirmed by Eusebius (De monst. Evang. vii. 1: προσήλυτος δὲ ὁ Ἀκύλας ἦν, οὐ φύσει Ἰουδαῖος), Jerome (Ep. ad Pam-mach. Opp. iv. 2, p. 255), and other Fathers, as well as by the Jerusalem Talmud (Megil. f. 71, c. 3; Kiddush. f. 59, c. 1, where there can be little doubt that the Akilas referred to is to be identified with Aquila). From this circumstance he is frequently called "Aquila the proselyte."

Epiphanius, in one of the curious digressions that form the greater part of his treatise De Pond. et Mens. (c. 14, 15), furnishes a more detailed account. He states that Aquila was a relative (the exact nature of the relationship denoted by the otherwise unknown form πενθερίδης is doubtful) of the emperor Hadrian, and was appointed by him to superintend the rebuilding of Jerusalem under the new name of Aelia Capitolina; that, impressed by the miracles of healing and other wonders performed by the disciples of the Apostles who had returned from Pella to the nascent city, he embraced Christianity and at his own request was baptized; that, in consequence of his continued devotion to practices of astrology which he refused to abandon even when reproved by the disciples, he was expelled from the Church; and that, embittered by this treatment, he was induced through his zeal against Christianity to become a Jew, to study the Hebrew language, and to render the Scriptures afresh into Greek with the view of setting aside those testimonies to Christ which were drawn from the current version on the Septuagint. No writer prior to Epiphanius makes any reference to the circumstance of Aquila having been a Christian, which, had it been true, would doubtless have obtained prominent notice as bearing on the object and spirit of his work; and the other portions of the narrative of Epiphanius, which are without confirmation, are now generally set aside as of little historical value. There appears, however, no just reason to doubt that Aquila may have lived in the reign of Hadrian (117-138); the attempt to rebuild Jerusalem took place A.D. 130; and, as a considerable period must have been occupied in the preparations for the translation and in the execution of the work, it may not have been completed much before the middle of the 2nd century. By some, indeed, it has been placed even later, on the ground that Irenaeus seems to speak of him as a contemporary (l. c. ὡς ἐνίοι φασι τῶν ὄντων μεθερμηνεύειν τολμῶντων τὴν γραφὴν); but the use of the present tense, followed as it is immediately by the aorist ἠρμήνευσεν, can hardly be construed so strictly, and the ὄντων may, perhaps, imply nothing more than the recent or modern date of those attempts to supersede the Septuagint version which had the sanction of antiquity and of general acceptance. It has been supposed, on the other hand, that Justin Martyr must have had the version of Aquila before him, when he refers to the substitution of the word νεάνις for παρθένος, as the rendering of Παρθένος in Is. vii. 14 (Dial. cum Tryph. 71); but the words of Justin do not necessarily point to a written translation.

The object of Aquila was to furnish a translation on which the Jews could rely as a more accurate rendering of the Hebrew than that of the Septuagint, which not only was in many instances loose and incorrect from the first, but had also in the course of four centuries undergone change and corruption. With this view he made his version strictly literal, striving to provide a Greek equivalent for every Hebrew word and particle in frequent disregard of the rules of grammar and of idiom, and with the result of often rendering his meaning hardly intelligible to those who were not acquainted with Hebrew (as in Job xxx. 1: καὶ νῦν ἐγάλασαν ἐπ' ἐμοὶ βραχεῖς παρ' ἐμὲ ταῖς ἡμέραις; Psalm xlix. 21, ὑπέλαβες ἐσόμενος ἔσομαι θυοὺς σοι: Psalm clix. 6; καὶ μάχαισα στομάτων ἐν χερσὶν αὐτῶν). He carefully endeavoured even to reproduce Hebrew etymologies in Greek, and for that purpose freely coined new forms (as in Psalm xxi. 13, δυναῖσαι Βααὺν διεδηματίσαντό με; Psalm cxviii. 10, μὴ ἀγνωματίσης με). Origen accordingly characterizes him as δουλεύων τῇ Ἑβραϊκῇ λέξει (Ep. ad Afric.), and the fragments of the version which have been preserved amply bear out the truth of the description. But the excessively literal character of the work, while impairing its value as a translation for those who were not Jews, renders it all the more valuable as a witness to the state of the Hebrew text from which it was made. (As to the nature and value of the version, see Dict. Bib. iii. 1622.)

It is alleged by several of the Fathers that Aquila not only prepared his translation for controversial purposes, but also, in special enmity to the Christians, made his version of the Messianic passages in particular designedly adverse to their views. But this charge seems to have had little or no foundation. For Jerome—whose expressions regarding Aquila, it must be allowed, are not quite self-consistent, since in one passage he speaks of him as “contentiosus interpres” (Ep. ad Pamph. l. c.), and in another as “non-contentiosus, ut quidam putant, sed studiosus” (Ep. 125 ad Damasum, ii. 567)—distinctly states that he compared the work of Aquila with the Hebrew copies, “ne quid forsitan propter odium Christi synagoga mutaverit,” and found in it, he candidly owns, various things tending to corroborate the faith (Ep. 74 ad Marcell., Opp. iv. 2, 61). The version was received with much favour by the Jews on account of its fidelity; they preferred it to other translations (Augustin. de Civ. Dei xv. 23), and a law of Justinian (Novell. 146) permitted its use, as a substitute for the Septuagint or a vernacular version, in the synagogues. In the Jerusalem Talmud it is said that Akilas received praise for his interpretation of the Law in the language of the 45th Psalm (v. 3), “Thou art fairer than the sons of men.”

Jerome on several occasions quotes an editio secunda of Aquila's translation, and in his Comm. in Ezech. iii. 15, refers to it as “quam Hebraei κατ' ἀκριβειαν vocant.” By some this expression has been taken to mean, not that the second edition was more strictly literal than the first, but that it was more accurate in respect of conformity to Greek idiom; but this view is an improbable one, and there can be little doubt that the second edition was a revision in which Aquila endeavoured still more faithfully and closely to carry out the principle of literal exactness which he had adopted.

Several scholars of eminence have recently maintained that Aquila is to be identified not only with the Akilas of the Talmud, but also with Onkelos, whose name is associated with the well-known Targum on the Pentateuch; holding that the latter is merely an altered form of the name, and that the Chaldee version came to receive what is now its ordinary designation from its being drawn up on the model, or after the manner, of that of Aquila. The arguments in support of this view, which appear to have great weight, are set forth with much clearness and force by Mr. Deutsch in his article on Versions, Ancient (Targum), in Dict. Bib. iii. 1642–45.

The fragments of the version of Aquila—first collected by Morinus for the Sixtine edition of the Septuagint, Rome 1587, and subsequently by Drusius, in his Veterum interp. Graec. in V. T. fragmenta, Arn. 1622—are more fully given in the edition of the Hexapla by Montfaucon, Paris 1714, and its abridgment by Bahrdt, 1769–70. An elaborate edition, which promises to be the most complete and valuable, is now in course of publication by Mr. Field (Origenis Hexaplorum quae supersunt . . . post Flaminium Nobilium, Drusium et Montefalconium, adhibita etiam versione Syro-Hexaplarum, concinnavit, emendavit et multis partibus auxit Fredericus Field, Oxon. 1867–70). The chief questions connected with Aquila are discussed by Montfaucon, and by Hody (De Bibliorum textibus originalibus. Oxon. 1705). [W. P. D.]

AQUILINUS, a Gnostic contemporary with Plotinus (Porph. V. Plot. 16); otherwise unknown. [H.]

AQUILIUS SEVERUS. [SEVERUS.]

ARA (Ἰ), a Syrian author of unknown age, who wrote a book against the Magians, and another called Scarabaei against Bardeisan (Ebedjesu in Assemani, B. O. iii. 230: cf. Hahn, Bardes. 7). [H.]

ARABIANUS (Ἀραβιανός), a Christian writer, who lived at the end of the 2nd century. Eusebius has mentioned his name (H. E. v. 27), but has preserved no fragment of his writings, nor even stated on what subject he wrote. His date is inferred from the fact that Eusebius mentions him immediately after his relation of the accession of Severus (A.D. 193). Jerome (De Vir. Ill. cap. 51) adds nothing to what is told by Eusebius. [G. S.]

ARABIANUS, bishop of ANCYRA. He was present at the Synod of Constantinople, A.D. 394, held to decide between two claimants to the see of Bostra, when he raised the question whether a bishop could be deposed by two bishops only (Labbe, Conc. ii. 1377, ed. Coleti). He also took part in the Synod held by Chrysostom at the same place, A.D. 400, to consider the charges against Antoninus of Ephesus (Pallad. Vit. Chrys. 13; see Labbe, Conc. ii. 1465). [L.]

ARABICI, the name given by Augustine (Haer. 83) to an “Arabian” sect of the 3rd century, described by Eusebius (H. E. vi. 37). They held that soul and body die together, and will hereafter be raised together. They were the occasion of a considerable synod, to which Origen was invited; and the force of his arguments induced them to recant. The date appears to be either the reign of Gordian (238–244), in which Origen held a similar and equally successful conference with Beryllus of Bostra in “Arabia” (Euseb. ib. 33) i.e. the country east of Jordan; or that of Philip (244–249), under which Eusebius perhaps intended to place the occurrence. The doctrine closely resembles that of Tatian (Or. ad Græc. 13). Its other possible affinities are fully discussed by Redepenning (Origenes, ii. 105 ff.) There is a short special treatise De Arabicorum Haeresi in the Miscellanea Sacra of J. F. Budde (Jena 1727, i. 538 ff.) [H.]

ARATOR, the author of a Latin hexameter poem in two books, entitled Historia Apostolica e.e. Lucæ expressa, was a native of Liguria. From Ennodius, bishop of Pavia, who celebrates his childhood in four short epigrams (lib. ii. cv. cxiv. cxv. cxvi.), we learn that he was an orphan, and owed his education to Laurentius archbishop of Milan, in which city he frequented the school of one Deuterius (Ennod. Dict. ix.) In A.D. 526, he gained reputation as an advocate in a mission to Theodoric the Ostrogoth, on behalf of the Dalmatians; in consequence of which he was made private secretary and intendant of finance (comes domesticorum et privatorum) to Athalaric his successor. The rescript in which this appointment was conveyed is preserved by Cassiodorus (Var. l. 8, Ep. 12), in which the father of Arator is alluded to as a man of learning and eloquence, and the son is complimented as the Tullius of Liguria. Arator subsequently left the court, received ordination, and was elected a subdeacon of the Roman Church, A.D. 541. He appears to have been on intimate terms with Vigilius, to whom he dedicates his chief work in a short Elegiac preface, flattering enough to the character of that wretched pontiff. This must have been written soon after the first Gothic war of Belisarius, to which it is possible that he alludes (Ep. ad Vigil. l. 1). Such was the estimation in which the work was held that Vigilius directed it to be publicly recited by its author in the church now called San Pietro in Vincoli. This recitation took place thrice in the same year, A.D. 544 (P. H. Labbe, Bibl. MSS. vol. i. p. 668). The only other extant works of Arator are two epistles in the Elegiac metre, the one recommending his version of the Acts to the favourable notice of the Abbot Florianus, which is generally prefixed to the Epic along with the preface to Vigilius; the other addressed to his old schoolfellow Parthenius, the nephew of Ennodius (Ennod. Dict. x.), who first induced him to write poetry; and to whom he sends his work for distribution amongst the Gauls.

The Historia Apostolica is entirely devoid of poetic merit. The language is obscure, the treatment bald, the style vicious, and even where it is impossible for the author to help rising with his narrative, he does his best to quench its divinity by the introduction of undignified conceits, far-fetched metaphors, and long-winded digressions. The admiration accorded to him by his contemporaries is a mournful proof of the vitiated taste of the age. A truer criticism is constrained to endorse his modest self-estimate (Ep. ad Flor.):—

“Jejuno sermone quidem sed pingula gesta Scriptimus.”

The Editio Princeps of the Historia Apostolica appeared at Milan, 8vo, 1469. The Epistle to Parthenius was first published in Sirmond's notes to Ennodius (lib. ix. Ep. i.) from a MS. in the monastery of St. Remigius at Rheims. The latest edition of the poems is to be found in Migne's Patrologia, vol. lxxviii., with the preface and notes of Arntzen, 1769. [E. M. Y.]

ARCAPII. [ATHANASIUS, p. 185, a.]

ARCHE (Iren. 55: cf. 54). [VALENTINUS; EPIPHANES.] [H.]

ARCHELAUS, a bishop of CARCHAR or CASCAR in Mesopotamia, who is said to have held a disputation with the heresiarch Manes, during the reign of the emperor Probus (A.D. 277?). The Acts of this disputation are extant in a Latin translation made from a Greek text of which we possess some long fragments quoted by Epiphanius, adv. Haer. lxxvi. 6, 25–31. Cyril's account of them, Catech. vi. 15, is full of interpolations (Beausobre, Hist. de Manich. i. 101; cf. i. 130, ii. 725, 748). Jerome (de Viris Illustr. lxxxii.) states that they were compiled by Archelaus himself “Syro sermone,” and subsequently translated into Greek; but according to Photius (Biblioth. cod. 85), Heraclian, the bishop of Chalcedon, in his work against the Manicheans, written in the reign of Anastasius, attributed them to one Hegemonius; and the language of the Acts themselves (capp. xxxix. lv.) implies that Archelaus was not the author. The Acts relate that Manes, having escaped from his imprisonment in Persia, sent a disciple, one Turbo, to Carchar with a letter addressed to a Christian nobleman there, named Marcellus. The letter is brief and obscure, but Turbo, on being questioned, gives an important summary of his master's doctrines, which is one of the extracts preserved by Epiphanius. Manes soon afterwards himself arrives, and a disputation takes place between him and Archelaus before four heathen arbiters. Manes professes to be the promised Paraclete, and the discussion chiefly turns upon the doctrine of the two principles, the claim to be the Paraclete, and the authority of the Mosaic law and the Old Testament. Manes, on his defeat, retires to a village called Diodoris, where he endeavours to win over the presbyter Diodorus (or Trypho, as Epiphanius calls him), who is represented as a simple-minded man, little skilled in theological controversy. Archelaus, however, again appears on the scene, and a second time silences him, the main point in this second dispute being the Manichean form of Docetism. The next day, before a large assembly, Archelaus gives a sketch of the origin of Manes' doctrines, tracing them up to a Saracen named Scythianus and his disciple Terebinthus or Budas. This account seems to be the earliest form of the Western, as opposed to the Eastern, version of Manes' history. The Acts conclude with a short notice of Manes' subsequent cruel death in Persia. Beausobre (Histoire de Manich. b. i. chh. xii. xiii.) has thrown grave doubts on the genuineness of these Acts, and would ascribe them to a Greek writer of the 4th century; he especially lays stress on the silence of Eusebius, and the passage in cap. xxvi., where Archelaus is represented as objecting to Manes that he could not be the Paraclete, since he would thus falsify Christ's words, “qui enim dixerat se non multo post missurum esse Paracletum, invenitur post trecentos et eo amplius annos hunc misisse.” Their original compilation in Syriac is rendered doubtful by the fact that the first Oriental author who shews any acquaintance with these Acts is Severus, the bishop of Asmonina, in Egypt, who wrote about 978; and the copy which he quotes differs in many respects from that which we possess. (Routh, Reliquiae Sacrae, vol. v. pp. 3-206; Beausobre, Hist. de Manich. b. i.; Baur, Das Manichäische Religionsystem, pp. 5-9, 413, 459.) [E. B. C.]

ARCHELAUS, bishop of CAESAREA in Capadocia about the beginning of the 5th century, wrote two "Anathematisms" against the Messalians (Phot. Bibl. 52). Cave (Script. Eccl. i. p. 430) on good grounds places his date about A.D. 440. [L.]

ARCHON, Ruler, a term of frequent occurrence in Gnostic mythologies to denote various heavenly powers superior to angels. They give their name to the sect called ARCHONTICI. In the Valentinian system they are in a manner replaced by the Aeons. The N. T. several times mentions the "prince (ἄρχων) of the devils" (δαμονίων), or "of the (this) world," or "of the power of the air;" but never uses the word absolutely in any cognate sense. In Leviticus (LXX.)

Ἀρχων (once οἱ Ἀρχόντες, xx. 5) represents, or rather translates, Molech. The true biblical source of the usage however is Dan. x. 13, 20, 21 (six times Theodotion; once indistinctly LXX.), where the archon (אֲרִי, "prince" A. V.) is the patron angel of a nation, Persia, Greece, or Israel; a name (Michael) being given in the last case only. The phrase θεοὶ ἀρχόντες in Plato (Phaedr. 247 A) is of no account here. The classical theology of Greece knew only gods, daemons, and heroes. Even Philo never alludes to archons: in a passage (De Mon. i. 1, p. 213) cited by Hilgenfeld (Apost. Väter, 252 q. v.) ἄρχοντες is merely correlative to ὑπήκοοι. But the Book of Henoch (vi. 3, 7; viii. 1) names 20 "archons of the" 200 "watcher" angels who sinned with the "daughters of men," as appears from one of the Greek fragments. The title is not indeed used absolutely (τ. ἀρχόντων αὐτῶν, Σεμιαζῆς ὁ ἀρχὼν αὐτῶν, bis: cf. ὁ πρῶταρχος αὐτῶν Σ.), except perhaps once (πρῶτος Ἀδαμὴ ὁ δεκάτος τῶν ἀρχόντων), where the Ethiopic has no corresponding words: but it has evidently almost become a true name, and may account for St. Jude's peculiar use of ἀρχή (v. 6). Christians soon followed the Jewish precedent. In the 2nd century the term appears in several writers alien to Gnosticism. The Epistle to Diognetus (7) speaks of God sending to men "a minister or angel or archon," &c. Justin (Dial. 36) understands the command in Ps. xxiv. 7, 9 (Ἀρατε πύλας, οἱ ἀρχόντες ὑμῶν LXX.) to open the heavenly gates as addressed to "the archons appointed by God in the heavens." The first spurious set of Ignatian epistles enumerates "the heavenly beings and the glory of the angels and the archons visible and invisible" (Ad Smyrn. 6), and again "the heavenly beings and the angelic collocations and the archontic constitutions" (i. e. order of provinces and of functions), "things both visible and invisible" (Ad Trall. 5); the meaning being lost by the time of the interpolator, who in one case drops the word out, and in the other gives it a political sense. The Clementine Homilies adopt and extend (xi. 10, ἐν ἄδῃ . . . ὁ ἐκεῖ καθεστὼς ἀρχων) the N. T. usage; and further call by the two good and evil ("right and left") "powers," which control the destiny of each man, "rulers" (archons, vii. 3), though more commonly "leaders" (ἡγεμόνες). Presently the syncreticism of the later Greek philosophy found room for archons. They are inserted by the author of the book De Mysteriis (ii. 3-9), and even it would seem by his questioner Porphyry, below gods, daemons, angels, and archangels, and above heroes (omitted by Porphyry) and departed "souls," in the scale of invisible beings whose presence may become manifest. It may be only an accidental coincidence that about the end of the 2nd century "Archon" was one of the names given by the Platonist Harpocration to the "Second God" of Numenius (Procl. in Tim. 93 c, cited by Zeller, Philos. d. Griech. v. 200). In any case the new term struck no deep root in either Christian or heathen soil. Probably "archangel" was found sufficient for every need. Evou Origen (C. Cels. vi. 30 f.) has to introduce the archons of the early Ophites with the explanatory phrase "ruling daemons." The Manicheans, on the other hand, readily adopted the Gnostic usage; but their archons are invariably evil beings (cf. Flügel, Mani seine Lehre, u. s. v. 242 f.). [H.]

ARCHONTICI. Under this name Epiphanius (Haer. xl. 291-299; cf. 389 A) describes a sect of the 4th century, evidently a branch of the old Ophites. The name comes from the ARCHONS (292 CD), whom they, in common with various Gnostic bodies, supposed to rule over the several "heavens:" who gave it does not appear. The Archontici were in the first instance confined to the "province" (eparchy) of Palestine, whence the doctrine was carried into the Greater and the Lesser Armenia. The story told by Epiphanius is as follows. One Peter of Capharbaricha, a village to the south of Jerusalem, attached himself in his youth to various heresies. He was accused before the bishop Aetius of belonging to the sect called "Gnostici," and deprived of his office as presbyter. Being driven from home by Aetius, he took refuge at Cochabe in Bashan, where the remains of early Judaizing sects still lingered. Later in life he returned home, but carefully concealed his opinions. Some words however which he incautiously dropped in the ears of neighbours were reported to Epiphanius himself, who excommunicated him. He took refuge in a cave, where he lived the life of an anchorite, "distributing his goods to the poor, and giving alms daily." He gathered many followers about him, urging them (it was said, probably with truth) to a like renunciation (compare the name Αποτακτικῶν adopted by the APOSTOLICI); and the veneration excited by his age and appearance procured for him the title of "Father."

Among his disciples was one Euctactus, of Satala in the Lesser Armenia, who after a sojourn in Palestine on his way from Egypt returned about 361 to his native land, where he soon died. Before his death however he had propagated Archontic doctrine with great success, especially among rich and eminent persons, including the wife of a Roman senator.

The Archontici used various apocryphal books, the chief being one called Symphonia (apparently there was a greater and a lesser Symphonia, but the passage is corrupt). Among the rest were the ALLOGENES, and the Ascension of Isaiah (cf.

Franc. Cod. Ps. V. T. i. 1086 ff.) For the doctrines of the sect see OPHITES.

All later authorities are dependent on Epiphanius, who followed the Symphonia and probably oral information. [H.]

ARCULF, a Gallican bishop, distinguished for intelligence and accuracy among the travellers of the middle ages. Adamnan, abbot of Hy, to whom we owe our knowledge of him, does not record his see, and it has been thought (Hist. Lit. de la France) that he perhaps received episcopal ordination for the service of some monastery. About 690, in company with an old monk named Peter, a Burgundian, who acted as his guide and interpreter, he undertook an expedition to the Holy Places for the purposes of devotion. On his return, embarking at Rome for the shores of France, he was driven by contrary winds on the western coast of Britain; a strange miscarriage, unless we are to suppose that the vessel was bound for one of the western ports of France. After some adventures and hardships, he was received as a most welcome guest by Adamnan, who proceeded to commit to writing such fresh points of information as he could gather after frequent conversation with Arculf, omitting only the topics which were contained in extant treatises on the same subject. This compilation, which Dr. Reeves (preface to Life of St. Columba) considers to be "the better written and more flowing of the two principal works of St. Adamnan," was presented by its author to Aldfrid, king of Northumbria, in 698. It consists of three books, of which the first contains Arculf's description of Jerusalem. The topographical details are carefully and minutely described; and the measurements of the more important churches are given, with slight ground-plans copied, says Adamnan, from Arculf's wax tablets. Our traveller joined the zeal and observation of an antiquarian to the devotion of a pilgrim, and spent nine months* in the Holy City to good purpose. The second book gives his other travels in the Holy Land, including Bethany, Hebron, the Jordan, the Dead Sea, Damascus, Tyre, and Joppa, whence he sailed to Alexandria. He aims at giving a faithful description of what he saw without exaggeration. In his account of the Dead Sea, for instance, he says nothing of the traditional horrors of the place, but compares the salt which incrusts the shore with some rock-salt which he noticed in Sicily on his homeward voyage. The third book presents the wonders of Constantinople, where he stayed from Easter till the following Christmas.

Arculf's narrative, thus given to the world by Adamnan, soon became popular. Bede inserts some extracts from it in his Ecclesiastical History (bk. v. c. 15-17, iii. 225-233, ed. Giles), and founds upon it his own treatise, De Locis sanctis (iv. 402-443). It was first published, with prolegomena and notes, at Ingolstadt, in 1619, by Gretser, the Jesuit, not by Serasius, as Cave states. Mabillon's edition, in Act. SS. Ben. iv. 502-522, has a more accurate text.

ARDESIANES (Hipp. Haer. vi. 35), evidently an error for the "Bardesanēs" of vii. 31 and of other writers. [BARDESANES.] [H.]

ARETHAS, bishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia, and ANDREAS an earlier archbishop of the same see, are so intimately associated as commentators on the Book of Revelation, and so little known otherwise, that they may most fitly be noticed together. We have no direct information regarding either, beyond the bare fact of their common connection with the see of Caesarea. The dates at which they flourished can only be inferred approximately, and somewhat vaguely, from incidental notices of persons or of events in their writings. The question has been most fully discussed by Rettig (Die Zeugnisse des Andreas und Arethas . . . in the Theol. Studien und Kritiken for 1831, p. 734 sq.); and his conclusions, as to the period to which they may most probably be assigned, have been very generally accepted.

The only ancient authors who make mention of Andreas are his successor Arethas, whose own date is uncertain, and John patriarch of Antioch (about A.D. 1100), who in his Ecloge asceticæ has preserved some fragments from a treatise of Andreas entitled Θεραπευτική. A reference in the commentary of Andreas (on Rev. xvii. 6) to the persecutions of the orthodox at Constantinople "in the times of the Arians" as matter of history precludes the supposition that it was written much earlier than the middle of the 5th century; and the mention of Antipater, bishop of Bostra (who flourished about 460 A.D.) as μακάριος (on Rev. xxi. 1), which shows that he was no longer living, suggests a date considerably later in the century, or subsequent at least to 460. On the other hand, the absence of any reference to persons or events of the 6th or subsequent centuries in a work handling the fulfilment of prophecy seems a clear indication that it cannot have been written much later than the year 500.

Arethas has been identified by Oudin (De Scriptor. Eccles. ii. p. 426) and others with a presbyter of that name belonging to Caesarea in the 10th century, the author of a treatise on the translation of St. Euthymius, patriarch of Constantinople, who died in A.D. 911. But—apart from the circumstance that the commentator is called a bishop, not a presbyter—the majority of scholars have assigned to him a considerably earlier period. In a passage of his commentary on the Apocalypse (viii. 6) he appears to speak of himself as having been contemporary with Andreas (Ἀνδρέας ὁ τῆς κατ' ἐμὲ Καισαρείας τῆς Καππαδοκίας ἀξίως τὴν ἐφορείαν λαχὼν);* and it is not improbable that he may have been a disciple of Andreas and may have thereafter succeeded him in the see. Rettig has shewn by enumerating the succession of bishops in Caesarea that the last thirty or forty years of the 5th century may be assigned to Andreas and Arethas; and, just as in the case of Andreas, while certain historical allusions preclude the possibility of the work being written earlier, the absence of any reference to later events favours the belief that it was prepared towards the close of the 5th, or in the earlier part of the 6th, century.

* The words κατ' ἐμὲ, however, do not occur in Cramer's Codex B.

Dr. Otto, however (in his Corp. Apol. iii. prol. p. xi, and more recently in his Des Patriarchen Gennadios Confession. Nebst einem Excurs über Arethas' -Leitalter, Wien 1864), quotes a MS. which states that it was written by Baanes, νοταρίος of Arethas, archbishop of Caesarea in the year of the world 6422 (914 A.D.)—a statement which goes far to settle the question in favour of the later date.

The commentary of Andreas on the Apocalypse (entitled Ἑρμηνεία εἰς τὴν Ἀποκάλυψιν) seems to have been the earliest systematic exposition of the book in the Greek Church; for, although at times he quotes the interpretations of particular passages given by earlier Fathers—as he states in his Preface—he makes no reference to any previous formal exposition. Indeed, as Lücke points out in his Einführung in die Offenbarung Johannis, the repeated expression in the Preface of the timidity and hesitation with which Andreas set about the undertaking, and the contrast which he draws between the often trodden field of Old Testament prophecies dealing chiefly with matters already fulfilled and the mystical book which he now ventured to handle, appear to shew that he had almost no predecessor. The statement of R. Simon, Fabricius, Rosenmüller, and others, that the work belongs to the class of Catena, is not borne out either by its form or by the language of the Preface, which simply means that he made use of the materials which he found in the earlier writers whom he names, and occasionally quoted their expressions (παρ' ὧν ἡμεῖς πολλάς λαβόντες ἀφορμὰς . . . καθὼς ἐν τισὶ τόποις χρήσεις τούτων παρεθέμεθα). He wrote, in compliance with the urgent request of persons who had a greater opinion of his judgment than he had himself, “to unfold the meaning of the Apocalypse, and to make the suitable application of its predictions to the times that followed it” (ἀναπτύξει τὴν . . . Ἀποκάλυψιν, καὶ τοῖς μετὰ τὴν αὐτῆς ὀπτασίαν χρόνοις ἐφαρμόσαι τὰ προφητευθέντα). His method rests on the distinction of a threefold sense in Scripture—the literal or outward historical (τὸ γράμμα καὶ ἡ κατ' αἰσθησαν ἱστορία), the tropological or moral (ἡ τροπολογία ἐξ αἰσθητῶν ἐπὶ τὰ νοητὰ ὀδηγοῦσα τὸν ἀναγνώσκοντα), and the mystical or speculative (ἡ τῶν μελλόντων καὶ ὑψηλοτέρων ἀναγωγὴ καὶ θεωρία); the expositor of the Revelation is chiefly concerned with the latter. He divided the text into 24 λόγοι corresponding to the four-and-twenty elders, and 72 κεφάλαια according to the threefold distinction of body, soul, and spirit ($24 \times 3 = 72$). The exposition contains not a little that is of value, but it is full of the fanciful interpretations to which the method gave rise; and Lücke goes so far as to declare that what is good and correct in it is for the most part the result of accident rather than design. The paucity of MSS. of the Apocalypse renders the text which accompanies the commentary of great importance to criticism; and Bengel was of opinion that the work of Andreas, by directing fresh attention to the book, contributed in no small degree to its more frequent use and transcription. An interesting passage in the Preface, where the writer mentions Papias among the other Fathers whose testimony to the inspiration of the book rendered it superfluous for him to enlarge on that point, has given rise to much discussion.

The work of Arethas, again, professes to be a compilation. The title usually prefixed to it (Συλλογὴ ἐξηγήσεων ἐκ διαφόρων ἀγίων ἀνδρῶν εἰς τὴν . . . Ἀποκάλυψιν) is probably, as Rettig observes, more recent than the work itself; but the second title which it bears (Ἐκ τῶν Ἀνδρέα . . . εἰς τὴν Ἀποκάλυψιν πεποιημένων θεαρέστως σύνοψις σχολικὴ, παρατεθεισά ὑπὸ Ἀρέθα ἀναξίου ἐπισκόπου Καισαρείας) may be regarded as genuine, for the epithet ἀνάξιος was not likely to have been used by any other than Arethas himself. While the writer thus modestly describes his work as a text-book based on the labours of Andreas, it has in reality a wider range and an independent value. It is no mere reproduction of the work of his predecessor, although it incorporates a large portion of the contents of that work, occasionally abridging or modifying the language of Andreas, and often specifying with more precision the sources of his quotations. But it contains much derived from other sources, or contributed by Arethas himself. Like other Catena, it has apparently been subjected in the course of transmission to various modifications both of omission and of addition.

The commentary of Andreas was first printed in the form of an imperfect and inaccurate Latin version by Peltanus in 1574. The Greek text was first edited by Sylburg from a collation of three MSS. in 1596, along with a reprint of the Latin version. It has been several times reissued in connection with the works of Chrysostom. The work of Arethas was first issued, by way of supplement to the Catena of Oecumenius, at Verona in 1532. A Latin translation by Hentenius appeared at Paris in 1547. The Greek text of the Verona edition, accompanied by this translation, was reissued by Morel at the end of his edition of Oecumenius, Paris 1631, but without, as Richard Simon complains (Hist. Crit. iv. 468), any use of the materials afforded by the MSS. of the Bibliothèque Royale or correction of the errors of the translation. The Greek text of Arethas is presented in its fullest and best form by Cramer (in his Catena Graec. Patrum in N. T., Oxon. 1840); whose valuable additions, furnished chiefly by the Codex Baroccianus, exhibit the text in a shape so different from that previously printed as to make the latter appear in many passages a mere abridgment.

[W. P. D.]

ARIANISM, one of the most powerful and tenacious heresies in the history of the Church, so called from Arius (Ἀρειος), a presbyter of Alexandria, who first reduced the doctrine to a clear expression, and made it the subject of public agitation in Church and State. [ARIUS.] It involves the question of the divinity of Christ and his relation to the Father, and indirectly the whole dogma of the Trinity. It led to a series of violent controversies which, during the 4th century, shook the Roman empire, especially in the East, to its very base, but resulted in a priceless acquisition to the knowledge and symbolical statement of the doctrine of Christ's Divine nature. It was by no means a fruitless logomachy, revolving about a Greek iota (ὁμοούσιος, ὁμοιούσιος, ἕτεροούσιος), but enters into the very heart of the Christian religion. The Arian system was a refined form of paganism, and substituted a created demigod for the eternal uncreated Logos; it degraded Christianity to a merely relative value; it separated God and the world by an impassable gulf, and made a real reconciliation and atonement impossible; it represented the Erastian principle, and associated itself with the secular political power, without which it soon lost its vitality; its irresistible tendency is downward to Socinianism, Unitarianism, and Rationalism, until the untenable conception of a secondary God, who originated before the world out of nothing, gives way to the idea of Christ as a mere man. The cause of Christian civilization was bound up with the downfall of Arianism and the triumph of the Nicene doctrine of the Holy Trinity. (Compare the remarkable concessions of Baur and Bancroft on the import and bearing of the Arian controversy, in Schaff's Church History, iii. 641 and 644.)

1. THE SYSTEM OF ARIANISM.—The Father alone is God; He alone is unbegotten, eternal, wise, good, unchangeable. He is separated by an infinite chasm from man, and there is no real mediation between them. God cannot create the world directly, but only through an agent, the Logos, who is himself created for the purpose of creating the world. The Son of God is pre-existent before time and the world (πρὸ χρόνων καὶ αἰώνων), and before all creatures (πρωτόκοκος πάσης κτίσεως), a middle being between God and the world, the perfect image of the Father, the executor of His thoughts, yea even the creator of the world of matter, and of the spirit. In a secondary or metaphorical sense he may be called God, Logos, and Wisdom (θεός, λόγος, σοφία). But, on the other hand, Christ is himself a creature (κτίσμα, ποίημα), the first creature of God, through whom the Father called other creatures into existence; he is made, not of the essence of the Father (ἐκ τῆς οὐσίας), but out of nothing (ἐξ οὐκ ὄντων)—hence the Arians were also called Eucyontians, or of the will of the Father before all conceivable time, yet in time; he is therefore not eternal, and there was a time when he was not (ἦν ποτε ὅτε οὐκ ἦν, ἀρχὴν ἔχει, οὐκ ἦν πρὶν γεννηθῆναι, ἴτοι κτισθῆναι); neither is he unchangeable, but subject to the vicissitudes of a created being (τρεπτός φύσει ὡς τὰ κτίσματα). In the last point Arius changed, having first asserted the unchangeableness of the Son (ἀναλλοίωτος, ἀτρεπτος ὁ υἱός), unless we save his consistency by a distinction between moral and physical unchangeableness: the Son, it may be said, is changeable in his nature (φύσει), but remains morally good (καλός) by an act of his will. With the limitation of Christ's duration is necessarily connected a limitation of his power, wisdom, and knowledge. It was expressly asserted by the Arians that the Son does not perfectly know the Father, and therefore cannot perfectly reveal him. He is essentially different from the Father (ἕτεροούσιος τῷ Πατρὶ)—in opposition to the orthodox formula ὁμοούσιος, and the semi-Arian ὁμοιοούσιος (hence also the name Hetero-ousiasts), and—as Aetius and Eunomius afterwards more strongly expressed it—unlike the Father (ἀνόμοιος κατ' οὐσίαν). [ANOMOEANS.] As to the humanity of Christ, Arius ascribed to him only a human body with an animal soul (ψυχὴ ἑλογος), not a rational soul (νοῦς, πνεῦμα); and on this point

he anticipated Apollinarius, who substituted the Divine Logos for the human reason, but from the opposite motive of saving the unity of the Divine personality of Christ. [APOLLINARIUS THE YOUNGER.]

The subsequent development of Arianism by Aetius [AETIUS] and Eunomius [EUNOMIUS], brought out no new features, except many inconsistencies and contradictions, and the negative, and downward tendency of Christological error. The controversy degenerated into a heartless and barren metaphysical war. The eighteen or more creeds, which Arianism and semi-Arianism produced between the first and the second Oecumenical Councils (325–381), are leaves without blossoms and branches without fruit.

The Arians supported their doctrine from those passages of the Bible which seem to place Christ in any way on a par with the creature (especially Prov. viii. 22–25; Acts ii. 36; Col. i. 15, where πρωτόκοκος must not be taken equivalent with πρωτόκτιστος or πρωτόπλαστος, but in the sense born, begotten of the essence of the Father before anything was made, i. e. from eternity), or which ascribe to the incarnate Christ (not the pre-existent Logos), in his state of humiliation, lack of knowledge, growth in knowledge, weariness, sorrow, and other changing affections and states of mind (Luke ii. 52; Mark xiii. 32; Heb. v. 8, 9; John xii. 27, 28; Matt. xxvi. 39), or which teach some kind of subordination of the Son to the Father (especially John xiv. 28, “the Father is greater than I,” which refers to the state of humiliation of the λόγος ἑνσαρκος, and implies his divinity, for in the mouth of a mere man, or even a created demi-god, such an assertion would be unmeaning and absurd). The dogmatic and philosophical arguments were chiefly negative and rationalistic, amounting to this:—The Nicene view of the essential deity, or the ὁμο-ουσία of Christ with the Father, is unreasonable, inconsistent with monotheism, with the dignity and absoluteness of the Father, and of necessity leads to Sabellianism or the Gnostic dreams of emanation.

On the other hand, Arianism was refuted by an array of Scripture passages, which teach directly or indirectly the divinity of Christ, and his equality with the Father. Its conception of a created Creator, who existed before the world, and yet himself began to exist, was shown to be self-contradictory and untenable. There can be no middle being between Creator and creature; no time before the world, as time is itself part of the world, or the form under which it exists successively; nor can the unchangeableness of the Father, on which Arius laid great stress, be maintained, except on the ground of the eternity of his Fatherhood, which, of course, implies the eternity of the Sonship. Athanasius charges Arianism with dualism and even polytheism, and with destroying the whole doctrine of salvation. For if the Son is a creature, man still remains separated, as before, from God; no creature can redeem other creatures, and unite them with God. If Christ is not divine, much less can we be partakers of the divine nature, and in any real sense children of God.

The philosophical relations of Arianism have been differently stated. Baur, Newman (The Arians, p. 17), and others, put it in connexion with Aristotle, and Athanasianism with Plato; Petavius, Ritter, and Voigt, on the contrary, derive the Arian idea of God from Platonism and neo-Platonism. The empirical, rational, logical tendency of Arianism is certainly more Aristotelian than Platonic, and so far Baur and Newman are right; but all depends on making either revelation and faith, or philosophy and reason, the starting-point and ruling power of theology. With faith for our guide, the Aristotelian logic and dialectics may be made a handmaid of orthodoxy, as they were in fact during the middle ages; without faith and the written Word, Platonism, with all its lofty ideal tendency, may lead into all kinds of Gnostic and mystic errors. Arianism started from human reason, and was predominantly intellectual or rationalistic in spirit and tendency; while the Nicene theology proceeded from the Scripture and the faith of the Church.

II. HISTORY OF ARIANISM.—The roots of the Arian conflict lie deep in the differences of the ante-Nicene doctrine of the Logos, especially in the contradictory elements of Origen's Christology, which was not without some good reason claimed by both parties. The great Origen, on the one hand, attributed to Christ eternity and other divine attributes, which lead, with logical necessity, to the Nicene doctrine of the identity of substance (ὁμοουσία); but, on the other hand, in his zeal for the personal distinctions in the Godhead, he taught with equal emphasis a separate essence and the subordination of the Son to the Father, calling him a secondary God, δεύτερος θεός, or θεός without the article, while the Father is ὁ θεός, or αὐτόθεός, Deus per se. He taught the eternal generation of the Son from the will of the Father, but represented it as the communication of a secondary divine substance. Athanasius laid stress on the first, Arius on the second element in the Christology of Origen.

1. History of Arianism from 318 to the Council of Nicaea, 325.—The controversy broke out at Alexandria about A.D. 318. According to the account of Socrates (I. c. 5), Alexander gave the first impulse by insisting, in a clerical meeting, on the eternity of the Son, whereupon Arius openly opposed and charged him with Sabellianism. He reasoned thus: if the Father begot the Son, he must be older than the Son, and there was a time when the Son was not; from this it further follows, that the Son has his substance (ὕπoστασις) from nothing. The account of Sozomenus and Epiphanius differs in this, that they date the conflict from discussions among the presbyters and laymen, and Sozomenus represents Alexander as at first wavering between the two opinions. In 321 Alexander convened a council of about a hundred Egyptian and Libyan bishops at Alexandria, which excommunicated Arius and his followers for their open denial of the true deity of Christ. He also issued a number of circular letters against the heresy. But Arius spread his views all the more zealously in an entertaining half-poetic work, Thalia, the Banquet, of which only fragments remain in Athanasius. He found powerful friends in Eusebius of Nicomedia, Eusebius of Caesarea, and other bishops, who either shared his view, or at least considered it innocent. In a short time the whole Eastern Church was turned into a metaphysical battlefield. Constantine was at first inclined to look upon the controversy as a mere logomachy, and never understood its deeper import. But for political considerations, and in the interest of the unity and peace of the empire, he called, probably at the suggestion of some bishops ("ex sacerdotum sententia," as Rufinus says), the first Oecumenical Synod of the Church, to settle the Arian controversy, together with the question of the time of celebrating Easter, and the Meletian schism in Egypt.

2. The Council of Nicaea, 325. (Comp. ATHANASIUS.)—The first Oecumenical Council, held at Nicaea, Bithynia (now a miserable Turkish village, Is-nik), consisting of 318 bishops (about one-sixth of all the bishops of the Graeco-Roman Empire) resulted in the formal condemnation of Arius, and the adoption of the Nicene Creed so called [CREEDS], which affirms in unequivocal terms the doctrine of the eternal deity of Christ in these words: "(We believe) in one Lord Jesus Christ, the only Son of God, begotten of the Father [the only begotten, i. e. of the essence of the Father, ἐκ τῆς οὐσίας τοῦ Πατρὸς, God of God], Light of Light, very God of very God (Θεὸν ἀληθινὸν ἐκ Θεοῦ ἀληθινοῦ), begotten, not made, being of one substance with the Father (γεννηθέντα, οὐ ποιηθέντα, ὁμοούσιον τῷ Πατρί); by whom all things were made [in heaven and on earth]; who for us men, and for our salvation, came down and was incarnate, and was made man; he suffered, and the third day he rose again, ascended into heaven; from thence he cometh to judge the quick and the dead."*) To the Creed is added the following anathema:—"And those who say: there was a time when he (the Son) was not; and: he was made out of nothing, or out of another substance or thing, or the Son of God is created, or changeable, or alterable;—they are condemned by the holy, catholic, and apostolic Church."

The Creed was signed by nearly all the bishops, Hosius at the head, even by Eusebius of Caesarea, the historian, who, before and afterwards, occupied a middle position between Athanasius and Arius. This is the first instance of such signing of a doctrinal symbol. Eusebius of Nicomedia and Theognis of Nicaea signed the creed, but not the condemnatory formula appended; and for this they were deposed and banished for a short time. Only two Egyptian bishops, Theonas and Secundus, persistently refused to sign, and were banished, with Arius, to Illyria. This is the first example of the civil punishment of heresy, which, before the union of church and state, had been visited only with ecclesiastical censure and excommunication, and it opened the long era of persecutions for all departures from the Catholic faith. The books of Arius were burnt, and his followers branded as enemies of Christianity. The Nicene Creed has outlived all the subsequent storms, and in the improved form given to it at Constantinople in 381, it remains to this day the most generally received creed of Christendom, and—if we omit the later Latin insertion filioque—a bond of union between the Greek, the Roman, and the orthodox Protestant Churches.

Council of Constantinople, 381.—After the Nicene Council an Arian and semi-Arian reaction took place, and acquired for a time the ascendancy in the Roman empire. Arianism now entered the stage of its political power. This was a period of the greatest excitement in church and state: council was held against council; creed was set up against creed; anathema was hurled against anathema. "The highways," says the impartial heathen historian Ammianus Marcellinus, "were covered with galloping bishops." In intolerance and violence the Arians even exceeded the orthodox. The interference of emperors and their court only poured oil on the flame, and heightened the bitterness of contest by adding confiscation and exile to the spiritual punishment of synodical excommunication. The unflinching leader of the orthodox party was the pure and sublime character of Athanasius, who had figured at the Council of Nicea as a youthful archdeacon, in company with Bishop Alexander of Alexandria, and after his death became his successor (328), but was again and again deposed by imperial despotism, and spent twenty years in exile. He was a theological character who sacrificed everything to his conviction, and had the courage to face the empire in arms against him (Athanasius contra mundum). He was a man of one idea and one passion—the true divinity of Christ—which he rightly considered as the corner-stone of the Christian system, and defended with superior intellect against all the attacks of the Arians and semi-Arians. [See ATHANASIUS, and Gibbon's remarkably favourable estimate of him.] The politico-ecclesiastical leader of the Arian party was Eusebius of Nicomedia, afterwards bishop of Constantinople, who baptized Constantine on his death-bed. Shortly before his death, Constantine was turned favourably to Arius; and on the ground of an artfully-constructed and evasive confession, accompanied by a solemn oath, he recalled him from exile, and ordered him to be solemnly restored to the communion of the Catholic Church at Constantinople. But on the day preceding his intended restoration the heretic died suddenly (336), in a manner that seemed to justify to the intolerant spirit of the age the inference of a direct judgment of God [ARITS]. In the year following, Constantine himself died, and his son Constantine II. recalled Athanasius from his first exile, into which his father had sent him. But in the East, where Constantius, the second son of Constantine the Great, ruled, Arianism prevailed, and was maintained with fanatical zeal by the court, and by Eusebius of Nicomedia, now transferred to Constantinople (since 338). Athanasius was deposed a second time, and took refuge with Julius of Rome (340), who, with the great body of the Western Church, sided with the Nicene Creed, and gloried in Athanasius as a martyr of the Christian truth.^b

It is unnecessary to follow the varying fortunes of the two parties, and the history of Councils which neutralized one another, without materially advancing the points in dispute. The most important are the Synod of Antioch, A.D. 341, which set forth an orthodox creed, but deposed Athanasius; the orthodox Council of Sardica, A.D. 343 (not 347, as formerly supposed, see Hefele, Conciliengeschichte, i. 515 sqq.); and the Arian counter-synod of Philippopolis; the Councils of Sirmium, 351, Arles, 353, Milan, 355; the second Council at Sirmium, 357; the third, 358; at Antioch, 358; at Ancyra, 358; at Constantinople, 360. Aided by Constantius, Arianism, under the modified form represented by the term homoi-ousion (similar in essence, as distinct from the Nicene homo-ousion and the strictly Arian hetero-ousion), gained the power in the empire; and even the papal chair in Rome was for a while desecrated by heresy during the Arian interregnum of Felix II. But the death of Constantius in 361, the indifference of his successor, Julian the Apostate, to all theological disputes, the toleration of Jovian (d. 364), and especially the internal dissensions of the Arians, prepared the way for a new triumph of orthodoxy. The Eusebians or semi-Arians taught that the Son was similar in substance (ὁμοιούσιος) to the Father, while the Aëtians (from Aëtius, a deacon of Antioch), and the Eunomians (from Eunomius, Bishop of Cyzicus in Mysia) taught that he was of a different substance (ἕτεροούσιος) and unlike (ἀνόμοιος) to the Father (hence the names Hetero-ousiasts and Anomoeans). A number of synods and creeds of compromise were devoted to the healing of these dissensions, but without permanent effect. On the other hand, the defenders of the Nicene Creed, the great Athanasius, and after his death (373) the three Cappadocian bishops, Basil the Great, Gregory of Nazianzum, and Gregory of Nyssa, triumphantly vindicated the Catholic doctrine against all the arguments of the opposition. When Gregory of Nazianzum was called to Constantinople in 379, there was but one small congregation in the city which had not become Arian; but his able and eloquent sermons on the deity of Christ, which won him the title of the Theologian, contributed powerfully to the resurrection of the Catholic faith, and in two years afterwards he presided over the second Oecumenical Council. The rising influence of monasticism, especially in Egypt, was bound up with the cause of Athanasius, who had glorified the life of St. Antony, the patriarch of monks; and the more conservative portion of the semi-Arians gradually approached the orthodox in spite of the persecutions of the violent Arian emperor Valens.

4. The final triumph of the Nicene orthodox under Theodosius the Great, 381.—This emperor was a Spaniard by birth, and reared in the Nicene faith. During his long and powerful reign (379–395) he completed externally the spiritual and intellectual victory of orthodoxy already achieved. After conquering the Goths, he convened the second Oecumenical Council at Constantinople 381, which, after the exclusion of thirty-six semi-Arian Macedonians or Pneumatomachians, consisted of only one hundred and fifty bishops, and was presided over successively by Meletius, Gregory of Nazianzum, and Nectarius of Constantinople. The Council condemned the Pneumatomachian heresy, which denied the divinity of the Holy Spirit, readopted, with some important additions, the Nicene Creed, and completed the orthodox dogma of the Holy Trinity. [CREED, NICENE.]

^b The most distinguished Western champions of orthodoxy during the fourth century are Hilary of Poitiers, and somewhat later Ambrose of Milan.

The Emperor gave legal effect to the doctrinal decisions and disciplinary canons, and in July 381 he enacted a law that all church property should be given up to those who believed in the equal divinity of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost. Arianism, after forty years' reign, was forcibly driven out of all the churches of Constantinople, and generally forbidden throughout the empire. We meet the last traces of it in Constantinople under the emperor Anastasius, 491-518.

After Theodosius, Arianism ceased to exist as an organized moving force in theology and church history, but it reappeared from time to time as an isolated theological opinion, especially in England. (Emlyn, Whiston, Whitby, Samuel Clarke, Lardner, and many who are ranked among Socinians and Unitarians, held Arian sentiments; but Milton and Isaac Newton, though approaching the Arian view on the relation of the Son to the Father, differ widely from Arianism in spirit and aim.)

5. Arianism among the Barbarians.—The church legislation of Theodosius was confined, of course, to the limits of the Roman empire. Beyond it, among the barbarians of the West, especially in Gaul and Spain, who had received Christianity in the form of Arianism during the reign of the emperor Valens, it maintained itself for two centuries longer, though more as a matter of accident than of choice and conviction. The Ostrogoths remained Arians till 553; the Visigoths till the Synod of Toledo in 589; the Suevi in Spain till 560; the Vandals, who conquered North Africa in 429, and furiously persecuted the Catholics till 530, when they were expelled by Belisarius; the Burgundians till their incorporation in the Frank empire in 534; the Longobards in Italy till the middle of the 7th century. Alaric, the first conqueror of Rome, Genseric, the conqueror of North Africa, Theodoric the Great, king of Italy and hero of the Niebelungenlied, were Arians, and the first Teutonic translation of the Scriptures, of which important fragments remain, came from the Arian missionary Ulfilas (cf. Revillout, De l'Arianisme des Peuples Germaniques: Paris, 1850).

III. LITERATURE.—(a). The sources of the early history of Arianism are: (aa) on the orthodox side, the church histories of Rufinus, Socrates, Sozomenus, and Theodoret, and most of the Fathers of the 4th century, especially the dogmatic and polemic works of Athanasius (Orationes contra Arianos, De Decretis Synodi Nicaenae, De Sententia Dionysii, Apologia c. Arianos, Apologia de Fuga sua, Historia Arianorum, &c., all in tom. i. pars i. and ii. of the Bened. ed. of Athan. Opera); Basil (Adv. Eunomium), Gregory of Nazianzum (Orationes Theologicae), Gregory of Nyssa (Contra Eunom.), Epiphanius (Ancoratus), Hilary (De Trinitate), Ambrose (De Fide), Augustine (De Trinitate, and Contra Maximinum Arianum).—(bb). On the Arian side, fragments of the $\Theta\acute{\alpha}\lambda\epsilon\iota\alpha$, and two Epistles of Arius, one addressed to Eusebius of Nicomedia, and one to Alexander of Alexandria, preserved in Athanasius, Epiphanius, Socrates, and Theodoret; the fragments of the church history of Philostorgius, 350-425; Fragmenta Arianorum, in Angelo Mai's Scriptorum Veterum Nova Collectio, Rom. 1828, vol. iii.—(b). The later literature on Arianism is very extensive.

The respective sections in Petavius' De Theologicis Dogmatibus and Tillemont's Mémoires, Bull's Defensio Fidei Nicaenae, and Waterland's very able defence of the Nicene dogma against the revived Arianism of Samuel Clarke and Whitby, are still very valuable for careful and accurate learning. ARIEL, in the Gnostic book Pistis Sophia (255 f., 380, 383 f.), presides over the fiery punishments of hell. The name (אֲרִיאֵל) means "hearth" (burning) "of God." It appears to have been sometimes applied to the fire-god Moloch (Movers, Phoen. i. 334 f.). In a Peratic (Ophite) book quoted by Hippolytus (Haer. v. 14) the "ruler of the winds" is called Ariel. [H.]

ARINTHAEUS, a general under Valens, with whom St. Basil corresponds, and from whom he seeks protection for a friend in difficulty (Ep. 179). On his death Basil writes a letter of consolation to his widow, in which he dwells on his remarkable endowments, his striking personal beauty and strength, as well as his lofty character and renown. Like many others in that age, Arinthaeus, though a devout Christian and a protector of the Church, deferred his baptism till at the point of death (Ep. 269). He was consul in the year 372, and must have died before Basil (A.D. 379). If the story told by Theodoret (H. E. iv. 30) be true, that he was present and seconded the rebuke administered to Valens by the general Trajan in 378 for his persecution of the Catholics, his death cannot have preceded his friend's by many months. For his military achievements see Tillemont, Empereurs, v. 100. [L.]

tional information (Euseb. H. E. iii. 39), and described by him as a personal follower of our Lord. Beyond the notice in the passage here referred to, there is no trustworthy information about him. The Roman martyrology (p. 102, Ven. 1630) apparently referring to the description just quoted, states on the authority of Papias that he was one of the seventy-two disciples of Christ. It commemorates his martyrdom at Salamis in Cyprus on the 22nd of February, the same day on which the martyrdom of Papias himself at Pergamus is also commemorated. Cotelier conjectures that he may be identical with the Aristo who is given as the first bishop of Smyrna (Apost. Const. vii. 45). [G. S.]

ARISTIDES, an early Christian writer, who, like his contemporary Quadratus, presented to the emperor Hadrian about A.D. 133 an Apology for the Christians, now lost. Such is the account of Eusebius, who states (Hist. Eccles. iv. c. 3, p. 143) that the work was extant, and in the hands of many, in his day. Whether he had himself read it does not appear. Jerome further states that Aristides was an Athenian philosopher of great eloquence, a disciple of Christ, yet retaining his old garb; and that the Apology, containing the principles of the faith, was still known amongst the learned, and afforded proof of his abilities (Lib. de Viris Illust. c. 20, p. 86); and again (Epist. 83, ad Magnum) that his book was interwoven with opinions of philosophers, and that he was subsequently imitated by Justin himself, also a philosopher. Both in Syncellus and in Jerome's version of the Chronicon of Eusebius, the character of an Athenian philosopher is assigned to Aristides. Usuardus in his Martyrology, for Oct. 3 (St. Dionysius the Areopagite), cites our author "a man admirable for faith and wisdom" as giving an account of the sufferings and martyrdom of St. Dionysius, in his book on the Christian religion; which, we are told by Ado, of Vienna (who wrote in the 9th cent.), in his Martyrology (p. 169, ed. Rosweydi) on the authority of such as were skilled in Greek matters (peritiores Graecorum) that the work was treasured by the Athenians of his day, as a noble monument of antiquity. Lastly, the Martyrologium Romanum (August 31) adds to Jerome's account, that Aristides argued with great clearness, in the presence of the Emperor himself, that Jesus Christ alone was God. For "solus Deus" Notker's Martyrology has "verus Deus;" but the former appears to be correct; meaning of course, that Jesus was God to the exclusion of the Gentile deities. The above notices supply all we know of Aristides. There is no improbability in the philosophical character assigned to him; but the story of his oration before Hadrian must in all likelihood be set down as an invention. An old French traveller, De la Guilletière, in a work Athènes anciennes et nouvelles (Paris 1672, p. 146), relates that a MS. of the Apology of Aristides was preserved in the monastery of Mount Pentelieus, six miles from Athens; but Spon (Itinerary) sought it there in vain. See Routh's Reliquiae Sacrae, i. 74, 79. [S. M.]

ARISTO, mentioned by Lucianus (Cyp. Ep. 22), last of the group of martyrs imprisoned with him A.D. 250 at Carthage, and already dead of hunger, thirst, heat, and crowding into two cells. They are Fortunio, Fortuna, Victorinus, Victor, Herenius, Credula, Herena, Donatus, Firmus, Venustus, Fructus, Julia, Martial, Aristo. Besides these, Mappalicius had died under torture, Bassus in pejerario (?) (v. l. Perario, pegrario: Rig. conj. petrario does not suit the circumstances) and Paulus (the most eminent, and the one in whose name the mischievous libelli were first executed) in consequence of his torture.

This group of martyrs seems to be the same commemorated in Africa on 17th April, the italicized names corresponding; viz. SS. MM. Fortunati (?), Marciiani, Mappalici, Baruci (= Bassi? Jewish), Quineti, Victorici, Donati, Januarii, Maecori, Galli, Theodorae, Juliani Presb. Meeconi, Migini, Diomedis, Philippiani, Fortunianis, Credulae, Firmi, Venti, Fructi, Martialis, Aristonis. Except for the omissions, the roll looks as if made up from Cyp. Ep. xxiii. (cf. CELERINUS). [E. W. B.]

ARISTOBULUS, Martyr, made out of the (probably Jewish) Aristobulus of Rom. xvi. 10, and alleged to have been sent to preach in Britain by St. Paul (Pseudo-Doroth. Synops., Menolog. March 15), and to have been there martyred (ib.); turned into Arwystli, "a man of Italy," and connected with Bran and Caractacus, by Welsh Triads; a brother of St. Barnabas according to the Menology. [A. W. H.]

ARISTO PELLAÆUS, the supposed author of a lost dialogue between Papisus and Jason, is mentioned by three ancient authors, the first of whom is Eusebius; he writes, "The author of their (the Jews') madness (i.e. Barchochebas) having suffered his just punishment, the whole nation from that time has been absolutely forbidden even to tread upon the land around Jerusalem; Adrian having given command by the issuing of an edict, and by injunctions, that they might not so much as look upon their native soil from a distance; Aristo of Pella is the relater" (Hist. Eccles. iv. c. 6, pp. 145, 146). The next is Moses Chorenensis, who, in a history of Armenia edited by two sons of W. Whiston (book ii. c. 57), narrating the death of Artases, king of Armenia, soon after the insurrection of Barchochebas, represents the account as taken from Aristo Pellaæus. Since, however, there is no mention elsewhere of any work on Oriental history, and Moses elsewhere ascribes to Firmilian, the Cappadocian bishop, a history of some Oriental kings, containing an account of an event known to have happened forty years after Firmilian's death, Routh concludes (Rel. Sacr. i. 103) that he is not more to be trusted in the present instance, and that, in fact, he knew nothing more of Aristo than the notice in Eusebius. The third writer who mentions Aristo is Maximus, in his notes on the work 1c Mystica Theol. ascribed to Dionysius the Areopagite (c. i. p. 17 ed. Corderii), in these words, "I have also read the expression 'seven heavens' in the dialogue of Papisus and Jason, composed by Aristo of Pella, which Clemens of Alexandria in the 6th book of his Hypotyposes says was written by St. Luke." This testimony, the only one connecting the name of Aristo with the dialogue, would be by far the most important of the three, save that some doubt seems thrown on its trustworthiness by the strange assertion it contains, that Clement attributed the work to St. Luke; an opinion which Grabius thinks so unlikely, that he supposes either a false reading to have crept in, or Maximus to have mistaken the meaning of Clemens. Hence Donaldson (Hist. of Christian Literature) throws doubt on the authorship of the Dialogue, pointing out that in the preface (still remaining) to Celsus' lost translation of it nothing whatever is said of the writer. It should, however, be remembered, that Maximus is far less likely to be in error when simply giving the name of an author, than when repeating another's words. In the Chronicon Paschale or Alexandrinum (p. 477, ed. Dindorf.) under the year 134 A.D., we read, "In this year Apelles and Aristo, whom (ὧν) Eusebius, the son of Pamphilus, mentions in his ecclesiastical history, presents (ἐπιδίδωσιν) apologies [so Donaldson, op. cit.; but better, "the draught of an apology," ἀπολογίας σύνταξιν] concerning our religion, to the emperor Adrian." Now there is no mention of Apelles in Eusebius; and the bad grammar of the passage suggests a corrupt reading. Ducange would omit the whole; but Fabricius (de Verit. Christ. Rel., p. 153) for Ἀπελλῆς καὶ Ἀρίστων ὧν would read ὁ Πελλαῖος Ἀρίστων ὄν. We should thus get another distinct reference to our author; but as it depends upon an emendation (though an ingenious one), it is not of very great value. It thus appears that our knowledge of Aristo is extremely small; but in default of more information we may accept the account of Maximus, and suppose him the author of the Dialogue of Papius and Jason.

Of that work we have the following further notices: "I remember to have found," says St. Jerome (lib. ii. Comm. ad Galat. c. iii. comm. 13) "in the dispute of Jason and Papius, which is written in the Greek language, this expression, Λοιδορία Θεοῦ ὁ κρεμνόμενος, i. e., He that is hanged is the curse of God" (iv. 259, ed. Benedictin.). And again (Question. Hebraic. in Genesim, Op. ii. 507) Jerome writes, "In the beginning God made the heaven and the earth. Most persons suppose that, as is written in the Dispute of Jason and Papius, and as Tertullian argues in his book against Praxeas, as Hilary, too, affirms in his exposition of one of the Psalms, in the Hebrew the passage stands thus: 'In the Son God made the heaven and the earth.' That this is a mistake, the fact of the matter proves."

Origen (contra Celsum, lib. iv. c. 52, p. 544 ed. Delaruan., p. 199 ed. Spencer) says, of Celsus, "After this, from all works that contain allegories and relations, respectable in style and phraseology, he picks out the inferior parts, that might increase the grace of faith in the simple multitude but could not move the more intelligent, and then observes, 'of this sort is a disputation between one Papius and Jason, which I have met with, worthy not so much of laughter as of pity and indignation.' It is no part of my plan to refute things of this sort; any one can see what they are, especially if he has patience enough to listen to the books," &c. "Yet I would wish," continues Origen, "that any one who has heard the strong language of Celsus, and his assertion that the work in question, the disputation of Jason and Papius concerning Christ, deserves not laughter but indignation, would take the work into his hands, and have patience enough to listen to its contents, that he might at once condemn Celsus, finding nothing in the book worthy of indignation; nor will one who reads impartially find the book move him to laughter. In it is described a Christian arguing with a Jew from the Jewish Scriptures, and showing that the prophecies concerning the Christ are applicable to Jesus; the other replying to the argument vigorously and in a way suitable to the character of a Jew."

In the words first quoted by Jerome, Λοιδορία Θεοῦ ὁ κρεμνόμενος, we have apparently, urged by Papius, the usual Jewish objection, that the Messiah would not have suffered the accursed death upon the tree. The next passage is important, since in the interpretation of the words "in the beginning" as equivalent to "in the Son," we find an exact parallel to Theophilus' application of the name ἀρχή, beginning, or origin, to the Word (Ad Autol. i. c. 3, 71 A); and the identical explanation is given (Ad Autol. ii. c. 10, p. 89 A), where λόγος and ἀρχή are assumed to be equivalent. Tertullian does not render the opening words of Genesis as Jerome represents, and Hilary only gives "in the Son" as one of three translations: we may therefore fairly suppose that we have, in the similar view of the passage ascribed to the author of our Dialogues, not a mistranslation, but a mystical interpretation of the Hebrew. From this example, taken along with the expressions of Origen and those of Celsus which he quotes, it seems that the method of Aristo was largely mystical and allegoric. What is implied by the mention of the seven heavens (in Maximus) we do not know. The general course of the Dialogue is thus described in the preface of the translator Celsus: "That noble, memorable, and glorious result of the discussion between Jason, a Hebrew Christian, and Papius, an Alexandrian Jew, comes into my mind; how the obstinate hardness of the Jewish heart was softened by Hebrew admonition and gentle chiding; and the teaching of Jason, on the giving of the Holy Ghost, was victorious in the heart of Papius. Papius, thereby brought to a knowledge of the truth, and fashioned to the fear of the Lord through the mercy of the Lord Himself, both believed in Jesus Christ the Son of God, and entreated Jason that he might receive the sign (of baptism). This is proved by the written account of their contest, which is described in the Greek language; they there encounter each other, Papius opposing the truth, Jason asserting and vindicating the commission [dispositionem] and fulness of Christ." We cannot determine the date of this work, except that it must have been written before the time of Celsus, i. e. before the middle of the 2nd century; and, if Aristo be its author, we see from the passage referred to by Eusebius, that he lived after the destruction of Jerusalem. Pella was then the seat of the bishop of Jerusalem, having been the refuge of the Jewish Christians. If Maximus' information be correct, Clement's belief that St. Luke was the writer of the Dialogue shews at least that it must have been commonly assigned to a very early date.

ARISTOCRITUS, a Manichean author, of whom nothing is known except that he wrote a book entitled Theosophia. His name is only mentioned in the Greek form of abjuration (ap. Cotelier's Patres Apost. i. 544), which states that he endeavoured in this work to prove that Judaism, Paganism, Christianity, and Manicheism were one and the same religion, and that, to deceive Christian readers, he occasionally attacked Manes with vehemence. (Beausobre, Hist. de Manich. i. 435.) [E. B. C.]

ARIUS (Ἀρειός), the father of Arianism, was born about the middle of the 3rd century (256) in Libya, according to other accounts in Alexandria,^a and ordained deacon by Peter, and presbyter by Achilles of Alexandria. Arius denied the eternity and essential divinity of Christ; but held that Christ was a secondary God, of a different substance, created by the Father before the world, by a free act and out of nothing, and that he created the world and became incarnate from the Virgin Mary. [See ARIANISM.] In 313 he was intrusted with the sole care of a church called Baukalis (Epiphanius, Haer. 68, c. 4), in which he was very popular; and after the death of Achilles he came near being elected patriarch of Alexandria over his rival Alexander (Theodoret, H. E. i. c. 2). About 318 began his controversy with Alexander concerning the divinity of Christ, which soon involved the whole Church, and agitated it for nearly a century. [ARIANISM.] He was excommunicated for heresy by a provincial synod of 100 Egyptian and Libyan bishops at Alexandria in 321, and by the Œcumenical Council of Nicaea in 325, which after a long debate adopted the famous Creed asserting in unequivocal terms the eternity of Christ and his coequality (ὁμοουσία) with the Father. [CREEDS.] Constantine banished the heretic to Illyria; but when, under the influence of his sister Constantia and bishop Eusebius of Nicomedia, he became favourably inclined to Arius, and satisfied himself of his substantial orthodoxy on the ground of an artfully prepared creed confirmed by a solemn oath, he recalled him and ordered his public restoration in 331. Athanasius refused to receive Arius into the communion of the church of Alexandria (Athanas. Apol. § 59). In 336 Arius had a second interview with the emperor at Constantinople, who, in spite of the remonstrance of bishop Alexander, gave directions that on a Sunday Arius be received into full communion by a solemn procession from the imperial palace to the Church of the Apostles. But on the preceding Saturday,^b towards night, he died suddenly at the age of over eighty years, at a time and in a manner that seemed to the orthodox party to be a direct interposition of Providence and a condemnation of his doctrine, while his friends attributed the death to poison. Athanasius relates the fact in a letter to Serapion, on the authority of a priest, Macarius of Constantinople (De Morte Arii, Opera, ed. Bened. tom. i. pp. i, 340), and ventures to interpret Providence in the uncharitable style of his age, yet not without some reluctance on the part of his better Christian feeling. Epiphanius (Haer. 68, c. 7) compares his death to that of Judas the traitor. Socrates (Hist. Eccl. i. 38) gives the following account:—"Going out of the imperial palace, attended by a crowd of Eusebian partisans like guards, Arius paraded proudly through the midst of the city, attracting the notice of all the people. On approaching the place called Constantine's Forum, where the column of porphyry is erected, a terror arising from the consciousness of his wickedness seized him, accompanied by a violent relaxation of the bowels. He therefore inquired whether there was a convenient place near, and being directed to the back of Constantine's Forum, he hastened thither. Soon after, a faintness came over him, and together with the evacuations his bowels protruded, followed by a copious hæmorrhage, and the descent of the smaller intestines: moreover portions of his spleen and liver were carried off in the effusion of blood, so that he almost immediately died." Sozomen (H. E. ii. 30) gives a similar account; and adds that for a long period everybody avoided with horror the spot on which Arius died, until a rich Arian bought the place of the public, and built a house on the site, that there might be no perpetual memorial of his death.

^a Epiphanius, Haer. 69, c. 1 (p. 727 c, ed. Petav.), calls Arius a native of Libya, and this is followed by Tillemont and most historians. Cave (Hist. Liter. Script. Eccles. p. 126) quotes Photius as authority for the statement that Arius was born in Alexandria; but the reference cannot be verified. This view is probably merely an inference from Constantine's letter, where he gives Arius permission to return from his exile "to his own country," meaning Alexandria (Socrates, H. E. i. 25, ἐπὶ τὴν πατρίδα ἀφικέσθαι). But this, as Tillemont observes, may apply to the place of his long residence as well as to the place of his birth.

Arius is described as a man of tall stature, popular manners, considerable learning, serious, even austere character and ascetic habits, but unyielding pride and quarrelsome disposition (Epiph. Haer. 69, c. 3).^c Before the outbreak of the Arian controversy he had been twice excommunicated by Peter of Alexandria for defending the cause of the schismatic Meletius (Epiphanius, Haer. 68, c. 4). His mind was acute and well versed in the arts of debate, but destitute of depth. Neander (Ch. Hist. iv. 685) ascribes to him "a contracted intellect without the intuitive faculty." He seems to have been educated in the school of the presbyter Lucianus of Antioch (at least he addresses bishop Eusebius of Nicomedia as στραλλουκλιανιστής), which favoured a free grammatical and semi-rationalistic exegesis, in opposition to the allegorical and spiritualistic method of Alexandria. His principal work, called Θάλεια, The Banquet, which he wrote during his stay with Eusebius at Nicomedia, was a defence of his doctrine in an entertaining popular form, half poetry, half prose, in the effeminate style of Sotades and the so-called Sotadic metre; but, with the exception of a few fragments in the tracts of Athanasius, it is lost. A letter of his to Eusebius of Nicomedia, and one to Alexander of Alexandria, are still extant. (See Fabricius, Biblioth. Gr. viii. p. 309.) On the doctrines on ^c Tillemont, following Epiphanius and the Greek historians, says of Arius that he had "toutes les qualitez d'un serpent dangereux, et un extérieur si bien composé, qu'il estoit pour séduire toutes les personnes simples et credules." The silence of his enemies is conclusive that, like Pelagius and Nestorius, he was free from vice, and that but for his heresy he would have been highly esteemed for his moral character.

LITERATURE.—The chief sources on the life and character of Arius are, besides the fragments of his own works, the writings of Athanasius, the 68th and 69th Hæreses of Epiphanius, the church histories of Socrates, Sozomenus, Theodore, and Philostorgius. Cf. Tillemont, Mémoires; Fabricius, Bibl. Græca; Walch, Historie der Ketzereien; and the more recent works quoted under ARIANISM. [P. S.]

ARMENIANS. The early history of Christianity in Armenia presents, in some respects, a remarkable parallel to that of our own country. The floating traditions of an apostolic origin of the Church, unauthenticated by any sufficient historical testimony; the certainty of the early evangelization of the country, in whole or in part; the ascertained existence of a large Christian community there at the commencement of the 4th century, immediately on the revival of the work of Christ by a new and more vigorous missionary effort,—all these phenomena have their counterpart in the annals of our own insular Church.

The curious and interesting narrative given by Eusebius of the correspondence between our Lord and Abgarus king of Edessa, which has so long exercised the critical acumen of students of ecclesiastical history, need not occupy our attention here; because, although it is recorded in fullest detail in the annals of the native Armenian historians, and the superscriptions of the letters of Abgarus describe him as king of Armenia, yet it is only by doing great violence to geography that the dominions of Abgarus can be brought within the limits of Armenia; and, in any case, the correspondence belongs rather to the personal history of the king than to the ecclesiastical history of his country. (Euseb. H. E. i. 13.) [ABGARUS.]

It is not so with the after consequences of that correspondence in the mission of Thaddæus, one of the seventy disciples, by St. Thomas the Apostle, which in its main features seems to rest on an historical basis, however overlaid by a later accumulation of legendary adornment. If his subsequent labours as the Apostle of Armenia were equally well authenticated, a sufficiently satisfactory view might be obtained of the first planting of Christianity in that country. But it must be admitted that, while any such records of the apostolic age escaped the laborious diligence of Eusebius, the language of the native annalists is not such as to command implicit confidence; so that the labours and martyrdom of St. Thaddæus and of his coadjutor St. Bartholomew the apostle, in Armenia, and the mission of St. Simon the Canaanite to Persia, may be best relegated to the nebulous region of ecclesiastical history which we have not the power to resolve into clusters of facts, for lack, it may be, of more full and authentic records.

Certain, however, it is that, whatever progress had been made in the evangelization of Armenia in apostolic times, the opposition which the faith encountered from the followers of the ancient superstitions had checked its progress so effectually that few traces of Christianity remained in the country at the time when its great evangelist St. Gregory Lusavoritch, i. e. the Illuminator, commenced his apostolic labours there in the first year of the 4th century.

For the labours of that illustrious man, for his sufferings at the hands of his former friend and patron, King Tiridates, and for the progress he had made in the conversion of his adopted country prior to his elevation to the episcopate, the reader is referred to the biographical notice of him in this Dictionary. The rapid growth of Christianity in the country is strikingly marked by a fact mentioned by Eusebius, who, singularly enough, makes no mention of St. Gregory—as neither do Socrates nor Sozomen—nor puts on record any particulars of the conversion of Armenia to the faith. He tells us only that, among the natural and political convulsions that shortly preceded the overthrow of the persecutor Maximinus, the tyrant raised up war against the Armenians, who had been from old times friends and allies of the Romans; whom, being themselves also Christians, and zealously affected with piety towards God, he converted from friends and allies to enemies, by his endeavours to force them to idolatry and demon-worship. The historian adds that he and his army suffered severely in this war. (Euseb. H. E. ix. 8.)

The exact date of St. Gregory's consecration to the episcopate is not fixed by the native annalists; but, as the progress of conversion was so rapid after his release from the pit in A.D. 300, the date assigned to his consecration by Mr. Malan, in 302, does not appear too early; if we may suppose Leontius to have occupied the see of Caesarea of Cappadocia at that time; for there can be no question that it was he who consecrated the first primate of the Armenian Church. The earliest notice, however, which we have of Leontius as bishop of Caesarea is in A.D. 314, when he subscribed the disciplinary Canons of the Councils of Ancyra and of Neocaesarea. He was also present among the 318 fathers of Nicaea, and undertook to transmit the canons of that council to the churches, among others, of the Great and Little Armenia; a note, by the way, of the organized state of the Church in that country before the end of the first quarter of the 4th century.

This early connection of the Church of Armenia with the primatial see of Cappadocia was continued for upwards of a century, when it was interrupted, as we shall see, by the kings of Persia.

The chief episcopal see of the Armenian Church was from the first fixed at or near the royal residence, Vagarshiabad, not far from Erivan, at the northern base of mount Ararat; its ancient name being superseded by that which it still retains, in honour of the vision which St. Gregory reported himself to have seen there: Etchmiadzin signifying the Descent or Manifestation of the Only-begotten.

The title Catholicos, which came very early to be appropriated to the primate of the Armenian Church, is explained by Le Quien (O. C. i. col. 1355) to signify "Procurator" or "Vicar-General," and to have reference to the subordination of the bishop to the metropolitan see of Caesarea, which, it is asserted, was the result of a compact between Leontius and St. Gregory, to which also Tiridates was a consenting party.

The organization of the Armenian hierarchy is involved in great obscurity, but we have apparently authentic lists of the catholicos, with a few particulars of their acts, preserved by their native annalists. St. Gregory is said to have divided Armenia into ten episcopal sees, which were subsequently increased, but their names have not been preserved, and the list in the Notitia of Leo Sapiens given by Dr. Neale (Introduction, p. 76) can scarcely be taken to represent the ancient dioceses, as they certainly do not their original native names.

St. Gregory is said to have presided over the Armenian Church for 30 years. He was succeeded by his two sons, of whom Rostaces sat two, and Bartanes three years. Two other brothers, sons of Rostaces, followed in succession, of whom Gregory II. sat 11, Joses 6 years. The name and date of the latter are authenticated by his subscription to the decrees of the Synod of Antioch in 364, as Isaacis (Ἰσαακῆς) of Great Armenia: but the duration of his episcopate must be corrected, if he be identical with the Isacis (Ἰσακῆς), whose subscription is found to a letter of St. Basil and other Oriental bishops in 372.

It was probably during his presidency that the emperor Julian (c. A.D. 363) addressed his insulting letter to Arsaces king of Armenia, filled with vain-glorious boasting of his own imperial virtues, with countenancing reproaches of his predecessor Constantius, and blasphemous invectives against the God whom Arsaces adored, as impotent to shield him from his imperial wrath if he refused compliance with his requests. (Sozomen, II. E. vi. c. 1.)

Joses was succeeded by Pharneses for 4 years, and he by Norseses for 34 years. This eminent prelate is said to have been the son of Athenogenes and nephew of Hesy chius, who was nephew of St. Gregory. He was present, according to the Armenian historians, at the 2nd General Council in Constantinople in 381, and was poisoned by Bab, or Para, king of Armenia during the reign of Theodosius the Great. [NORSESES.]

On his death, the ecclesiastical affairs of Armenia fell into great confusion, by reason of the metropolitan of Caesarea prohibiting the three succeeding catholicos from ordaining, in consequence of the murder of Norseses; and they are said to have been merely titular catholicos. They were Joses II., who sat 3 years, Zagenes 4 years, Aspuraeces 7 years. He was succeeded by St. Isaac, who received licence to ordain, and ruled the Church for 40 years, when he was deposed, and another period of anarchy followed. The long presidency of St. Isaac was marked by political convulsions which terminated the reign of the native dynasty of the Arsacidae, and subjected Armenia to the tyranny of the Persian Sassanidae. It was equally notorious in the literary history of the Church and nation: for he it was who, with the aid of Mesrob, invented the Armenian character and translated the Scriptures into the vernacular, the Syrian version having been in use up to his time. Then, too, the Armenian Liturgy, first translated from the Greek by St. Gregory, took its present form, and "the golden period" of native literature set in. [ISAAC, MESROB, MOSES of Chorene.]

St. Isaac was deposed about A.D. 440 by the king of Persia, who intruded Sormac into his office, only to replace him by two other intruders, Persicus for three, and Musulius for two years, Syrians by nation. During this time ordinations were again prohibited by the metropolitan of Caesarea, in consequence of the deposition of St. Isaac, who declined an invitation of the native princes of the Azati to return to his post, but appointed Mastentzes to administer the see in his stead; and from that time, by command of the kings of Persia, the catholicos and bishops of Armenia were consecrated within the country itself, and its dependence on the metropolitan see of Caesarea of Cappadocia virtually ceased.

The intestine troubles of the Armenian Church during this period, while they account for a remarkable anomaly in their national ecclesiastical observances, go far to justify their divergence from the creed of Catholic Christendom—in expression, at least, if not in doctrine. The former relates to the celebration of the festival of our Lord's Nativity, which is observed in the Armenian Church, concurrently with His Baptism, on the 6th of January; the other, of more serious import, is the rejection of decrees of the Council of Chalcedon (A.D. 451), which has not unnaturally involved the Armenian Church in the suspicion of symbolizing with the Monophysite or Euty chian heresy condemned in that synod. This rejection is attributed to a misunderstanding of the effects of the decisions of the council, as though favouring the Nestorian heresy condemned at Ephesus (A.D. 431), a misunderstanding resulting partly from the misrepresentations of heretical teachers, partly from the questionable attempts of the emperors Zeno and Anastasius to reconcile the conflicting errors. There can be no doubt, however, that the mission of Samuel to Armenia by the Archimandrite Barsumas (cir. 460) was the main cause of the persistence of the nation in their—perhaps at first, involuntary—error. (Assemani, Bib. Orient. ii. 296.)

The schism was not consummated until A.D. 491, when the national Armenian Council, assembled at Vagarshabad, anathematized the Council of Chalcedon; since which time the Armenian Church has remained separated from the orthodox Church of the East, notwithstanding several attempts at reconciliation and reunion, one of which was partially and temporarily successful.

The first Catholicos of the Armenian Church after the subjection of the country to the Persians, was Joseph, a disciple of St. Mesrob, who after sitting two years was put to death, together with Leontius and his companions, by Isdegerdes king of Persia. He was succeeded by Citus or Kyut, who presided 15 years, during which time he transferred the seat of the Catholicos from Etchmiazin, reduced to ruin by the Persians, to Thevin or Tiben, supposed by some to be identical with Erivan.

To Kyut succeeded John I., surnamed Martacunes, for six years. He acquired by his writings the title of Philosopher. He re-arranged and amplified the service-books of the Church, and composed and published various sermons, addresses, and hymns.

Apovipenes, or Papchen I. succeeded, and it was during his term of office, which lasted five years, that the National Council of Vagarshabad completed the rupture with the orthodox Church, as above related. Then followed Samuel of Artasai for twelve years, according to one account, according to another for five only; Museles, or Moses, of Arperes, whose term is variously stated at six, and fifty years; Isaac of Arcan for seven (otherwise five) years. Christopher of Cubaritze succeeded, for five or six years; commemorated by Bar-Hebraeus in his Chronicle as a holy man, a native of Syria or Mesopotamia (Assemani, B. O. ii. 411). Leontius sat for two or three years, and was succeeded by Norseses II. of Asparax, who governed the Church for nine years. Under his rule the Armenian Church committed itself more completely and irrevocably to the errors which it had—inadvertently, perhaps, in the first instance—embraced; for in the Council of Tiben the Church synodically ruled the concurrent celebration of the Nativity and Epiphany or Baptism of our Lord, anathematized the orthodox Church of Jerusalem, and adopted into its Liturgy the heterodox interpolation into the Tersanctus of the words, “who was crucified for us,” applied to the Holy Trinity. The importance attached to this Council of Tiben by the Armenian nation is marked by the fact that it has ever since been regarded as an era in their history; which era, however, Le Quien has shown, commenced in A.D. 551, though the Council of Tiben sat in 535. (Oriens Christ. i. col. 1383.) After the death of Norseses II. Byanases of Capelene sat 17 years, when he was succeeded by Moses II. of Elibaret, who occupied the throne of St. Gregory for 30 years. He is reported by some annalists to have held another council at Tiben to confirm the decrees of the former as to the addition in the Trisagion; and it is probably this council, not the former, that marks the epoch of the Armenians, as the annalists mention the introduction into the Armenian calendar of the computation of the Turcomans, by order of this Catholicos.

During his long reign a schism, resulting from political causes and followed by permanent consequences, took place in the Armenian Church. In gratitude for the services of the emperor Maurice, to whose active intervention on his behalf he owed his throne, Chosroes II. made over to the Byzantine empire the Armenian provinces of the Persian dominions, as far as Tiben, then the seat of the Catholicos. Maurice's attempts to convert Moses to the orthodox faith were ineffectual. He and the bishops beyond the river Azat, i. e. within the Shah's dominions, held fast to their heterodox creed, and to the unleavened bread and unmix'd chalice in the Holy Eucharist; while the prelates of the province of Taron, within the Roman empire, went to Constantinople, where, after long discussion, they gave in their written adhesion, under oath, to the orthodox faith. On the return of these conforming bishops to Armenia, Moses and the bishops of Persarmenia refused to communicate with them, whereupon the emperor appointed an orthodox Catholicos of Taron, one John of Cocosta; so setting up a rival throne and perpetuating the theological differences among the Armenians, until the government was again reunited under Chosroes II., about the time of the death of Moses.

He was succeeded by Abraham of Arastune, who sat 23 years. He summoned a council of bishops, presbyters, and abbots, in which it was decreed that all who refused to anathematize the Council of Chalcedon should be banished the country; upon which John, and those who held with him, including the Iberians and Colchians, separated from the Armenian Church, which thus recovered its unity at the expense of its orthodoxy and the sacrifice of its dependencies.

Cometas, the successor of Abraham, sat eight years; during which time he distinguished himself above all his predecessors for his zeal against the decrees of Chalcedon. He was followed by Christopher II., surnamed the Abrahamite, possibly as belonging to the family of the former Catholicos of that name. He sat but three years, when he was deposed through the machinations of one John, whom Cometas had desired for his successor. John, however, was disappointed in his hope of occupying his rival's seat, which was filled for ten years by Esdras of Nica (called Jeser by the annalist), who had been educated in the patriarchal palace from his infancy.

It was at this epoch that the most serious, and for a time successful, attempt was made to reconcile the Armenian to the orthodox Eastern Church. A mixed council of Armenian and Greek theologians, including bishops, abbots, and doctors, was assembled by order of the emperor Heraclius, in the city of Charnum, i. e. Carana, or Theodosiopolis, the modern Erzeroum, for the discussion of the various questions at issue between the two churches. The result of a month's most careful consideration was the entire agreement of the Armenians with the Greeks. The Council of Tiben was anathematized; the festivals of the Nativity and Baptism of our Lord disavowed; the interpolation in the Tersanctus removed; and the decrees of Chalcedon admitted to the same place of authority as those of the first three councils. The date of this important Council of Carana is fixed to the 23rd year of Heraclius, the fourth after the death of Chosroes, coinciding with the year 632 A.D.

This settlement of the disputed questions was not, however, destined to be permanent. The old rival of Christopher and Esdras, John (Maracumensis or Maurocomita), who alone stood out against the decrees of the council, was condemned as a heretic and doomed to banishment. After a vain attempt to draw away other bishops from the communion of Esdras, and a third ineffectual endeavour to occupy the patriarchal throne, he was cited to another council summoned by Norseses III., where he was again condemned, and sent into exile, after having been branded in the forehead by the Praetor of Armenia with the figure of a fox. His place of banishment was Mount Caucasus, from whence he returned after the demise of Anastasius, the successor of Norseses, and died in extreme old age, leaving, however, behind him a generation of younger disciples, who succeeded in vindicating his principles, and again reducing the Armenian Church to its former state, in which it has continued ever since.

Norseses III. of Ischna occupied the patriarchal throne for twenty years, and is eulogized by the native annalists as the restorer of the ruined and desolated nursery of the Armenian faith at Vagarshabad or Etchmiazin, and for other like ecclesiological works of pious munificence.

He was succeeded by Anastasius of Cora, who sat six years; Israel of Tmosu followed for ten years; then Isaac III. of Bazacastrum, to whom no years are assigned in the catalogue; which may be taken as a significant indication that it was compiled during his lifetime. This is true also of the narrative, which has been a trustworthy guide up to this period of the history. According to this authority, Isaac III. was summoned to Constantinople, with the bishops subject to his jurisdiction, in the fifth year of the emperor Justinus—probably Justinian II., which would correspond with A.D. 689; for as Justinian II., who had made himself master of Armenia in 685, remained in possession of that country until 690, when he was forced again to cede it to the Saracens, he was in a position to exercise thus much authority over the Armenian hierarchy. In this council they again gave in their adhesion to the decrees of Chalcedon; but, on their return to their country, this act of theirs was condemned by their fellow-countrymen, and the prelates, to avoid the threatened anathema, renounced the faith they had professed at Constantinople. As this repudiation of the orthodox faith synchronizes, as did their acceptance of it, with political convulsions and the transference of their civil allegiance, it was probably influenced by secular as much as by religious considerations; and as their Moslem masters, not less than their Persian oppressors before them, would not be displeased to raise a moral barrier between the subjected Armenians and the Greek empire, their influence would not be wanting to promote the rupture. Isaac is said, on doubtful authority, to have died at Haran, near Damascus.

Elias followed Isaac III. He occupied the patriarchal throne 24 years, and was succeeded by John III., whose rule of 11 years was signalized by a synod assembled at Manaschertum, on the confines of Hyrcania, by command of Omar, the general of the Saracens, and, with the aid of the calif of Babylon, in which the schism from orthodoxy was finally consummated. Six Jacobite bishops of Assyria were present in this council, and a fusion of the two communions was the result. The Armenian Church accepted the definition of one nature, one will, and one operation in Christ; leaven was rejected from the bread, water from the wine in the Holy Eucharist, and divers ecclesiastical rules were subsequently introduced by the patriarch Elias, the effect of which was to bring about a closer agreement between the two communions; although, according to Gregory Bar-Hebraeus (loc. sup. cit. p. 296), many of the Armenians continued firm even to his time in the doctrine of Julian of Halicarnassus, whose peculiar notions concerning the nature of Christ were equally divergent from those of Severus of Antioch, the founder of the Jacobites, and from orthodoxy. This Julianist modification of Monophysite heresy had been propagated in Armenia soon after 545, by one of the ten pseudo-bishops ordained by Eutropius, who had himself received consecration only by the dead hand of the defunct Procopius, bishop of Ephesus, the sole episcopal representative of the extravagances of Julian (Joannes Episc. Asiae apud Assemanum, B. O. ii. 87, 88).

As this council forms an important epoch in the history of the Church of Armenia, it is fortunate that its date is accurately determined, being fixed by Bar-Hebraeus to the year of the Greeks 1037 (= A.D. 715), of the Armenians 135, which Assemani proposes to correct to 175—dating the era of Tiben in A.D. 551 (Assemani, B. O. ii. 106, 296, note, and p. 338; Le Quien, O. C. i. col. 1392, corrected in tom. ii. col. 1365, 6).

From this period until the latter half of the 9th century the annals of the Armenian Church are scanty in the extreme, the names only and periods of the catholics being preserved.

Here, then, the list of the patriarchs of the old Armenian Church, founded by St. Gregory the Illuminator, may be fitly brought to a close; and any attempt to investigate the sites and successions of the sees dependent on the Catholicos must be abandoned as unavailing, after the unsuccessful efforts of Le Quien. The migrations of the chief see were long subsequent to this period; as was also the erection of the titular sees of Constantinople and Jerusalem, which had a civil rather than an ecclesiastical origin and significance, and was necessitated by the wide diffusion of the Armenian race in Europe and Asia. The defection of a section of the Armenian Church to the ranks of Latin Christianity dates probably from the time of the Crusades, and therefore the consideration of it does not come within the scope of this volume.

A few words may be added concerning the literature of Armenian Christianity. This is for the most part accessible only in their ecclesiastical language and character, which have not found many students among the literati of Europe. There are doubtless treasures of great value among the manuscripts in the Patriarchal Library at Etchmiazin, which would well repay translation and publication; and as that library has been lately catalogued, by order of the late Catholicos, it may be hoped that its contents will become better known to the historiographers, not only of that nation but of the world at large.

M. Langlois has done excellent service to this branch of literature in his Collection des Historiens Anciens et Modernes de l'Arménie, issued under the auspices of Nubar Pasha, Minister of Foreign Affairs to the Viceroy of Egypt. It is published in French, with the originals of the Greek and Latin authorities, in two volumes, of which the former, published at Paris in 1867, contains the Greek and Syrian authors which had been translated into Armenian; the second, the Armenian annalists of the 5th century, including Moses of Chorene. More will be said of the Rev. S. C. Malan's labours in the same field when we have to speak of the great founder of the Armenian Church, St. Gregory the Illuminator. [G. W.]

ARMOGEN.—In the system of the BARBELIOTÆ [OPHITES], as expounded by Ireneus (108 Mass.), the second "syzygy," consisting of "Christ" (the primal Light) and "Incorruption," brings into existence four luminaries or derivative lights to attend upon "Autogenes," the product of the first "syzygy." Of these "the first and great" luminary was "Soter" (Saviour), who was called Armojen. The name is variously written Armojenes, Armoje, and apparently also with the aspirate: see too

Vallarsi's note on Jerome, Ep. lxxv. 3 [ARMAGIL]. No satisfactory derivation is known: for conjectures see Harvey on Iren. l. c. [H.]

ARNOBIUS, an eminent Latin Apologist for Christianity. His name is occasionally cited as Arnobius Afer; but the latter word is a mere local description. No sign whatever remains to us that he possessed any other name than one. The Greek formation of his name suggests the conjecture (but no more) that he was a freed-man.

The records of his life are meagre and somewhat uncertain; consisting, indeed, wholly in a few brief notices by St. Jerome, and another by Trithemius, aided by his own few incidental allusions to himself. The result may be briefly summed up as follows:—

The outbreak of the last great persecution (303–313) found Arnobius a professor of rhetoric at Sicca, in Africa. His reputation was high, and his pupils numerous and distinguished; among them was LACTANTIUS. Arnobius was a sincere pagan; versed in schemes of philosophy; but none the less an unhesitating and even abject idolater. He was, moreover, active as a lecturer in attacks upon Christianity. The sight, however, of the martyrdoms which followed the edict of Nicomedia appears speedily to have touched him; and a dream or vision (says St. Jerome) warned him to submit to Christ. He presented himself to the church at Sicca; but “they were afraid of him,” and demanded from their late enemy some hostage for sincerity. The result was the composition of the Disputations against the Pagans; whether in their present form or not. He was thereupon baptized, and (according to Trithemius) attained the rank of presbyter. Of his subsequent history we know nothing.

Some doubt attaches to the exact date of the conversion of Arnobius, and publication of his treatise. St. Jerome, continuing the chronicle of Eusebius, which closes with the year 327, enters next the name and life of Arnobius. But elsewhere he places him under Diocletian (284–304). Arnobius himself incidentally notices that Christianity had existed (juimus Christiani) 300 years at his date of writing (i. 13); and that the then age of Rome, according to the Annals, was 1050 or rather less. Again, throughout his work occur allusions to the presence of persecution; to the burning of the Scriptures and the destruction of the churches (conventicula); which Eusebius records as main features of Diocletian's persecution; to the sword, the flames, the rack, and the beasts; to the hostile answers of oracles (see i. 26; ii. 77; iii. 36; iv. 36, &c.).

On the whole this evidence points to some date between 303 and 313. St. Jerome's entry in the Chronicle appears to be irrespective of sequence. The express notes of time in the work of Arnobius are too cursory to be much insisted upon. The mention of the Annals of Rome leaves an ambiguity; for one era would fix the year 1050 to A.D. 296, another to A.D. 303. Thus there is nothing to invalidate the evidence of the frequent incidental allusions to the present persecution (Hieron. de Scr. Eccl. c. 79; id. in Chronicon Eusebii; Trithemius de Scr. Eccl. p. 10 a.).

The title of Arnobius's work usually appears as Disputationes adversus Gentes; occasionally, adv. Nationes, which last is sanctioned by the inscription at the close of book ii. in the Parisian MS.

It is divided into seven books of unequal length. The first two are devoted to the defence of Christianity, the remainder to the exposure of paganism. A brief abstract is subjoined; the first two books demand the closer analysis.

Book I. The author opens with a statement of the perpetual charge against Christianity, that it was the cause of the heavy calamities of the empire. This is met by an appeal to the disasters of other ages (2–3); to the mild nature and influence of Christianity, already felt (6); to our human ignorance of the constitution of the universe (8–11); to the partial extent of the alleged disasters, whereas the Christians were ubiquitous (15); to the passionless nature of the Divinity (13–20). It is asked, what is the capital offence of the Christians (25); and the reply is a series of fine passages explaining their worship of the one Creator and King as revealed by Christ (26–34). To the charge however that they worship (colere) a man, Arnobius replies by a retort upon the heathen heroes; by an assertion that even were Christ a mere man, his beneficence merited divine honours (36–40); and, lastly, by an eloquent assertion of his deity and incarnation. The proof of this is centred in his miracles, which are enumerated with general correctness. Their unique character and circumstances are admirably enforced: their publicity; simplicity of performance; uniform beneficence; the transmission of the power to others; and, lastly, their abundant historical proof (40–55). The literary character of the Christian records (their rusticity and solecisms), is briefly but ably noticed as anything but a prejudice to their truth (57–58); and the book closes with remarks on the reasons of the Incarnation; the nature of the Lord's Death in regard to his Deity; and an apostrophe to his benign character.

Book II. Objections are met, drawn from the uncertainty of opinion (4). On the other hand, the extent of human ignorance (a favourite topic with Arnobius) and the consequent call for humility and faith are well stated (7–10). Parallels are found in Plato to the tenets of a Resurrection and a Gehenna (13–14); and the rest of the book is occupied mainly with the nature of the soul, which is concluded to be not immortal though in all cases to outlast the body; in the case of the saved to be gifted with immortality by God, with whom nothing is impossible; to draw its origin not from God himself, but perhaps from some unknown secondary power (36). Sin and imperfection (it is argued) forbid the thought of a direct generation or creation. Hence the argument passes to the origin of evil (54), which problem is firmly and eloquently dismissed as beyond our knowledge. In the same way other like questions are laid entirely aside; and the reader is pressed to leave such hopeless snares, in obedience (it is said) to a direct command of Christ, for the instant question of salvation (61–77). The objection that Christians are afflicted in spite of their creed is met by the assertion that they have no promise of temporal bliss.

Book III. The attack on paganism here begins. It is asked, whence the knowledge of the Gods is drawn? Their sexes, corporeity, mechanic attributes, &c., are considered and followed up into their details and results as an argument ex absurdo. The contradictions of the legends are lastly noticed; and it is well shewn how fatal is the uncertainty they involve as to the reality of worship.

Book IV. The argument proceeds on the same plan, viz. the pursuit of the mythology into its details and results. To the plea that the theologi are to blame, it is replied that they are the only source of information. A rationalist explanation only leaves the dilemma that either gods or men are vile. It is worse to think thus of gods than to miss a step in ritual. Again, if the classical poets are the source of the evil, their writings should be visited by law, like an eloquent libel. The acted blasphemies of the theatres are lastly exposed.

Book V. This book is mainly engaged with the dissection of some of the legends, e. g. the colloquy of Jupiter and Numas, and the hideous fables of Acastis and Baubo. To such a creed, to such rites, the Christian was to be driven at the sword's point! The book concludes with an exposure of the attempt to excuse all by a symbolical explanation. The theory (it is urged) fails to explain the details of the legend; and it is a strange process to convey, e. g., a lesson of purity through an allegory grossly impure.

Books VI.-VII. The charges against the Christians of their lack of temples, images, altars, incense, &c., are retorted by a discussion in detail of the total discord (in Arnobius's view) between all such tributes and the idea of a divine nature. Thus, temples are argued to imply a need of shelter, or a material locality, in the tutelar; images to be useless, unless it be held that the unseen being is imprisoned in them; sacrifices, to be a declaration that the Deity has appetite or a mutable will. Finally, it being fully granted that history presents instances of accepted and answered sacrifice, &c., it is boldly asserted that the worshipped beings are not gods; that is, answer no definition of the divine nature; but must be alien and evil powers, daemones.

The whole work closes somewhat hurriedly with a brief contrast between the Pagan and Christian belief as to beings divine (genus divinum), and with the question, which party are the atheists and blasphemers?

Such is the scheme and process of the Disputationes. We may supplement this abstract with a notice of some of the leading features in the opinions of Arnobius, and of the state of his Christian knowledge, indicated by his own words.

Of God, he speaks in the noblest and fullest language of adoration. His existence is assumed (i. 33) as a postulate in the argument. He is the first cause; the Father and Lord of things; foundation of all; author of only good; unborn; omnipresent; infinite, incorporeal; passionless; shrouded in light; to be known only as the Ineffable (see especially i. 31). Arnobius hesitates, however, over the details of creation; thinking apparently that alike the human soul and the lower animals—insects and reptiles—are the work of some intermediate creator (ii. 36, 47).

Of the Lord Jesus Christ he uses the most glowing language. As a man He is the supreme philosopher and teacher, both of nature and religion. But He is also God: "Deus re certâ: Deus, homo tamen natus; Deus interiorum potentiarum; Deus sublimis; radice ex intima; ab incognitis regnis; sospitator, ab omnium principis missus;" His pontificium is to give salvation to the soul; He is the only path to light; His followers alone are saved; He is stronger than fate. Some doubt may, perhaps, be thrown over the extent of these ascriptions of deity by the vague language with which Arnobius speaks of the gods (see below). But with every deduction they are magnificent, and at least lie in the direction of the fullest orthodoxy. The allusions to the incarnation, life, and death of the Redeemer are numerous. The former is somewhat vaguely described as the assumption of a man to the self, the God; its motive was the presentation of the God to human senses, and the general performance of Christ's mission. His resurrection and the subsequent appearances are insisted upon; it is asserted (apparently) that He still appears to the faithful. To the Second Advent there is at most only a doubtful allusion (i. 39). (See generally, i. 36-65; ii. 60).

On the origin of the Soul he is far more speculative than is his wont. Its sin, imperfection, and inborn infirmity (he holds) forbid the belief that it comes direct from the supreme cause. It cannot for the like reasons be immortal (i. e. absolutely and per se); it outlives the body, but depends wholly on the gift of God for eternal duration. After death there awaits the evil, a second death, a Gehenna of unquenchable fire, in which gradually they are consumed and annihilated (see especially ii. 15-54).

The resurrection of the flesh is emphatically asserted, but in somewhat obscure terms (ii. 13).

Of the existence of Gods he speaks with much ambiguity. The actual objects of heathen worship he concludes from the nature of their mythology and ritual to be real but evil beings. But he nowhere denies that there exist also dii boni; only he views them (if existent) as mere reflexes of the supreme nature, and as in no sense distinct objects of worship and prayer. In worshipping the Supreme (he argues), we worship by implication—if to be worshipped they are—such gods as are gods indeed.

On the nature and efficacy of prayer, he uses perplexing language. His belief apparently is that in the present life all externals are fixed by an immovable destiny (vii. 10); that prayer is useful only as a means of divine communion; but again describes the prayers of the Christian Church as petitions for peace and pardon for all classes of mankind; the emperor, the magistrate, the armies, &c. (iv. 36). Prayer is regarded as (in some sense not specified) efficacious for the dead (l. c.). Arnobius asserts the "freedom of the will;" God calls man "non vi sed gratiâ" (ii. 64).

In the latter books his arguments against heathen sacrifices are so managed as logically to exclude altogether the sacrifices both of the Jewish temple and of the Cross. Of idol-worship and incense he speaks in terms which prove that he can have known nothing of images, or incense, or a local presence, in the conventicula of the Christians.

Of the Holy Scriptures Arnobius appears to have known very little indeed as a reader. The acute remarks he makes (i. 58) on the rude style of the evangelists is the nearest approach to evidence that he had opened the N. T. One text alone (1 Cor. iii. 19) he quotes verbatim;

but even this is introduced as illud vulgatum (ii. 6). He enumerates more than one apocryphal miracle as evangelical (i. 46, 53); he knows nothing of any promise of temporal happiness (ii. 76); he confuses the Pharisees with the Sadducees (iii. 12). Of the O. T. he was apparently quite ignorant. In one passage (iii. 10) he even seems to speak of it with disrespect; though the passage has been explained of the Rabbinical books. In many places he shews by implication a total ignorance of the national election and the ritual of the Jews (to whom he scarcely alludes at all), and of the Scriptural prophecies and chronology. These phenomena are, of course, in great measure accounted for by the alleged circumstances of the composition of the work. We may observe that they render the more remarkable the faintness of that tinge of Gnosticism which appears in its pages. Obviously, however, the authority of Arnobius on points of Christian doctrine is reduced almost ad nihilum by these indications; and we can hardly wonder that in the 5th century he was banished by Pope Gelasius to the apocryphal Index.

Critical opinions on the merits of Arnobius have been very various. St. Jerome's verdict varies between praises of his libri luculentissimi and censure of his defects as inaequalis, nimius, confusus, in style, method, and doctrine. After the censure of Gelasius an almost total oblivion seems to have followed him till the revival of letters. Among his earlier subsequent critics, the Leyden editor (1051) speaks with enthusiasm of his eloquence, reasoning, and antiquarian treasures (quoted by Orellius, ap. Migne, v. 1291). J. C. Orellius (l.c.) confirms this verdict. Cave (Lives of the Fathers) notices the fact (a most natural one) that his strength in defence is less than in attack; but bestows high praise upon his learning, ardour, method, and wit. Dr. Woodham (in his edition of Tertullian's Apology, preliminary Essays, ed. 1850) protests against the obscurity and neglect which have attended his name; holds that his "peculiar position and character invest his sentiments and reasoning with very singular interest and value;" pronounces him to be in some respects "the keenest of the Apologists;" and, above the rest, to be remarkably apposite on the whole to the popular arguments of modern times, and thus describes his style: "Arnobius has some resemblance to Apuleius, his descriptions are of the most astonishing luxuriance, they wander through page after page with all kinds of rhetorical embellishments, he has very frequent examples of a certain involution; but the general arrangement of his sentences and periods is remarkably constant, so that after an attentive perusal of a few chapters the reader may know exactly where to expect the epithets and the verbs, and precisely anticipate the rhythm and the cadence" (pp. 21, 29, 52, 53).

To the whole of this verdict we subscribe. Arnobius presents as a man a mind and character combining much ardour with much common sense. His sincerity is eminently manifest. He has apprehended to a degree nowhere and never common the great fact of human ignorance. As a writer, he appears as the practised and facile, but not very fanciful, rhetorician of his time and country; and is even a master and model of that peculiar style of a declining age which consists in a subtle medium between the dictions of poetry and of prose.

As a storehouse of old Latinity and of allusions to points of antiquity—to heathen mythology and ceremonial; to law, education, and amusements—his work is of the greatest interest and importance.

Besides the extant work, he wrote also at least a treatise in one book, De Rhetoricâ Institutione, which is entirely lost. The Commentarij in Psalmos; Annotationes in quosdam Evangelistarum locos; and Conflictus Arnobii Catholici cum Serapione Aegyptio de Deo Trino et Uno, belong to another author and later age.

The Disputationes themselves were long out of sight. Erasmus believed them to have perished. At present their text depends wholly upon two MSS., of which (L.) is in the Imperial Library at Paris (No. 1661). It belongs to the 9th or 10th century; was transcribed probably in Italy; and contains the Octavius of Minucius Felix as an 8th book, an error not discovered until the year 1582. The MS. appears to have been once the private property of Faustus Sabaeus Brixianus, librarian of the Vatican, and first editor of Arnobius; to have been obtained by him from some northern monastery, and to have been presented by him to Francis I. of France. This MS. is quoted as Codex Regius or Parisinus. (II.) Is known as Codex Bruxellensis, once deposited at Brussels, now at Dijon (Burgundia) (No. D, 6851). It appears to be a transcript of (L.), executed in the 11th or 12th century. The text is imperfect and corrupt.

The text, thus in fact depending on one MS., is in detail uncertain. There are but few main passages, however, affected, of which the chief are ii. 1, and vi. 41; at which latter a large spurious section seems to have been inserted.

Of Editions of Arnobius the following may be enumerated: (1) Romae, 1543, ed. Faustus Sabaeus Brixianus (owner of Codex Regius, as is most probable). (2) Basileae, 1546, ed. Sigism. Gelenius. The editor deals much in ingenious emendation. (3) Antwerpiae, 1582, ed. The. Canterus. (4) Romae, 1583, editio posterior, a Fulvio Ursino. In this and (3) simultaneously appears the discovery of the true authorship of the Octavius. (5) Lugduni-Batav., 1651. A variorum edition; the text emended by Salmasius, who died before his commentary was ready. (6) Lipsiae, 1816, ed. J. C. Orellius. Excellent for a full and learned commentary. (7) Halis Saxonum, 1844, ed. G. F. Hildebrand. (8) Parisiis, 1844, in J. P. Migne's Patrologiae Cursus Completus. The most convenient of the editions, containing in its apparatus the long and brilliant prolegomena of the Benedictine Le Nourry. (9) Lipsiae, 1846, ed. F. Oehler, in Gersdorff's Biblioth. Patr. Eccl. Selecta. A wholly critical edition, with short but clear prolegomena. There is a monograph upon Arnobius's work, by P. K. Meyer, Hauniae, 1815.

An edition by Ernstius, Hauniae, 1726, may be specially mentioned, as said to contain corrections copied by the editor from a recension of an independent but unknown MS.

ARNOBIUS (commonly known as ARNOBIUS JUNIOR, to distinguish him from the preceding), a presbyter, or possibly bishop, of Gaul. The dates of his birth and death are unknown; but he is presumed, from internal evidence of his writings, to have lived at least as late as A.D. 460.

Authorities.—The only external notices seem to be those of Venerable Bede, who praises Arnobius's Commentary on the Psalms, and of Alcuin, the distinguished preceptor of Charlemagne, who makes favourable allusions to him as the author of the Altercation with Serapion, in a letter addressed to Flavius Merius, and in the sixth book of his treatise Contra Felicem Urgelitanum. The internal evidence is based upon the Commentarium in Psalmos, the notes on some passages of the Gospels, and the Altercatio cum Serapione. The Commentary and Altercation may both be found in the Bibliotheca Patrum Maxima (tom. viii.), published at Lyons in 1677: but the contents of the two chief works render it very difficult to believe that the same person was author of both.

Works.—The Commentary on the Psalms is avowed by its author, who dedicates it to Leontius, bishop of Arles, and to Rusticus, bishop of Narbonne. The comments are pointed, but brief, being frequently not much longer than the psalm commented upon. They are not critical, but interpret everything as referring to Christ and the Church. The tone is devout and practical. They are however accused of a semi-Pelagian tendency; and a very learned writer, whose Historia Ecclesiastica appeared about A.D. 1686, Natalis Alexander, invites special attention to remarks of Arnobius upon Psalms l. ciii. cviii. and ccxvi. (in the Hebrew and the A. V., li. civ. &c.). But Nat. Alexander was a Jansenist; and it is by no means clear that anti-Jansenist writers, such as the Bollandists, would not maintain that the majority of the above-named comments were capable of an orthodox interpretation. It must however be allowed that the author of the Commentary is anti-Augustinian; as on Ps. cviii. (cix.) 16, 17, he speaks of the heresy, "quæ dicit Deum aliquos prædestinasse ad benedictionem, alios ad maledictionem." [Previous editions are those of Basel (1552), Cologne (1532), and Paris (1639). The last is reproduced in the Bibl. Patr. Max. The Paris editor, Laurence de la Barre, had ascribed the work to the elder Arnobius; an evident anachronism, for the author must have lived after the rise and condemnation of the Eutychian heresy.]

The Altercatio cum Serapione (previously published at Cologne, 1595, under the editorship of Franciscus Feuardentius) is a dialogue, which is represented as having been held between Arnobius and Serapion, in the presence of two chosen judges, named Constantius and Ammonius. Serapion by turns plays the part of a Sabellian, an Arian, and a Pelagian, and is gradually driven from each position. Although the book gives the idea of either a fictitious contest, or else a very one-sided report of a real debate, yet considerable learning is displayed, and a clear apprehension of the points at issue, combined with much real ingenuity of argument. The circumstance of Arnobius being the chief speaker does not of course prove that the authorship is his, any more than the position of Socrates in certain of the Platonic dialogues would prove that Socrates wrote them. Moreover, just as we cannot make Socrates responsible for all that Plato has put into his mouth, so neither can Arnobius junior be justly credited with the tenets here ascribed to him by some unknown author. Both the style and tone of the Altercation seem different from that of the Commentary: and though there is in both works a consentient rejection of the errors condemned in the first four general councils, yet it is hardly possible that an author of semi-Pelagian leanings, who had stigmatized predestinarian doctrine as a heresy, should declare, as Arnobius is made to do towards the conclusion of the Altercatio cum Serapione, that "he accepts and defends the dicta of St. Augustine concerning Pelagianism, as if they were the most hallowed writings of the Apostles (ac si sacratissima Apostolorum scripta)."

The Notes on some passages of the Gospels, which seem really to belong to Arnobius junior, are given in the edition of L. de la Barre, and separately in an earlier edition by G. Cognans (Basel, 1543). Of the events of our author's life we are wholly ignorant. [J. G. C.]

ARNULFUS, later, and less accurately, ARNULPHUS (Fr. Arnoul), St., bishop of Metz, and founder of the second or Carolingian race of kings, was born about 580, near Nancy. His parentage has been traced back to the stock of Clothaire I., but this only can be stated with certainty, that it was undoubtedly noble. His connexion with the Carolingians will be seen by the subjoined table:—

Arnulf was introduced to the court of Theodebert II. of Austrasia by Gundulf, Mayor of the Palace. He soon rose to high favour and positions of trust with the king. In his secular life he combined great exactness in duty with devotion and rigid self-discipline. In 609, under the pressure of his friends, he married Doda, a person recommended alike by nobility, wealth, and piety. Shortly after giving birth to her second son, she retired into a nunnery at Treves, where she ended her life. Arnulf remaining at court, became intimate with St. Romaric and had planned with him a seclusion at the monastery of Lerins, but they were detained by the war between Theodebert and Thierry of Burgundy, resulting in the defeat of the former, and when at length Clothaire of Neustria had united Austrasia under his single rule, he was too sensible of Arnulf's administrative power to allow him to prosecute his resolution. The date of his elevation to the bishopric of Metz, vacant by the death of Pappulus (610), has been disputed. Mabillon, whom Baillet follows, fixes it in 614, under Clothaire, but the best authorities (Gall. Chr. xiii. 693) assert that St. Arnulf was made bishop under Theodebert, who died in 612. It was forced upon him while still a layman, but his virtues as a bishop did not yield to those which had made him conspicuous in earlier life. His liberality to the poor is especially noticed. It was so unbounded as often to impoverish him seriously. It is said that once to supply means for almsgiving he sold to a courtier named Hugh a heavy silver dish, the property of his church. On the sudden death of its new owner it was carried to the king, who returned it to Arnulf with a hundred gold pieces. His rigour towards himself was in proportion to this generosity. Though at times he retired to the solitudes near Dodigny, he longed for entire seclusion from the world. With this view he wrote to Clothaire, asking that another bishop might be appointed to his see; but the king, so far from accepting his resignation, compelled him, about 622, to act as chief minister and adviser to his son Dagobert, whom he had associated with himself in the government of Austrasia. In this capacity he succeeded in bringing to justice some offenders of high rank. In 625 St. Arnulf attended the Council of Rheims held under Sonnatus. In 626 Clothaire reluctantly gave the permission which he had hitherto withheld, but Dagobert, a hot-tempered youth, at first threatened the saint with personal violence. Arnulf's firmness, which was more than a match for the passion of a prince, was moved by the importunate tears of a crowd of suppliants who depended for their support on his alms. He commended them to the care of his successor and kinsman St. Goeric or Abbo, and retired with St. Romaric to his castle at Habend in the Vosges, the famous monastery of Remiremont. Hence he went with a few monks to a deep solitude called Horemberg, where he occupied himself till his death in performing the most menial offices for some lepers. He breathed his last with expressions of the deepest penitence on August 16, 640, according to Sigebert of Gemblours, but the year is not quite certain (see Boll. p. 431, or Gall. Chr. p. 696). St. Romaric conveyed the body to Remiremont, whence scarcely a year later (on July 16) it was translated by St. Goeric and the bishops of Toul and Verdun (several miracles on the way bearing witness to its sanctity) to Metz, where it was laid in the suburban church of the Holy Apostles, made over in 941 to Benedictine monks, which being destroyed in 1553 during the siege of Metz by Charles V., the relics were transferred to the new monastery within the city, where they are enclosed in a silver case. For a full account of this monastery, see Gall. Chr. xiii. 893-898. St. Arnulf's cultus has always been widely spread in France. The Carolingians seem to have regarded him with the mixed veneration due to tutelary Saint and feudal Lord. The Annales Mettenses in Du Chesne, iii. 263, assert that he used to be held the principal patron of the Franks before God and man, while the "Poeta Saxo" (Pertz, i. 269), after describing with some vigour his principal acts, continues—

Nunc ovat in caelis, praebens miracula terris
 Sublimis meriti signa decora sul:
 Indeque nostrorum totam seriem dominorum
 Stirpem nempe suam protegit atque fovet.

Charles, the greatest of his descendants, was the next person on whom by the general suffrage of the Franks, with greater claims to popular hero-worship, with far less to actual saintliness, this patronage of the nation devolved. (See Bryce, H. R. E. p. 83.)

We are fortunate in possessing trustworthy materials for the history of St. Arnulf. By far the most valuable of the two lives given by the Bollandists (pp. 435-445) is the first, written by an anonymous contemporary author. A supplementary notice by Paul the Deacon (ibid. p. 446) gives, as he received it from the mouth of Charles, the anecdote of the saint's ring. While still a layman he was standing on a bridge which crossed the Moselle, when being struck with deep compunction for his past sins, he took a ring from his finger and threw it into the river, saying that if the ring should ever return to him he would accept it as a token that God had forgiven him. Some years after, when he was bishop, the ring was found in a fish which the cook was preparing for his evening meal. It is still preserved in St. Stephen's Church, says Mabillon, and shewn on his festival, August 16th, with some religious ceremonies (Nouvelle Biog. Gén.). The best authorities for St. Arnulf are Mabillon, Act. SS. o. s. B. ii. 149-157, ed. 1669; Act. SS. Boll. Jul. iv. 423-447; Bouquet, Recueil, iii. see Index, p. 763; Gall. Chr. xiii. 692-697; Baillet, Vies d. Saints, Août, 253-258 (with several inaccuracies); Nouvelle Biog. Gén. [C. D.]

ARRHENIUS (Ἀρρήνιος) appears in Socrates, H. E. ii. 45, as the bishop intruded into the see of Jerusalem after the second deposition of Cyril. The name is spelt 'Herennius,' Epérenviov, by Sozomen, H. E. v. 30; Clinton, Fasti Romani, calls him Irenaeus. [E. V.]

ARRHETUS (Iren. 55 f.) [VALENTINUS]: (ib. 54) [EPIPHANES]: (ib. 74) [MARCUS, Gnostic.] [H.]

ARSACIUS, the intruding archbishop of Constantinople, after the violent expulsion of Chrysostom (A.D. 404). He was the brother of Nectarius, Chrysostom's predecessor, and had served as archpresbyter under Chrysostom (Phot. C. 59). In earlier life his brother had selected him for the bishopric of Tarsus, and had attributed his refusal to an ambitious design of becoming his successor at Constantinople. On this, Palladius asserts, he swore voluntarily that he would never accept the see of Constantinople; his intrusion into Chrysostom's chair being thus rendered still more culpable by the sin of perjury (Pallad. c. xi.). If Arsacius had really entertained the ambitious views attributed to him by his brother the day for their realization must have seemed long gone by, when, after he had passed his 80th year, the success of the base intrigue of Eudoxia and Theophilus against Chrysostom opened an unexpected way for his elevation to the archiepiscopal throne. Eudoxia and the party now triumphant wanted for their new archbishop a facile tool, who, without initiating any decided course of his own, would sanction any measures they might think necessary; whose name would give weight to their actions, and under whose authority they might shelter the violence of their proceedings. Such an instrument they had ready to their hand in Arsacius. His reputation for piety, and clerical virtues, rendered such an appointment sufficiently decorous; while the sweetness and gentleness of his disposition, and the acquiescent indolence of his character secured for it a degree of popularity. Apathetic and taciturn—Palladius (u. s.) says he was “as mute as a fish, and as incapable of action as a frog”—neither the warmth of his feelings, nor the violence of his language were likely to lead him into trouble. Whatever he might have been in his youth, at his advanced age he was little more than a necessary ornamental appendage to be wheeled into such positions, and manoeuvred in such a manner as might suit the tactics of the party which put him forward. His hostility to Chrysostom, which would have been soon awakened by the silent reproach cast on his brother Nectarius by the contrast between the private and official life of the two archbishops, and stimulated by the superior popularity gained by the new-comer, had been sufficiently testified at the synod of the Oak, when he appeared as a witness against Chrysostom on the charge of illegally making away with the property of the Church, and other counts, and vehemently pressed his condemnation. All essential requirements seemed to centre in the old man, and Eudoxia’s all-powerful influence nominated him to the see to which he was consecrated June 27, 404. Chrysostom on hearing of it denounced him, “as a spiritual adulterer, and a wolf in sheep’s clothing” (Ep. cxxv.). Notwithstanding the influence of the court party, the diocese soon made it unmistakably plain that they regarded the new archbishop as an intruder, illegally usurping the place of their much-beloved spiritual father. The churches once so thronged became empty: with the exception of a few officials, the dependants of the court party, and the expectants of royal favour, the people of Constantinople refused to worship with the usurper, or to attend any religious assembly at which he might be expected to be present. Deserting the sacred edifices, they gathered together in the outskirts of the city, and held their religious assemblies in the open air. Stung by the desertion of his flock, Arsacius with petulant weakness appealed to the emperor. By his orders, or rather those of Eudoxia, by whom the weak Arcadius was completely governed, soldiers were sent to disperse the suburban assemblies. Brutal violence was employed, especially towards females, in the execution of their commission. Those who had taken a leading part in the assemblies were apprehended and tortured, and a fierce persecution commenced of the adherents of Chrysostom, rivalling in its horrors those which the Christians themselves had suffered at the hands of heathen rulers (see EUTROPIUS, OLYMPIAS). We learn from Sozomen (H. E. viii. 23) that Arsacius was not personally responsible for these foul and cruel deeds. But he lacked strength of character to offer any decided opposition to the proceedings of his clergy. They did what they pleased, and Arsacius bore the blame. So Arsacius’ position became more and more intolerable. It was in vain that all the bishops and clergy who embracing Chrysostom’s cause had refused to recognize him were driven out of the East (Nov. 18, 404). This only spread the evil more widely. The whole Western episcopate refused to acknowledge him, and with one consent abstained from writing to congratulate him on his appointment. Pope Innocent himself, who had warmly espoused Chrysostom’s interests, wrote to the clergy and laity of Constantinople strongly condemning the intrusion of Arsacius, and exhorting them to persevere in their adhesion to their true archbishop (Soz. H. E. vi. 22, 26). It is no cause for surprise that Arsacius’ episcopate was a brief one, and that a feeble character worn out by old age should have soon given way before a storm of opposition so universal, and, he must have painfully felt, so deserved. He died Nov. 11, 405. (Soc. H. E. vi. 19; Soz. H. E. viii. 23, 26; Photius, C. 59; Palladius, Dial. c. xi.; Chrys. Ep. cxxv.) [E. V.]

ARSENIUS, called the Great, one of the most famous of the monks of Egypt. He was of high Roman family; born probably in 354. By one account, he was a deacon of the Roman Church; but this, on the whole, is not probable. He was deeply read in Greek literature. About 383, Theodosius the Great being desirous of finding a suitable instructor for his sons Arcadius and Honorius, the elder of whom was then about six years old, Arsenius was recommended to him, it is said, by the Roman bishop,^a and in this way came into the service of the best of the Christian Caesars. He is said to have been godfather, as well as tutor, of the young princes; hence he was sometimes spoken of as “Father of sovereigns,” as they “obtained from the tenderness of the father the title of Augustus” (Gibbon, c. 27; cf. c. 29). The story that on one occasion Theodosius expressed his displeasure at finding them seated while their teacher stood, has every appearance of truth; but that he thereupon deprived them of the imperial ornaments looks like a rhetorical amplification. The time that Arsenius spent at the court—enjoying high consideration, and surrounded by luxurious splendour, attended on by “slaves in silken garments and golden girdles”—came to an end when he was forty years old, in 394. It has been said that the immediate cause of his retirement was the boyish spite of Arcadius, whom he had had occasion to chastise, and who plotted against his life; but this may be considered doubtful. Arsenius may have cherished for some time the resolution to retire from the world, in order to “cleanse his soul,” as he himself expresses it, and the purpose was probably strengthened by the apparently incurable vices of the imperial court life. Theodosius was a prince to be admired and loved: but a thoughtful and high-souled Roman Christian, living under the ascendancy of Rufinus, might not unnaturally be impelled towards monastic seclusion by sheer disgust and despair as to the prospects of so-called Christian society. He gave up his charge, in obedience, as he said, to a voice which bade him “fly from men, if he would be safe.” It was one more instance of a choice, which we may now think ill-advised, which may seem to us little better than the abandonment of an appointed post, the withdrawal of gifts which might have contributed to the moral recovery of many, at least, in “Caesar’s household:” but the passion for solitary self-discipline was then at its height, and the corruptions of secular life were soon to task all Chrysostom's energies, and in a few years to work his overthrow.

Arsenius sailed for Egypt. Arriving at the monastic wilderness of Scetis, he begged the clergy there to put him in the way of salvation by making him a monk. His aspect and speech betrayed his high condition; but he represented himself as a poor humble stranger seeking to be saved. Then, the story proceeds—and it is characteristic of the time and the place—they took him to abbot John Colobus (the Dwarfish), who invited them to a meal: Arsenius was kept standing while they sat; a biscuit was flung to him, which he ate in a kneeling posture. "He will make a monk," said John; and Arsenius staid with him until he had learned enough of the monastic life from John's teaching, and then established himself, as a hermit, in Scetis, where he continued forty years. Arcadius is said to have granted him the tribute of all Egypt for the relief of the poor and of the monasteries: the answer ascribed to him was that one who was dead to the world could have no concern in the distribution of money, just as he rejected a senator's legacy with the remark, "I had died before him." Early in his sojourn, the Mazici, a tribe of barbarians, invaded Scetis for the first time: he passed, says the narrative of Metaphrastes, through their bands, unobserved and uninjured. About this time, also, when he was in the first ardour of monastic severities, two monks were received by him with absolute silence—by another eminent recluse, abbot Moses, with cordial welcome. A monk, perplexed at the dissimilar conduct of two holy men, was said to have seen, in a dream or vision, two great boats on the Nile: in one was Arsenius, with the Spirit of God—in another, Moses, fed with honey by angels. For a time he retained some little external habits foreign to the ways of a monk; they were laid aside in consequence of a delicately given intimation. His love of solitude became intense; the inward voice had seemed to bid him "be silent, be quiet," if he would keep innocency; one visitor he even drove away with stones: he discouraged the visits of Theophilus the archbishop: and one of the most curious anecdotes in his life is that of the high-born Roman lady who visited him during one of his occasional sojourns outside the desert, and whose request to be remembered in his prayers was met by the brusque expression of a hope that he might be able to forget her. She complained, in her distress, to Theophilus, who reminded her that she was "a woman;" but assured her that "the old man would pray for her soul." Whenever he came into a church,^b he hid himself behind a pillar: he even shrank at times from his brother-hermits, remarking that the ten thousands of angels had but one will, but men had many; and to a monk who, as he could not fast or labour, thought of visiting the sick, he said, "Eat, drink, sleep, do no work—but stay in your cell." But with all his sternness—which was zouped with more than the usual monastic austerities in regard to poor and scanty food, and a brief allowance of sleep, and also with what a mediaeval collect in his memory called his "ceaseless floods of tears" (his "sudarium" was ever at hand)—Arsenius could be cordial, and even tender. After once separating himself from two of his friends and disciples, he returned to them "as the dove to the ark." He would not see two kinsmen of the archbishop; but he afterwards told them that he had neither eaten nor drunk till he had heard of their safe return home. He took a monk of incurably thievish habits into his own cell, in the vain attempt to reclaim him. One story illustrates the feeling entertained in the monastic mind—especially at Scetis (see Fleury, b. 21, c. 1)—against the name of Origen. An old man comes to abbot Lot, is kindly treated, but begins to utter "sermones Origenis." Arsenius is consulted, and gives his advice: "Do not drive him away, but say to him, See, here are God's gifts—eat and drink as you will, only do not utter those words." Young monks, if they offended, he would never exclude from communion, lest they should be rendered obstinate. His humility was worthy of a follower of Antony: when he was ill, and lacked a shirt, he accepted money given him to purchase one, and thanked God that he was accounted worthy to receive alms in His name. He and another abbot are spoken of as conspicuous for their dislike of praise. He refrained even from expounding Scripture: his self-depreciation knew no bounds. He was heard to cry aloud in his cell, "Forsake me not, O God! I have done no good in Thy sight, but, in Thy goodness, grant me to make a beginning." (Compare Iguatius, "Now I begin to be a disciple.") There was a shrewdness in his judgments of character: he would not see some monks who asked admission; their real object, he said, was to go on to the Thebaid for flax. A very famous saying of his referred to faults of the tongue: "Often have I been sorry for having spoken—never for having been silent." The Exhortation to Monks, ascribed to him, and published in Greek by Combesis (Gr. Patr. Auctarium, i. 301—the Latin version had been published by Servius, and both are in Galland, Biblioth. vii. 427), exhibits the results of deep spiritual experience. It warns the monk not to forget that his great work is not the cleansing of the outer life, but of the inner man: spiritual sins, not carnal only, have to be conquered; many a good action has, through the temper's subtlety, become the door to unexpected evil; many who have thought their battle with sin accomplished have relapsed through the perilous hearing of other men's sin: in short, "we must keep guard all round." He could give very definite and practical counsel: "Seek God, and He will appear to you: hold Him fast, and He will abide with you." "Whenever a man has fallen into sin, if he will but say heartily, 'Lord God, I have sinned, forgive me!' the soul-wasting power of melancholy will cease." Of impure thoughts he said, "Do not parley with them: do not answer them, but rise up, pray, make an act of repentance, and say, 'Son of God, have mercy on me.'"

^b The monastic anecdotes represent the holy solitaries as zealously devout towards all church ordinances. Arsenius is said to have told a story of a monk who did not believe in the real presence, until a vision (like that in the story of "St. Gregory's mass") convinced him. (Cotelier. i. 421.)

In 434, Arsenius left Scetis, driven forth by the second irruption of the Mazici. He staid at Troe, near Memphis, until 444; then spent three years at the little island (not the city) of Canopus; returned to Troe, and there spent the two remaining years of his long monastic life. When very near his end (A.D. 449-450) he was seen weeping. "Are you, then, Father, afraid?" asked the monks. "Truly," said the old man, "the fear that is with me in this hour has been with me ever since I became a monk."

The Greek Church honours him, as "our Father, Arsenius the Great," on May 8: the Latin, on July 19. See the Bollandists for that day. They consider the life of him by Metaphrastes (ap. Surium de probatis SS. historis iv. 250) inferior in value and authority to an earlier one, which they give, and which is ascribed by them to Theodore of the Studium. Cotelierius (Eccl. Gr. Monum. i. 353) includes many sayings of his among the "Apothegmata Patrum." (Fleury, l. c.; Tillemont, xiv. 676.) [W. B.]

ARSESIUS (Arsenius) a monk of Nitria, contemporary, but survivor of, St. Antony (Pall. Hist. Laus. 7, 117). He is styled "great" by Sozomen (Hist. vi. 30) and by Nicephorus (Hist. xi. 37). [I. G. S.]

ARSINOUS. Near the end of the Muratorian fragment on the Canon we read Arsinoi autem seu Valentini vel Mitiades (Miltiadis) nil in totum recipimus (-imus). The whole passage is grievously corrupt. No other record exists of a heretic called Arsinous. The name has been referred to Valentinus himself, an Egyptian by birth (so Simon de Magistris, quoted by Routh, R. S. i. 431), or to some other heretic supposed to be recognised in the 2nd century as "the Arsinote" (ὁ Ἀρσινωεῖτης, ὁ Ἀρσινωεύς) from the Egyptian name of Arsinoe. Credner, who makes the latter suggestion (Gesch. d. N. T. Kanon, 166 f.), observes that an allusion in Hippolytus (Haer. v. 14) to Πτολεμαῖος ὁ Ἀρσινόης would be available here if the Valentinian Ptolemaeus could be the Ptolemaeus intended. His editor Volkmar eagerly adopts as a certainty the unwillingly abandoned conjecture. Unfortunately the Peratae, as quoted by Hippolytus, certainly meant either Ptolemy Soter, son of Arsinoe Philip's concubine, or Ptolemy Philadelphus, brother and husband of a more famous Arsinoe: the other associated names are Didyme (evidently the Egyptian concubine of Ptolemy Philadelphus, Athen. xiii. 576 E), Cleopatra, and Olympias. But indeed the personal designations Valentini and Mitiadis sufficiently exclude a geographical interpretation of Arsinoi. In an earlier work (Zur Gesch. d. Kanons, 91) Credner had conjectured Burdesanis: but, according to the best authorities, the great Syrian lived after the probable date of the fragment, and in any case he was not likely to be known to its author. Marcioni (-nis) comes nearer to the letters of the MS. (compare Ἀρθησιάνης for Βαρθησιάνης, Hipp. Haer. vi. 35); and two lines later we find Marcioni apparently out of place, possibly a marginal correction taken up into the text. Yet the reference may conceivably be to some comparatively obscure Arsinous; the Miltiades of the same sentence is equally obscure, if he be not the Montanist known only from a quotation in Eusebius (H. E. v. 16), where the reading is not free from doubt. [H.]

ARTEMIUS, or ARTHEMIUS, Martyr, a 'Praefectus Augustalis,' put to death as a martyr by Julian the Apostate (Menor. Oct. 20), but for other reasons according to Ammian. Marcell. xii. 11: see also Theodoret H. E. iii. 18; Niceph. x. 35; Baron. Oct. 20. [A. W. H.]

ARTEMON, ARTEMONITES, belong to that class of ante-Nicene Monarchians, or Antitrinitarians, who saw in Christ a mere man filled with divine power. Of Artemon, or Artemas, we know very little. He taught in Rome at the end of the second and beginning of the third century, and was excommunicated by Pope Zephyrinus (202-217), who, as we learn from the Philosophumena of Hippolytus, favoured the opposite error of Patripassianism. He declared the doctrine of the divinity of Christ to be an innovation dating from the time of Zephyrinus, the successor of Victor, and a relapse into heathen polytheism. He asserted that Christ was a mere man, but born of a virgin, and superior in virtue to the prophets. The Artemonites were charged with placing Euclid above Christ, and abandoning the Scriptures for dialectics and mathematics. This indicates a critical or sceptical turn of mind. The views of Artemon were afterwards more fully developed by Paul of Samosata, who is sometimes counted with the Artemonites. The sources of our fragmentary information are Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. v. 28; Epiphanius, Haer. lxx. 1, 4; Theodoret, Haer. Fab. ii. 4; Photius, Biblioth. 48. Cf. Schleiermacher's essay on the Sabellian and Athanasian conceptions of the Trinity (Works, vol. ii.), and Dorner's Entwicklungsgeschichte der L. v. d. Person Christi, 2nd ed. i. 508 ff. [P. S.]

ARVALDUS, a king of the Isle of Wight, whose sons having been captured by the king of Wessex at a place called Ad Lapidem, probably Stoneham, were condemned to death. Cyniberht, abbot of Hreutford, begged leave to baptize them before they were executed; and this having been done, the sentence was carried out (Bede, H. E. iv. 16). [S.]

ASCLEPAS or AESCULAPIUS, bishop of GAZA, warmly advocated the Nicene faith in the council of Tyre, A.D. 335, and was deposed by the Arian majority on the charge of having overturned an altar, Quintianus being appointed in his room. (Soz. iii. 8; Theod. H. E. i. 29.) He joined Athanasius and Marcellus in their appeal to Julius, bishop of Rome, and was with them restored to his see by the decree of Julius, A.D. 341. (Soz. iii. 8; Socr. ii. 15.) He appeared at the council of Sardica, A.D. 343, and it is stated in the "Synodical Letter" drawn up by the orthodox bishops at that council, that he there produced a report of what had taken place at Antioch, where in the presence of his accusers and Eusebius of Caesarea, he had been acquitted by the verdict of the assembled bishops (Theod. ii. 8; Athanas. Apol. §§ 47, 49; Apolog. de Fuga, § 3). Mention is made of a church erected by him at Gaza (Bolland. Feb. 26, Vita S. Porphyrii, n. 20, p. 648.) His name appears among the seventy bishops to whom Alexander addressed an encyclical letter against those who had received Arius (Epiphanius. Haer. lxxix. 4). [E. V.]

ASCLEPIADES, succeeded Serapion as ninth bishop of Antioch, and sat from A.D. 203 to A.D. 218 (Clinton, F. R.). Eusebius mentions him (H. E. vi. 11) as "having become conspicuous in the confessions during the time of the persecution" (of Severus); and quotes a letter of Alexander, bishop of Jerusalem, speaking of the comfort it has been to him in his imprisonment to hear that one so well qualified as regards his faith had been entrusted with the episcopate of Antioch (ib.). He was succeeded by Philetus, A.D. 218 (Niceph. H. E. iii. 19, v. 26; Baronius sub ann. 203, 218). [E. V.]

ASCLEPIADES, bishop of TRALLES, the reputed author of a letter to Peter the Fuller on the Trisagion, about A.D. 483. The letter is contained in the collections of the Councils (e.g. Labbe, Conc. v. 241, ed. Coleti); but the authenticity of the letter and the existence of Asclepiades are disputed: see Vales. Obs. Eccl. ad Evagr. i. 4; Le Quien. Damasc. Op. i. 478 sq.; and on the other side Pagi Baron. ad Ann. 485, no. 15. [L.]

ASCLEPIUS, a Marcionist bishop, suffered martyrdom by fire at Caesarea in Palestine Jan. 11, 308 or 9, in the persecution begun by Diocletian (Eus. Mart. Pal. 10 Gr. = p. 35 f. Curet.) [H.]

ASCODRUGITAE. — Under this name Philastrius (Haer. 75) describes a sect in Galatia, who set up and "covered" (cooperiunt) an inflated wine-skin in their churches, and danced wildly round it in Bacchanalian fashion, "like pagans dancing to father Liber." Again Jerome (Com. in Gal. ii. praef.) depicts as from personal observation (scit necum qui vidit) the distraction of Ancyra, the capital of Galatia, by a variety of sects and doctrines, not merely the familiar Cataphrygians, Ophites, Borborites, and Manicheans, but Passalorhynchites, Ascodrobi (so at least the edd.), and Artotyrites; monstrous names unheard in "the Roman world." The letter belongs to 387, but the knowledge must have been gained in Jerome's journey through Galatia in 372 or 3. The two other sects here named stand next to the Ascodrugites in Philastrius, Galatia being specified as the home of the Artotyrites.

On the other hand Epiphanius (Haer. 416) states that Tuscodrugitae was a name for either the Cataphrygians (Montanists) or the "Quintilliani," i.e. the Cataphrygians again under another title (R. A. Lipsius, Zur Quellengesch. d. Epiph. 230 f.) Τασκός, he says, meant in their language a peg (πάσσαλος), and δροῦγγος a nose or beak (μυκτήρ ἐστὶ δὸν βύγχος). Hence "from their placing their forefinger on the nose in praying, to make a show of humility and exceeding righteousness, they were called by some 'Tascodrugitae,' that is, 'Passalorhynchites.'"

Lipsius (10–32) has proved that Philastrius, though possibly writing (not more than six years) after Epiphanius, i.e. after 375 (p. 404 A), had no acquaintance with any part of his work. The three accounts are then almost certainly independent. Now we find Jerome and Philastrius alike grouping together three sects as Galatian (Philastrius gives no country for his third sect). Thus a presumption arises in favour of Philastrius where he differs from Epiphanius. Even the improbable supposition that the two peculiar names differing by a single letter represent different sects will not reconcile the two detailed accounts, for Epiphanius makes the third name in Philastrius to be a translation of the second, and both to denote the Cataphrygians. He writes, it must be observed, with conscious vagueness, evidently from a confused recollection of an oral report. He has the three names (Artotyrites 417 D) in common with the two Latin authors, but his information concerns only the Passalorhynchites. His reference of all three to the Cataphrygians, which is unsupported by other evidence, is probably due only to the need of finding some place for them in his work, the bare knowledge that they belonged to the Phrygian region, and the consequent temptation to associate them with another Phrygian heresy. In spite therefore of the etymology by which he endeavours to identify two of the names, his testimony must here be set aside as of no value.

This conclusion would probably have been reached long ago but for the apparent absurdity of the account given by Philastrius of his Ascodrugites, which no doubt looks at first sight like the fictitious embodiment of a conjectural derivation (ἄσκός, a wine-skin). Yet the rite which he describes may with better reason be thought a curious relic of the earlier worship of central Asia Minor. In the market-place of Celaenae, the ancient capital of southern Phrygia, at the source of the river Marsyas, had once been hung up what was said to be the skin of Marsyas whom Apollo flayed alive (Herod. vii. 26; Xenoph. Anab. i. 2 § 8; Aelian, V. H. xiii. 21; Ps. Plut. de Fluv. 10; Stat. Theb. iv. 186). Marsyas is well known to have been a divinity ("daemon" C. O. Müller) of the primitive Phrygian religion, invaded but not destroyed by the worship of Apollo, as is indicated in a legend told by Aelian (l.c.). He is called a Silenus by Herodotus (l.c.), Pausanias (i. 24; ii. 7), and perhaps Euphorion (ap. Ath. iv. 184 A); and a Satyr by Plato (Symp. 215 B), Suidas (s. v. Ὀλυμπος), and Statius (l.c.) The Phrygian worship extended over the region which after the Gallic immigration was known as Galatia, and its influence is perceptible in quite late times (cf. Lightfoot, Galat. 8 ff.) The persistence of primeval rites under a Christian guise in the 4th century is therefore probable enough. That the supposed skin of Marsyas may well have played a part in the Phrygian cult is shewn by a statement quoted by Photius (Bibl. cod. 190, p. 149 a 6) from Ptolemaeus Chennas, who wrote early in the 2nd century, that on the birthday of Marsyas (which was the feast of Apollo) the skins of all the animals sacrificed were solemnly hung up. The confusion with a wine-skin is easily explained. The skin of Marsyas is called ἄσκός by Herodotus and Pseudo-Plutarch, and "to flay to a wine-skin" (ἄσκον δέρειν) was a Greek proverbial expression (Solon ap. Plut. V. Sol. 14; Aristoph. Nub. 441; Plat. Euthyd. 285 C); probably, as Plato seems to say, in allusion to this legend (Herod. iii. 9 is ambiguous). C. O. Müller indeed (Proleg. Myth. 113 f.) supposes that the object of worship at Celaenae was itself a wine-skin, the natural symbol of a Silenus, and that the other account of it arose with the Greek myth. This must, to say the least, remain doubtful. Philastrius has been understood as saying that his Ascodrugites grounded their practice on Matt. ix. 17; but he alone is responsible for the reference.

Though however the name did not originate the description of the sect, the converse is probably true in part. Epiphanius seems to have preserved in "Tascodrugitæ" the genuine form, naturally corrupted by a Greek ear when the subject was a sect who did homage to an Ascus. A further step is seen in Augustine (Haer. 62), who, abbreviating Philastrius, gets rid of the unintelligible second element and writes Ascitæ. Various other corruptions may be found in a note of Cotelier, Mon. Eccl. Gr. i. 774. The true etymology is obscure. $\Delta\rho\omicron\upsilon\gamma\gamma\omicron\varsigma$, Lat. drugus, a common Byzantine word, was already in use for a small compact body of men (= globus: see Casaubon and Saumaise on Vopisc. Prob. 19); but it has no obvious meaning here. After all the appellation may be local, like 'Pepuzitæ': Tasc- begins two Gallic names. Were it not for the express statements about the Passalorhynchites, their name too might be thought a second Greek corruption of "Tascodrugitæ": there is but one superfluous letter and one unusual substitution; the other changes are slight and common in uncial writing.

A fresh element of confusion would be introduced by Theodoret (Haer. Fab. i. 9 f.) if his statements on these matters carried greater weight. He says that from the Marcosians sprang many sects, among which were those called by some Ascodruti, by others Ascodrupitæ (T or Π for Γ). His account of their doctrines relates only to the sacraments and "redemption," and is evidently a clumsy summary of part of what Irenæus (93 ff.=Epiph. Haer. 254 ff.) had written about the Marcosians. The combination, though not now explicable, is doubtless erroneous. Later Greek compilers either mix the reports of Epiphanius and Theodoret (Timoth. de Rec. Haer. in Cotel. Mon. Eccl. Gr. iii. 377 f.), or preserve them separately under different names (Nictet. Thes. iv. 7, 20).

A law of Theodosius in 383 (Cod. Theod. xvi. 5. 10), addressed to the "vicarius" of the Pontic "dioecesis" which included Galatia with 10 other provinces (Godefroi ad l.), directed that the "Tascodrogitæ" should not be expelled, but should not be allowed to meet for worship. In a law of 428 (ib. 65) they occur between the Hydroparastatae and the Photinians in a long list of heretics on whom a similar restraint is laid. [H.]

ASENETH, HISTORY OF. The Life and Confession of Aseneth daughter of Pentephres of Heliopolis ('Potipherah . . . of On,' A. V. Gen. xli. 45, 50): A Narrative [of what happened] when the beautiful Joseph took her to wife: such is the full title of a short religious romance published by Fabricius. He gave at first (Cod. Pseudep. V. T. i. 774-784) a Latin text; afterwards (ii. 85-102) the much fuller Greek original of 8 out of the 19 chapters, from an imperfect MS. (Barocc. 48). The British Museum (Add. 17,202) possesses a Syriac version. The Latin abridgment was incorporated by Vincent of Beauvais (cent. xiii.) in his Speculum Historiale, i. 118-124.

The story is very simple. Aseneth was a proud beauty, disdainful all lovers but Pharaoh's eldest son, whose suit his father forbade, and worshipping innumerable Egyptian gods of silver and gold with her seven virgin attendants in the splendid upper storey of a tower in her father's house. She treated with scorn Potipherah's wish that she should marry Joseph, on the occasion of his being expected to visit Heliopolis while journeying to collect corn in the first year of plenty: but when from her window she beheld him entering, she declared that by his beauty he must be a "son of God," and repented the bitter words she had spoken about his imprisonment and the occasion of it. Joseph, having seen her at the window, requested that she might be sent away, as he was weary of the advances made to him by the daughters of Egypt: but when he heard that she hated the sight of men, he asked to have her brought, that he might love her as a sister. She came down and greeted him, "Hail, my lord, blessed of the Most High God;" and at her father's bidding went forward to kiss him. But he repelled her, saying that it was not meet for one who "blessed with his mouth the living God, and ate the blessed bread of life, and drank the blessed cup of immortality, and was anointed with the blessed unction of incorruption," to kiss an idolatrous woman. Then seeing her tears he laid his hand on her head, and prayed God to "bless her, and quicken her, and renew her with the Holy Spirit that she might eat the bread of life and drink the cup of His blessing, and number her with His people whom He had chosen before the world was, and that she might enter into His rest which He had prepared for His elect, and live in His eternal life unto eternity." After this he departed. She returned to her chamber rejoicing at his blessing, but full of grief and fear. "Repenting of her idols," she flung them out of the window, cast "her royal feast" to the dogs, and sat in ashes weeping seven days. At dawn of the eighth day the sky was reut with a great light near the morning star, and an angel appeared before her, proclaiming himself to be "the prince of the house of God and the prince of the army of the Lord." He bade her cast off her garments of mourning and rejoice, "for thy name is written in the book of the living, and shall not be blotted out for ever: lo, from this day thou art renewed and quickened, and shalt eat the bread of blessing and drink the cup of incorruption, and be anointed with the holy unction: lo, I have given thee to-day as a spouse to Joseph, and thy name shall no more be called Aseneth, but 'of much refuge;' for Penitence hath for thee supplicated the Most High, [Penitence] who is a daughter of the Most High, a virgin mirthful, always smiling, and modest." Invited by Aseneth to eat, the angel caused a honeycomb to appear miraculously before her. "Blessed," he said, "are they that approach my Lord in repentance, for they shall eat of this comb made by the bees of the paradise of God from the dew of the roses in paradise, and all the angels of God eat of it; and whosoever shall eat of it, shall not die for ever." After they had eaten of the comb, he restored it as it was. Then he drew his finger along it from east to west, and again from north to south, and each time the track of his finger turned to blood. Out of the comb came white bees with purple wings, and made and ate of fresh comb in Aseneth's hands, till the angel bade them go to their place, when they all departed eastward to paradise. Once more the angel touched the comb, and fire came forth from the table and devoured the comb with a fragrant odour. As soon as the angel had departed, Joseph arrived. Aseneth met him, told him the words of the angel, and washed his feet. Next day Joseph asked her of Pharaoh, and Pharaoh celebrated the marriage with great pomp.

The book ends with a strange story. When Jacob and his sons came into the land of Goshen, Joseph and Aseneth brought back home Levi and Simeon after a visit. Pharaoh's son, being enamoured of Aseneth, tried to bribe the two brothers to slay Joseph. Failing with them, he next tried Dan and Gad, assuring them that as sons of a handmaid they were to be disinherited. They agreed to the murder, while he himself set about slaying his own father. Being baffled by Pharaoh's guards, he joined the ambuscade of Dan and Gad with 50 armed men, and they succeeded in destroying all the retinue of Joseph except one man. From him Simeon and Levi heard the news, and gathering together all the force at hand they routed the assailants. Aseneth meanwhile fled in a chariot with Benjamin; and when Pharaoh's son drew near to carry her off, Benjamin caught up a stone from a torrent-bed and dashed him to the ground from his horse. On the arrival of Simeon and Levi the three brothers tended the wounded man and brought him to Pharaoh, who thanked them for sparing him; but on the third day he died. Pharaoh himself died of grief soon after, and Joseph became regent of Egypt for 48 years.

The purpose of this history is not very evident. The greater part of it has no distinctly religious character, and is verbose and wearisome; yet passages of some beauty occur now and then. The signs of Christian origin, if few in number, are not to be mistaken, though Jewish legend may have supplied materials. The bread and cup of blessing and the chrism are four times mentioned, and the bloody tracks upon the honeycomb evidently make up the cross. The full significance of this mysterious comb is not easy to discover, though various particulars connect it with the Eucharist. Its consumption by fire stands in broad contrast to the Jewish law (Lev. ii. 11), confirmed by all authorities except Theophrastus in Porphyry (de Abst. ii. 26): cf. Bernays, Theophr. üb. Frömmigkeit, 112. A peculiar kind of prominence is given to repentance.

In the Syriac catalogue of Ecclesiastical Books by Ebed Jesu at the end of the 13th century (Assémani, B. O. iii. 4) "the book of Asiatha the wife of Joseph the Just, the son of Jacob," stands before "the book of Tobias and Tobith the just Israelites" among writings partly belonging to our Apocrypha, partly of other origin. "Asseneth" likewise occurs between Judith and Esther in an Ethiopic list of canonical books (Brit. Mus. Add. 16,188; see Dillmann's Catalogue, cod. iv.), but it is wanting in another similar list (Add. 16,205, Dillmann's cod. xxxv.): no Ethiopic MS. containing the book appears to have reached Europe.

The Syriac version was made from the Greek by Moses of Agil (on Dr. Wright's authority), who lived about 550. How much earlier, and in what country, the book of Aseneth was written, there is apparently no evidence to shew. [H.]

ASPHALIUS, a presbyter of Antioch, and a zealous adherent of the heretic Aetius, who was deputed by Eudoxius, after he had taken forcible possession of the see of Antioch, A.D. 358, to proceed to Constantinople and obtain the recognition of his episcopate from the emperor Constantius. Asphalius had obtained his object, and was just about to start for Antioch with the Emperor's letters of authorization when the deputies from the council of Ancyra arrived, and by their representations induced the weak Constantius to declare himself against the Anomoeans, and recall his letters. A document of a very different kind was substituted, denouncing the intrusion of Eudoxius, speaking of him in the most violent terms, and forbidding him to appear in the Christian assemblies (Soz. H. E. iv. 13, 14). [E. V.]

ASTAPHAÆUS, Adstaphæus, Astanphaeus, or Astaphius, a personage in the Ophite mythology (Iren. 109, 111; Orig. cont. Cels. vi. 31 f.). The name, like "Jaldabaoth" and "Oraeus," is said by Origen to come from the Magian religion. Various unsatisfactory etymologies have been given. The least unlikely is from אֶסְתָּא, to watch as from a tower (Hilgenfeld in his Zeitschrift for 1862, p. 433). [H.]

ASTARTH or Astoriane, the legendary brother of Melchisedek according to "some" known to Epiphanius (Haer. 469 B). So the Venice MS.: the common text has Astaroth and Asteria. [H.]

ASTERIUS (1) A bishop of ARABIA (called bishop of Petra, Tomus ad Antioch. § 10) accompanied the Eusebians to the Council of Sardica, but separated himself from them in company with his brother bishop Arius or Macarius (who by some confusion is also called bishop of Petra), complaining of the menaces and violent treatment to which the deputies had been subjected, with the view of driving them into supporting the Eusebian faction (Theodt. ii. 8). The unscrupulous Eusebians soon had their revenge, and the two bishops were banished to Upper Libya, where they endured much suffering (Athanas. Hist. Arian. § 18; Apolog. § 48).

On the promulgation of the edict of Julian, recalling all the banished bishops, Asterius returned from his exile, and (A.D. 362) took part in the important council summoned by the newly restored Athanasius at Alexandria, for the purpose of promoting union between the orthodox and those who, without embracing the errors of Arius, had held communion with the Arian party. One of the chief subjects that came before this synod was the unhappy schism at Antioch between the Eustathians and the Meletians. Meletius and his adherents having renounced communion with the Arians, the way for the healing of this painful rupture appeared open, and a letter was addressed by the council to Lucifer of Cagliari, and the other bishops who were then at Antioch, of which Asterius and Eusebius of Vercelli were the bearers, recommending reunion, and stating the terms on which it might be sought (Athanas. Ep. ad Antioch. i. 575; Rufin. i. 29, p. 249; Tillemont, Mémoires, viii. 205-209). How this attempt at reunion failed, through the precipitation of Lucifer in consecrating Paulinus bishop of Antioch, may be read elsewhere. [LUCIFER, MELETIUS, PAULINUS.] On the singular fact that the name of Asterius, together with that of Eusebius of Vercelli, is found among those to whom this letter is addressed, as well as these by whom it was written, of which it is difficult to give a satisfactory explanation, cf. Tillemont, u. s. p. 707; Baronius, Ann. sub ann. 362 § 219.

(2) The teacher of Acacius bishop of Beroea, whom he accompanied A.D. 372 to Edessa, to summon thence the famous solitary St. Julian Sabbas, whose pupil he had been, to support the orthodox faith at Antioch, during the persecution of the Catholics by Valens (Theodt. Vit. Patr. p. 780).

(3) A presbyter belonging to the Arian party at Antioch, c. 380. When the decree of Theodosius had left the Arian party at Antioch without a head by compelling Dorotheus to leave his see, Asterius took the lead in conjunction with some neighbouring bishops, in an application to the Eunomians to be received into communion with them. This negotiation broke down in consequence of the demands of the Eunomians that the condemnation of Aetius should be recalled, and all abuses reformed (Philost. H. E. x. 1).

(4) "Comes Orientis," A.D. 398, who carried out with prudence and tact the orders of the emperor Arcadius for the secret removal of Chrysostom from Antioch when elected to the see of Constantinople (Pallad. 43). See CHRYSOSTOM. [E. V.]

ASTERIUS, bishop of AMASEA in Pontus, a contemporary of St. Chrysostom. He himself tells us, that his teacher was a certain Scythian (i. e. Goth), who, having been sold in his youth to a citizen of Antioch, a schoolmaster, had made marvellous progress under his owner's instructions and won himself a great name among Greeks and Romans (Phot. Bibl. 271, p. 1500). Beyond this not a single incident in his life is recorded. His date however is fixed by allusions to contemporary events in his Homilies. He speaks of the apostasy of Julian as having happened within his memory (Aster. Or. 3, p. 56, ed. Combefis); and in his sermon on the Festival of the Calends (Or. 4, p. 76) he mentions the consulate and fall of Eutropius as an event of the preceding year. This sermon therefore must have been delivered on New Year's Day A.D. 400. Elsewhere he spoke of himself as a man of very advanced age (Phot. Amphil. 125 [312]).

The extant works of Asterius consist almost solely of sermons or homilies. Of these we possess twenty-two perfect; twelve on various subjects included in the edition of Combefis (Paris 1648); eight on the Psalms, of which one is found among the works of St. Chrysostom and the remaining seven were published by Cotelier, Mon. Eccl. Graec. ii. (Paris 1688); and two again on other subjects, which are published among the works of Gregory Nyssen, but must be assigned to Asterius on the authority of Photius. Besides these Photius (Bibl. 271) gives extracts from several others. In addition to these homilies, a life of his predecessor, St. Basil of Amasea, printed in the Acta Sanctorum, April 26, is ascribed to him. A complete collection of his works will be found in Migne's Patrol. Graec. xl.; a complete list in Fabric. Bibl. Graec. ix. 513 sq. ed. Harles. An account of their contents is given by Tillemont, x. 409 sq.

Asterius was a student of Demosthenes (Or. 11, p. 207), and himself no mean orator. His best sermons (for they are somewhat uneven) display no inconsiderable skill in rhetoric, great power of expression, and great earnestness of moral conviction; and some passages are even strikingly eloquent. His orthodoxy was unquestioned. Photius (Amphil. l. c.) contrasts him with his Arian namesake, as stance in the faith, devoting himself to the care of his flock, and setting an example of a virtuous and godly life. His authority was quoted with great respect in later ages, more especially during the Iconoclastic controversy at the 2nd Council of Nicaea, when with an innocent play on his name he was referred to as "a bright star (astrum) illumining the minds of all" (Labbe, Conc. viii. 1385, 1387, ed. Coleti). [L.]

ASTERIUS, Martyr, a Roman senator of high rank and favour with the emperor, whom Rufinus makes to have been a martyr at Caesarea in Palestine in 262 (H. E. vii. 13); but Eusebius, while mentioning his faith and charity in burying the martyr Theotecnus (H. E. vii. 15), says nothing of his martyrdom. He is also called ASTURIUS (see also Martyrol. March 3). [A. W. H.]

ASTERIUS URBANUS, a writer in the Montanist controversy of the 2nd century. He is only known by a reference to a λόγος κατὰ Ἀστέριου Οὐρβανὸν which occurs in an anonymous work against Montanism, fragments of which are preserved by Eusebius (H. E. v. 16, 17). On the supposition that this reference was a note by Eusebius or by some ancient scholiast, Valesius, Tillemont, Cave and others have ascribed to Asterius the authorship of the work in question. But it would seem from the context that Eusebius was ignorant of the author's name; Rufinus, against internal evidence, ascribes the work to Apollinaris; Jerome, with less improbability, to Rhodo. And since, according to the most obvious interpretation, the reference to Asterius forms part of the quotation, Asterius was probably a Montanist replied to by the writer. [G. S.]

ASUAM. [AVAN.]

ATARBIUS, bishop of NEOCAESAREA. He was apparently a relation of St. Basil (Ep. 210), but there had been an estrangement between them, and Basil writes to him urging him to break his long silence and to resume friendly relations for the sake of the Church (Ep. 61). He does not appear to have responded to this appeal. At a later date we find him calumniating Basil and alleging as authority for his calumnies a special revelation which had been vouchsafed to him in dreams. At the same time he himself was betrayed into the errors of Sabellianism. To correct these irregularities, Basil sought a personal interview with him at Nicopolis, where he was present at a synod; but, hearing of Basil's approach, he left precipitately, though the synod was still sitting (Ep. 126, 204, 207, 210). At the Council of Constantinople (A.D. 381) we find him subscribing through Cyril the reader (Labbe, Conc. ii. 1136, ed. Coleti).

Tillemont (ix. 197 sq.) makes him an Armenian bishop; but there can be little doubt that his see was Neocaesarea; for (1) he is so designated in some MSS. of Basil's letters; (2) the character and circumstances of Atarbius, described in Ep. 61, 126, entirely agree with those of the unnamed bishop of Neocaesarea referred to in Ep. 204, 207, 210 (see Garnier Basil, Op. iii. p. cxxv); (3) in the Acts of the Council of Constantinople he represents the province of Pontus Polemoniaca, of which Neocaesarea was the metropolis. [L.]

ATHANASIUS (St.), Archbishop of Alexandria. The materials for the biography of this great prelate may be thus described:—(1.) His own memoirs, as they may be called, or "Historical Tracts," as they are entitled in the "Library of the Fathers," including his great Apology (so-called) against the Arians, two Encyclics, the Apology to Constantius, the Apology for his Flight, a Letter to Serapion, a Letter to the Monks prefatory to a History of the Arians; to which must be added many passages, in other writings of his, which illustrate his history. (2.) Notices by contemporary Fathers, as Hilary, Basil, Gregory Nazianzen, and Epiphanius; but as to some of these caution is necessary, e.g. Gregory is not historically exact, and Epiphanius relied too much on some questionable information. (3.) Chronicles, or Fragments of Chronicles, as the Index prefixed to his recently discovered Festal Letters, and the Fragmentum Maffeanum, published from the Chapter Library of Verona, in 1742, by Maffei, and supposed by Mansi to be the Latin version of annals written at Alexandria about A.D. 385. Valuable as these are, they contain some manifest errors. (4.) Subsequent church historians, as Sulpicius Severus, Rufinus, Socrates, Sozomen, Theodoret. Montfaucon says (in Vit. Ath. Monitum) that Sulpicius' notices of the subject are meagre and of little value, and that Rufinus is credulous and "negligentiae nomine suspectus." We may add, Socrates—although it would not be correct to call him a mere copyist of Athanasius—is by no means worthy of implicit trust when his narrative takes a different line; in fact, as Montfaucon observes, "quam in ordine et tempore perturbationem attulerit pluribus est alias commonstratum," and his dates, which used to be thought safe landmarks, are now much questioned. Montfaucon says more in favour of Sozomen than is, perhaps, usual; and sets his authority far above that of Socrates, considering him to have had access to some valuable memoranda. He proceeds to assign a certain amount of value, on a similar ground, to the generally brief and confused narrative of Theodoret (to whom we owe a fragment of one of Athanasius' letters). He describes Gelasius of Cyzicus as "generally trifling, but as having done some service." Of the much earlier "Life of Pachomius," as contributing some materials, he speaks very highly: of the Greek Lives of Athanasius, his judgment is naturally contemptuous: one, by an anonymous writer, is wholly worthless—that which was read by Photius, and included in his "Library," and which he described as "tending towards carelessness rather than exactness," is "quisquillae sine pari:" of the "Vita ex Metaphraste" he judges more leniently, but thinks it of no great use. An Arabic Life, translated by Renaudot, and by him communicated to Montfaucon, is characterized by the "stupendous ignorance and silliness" of the Copts for whom it was compiled. The Bollandist Life (May 2) speaks similarly of these Greek productions as "undeserving of insertion:" "omnes isdem laborant defectibus." Montfaucon's own Latin Life stands on an eminence among good biographies. Tillemont's 8th volume of Mémoires contains an elaborate Life, with notes. Cave has a full memoir of St. Athanasius in his Lives of the Fathers; a shorter in his Historia Litteraria. Möhler's volume on Athanasius the Great, published in 1827, is rather an exposition of his work as a theologian than a record of his life: it is admirably described by the English translator of his Symbolism. The references in the following account will be made to the Benedictine edition, which is included with supplementary matter in Migne's series.

The life of Athanasius divides itself naturally into seven sections, respectively terminated by (1) his consecration; (2) his first exile; (3) his second exile; (4) his second return; (5) his third exile; (6) his fourth exile; (7) his death.

1. From his birth to his consecration.—He was born, it appears, at Alexandria; a letter of Constantine, recalling him from his second exile, seems to refer to that city as his "native home" (Apol. c. Ar. 51). Of his family circumstances we only know that his aunt suffered much from Arian cruelty during his second exile; that, by his own account to Constantine, he had but scanty private means; and that his father's tomb was at some distance from the city. (Hist. Ar. 13; Ap. c. Ar. 9; Socr. iv. 13.) We must date his birth at about A.D. 296; not earlier, because he had no personal remembrance of the persecution under Maximian in 303 (Hist. Ar. 64), and was comparatively a young man when consecrated bishop, soon after the Nicene Council; not later, because he received some theological instruction from persons who suffered in the persecution under Maximian II. in 311 (De Incarn. 56), and the first two of his treatises appear to have been written before 319. Of his boyhood there is a story which was first told by Rufinus (i. 14), and after him by other authors, and which many English readers know through a poem in Keble's Lyra Innocentium.^a Alexander, bishop of Alexandria—so runs the tale—was one day looking from the windows of a house belonging to him near the sea, and saw some boys on the beach, playing, as it seemed, at an imitation of Church ceremonial. After watching them some time with interest, he began to think that their game was touching too nearly on things especially sacred; he called them before him in the presence of some clergy, and ascertained that one of the boys, named Athanasius, had acted the part of a bishop, and as such had baptized some of his companions who were as yet unchristened. Alexander, after consulting with his clergy, resolved to recognize this baptism as valid; and commended the boy-bishop, and other boys who had acted as ministrants, to their respective relations, to be trained for the actual service of the Church. The story, though set aside by several high authorities,^b is considered by Dean Stanley

^a "Enacting Holy Rites." Rufinus, who loves a detailed story, says that Alexander, after the service on the anniversary of bishop Peter's martyrdom, was expecting some clergy to dine with him.

^b E. g. Cave says, "Fabulam certe esse et nunc et olim suspicatus sum." And see Tillemont, and the Benedictines. Neale (Hist. Alex. i. 153) calls it, "to say the least, very doubtful."

to have "every indication of truth." (Lect. East. Ch. p. 264.) But, apart from any difficulty as to the resolution ascribed to Alexander, the chronological objection appears quite fatal.^c When Alexander came, in 313, to the episcopate, Athanasius must have been about seventeen years old, and within six years he came forward as a theologian. But the legend, if we are so to consider it, may well represent thus much of truth, that the young Athanasius shewed the promise of a high vocation; and that Alexander, by whatever means he first came under his notice, regarded him as probably destined to do great things in the cause of Christ. There can be no reason to doubt that, ere long, Athanasius became an inmate of the good prelate's house, as his companion and secretary (Soz. ii. 17). The position involved great advantages. The place held by Alexander as "successor of St. Mark," and occupant of "the Evangelical throne," was second in the Christian hierarchy: we may call the bishops of Alexandria in the 4th century, for convenience's sake, Archbishops^d or Patriarchs, although the former name was then very rarely applied to them, and the latter not at all, and they were frequently designated, though not in contradistinction to all other prelates,^e by the title of Papas (Pope) or "dear father." Their power throughout the churches of Egypt, Libya, and Pentapolis, was, by ancient custom, which the Nicene Council afterwards confirmed, almost monarchical, extending over about a hundred bishops, who revered their judgments as the decisions of the see of Rome were revered in Italy.^f To be admitted then to the intimacy of a "Pope" Alexander was for Athanasius a high privilege; and to live, "as a son with a father,"^g under the roof of one "beloved for the sweetness of his disposition,"^h must have been a happiness often recalled to mind in the storms and conflicts of after life. And the young secretary was one who had enjoyed other opportunities for thought, observation, and study, which he had carefully improved. From childhood he had lived in a city which was "an emporium for the interchange of ideas and speculations, along with the products of various climes and industries:"ⁱ where different nationalities jostled each other, and different streams of thought ran side by side. He was familiar with Paganism in divers forms: the towering mass of the Serapeion would be to him an embodiment of a native idolatry which, if dying, was not yet near its death; Osiris was still annually lamented, and Isis, Apis, and the Nile were still adored; Hadrian's visit to Alexandria was remembered; the apotheosis of Roman emperors would be, for Athanasius, an illustration of the Euhemeristic theory which he had learned to adopt as to the origin of the gods of Heathendom.^k He must have seen Judaism, in its most stubborn and self-asserting mood, established in two of the five regions of the city.^l He must have heard echoes of the Neo-platonism of Plotinus: he had probably fallen in with Manicheans:^m his studies of "grammar" and "rhetoric" had introduced him to Homerⁿ and to Plato, and trained, as Möhler observes, his logical ability: he accustomed himself to the consideration of such hypotheses as pantheism and materialism: he became an enthusiast for the argument from design to a Creator, and for the proof of a soul from the instinctive yearnings after immortality.^o According to one writer,^p he added to his other studies that of the Roman law. But all these, it is evident, were subordinated, in his mind, to the great object of becoming "a scribe instructed unto the kingdom of heaven:"^q Christian theology constituted his chief interest, and to him was given that high endowment which could alone make versatility and manifold cultivation truly precious—a commanding and elevating simplicity of aim. And for this special work of his life his antecedents had already been preparing him. He had seen what a Pagan persecution was like, especially when carried on by such a savage as Maximin II.: he had hung, as a boy of fourteen or fifteen, on the life of teachers who were shortly to seal their teaching with their blood. If he was too young to know personally the martyr-bishop Phileas of Thmuis, who confessed so earnestly the Divinity of the Crucified, he must have seen and spoken to some who had imbibed his spirit and followed in his footsteps; and he may well have learned to associate his own bishop Peter's constancy unto death with devotion to Him who, being "by nature God, became by nature man" (S. Petr. Alex.

^c The Bollandist Life of Athanasius indeed, by placing the death of bishop Peter at the beginning of the persecution, avoids this difficulty: and, as to the "baptism," refers to Athanasius's "gratia pæcox."

^d See Athan. Apol. c. Ar. 71. It is questioned whether "archbishop" in the catalogue of Meletians refers to Alexander or to Meletius.

ap. Routh, Rel. Sacr. iv. 48; cf. Athan. Orat. iii. 41, 51; c. Apollin. i. 7). Intercourse with such heroic souls would tend to form in the young listener the heroism, not less true nor less religious, which was to bear him so well through the "long tragedy" (Hooker, v. 42. 5) of his own future: it would fill him, once for all, with a profound sense of the realities of Christianity; and his career is best appreciated when we recognize in him the confessor's spirit (See Ep. ad Ep. Aeg. 21). Even after the persecution was over, he would have constant evidence of the severity of the struggle which Christianity was still called upon to wage. Those hard Alexandrian mockeries which Hadrian had found so biting were levelled mercilessly at a religion which proclaimed an Incarnation and a Cross (De Incarn. 41, 48), and whose votaries had but lately been hurried in masses to a death of shame and torture. And one experience of a different kind, most fruitful in its consequences, was Athanasius' acquaintance with the great hermit Antony. He tells us, in his Life of Antony,^r that he often saw him; and although that reading of the conclusion of the preface which makes him say that "he himself for some time attended on him, and poured water on his hands," may be considered doubtful, yet we know that he was afterwards spoken of as "the ascetic," and that when, years later, he took shelter in the cells of the monks of Egypt, he found himself perfectly at home.^s He contracted an admiration for monasticism, which will not surprise those who remember that the spiritual intensity of the Christian life had found a most emphatic, though a one-sided expression, in such a life as was being led by men who fled, like Antony, from a society at once tainted and brutalized beyond all modern conception. The self-sacrifice of the monk seemed akin to the self-devotion of the confessor; and the morbid and eccentric elements in the rising institution were less observable in Antony's own case^t than in many others. The old hermit's energetic Christian zeal, his practical sense and sober-mindedness, not unmixed with humour, his serene courage, his deep tenderness, even the outward charm of a face that never lost its bright tranquillity, and that must have seemed especially radiant when in the last days of persecution he stood, conspicuous by his white cloak newly washed, in the very path of the praefect at Alexandria—all this union of sweetness and strength would act irresistibly on the imagination and affections of Athanasius (Vit. Ant. 67, 46); nor is it fanciful to think that he may often in subsequent troubles have "thanked God and taken courage," when remembering Antony's sentiment, once expressed in Coptic to younger monks

^r "I conceive," says Dr. Newman, "no question can be raised with justice about its substantial integrity" (Church of the Fathers, p. 176). So Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 193, where he owns that it contains some things "tanto viro indigna," and refers to Dupin's "ingenious" admission that it may be partially interpolated. Such a book was, indeed, almost certain to receive some additions from readers who thought they could enrich the common store of recollections of Antony.

^s Cf. Vit. Ant. 44, where the monastic retreats are compared to the "goodly tents of Jacob." And see the address of the Letter to the Monks, citing Matt. xix. 27.

^t It is not meant that they were absent in his case (e. g., see Vit. Ant. 45), or that Athanasius's judgment on such points in Antony was necessarily sound.

—"that the longest life of 'spiritual training' was nothing to the ages of ages and the Crown" (Vit. Ant. 16).

The two essays of Athanasius, Against the Gentiles and On the Incarnation, which form one complete work addressed to a convert from Heathenism, cannot be dated later than the end of 318; for they make no reference to the Arian controversy which broke out in 319. Dörner, in his work On the Person of Christ, has given a résumé of their argument on the threefold subject of God, man, and the Incarnate Word; and Möhler calls the book on the Incarnation "the first attempt that had been made to present Christianity and the chief circumstances of the life of Jesus Christ under a scientific aspect. By the sure tact of his noble and Christian nature, everything is referred to the Person of the Redeemer: everything rests upon Him; He appears throughout." These words account for the theological greatness attained by the young author, who seems to have been ordained deacon about this time, and placed in the position of chief among the Alexandrian deacons. Thus drawn into yet closer relations with his bishop, he was to him, doubtless, what St. Laurence was to Sixtus II. of Rome; and gave him effective help when Arius, one of the parish priests, while taxing Alexander with Sabellianism, expressly denied, on grounds which may be called rationalistic, (1) the eternity, (2) the uncreatedness^u of the Son of God. [ALEXANDER; ARIUS.] Among the clergy who joined the archbishop in calling on Arius to retract, and who afterwards assented to his deposition, was the young archdeacon of Alexandria. (See the Benedictine Athanasius, i. 396 sq.) To ascribe the line which he took to loyal feeling for a benignant superior, to mere polemical partisanship, or to mere ecclesiastical conservatism, would be to misread his character and to lose the lesson of his life. The greatness of the issue was never absent from his mind. The affinity of the Arian hypothesis to older heresies, and, in one respect, to ethnic habits of thought^v (De Syn. 50; Orat. iii. 16); its remarkable incoherency in starting from the premises, "A father must be prior to a son," and presenting a conclusion which separated the Son from the Father's essence (cf. Orat. c. Ar. i. 26); its strange tendency to promote irreverence, and to fight its way with unhallowed weapons—all this he saw: but his hostility to Arianism would be best summed up by saying, with Dörner, that "it was his intuitional perception of the Redeemer in His totality that marked out for Athanasius the direction which he ought to pursue;"—and it was in this spirit that he attended Alexander to the Nicene Council in 325.

^u Cf. Athan. ad Ep. Aeg. 12, de Decr. 6, Orat. c. Ar. i. 5; Soc. i. 5, 6. The position that the Son was a creature implied that He had once, at any rate, been capable of moral fall. See, on the Arian phrase τρεπτόν, Athan. Orat. i. 33.

^v The Ditheistic tendencies of Arianism gave a great advantage to the Catholics; and Athanasius's pure and severe Monotheism comes out in such passages as Orat. iii. 16, De Decr. 11. See Merivale's Conversion of the Empire, p. 135 sq. In another point of view, Athanasius frequently charges the Arians with Judicial tendencies, as in Orat. iii. 27, De Decret. 10. In De Synod. 20, he traces Arianism up to the Humanitarian Artemas, and then to the Jews who condemned our Lord (i. e. for claiming Divinity).

And in that great assembly he is represented by Gregory of Nazianzum (Orat. 21) as "foremost among those who were in attendance on bishops," and as "doing his utmost to stay the plague."† We can picture him as he stood forward, with the diminutive figure that Julian afterwards sneered at, and the beautiful face that Gregory compared to an angel's; his keen eyes watching the Arianizers, who in hasty private conference were arranging evasive senses in which they could accept the phrases suggested by the majority (De Decr. 20; Ad Afr. 5); his readiness as a disputant, and his richness as an interpreter of Scripture, making him already a great power at a great crisis. His writings may assure us of the argument which he would maintain; that the real Divinity of the Saviour was (1) asserted in many places of Scripture, (2) involved in the notion of His unique Sonship,‡ (3) required by the Divine economy of redemption, and (4) attested by the immemorial consciousness of the Church. And although, as he himself informs us, the Council would willingly have confined themselves to purely Scriptural terms (De Decr. 19) if their legitimate sense could have been bonâ fide admitted; although too he was far from imagining that any form or expression of human thought would adequately represent a Divine mystery;§ yet his convictions went thoroughly with the adoption of the term "Homooousion" or "co-essential," explained, as it was, ¶ in a sense which made it simply equivalent to "truly Son of God," and proposed as a test of adherence to the Scriptural Christology. And if we are to understand his mind at the close of the council, we must say that he regarded its proceedings as something done, in fact, "for the rightful honour of Jesus."‡ Nothing was to him more certain than that Jesus was, in the full force of the words, God Incarnate; that Arianism was essentially a denial, and the "Homooousion" the now authenticated symbol, of this His claim on men's absolute devotion; and that it was infinitely worth while to go through any amount of work or suffering in defence of such a truth, and in the cause of such a Master.

† The Bollandist Life cites the Greek Menæa for Jan. 18, as describing his personal appearance,—stooping, bald, with an aquiline nose, a small mouth, Auburn hair, &c.

‡ It must be remembered, that whereas the Arian theology, properly speaking, viewed the Son as a creature (however exalted and glorious), made after the likeness of the impersonal Word, Athanasius identified the Son, admitted to be personal, with the Word, admitted to be eternal. See Orat. ii. 37.

¶ See De Decr. 20, De Synod. 39, 41, 45, 48, 54. Compare Ad Afros. 6. He laid stress on its having been used before as a test of orthodoxy, and carefully guarded against materializing misinterpretations of its real purport. His argument perpetually comes to this: "Either own Him to be Homooousios, or plainly call Him a creature." The Arian assertion, that the Son was per se morally "mutable," was to Athanasius a reductio ad horribile of Arianism.

More work was near at hand, and suffering was not far off. A passage in Athanasius's Apology against the Arians (c. 59) has usually been taken to fix the death of Alexander within five months from the close of the Nicene Council, i. e. in January 326; but if it could be understood as reckoning from the reception by Alexander of the Meletian sectaries [MELETIUS] into the Church, according to a Nicene resolution, we might adopt the date fixed by Coptic authorities, the 22nd of Pharmuthi, or 17th of April, in the Easter-tide of 326.^d Alexander, it seems, had already discharged, for the year in which he died, an annual duty imposed by the Nicene Council on his see—that of announcing the days on which, according to Alexandrian science, Lent would begin and Easter would fall, first by a "Festal Letter" to his own people, and then also to the bishop of Rome, who was to give information, as Leo the Great afterwards expressed it, "to more distant churches" (Leo, Ep. 121; Le Quien, ii. 377). A solemn and touching incident of Alexander's last moments is connected with the history of Athanasius, who was then absent from Alexandria, perhaps on some mission from the archbishop himself to the Court, unless we suppose that he purposely retired in order to avoid election as successor. The dying man, while his clergy stood around him, called for Athanasius. One of those present, also bearing that name, answered, but was not noticed by the archbishop, who again repeated the name, and added, "You think to escape—but it cannot be." Some time appears to have elapsed between his death and the assembling of the Egyptian bishops to consecrate a successor. Of their proceedings we have, on the one hand, an Arian account, more or less detailed; as, that seven prelates, despite their vow to elect in open synod, clandestinely laid hands on Athanasius; or, that he with some followers seized a church by night, compelled two bishops, whom he found there, to consecrate him, procured by fraud an imperial sanction of his appointment, and employed the civil power to wreak his vengeance on those who shrank from his communion (Soz. ii. 17; Philo-

^d The Index of the recently discovered Festal Letters of St. Athanasius, while agreeing as to the day, gives the year 323. But this index is not of first-rate authority: see it on Ep. 3 and 8. This date cannot stand with the words of Athanasius, unless we suppose (which is surely improbable) that the reception of the Meletians was delayed for nearly two years. Meletius's own character has long been problematical. Athanasius declares that he was convicted by bishop Peter of escaping from persecution by apostasy, and that he thereupon formed a schismatic sect (Apol. c. Ar. 59). Epiphanius (Hæc. 68), relying on Meletian authorities, makes Meletius a brave confessor, who took a strict view of the case of the lapsed. It is difficult to resist the force of Athanasius's express statement; yet we may observe that it was made many years after the schism began; that Athanasius was disposed to believe the worst about a bitterly hostile faction; that the letter of the Nicene Council speaks only of the "disorderly" conduct of Meletius; and that the "Maffelan Fragments" ascribe the schism to his irregularly ordaining clergy outside his own diocese, on plea of necessity during the persecution.

‡ The statement of Epiphanius, that Achillas succeeded instead of preceding Alexander, is one of his manifest mistakes. What he adds, as to the Meletians setting up one Theonas as a rival bishop, looks rather like a Meletian storg. ii, 11). On the other hand, an encyclical letter of these same Egyptian prelates—of whom Gibbon says, that they can scarcely be supposed to have solemnly attested “a public falsehood” (D. and F. c. 21) proclaimed to all Christendom, some years later, that a majority of them had elected Athanasius in the presence, and amid the applause, of the whole Alexandrian laity, who for days and nights persevered in demanding him as “the good, pious, ascetic Christian,” who would prove a “genuine bishop,” and prayed aloud to Christ for the fulfilment of their desire (Apol. c. Ar. 6). It was granted; and then, in the words of Gregory, “by the suffrages of the whole people, and not by those vile methods, afterwards prevalent, of force and bloodshed, but in a manner apostolic and spiritual, was Athanasius elevated to the throne of Mark,” some time after the beginning of May in 326, and very probably on the 14th of Payni, or 8th of June,—the day of the month, though not the year, given in the Index of the Festal Letters. (On the question of the mode of appointment of Alexandrian patriarchs, see ALEXANDER: it will suffice here to say that the story told 600 years later by Eutychius, as to a presbyteral college laying hands on the predecessors of Athanasius, is apparently an erroneous form of Jerome’s statement as to the election of early bishops to this see.)

II. From his consecration to his first exile.—It is usual to place at the outset of his archiepiscopate the organization of the Church in Ethiopia or Abyssinia. He was sitting in synod with other prelates, when a person just arrived from that country requested a hearing. His name, he said, was Frumentius. He and his brother Aedesius, Christians of Tyre, had some years before, when in their boyhood, accompanied their kinsman, a philosopher named Meropius, on a journey to Ethiopia. Their vessel, on their return, had put in at a port in the Red Sea; and they alone had escaped death at the hands of savage natives, had been sold as slaves to the king, and had become his confidential servants. After his death, Frumentius had been made guardian of his son, and in that position had done his utmost to provide places of worship for his fellow-Christians resident in the country for purposes of trade, and to facilitate the spread of Christian ideas among the people. The young king had now assumed the government, and the brothers, resisting his and his mother’s request that they would remain in Ethiopia, had returned to “the Roman world.” But while Aedesius had hastened home,^f Frumentius, feeling that “it was not right to conceal the Lord’s work,” had come to beg that the Church of Alexandria would send a bishop to build up a Church in the land which he had loved. “And who,” answered Athanasius, “can be so fitted as yourself for such a work?” With the assent of story. In one of his two passages on the subject he makes Theonas sole bishop. The Festal Index dates Athanasius’s election on 14th Payni = June 8. If this interval elapsed, the custom mentioned by Liberatus, Breviar. 20, that the patriarch elect kept watch by the corpse of the dead patriarch, placed its right hand on his own head, and took from its neck the pall of St. Mark, “et tunc legitime sedere,” was not observed in this case.

^f He there took orders, and from his lips, many years later, Rufinus (l. 9) heard the narrative. See also Socr. i. 19, Soz. ii. 24. Rufinus says that Aedesius, whom the king made his cup-bearer, was endowed simply with “pure faith and a sober mind.”

the other prelates, Frumentius was forthwith consecrated. He returned to Abyssinia, fixed his see at Axum, was supported in his mission by the princes whom he had served, and left a name honoured for ages in the Abyssinian Church as “Fremonatos” and as “Abba Salama,” who had “kindled in Ethiopia the splendour of the light of Christ.”

Another event of these comparatively quiet times was Athanasius’s visitation of the Thebaid, a region where much trouble was being caused by the Arians, and by the Meletians, who resisted his earnest efforts to repress their separatist tendency.^g Pachomius, the first organizer of the coenobitic life, came forth from his monastery at Tabenne (or Tabennesus), with a choir of monks, to greet the archbishop; but finding that a probable result would be his own elevation to the priesthood, his humility^h induced him to hide himself in the thong, and gaze, unobserved, at Athanasius “in navi existentem.” “Cognovit,” adds the biographer, “esse verum Dei famulum,” who possessed great powers of endurance in the cause of the faith.

And now began the troubles which tested those powers to the utmost, and of which Hooker says, with but little of exaggeration, that “the Arians never suffered Athanasius, till the last hour of his life in this world, to enjoy the comfort of a peaceable day” (Eccl. Pol. v. 42. 2). It was probably in 330 that he had his first severe experience of their hatred. Constantine “the Great” was not great in his extreme susceptibility of opposite influences. Eusebius of Nicomedia, whose credit with his sister had given him a strong position at court, had, at the outset of the Arian controversy, contrived to make the emperor (as yet, and until his last illness, unbaptized) assume a tone of anti-dogmatic indifference (see his letter to Alexander and Arius, Soc. i. 7). After the Nicene Council, he had become a zealot for orthodoxy; or rather, perhaps, he had tried to establish peace in the Church by penal laws against Arianism. Eusebius had fallen under his displeasure on this account, and had been exiled. But he had procured his recall by orthodox professions; it may have been by his means that Arius himself was recalled, perhaps in November 330; and he now became the originator of the worldly and disingenuous policy which was so successful in “embellishing” Arianism (Newman’s Arians, c. 3, § 2), and concealing its true character from the unsuspecting. He now entered into a league with the Meletians of Egypt,ⁱ of whom a bishop named John Arcaph was the head. “He bought them,” says Athanasius, “by large promises, and arranged that they should help him on any emergency” by that machinery of false accusation which they had already employed against three archbishops. The charges were not to be ⁱ This was admitted, and lamented, by Epiphanius’s Meletian authorities. Compare Epiph. Haer. 68. 6 with Athan. Apol. 59.

^g This, which we learn from Epiphanius (Haer. 69. 11; in 68. 6, he says, Athanasius “tried to compel them into unity,” but this may be an exaggeration), appears a trustworthy piece of information, amid a heap of Meletian romance.

^h See Gibbon, c. 37; and for Pachomius’s rule, Soz. iii. 14. Jerome also gives it. Tillemont dates this journey of Athanasius some years later (viii. 30).

theological; to attack Athanasius's teaching would be to declare against the Nicene doctrine, and this was a step on which Eusebius could not venture. He began by writing to Athanasius in behalf of Arius, and urging^k that, as a man whose opinions had been seriously misrepresented, he ought in justice to be received to Church communion. Athanasius's answer shews the ground on which he took his stand, and proves (if proof were wanting) that his readiness to "confront the world" for his belief was wholly unconnected with religious individualism.^l "It cannot be right to admit persons to Communion who invented a heresy contrary to the truth, and were anathematized by the Oecumenical Council." It is probable that (as Fleury thinks, though Tillemont and Neander date it much later) we should refer to this period the visit of Antony to Alexandria (Vit. Ant. 69), when he confounded the Arians' report that he "agreed with them," by exhorting the crowds attracted by his presence to hold no fellowship with deniers of the Eternity of the Word. This would be a great support to Athanasius. But, although hitherto baffled, Eusebius had recourse to Constantine, who thereupon wrote, commanding Athanasius to admit into the Church "all who desired it," on pain of being removed from his see by sheer State power.^m This gave him an opportunity of laying before Constantine his own views of his duty. "There could be no fellowship," he wrote, "between the Catholic Church of Christ and the heresy that was fighting against Him"—a phrase which frequently recurs, with much significance, in his controversial works. This, for the present, satisfied Constantine; but we may gather from the opening of Athanasius's Festal Letter of 331 that some vexatious charge—probably that of factious motives, which Eusebius would be ready to impute to him—had given him at this time some trouble. Not long afterwards, in compliance with instructions from Eusebius, three Meletians, Ision, Eudaemon, and Callinicus, appeared before the emperor, then at Nicomedia, with a chargeⁿ against Athanasius that he had assumed the powers of the government by taxing Egypt to provide linen vestments^o for the church of Alexandria. But two of Athanasius's priests, happening to be at court, at once refuted this calumny; and Constantine wrote to Athanasius, condemning his accusers, and summoning him to Nicomedia. Eusebius however persuaded the accusers to meet him on his arrival with a bolder charge than that of actual treason; "he had sent a purse of gold to Philumenus, a rebel." This, being easily overthrown, ^k In an oral message he spoke menacingly of what he would do if Athanasius were uncomplying. Gibbon has wrongly ascribed these menaces to Constantine, c. 21. Cf. Athan. Apol. l. c.

^l See also Orat. c. Ar. i. 7, 37, iii. 28, 58; De Decr. 27; De Syn. 14; Ad Epict. 3. Few points in his mind are more striking than the harmonious combination of the "scripturalist" with the ecclesiastical principle.

^m Soc. i. 27, also gives the letter.

ⁿ Another charge, that of having been consecrated too young, is the only one mentioned in the Festal Index; but Athanasius, in Apol. 60, is silent about it; and see note to Fest. Epp. Lib. Fath. p. 31.

^o Sticharia, i. e. white tunics, or albs. See Sulzer; Goar, Eucholog. pp. 59, 110; Neale, Intr. East. Ch. l. 306. That this and like charges should have been even thought of, shows the great position of the "Evangelical" see.

was at once followed up by the famous story of the broken chalice. A certain Ischyras had for some years pretended to the character of a presbyter, although an Alexandrian council had pronounced him a layman, as having been ordained, not by a bishop, but by a schismatical presbyter named Colluthus (Apol. 12, 74, 76).^p He persisted in officiating at a little hamlet called "the Peace of Sacontarurum," in the Mareotis; his congregation consisted of a very few persons, including his father and near relations, and the services were held in the house of an orphan boy. Athanasius, being informed of this while on a visitation tour, sent a priest named Macarius, with the actual pastor of the district, to summon Ischyras before him. Finding that he was ill, they conveyed the episcopal rebuke through his father; but Ischyras, on recovering, when his friends declined to continue their support, attached himself to the Meletians, who were glad to get a footing in the Mareotis.^q They now resolved to use him as a tool, and by threats, and even blows, made him declare that Macarius had found him in church, in the act of "offering the oblations," had thrown down the holy table, broken the chalice, and burned the church books; of which sacrilege Athanasius was to share the responsibility. But he was able to prove before Constantine, who heard both this and the preceding charge at a suburb of Nicomedia, called Psummathia, that, point by point, it was a falsehood. There was no church in the hamlet; the day in question there could have been no celebration of the Eucharist, even had Ischyras been competent to celebrate, for it was a common week day, and he happened to be lying sick in his cell; and, lastly, he was not competent, for he was not a priest by lawful ordination.^r The result is told by Athanasius, not only in his Apology, but in his fourth Festal Letter, written "from the Court," in the early part of 332, but somewhat later than his usual time. He had been suffering from long illness; but he rejoiced to tell his brethren in Egypt that his Meletian assailants had been driven away as convicted slanderers. About Mid-lent he returned home, with a letter from Constantine reprobating his enemies and praising him as "a man of God," and then Ischyras came to him, asking to be received into the Church, and piteously protesting that the Meletians had set him on to assert a falsehood. He signed, in presence of thirteen clergy, a statement denying the whole charge, and declaring that he had made it, so to speak, under duress. But his penitence was not thought trustworthy; he was not admitted to communion; and the story, perhaps in consequence, was ere long revived in an aggravated form—Athanasius himself being now called the perpetrator of the outrage (Apol. 62, 64, 28, 74, 17, 65, 68).

^p The case is commonly cited as shewing that ordination by a presbyter was considered invalid.

^q Athan. Apol. 85, 77, 76, 63. Some of his friends were afterwards frightened into siding with him (ib. 75).

^r See Apol. 11, 28, 46, 63. On Saturday, as well as on Sunday, the Eucharist was usually celebrated in Egyptian churches and monasteries. The prominence given to the "breaking of the chalice" is fully explained by observing that it implied an outrage done to the Sacrament itself (see Julius, in Apol. 30), the attack being said to have been made at the time of consecration. When the Egyptian bishops, in their remarks on the case, say there was no chalice, they mean none used for any legitimate celebration.

A darker plot, however, followed. John Arcaph persuaded a Meletian bishop, named Arsenius, to go into hiding. A rumour was then spread that he had been murdered, and dismembered for purposes of magic, by Athanasius; in proof of which the Meletians, "with feigned lamentations," exhibited a dead man's hand in a wooden box (Apol. 63, 42; Soc. i. 27; Soz. ii. 25; Theod. i. 30). The emperor heard of it, and was persuaded to think it a case for inquiry. Athanasius received from Dalmatius the censor, Constantine's half-brother, a formal summons to appear at Antioch and stand his trial. At first he disdained to take any steps; but, "since the emperor was moved," as he himself tells us, he wrote, apparently while on a tour in Pentapolis and Ammoniacæ,* to his "fellow-ministers in Egypt," and sent a deacon to search for the missing Arsenius. The deacon went to the Thebaid, Arsenius's country, and ascertained that Arsenius was concealed in a monastery at Ptemencyreis, on the eastern side of the Nile. Before he could arrive there, Pinnes, the superior, had been forewarned, and had promptly sent off Arsenius into Lower Egypt; but was himself arrested by the deacon, carried before one of the "dukes" of Egypt (see Gibbon, ii. 320) at Alexandria, and obliged to confess—as he informed John Arcaph in a singular letter, which somehow fell into Athanasius's hands—"that Arsenius was alive, and had not been murdered." To track the dead-alive was the next point, and a trivial incident led to his discovery. At Tyre, the servants of Archelaus, a consular, happened to hear it said in a tavern that Arsenius was hidden in one of the houses of the city. They marked the speaker's face, and told their master. The clue was taken up, the house searched, and a man found, who denied that he was the person sought for, until placed before the tribunal of Paul, the bishop, who had known Arsenius of old; whereupon, as Tillemont quaintly phrases it, "il fut convaincu d'être lui-même." Constantine stopped the proceedings at Antioch on hearing of this exposure, and sent Athanasius a letter, to be read frequently in public, in which the Meletians were warned that any fresh offences of theirs would be dealt with by the emperor in person, and according to the civil law (Apol. 9, 68).

The slandered archbishop had now a breathing time. Alexander, the aged bishop of Thessalonica, a right-minded though somewhat weak man, who had sat in the Nicene Council, sent to his "dear lord and son" a letter of congratulation; he had rejoiced, he said, to hear that Arcaph the calumniator (ὁ συκοφάντης) had come to disgrace. Arcaph himself "came into the church," was admitted to communion, blamed his own conduct, announced to Constantine his reconciliation with Athanasius, and received a gracious reply; while Arsenius sent to his "blessed Pope," in his own name and that of his clergy, a formal renunciation of schism, and a promise of canonical obedience to "the church over which, by the grace of God, you preside:" a promise which he kept (Apol. 66, 17, 70, 69, 8, 27).

† See Apol. 67. It was probably intercepted by the friends of Athanasius. "The thing," writes Pinnes, "can no longer be kept a secret."

But the faction had not repented. Eusebius persuaded Constantine that such grave scandals as the recent charges ought to be examined in a council; and that Caesarea, the see of his namesake the historian, would be the fitting place. There, accordingly, a council was summoned early in 333; but it did not meet until 334. (See Tillemont, Ath. a. 15; cf. Festal Epp. index, for A.D. 334). Athanasius expected no justice from a synod held under such circumstances, and persisted. Sozomen says (ii. 25), "for thirty months" in his refusal to attend. This, of course, was represented as contumacy; and being at last peremptorily ordered by Constantine to attend a council which was to meet at Tyre (shortly before the contemplated dedication of the new church of the Resurrection at Jerusalem), he obeyed, in the summer of 335, and was attended by about fifty of his suffragans, who, on arriving, were indignant at being introduced into the assembly "not by deacons, but by a registrar of indictments," and protested, by Athanasius's mouth, against several bishops present as disqualified by partisanship from being judges of his cause. (Apol. 8, 78; see Hooker, v. 42. 2.) Although the large gathering included several who were not Arianizers, Athanasius saw at once that his enemies were dominant; the presiding bishop, Flacillus of Antioch, was one of an Arian succession. Macarius was dragged before the council in chains; he himself had to stand up as a defendant, and, according to Epiphanius (Haer. 68. 7), an old Egyptian bishop, Potammon, who had lost an eye in the great persecution, asked Eusebius of Caesarea, with a bitter taunt, how he dared to sit as judge of "the innocent Athanasius." The Count Dionysius, appointed by the emperor to keep order, was mostly swayed by Eusebian influences. Ischyra appeared among the accusers. New charges were added to the old ones; some of these referred to the time of Athanasius's election. He was also said to have thrown down an episcopal chair (covered, as usual, with linen, Apol. 17); to have caused Ischyra to be imprisoned on a charge of pelting the emperor's statues; to have deprived, excommunicated, and exposed to military cruelties, a bishop named Callinicus, for suspecting him in the case of the chalice; to have given the see to a priest who had been deposed, and to have ill-treated other bishops for disowning his authority. A document was read, purporting to express the repugnance of the Alexandrian laity to join with him in worship. Some of the charges Athanasius at once confuted; as to others he demanded time. His suffragans were interrupted when they offered evidence in his favour, while even convicted slanderers found indulgence. Incredible as it may seem, the dead man's hand, in the box, was again exhibited; a cry of horror arose, and Athanasius calmly asked, "Did any one here know Arsenius?" Many replied, "We knew him." Athanasius led forward a man with downcast face, closely ‡ Sozomen (ii. 25) must have had some special information about the proceedings; but part of it—including a charge advanced by a woman, and signally confuted (see Ruf. l. 17)—seems untrustworthy. What he says about supposed friends of Athanasius coming forward to denounce him has the appearance of truth.

§ This, Montfaucon is inclined to think, may have really happened before the death of Alexander.

muffled; then, bidding him raise his head, looked round and asked, "Is not this Arsenius?" The identity was undeniable. He drew from behind the cloak first one hand, and then, after a pause, the other; and remarked with triumphant irony, "I suppose no one thinks that God has given to any man more hands than two." In the confusion that followed, John Arcaph ran out of the court: his associates, with more presence of mind, first raised a cry of "magical illusion," and directed against Athanasius an outburst of fury from which he was just saved by the intervention of Dionysius; and afterwards tried to account for their "mistake" about Arsenius by a lame story of cruelties inflicted on him at Athanasius's command, from which he had contrived to escape. The case of the broken chalice now remained: it was resolved to send a commission of inquiry to the Mareotis; and in spite of remonstrances from the Egyptian bishops, the dominant party (four days after certain Meletians had been sent on to prepare evidence), despatched six commissioners, all thorough-going Eusebians, two of whom, Valens and Ursacius, had "in their early days been instructed by Arius, had been degraded from the priesthood," and, although still young, had been appointed to bishoprics in Pannonia "for their impiety," as Athanasius expresses it (Athan. ad Ep. Aegypt. 7, cf. Apol. 13)—meaning, for their zeal in the Arian cause. Macarius was left at Tyre under guard: Ischyra accompanied the commissioners, as "a sharer in lodging, board, and wine-cup;" they opened their court in the Mareotis, unbelievers being admitted to an inquiry "respecting the table and the chalice" of the Christian mysteries, while presbyters were persistently shut out (Apol. 72, 14, 31). Philagrius, praefect of Egypt, an apostate to Arianism,² was there with his heathen soldiery to intimidate the witnesses. Among these were Jews and catechumens, none of whom could have been present at what purported to be an Eucharistic celebration; yet even so, it appeared in evidence that no books had been burned, and that Ischyra had been—as he himself once admitted—too ill to officiate on the day of the alleged sacrilege.³ An inquiry of such an ex parte character—as Arsenius himself afterwards described it,—called forth indignant protests from the Alexandrian and Mareotic clergy, one of which documents bears the date of the 10th of Thoth, i. e. Sept. 7, 335. The commissioners, disregarding remonstrance, after procuring the exile of four Alexandrian priests, and allowing the heathen rabble almost in their presence, and on a fast day, to insult the Alexandrian Catholics, returned to Tyre (Apol. 27, 73–76, 17, 15).

¹ Theod. i. 20. Soc. i. 29 makes him say, "You see he has his two hands; where was the third cut off?" See Dean Stanley's account, East. Ch. p. 285. Athanasius's sense of humour appears also in the anecdote, that being once asked what was the spiritual condition of persons baptized without real faith, he answered that when in time of plague many sought baptism from fear of death, an angel said to Bishop Peter, "Why do you send us these sacks sealed up and empty?" (Rosweyde. Vit. Patr. l. x. c. 198. See Stanley, p. 286.)

Athanasius had complained to Dionysius, as soon as they had started for Egypt, that the very men to whom he had objected were sent on the commission. His suffragans called on the count to reserve the case for the emperor's own hearing; and some of them passionately complained to Alexander of Thessalonica that "the wild beasts were about to rush upon them." He thereupon wrote to Dionysius, regretting the nomination of the commissioners, and speaking of Athanasius as the victim of a conspiracy; and Dionysius felt himself obliged to warn the Eusebians not to let the council's proceedings be vitiated by injustice (Apol. 78–81). But Athanasius regarded them as already vitiated (Apol. 82); and resolved, without waiting for the judgment of such an assembly (the ruling spirits of which soon drew back Dionysius into a line of violent unfairness, Apol. 9), "to make a bold and dangerous experiment, whether the throne was inaccessible to the voice of truth."^b Attended by five of his suffragans, he took the first vessel for Constantinople, and suddenly presented himself in the middle of the road when the emperor was riding into the city. Not recognizing him at first sight, Constantine, on learning who he was, and what was his errand, tried to pass him by in silence; but Athanasius firmly stood his ground. "Either summon a lawful council, or give me opportunity of meeting my accusers in your presence." The request was conceded. The bishops of the council, after receiving their commissioners' report, had by a majority condemned Athanasius, recognized the Meletians as churchmen, adjourned to Jerusalem for the dedication solemnity, and there pronounced Arius orthodox on the ground of a doctrinal statement made five years earlier, when they were startled by an imperial letter expressing suspicion of their motives, and summoning them to Constantinople.^c Many of them, in alarm, fled homewards; but the two Eusebii, Theognis, Patrophilus, Valens, and Ursacius, repaired to court, and, saying nothing of "the chalice," or the report of the commission, presented a new charge, like the former quasi-political ones—that Athanasius had talked of distressing Constantinople by preventing the sailing of Alexandrian corn-ships.^d "How could I, a private person, and poor, do anything of the kind?" asked Athanasius. Eusebius of Nicomedia answered by affirming with an oath, that Athanasius was rich and powerful, and able to do anything. The emperor cut short Athanasius's defence, with a show of indignation; and, perhaps^e not from real belief in the charge, but by way of getting rid of the case and silencing the archbishop's enemies in his own interest, banished him to the distant city of Trier or Treves, the seat of government of his eldest son Constantine, who received the exile with much kindness, in February 336.

III. From his first exile to his second.—His life at Treves, including nearly two years and a half,¹ was an interval of rest, much needed and doubtless invigorating, between the storms of the past and those of the future. He had now to "stand and wait"—a new experience for him. And the scene was very new: transferred on a sudden to Northern Germany, which seemed to him "like the ends of the earth," he found himself in a city already venerable, and in some sense imperial—the "domicilium principum clarum" of Ammianus (xv. ii. 9)—which shewed to him in their freshness many features of Roman grandeur, some of which it still shows to the modern visitor in their decay. He would pass under the huge "Porta Nigra," would visit the baths, and the basilica of the palace, and the amphitheatre where the reigning emperor had exhibited his barbarous "Ludi;"² and the present cathedral perhaps retains some portion of the church which he saw used on festivals by the Christian population, on account of its spaciousness, before it was out of the builder's hands (Apol. ad Const. 15). He was "abundantly supplied with all necessaries" (Constantine II. in Apol. 87); he had the friendship of Maximin, the orthodox bishop of Treves, afterwards canonized;³ he had with him some Egyptian "brethren," and kept up a correspondence with his friends at home, although at the risk of having his letters seized in order to find fresh matter for accusation. He may often have walked under those "broad walls," or by the "placid Moselle" (Ausonius, Nob. Urb. 4), pondering the news just received of his Alexandrians' success in resisting the return of Arius, or their failure (and Antony's) in petitioning for his own (Soz. ii. 31); of the terrible end of the heresiarch; and of the death-bed baptism of the emperor in May 337. He wrote to the presbyters of Alexandria, exhorting them to take up the Apostle's words, "Nothing shall separate us from the love of Christ,"⁴ and at the beginning of 338 he wrote a Festal Letter, announcing the coming Easter, which he would keep with his flock in a spiritual communion too real for local separation to disturb (Fest. Ep. 10; cf. Hist. Ar. 40). Into one passage of it he seems to pour his whole spirit, in its faith, tenderness, and heroism, reminding his "beloved" people that the way to comfort was through affliction; that antichristian hostility was to be expected; but that the man who lived in Christ would win the victory.

For more than a year, Constantine's death produced no change in Athanasius's position; but at length, on the 17th of June 338,⁵ Constantine

² See Kingsley's Hermits, pp. 26–23. Constantine had often resided at Treves; and his son was now representing him in the sovereignty of Gaul, Spain, and Britain.

II., who in the partition of the empire had a certain precedence over his brothers Constantius and Constans, the sovereigns of the East and of Italy, wrote from Treves to the Catholics of Alexandria, announcing that he had resolved, in fulfilment of an intention of his father, to send back Athanasius, of whose character he expressed high admiration (Apol. 87). In this he appears to have presumed his brother's consent, and to have then taken Athanasius with him to Viminacium, an important town of Moesia Superior, on the high-road to Constantinople. Here the three emperors had a meeting, and all concurred in the restoration of Athanasius, who after passing through Constantinople, saw Constantius a second time, at a further point on his homeward journey, at Caesarea in Cappadocia (Apol. ad Const. 5; Hist. Ar. 8). His arrival at Alexandria, in November 338, was hailed by popular rejoicing: the churches resounded with thanksgivings, and the clergy "thought it the happiest day of their lives."⁶ But his enemies bestirred themselves, and "did not shrink from long journeys" in order to press on the emperors new charges against him—that he had misappropriated the corn granted by the late emperor for charitable purposes in Egypt and Libya, and that the day of his return had been signalized by bloodshed. Constantius wrote to him in anger, assuming the truth of the former charge; but Athanasius was successful in disproving both. However, Constantius—who was so soon to be "his scourge and torment" (Hooker, v. 42. 2)—fell more and more under the influence of his great enemy Eusebius, now transferred from Nicomedia to the see of Constantinople, which had been forcibly vacated by the second expulsion of the orthodox Paul.⁷ The Eusebians now resumed a project which had been found impracticable while Constantine lived; this was to place on "the Evangelical throne" an Arian named Pistus, who had been a priest under Alexander, had been deposed by him for adhering to Arius, and had been consecrated, as it seems (Apol. 24) by a notorious Arian bishop named Secundus. It was argued that Athanasius had offended against all ecclesiastical principles by resuming his see in defiance of the Tyrian sentence, and by virtue of mere secular authority. The charge did not come well from a party which had leaned so much on the Court and the State; but it must be allowed that Athanasius's return had given some colour to the objection,⁸ although he doubt-

⁸ See Soc. ii. 2; Neale, Hist. Alex. i. 172. Cf. Encyclic of Egyptian Bishops, Apol. 8. But see Hist. Ar. 1.

less held that the assembly at Tyre had forfeited all moral right to be respected as a council. By way of harassing Athanasius, the Eusebians, apparently about this time, made Ischyras a bishop, after obtaining an order in the name of the emperor that a church should be built for him—an order which failed to procure him a congregation (Apol. 12, 85).

And now the Eusebians applied to the West in behalf of their nominee Pistus. Three clergy appeared as their envoys before Julius, bishop of Rome; on the other hand, Athanasius sent to Rome presbyters to state his case, and an encyclic—the invaluable document which has furnished us with so much information—from “the holy Synod assembled at Alexandria out of Egypt, Thebais, Libya, and Pentapolis,” composed, says Athanasius, of nearly 100 prelates. He had already written an encyclic of his own (now lost), which had drawn forth from many foreign bishops an anathema against his intended rival (Apol. 6). At Rome his envoys gave such evidence respecting Pistus as to cause the senior of the Eusebian envoys to decamp by night in spite of an indisposition. His companions asked Julius to convoke a council, and to act, if he pleased, as judge. He accordingly invited both parties to a council, to be held at some place which Athanasius should choose.^o Thus matters stood about the end of 339.

But early in 340 a new announcement disquieted the Alexandrian Church. It was notified in a formal edict of the præfect that not Pistus, but a Cappadocian named Gregory, was coming from the Court to be installed as bishop (Encycl. 2). This, says Athanasius, was considered an unheard-of wrong. The churches were more thronged than ever: the people, in great excitement, and with passionate outcries, called the magistrates and the whole city to witness that this attack on their legitimate bishop proceeded from the mere wantonness of Arian hatred. Gregory, they knew, was an Arian, and therefore acceptable to the Eusebian party: ^p he was a fellow-countryman of Philagrius. According to Gregory Nazianzen, he had once studied at Alexandria, and been kindly treated by the prelate whom he was now to supersede. Remonstrance was vain. Philagrius attacked the church of St. Quirinus, and encouraged a mob of the lowest townspeople and of savage peasants to perpetrate atrocious cruelties and profanations. Hideous orgies were carried on in the baptistery, church books burned, the Holy Table defiled by heathen sacrifices, the stores of wine, oil, and candles pillaged, and monks, virgins, and widows maltreated, or even slain.^q Athanasius was residing in the precincts of the church of St. Theonas: he knew that he was specially aimed at, and, in hope of preventing further outrage, he withdrew from the city (after first, according to the Festal Index, baptizing many^r) to a place of concealment in the neighbourhood, where he busied himself in preparing an encyclic to give an account of these horrors. This was on March 19. Four days later, Gregory is said to have “entered the city as bishop.”^s This Lenten season was a time of Arian persecution: Gregory, on Good Friday, punished the abhorrence shown at his entry into a church by causing Philagrius to scourge 34 women, one of them with her psalter in her hands: and Easter Day, to the delight of the heathens, was selected for the work of putting Catholics into prison. Captains of vessels were tortured to make them convey Gregory’s “letters of communion.” Clergy were prevented from giving baptism or visiting the sick; lay people could not pray in their own houses undisturbed; an indictment signed by heathens and Arians, and accusing Athanasius of capital crimes, was given to Philagrius for presentation to the emperor. Athanasius, after hastily completing and despatching his encyclic, sailed for Rome in the Easter season of 340,^t some weeks after Constantine II. had been slain during his invasion of Italy.

IV. From his second exile to his second return.

—After Julius had welcomed Athanasius, he sent two presbyters, Elpidius and Philoxenus, in the early summer of 340, to repeat his invitation to the Eusebian prelates, and to fix definitely the next December as the time of the proposed Council, and Rome as the place.^u Athanasius says of himself, with a noble simplicity, “When I had laid my case before the Church” (at Rome) “for this was my one subject of anxiety—I spent my time in the Church services.” He received much kindness from the emperor’s aunt, Entropion, from two persons named Abuterius and Sperantius, and from many others (Ap. ad Const. 417; cf. Fest. Ep. 13). He was “refreshed” by letters from Egypt; and he had with him two Egyptian monks, one of whom, Ammonius, is said to have shown no interest in any Roman buildings.^v

^o The Index assigns these events to 339; but that would not leave time for the proceedings in the case of Pistus, &c., as Athanasius only reached home at the end of 338. As to the “four days,” Athanasius himself says (Hist. Ar. 11) that he sailed to Rome before Gregory arrived; which may be an abbreviated statement of the case, admitting of his first hiding himself near Alexandria. See Mansi (Suppl. i. 173 sq.) on these points; he relied on the “Anonymus Maffelanus.”

^p The difficulties of the chronology at this period have long been felt. The opinion that Athanasius visited Rome twice is now generally (though not by Neale, Hist. Alex. i. 176) abandoned for what Gibbon (iii. 75) calls “the simple hypothesis” of Valesius. But the date of this single journey has been disputed. However, since the discovery of the Festal Letters, more light has been gained. In the 13th, at the beginning of 341, Athanasius expressly says that he “writes from Rome:” whence it appears that the spring in which he fled to Rome (i. e. the spring of the year of Gregory’s intrusion) must be that of either 339 or 340: but 339, for a reason given above, seems excluded. Hefele therefore decides for 340; and (as Mansi had done on grounds of internal probability) rejects the common notion that Gregory was appointed by the Dedication Council, which sat in 341. Newman’s arrangement, in the preface to Historical Tracts of S. Athanasius (Lib. Fath.), was made before the publication of the Festal Letters.

except "the church" of St. Peter and St. Paul. But their presence in the city, and Athanasius's enthusiasm for Antony and other types of monastic saintliness, made a strong impression on the Roman Church society, and abated the prejudices there existing against the very name of monk, and the disgust at a rude and strange exterior. In fact, Athanasius's three years at Rome⁷ had two great historic results. (1.) The Latin Church, which became his "scholar" as well as his "loyal partisan," was confirmed by the spell of his master-mind⁸ "in its adhesion to orthodoxy, although it did not imbibe from him the theological spirit." And (2) when Gibbon says^a that "Athanasius introduced into Rome the knowledge and practice of the monastic life," he records the origination of a vast European movement, and represents the great Alexandrian exile as the spiritual ancestor of Benedict, of Bernard, and of the countless founders and reformers of "religious" communities in the West.

Meantime Elpidius and Philoxenus had discharged their errand. The Eusebians at Antioch, finding that Athanasius was at Rome, and that the Council to which they were invited would be a free ecclesiastical assembly,^b detained the Roman legates beyond the time specified, and then dismissed them with the excuse that Constantius was occupied with his Persian war. At the same time they stimulated Philagrius and Gregory to new severities. Orthodox bishops were scourged and imprisoned; Potammon never recovered from his stripes; Sarapanmon, another confessor-bishop, was exiled (Hist. Ar. 12). The letters of Alexandrians to Athanasius, consolatory as proofs of their affection, gave mournful accounts of torture and robbery, of hatred towards himself shown in persecution of his aunt, of countenance shown to Gregory by the "duke" Balacius; and some of these troubles were in his mind when, early in 341, he wrote "from Rome" his festal letter for the year. That year had begun without any such settlement of his case as had been hoped for at Rome. December had passed, and no council could be held, for the Eusebians had not arrived. January came, and at last the legates returned, the unwilling bearers of a letter so offensive that Julius "resolved^c to keep it to himself, in the hope that some Eusebians" would even yet arrive (Apol. 24), and render the public reading of it unnecessary. No one came. On the contrary, the Eusebians resolved to take advantage of the approaching dedication of a new cathedral at Antioch, "the Golden Church," in order to hold a Council there. Accordingly, 97 bishops, many of whom were rather negatively than positively heterodox, assembled on this occasion, apparently in August^d 341. Constantius was present. The sentence passed at Tyre was affirmed; several canons were passed; and three creeds were framed, in language partly vague and general partly all but reaching the Nicene standard (cf. Newman, Arians, c. 4, s. 1; cf. Ath. Treatises, i. 105 sq.). This business necessarily lasted some time; and no information as to this Council had reached Rome when, in November, Athanasius having now been waiting at Rome for eighteen months (Apol. 29), Julius assembled the long-delayed Council, consisting of more than fifty bishops, in the church of the presbyter Vito. The Eusebian letter was read; Athanasius's case was fully examined; the reports of the Marcotic commission, which had been brought to Rome two years before by the three Eusebian envoys, were laid before the assembly; and priests from Egypt gave evidence of the more recent cruelties of the Arian intruder. Athanasius was formally pronounced innocent; his right to brotherly treatment and Church communion—admitted from the first by the Roman bishop,^e—was solemnly recognized by the Italian Council. Marcellus of Ancyra, who, in the course of opposing Arianism, had been accused of denying the personality of the Logos, the Eternity of the Sonship, the reality and the permanence of the Incarnation,^f had been deposed and banished, and had been staying at Rome a year and three months, was now declared orthodox on the ground of statements which he delivered, and which satisfied the Western bishops. Other prelates and clergy from various countries testified to wrongs inflicted by Arianizers. By desire of the Council, Julius wrote to the Eusebians a letter of dignified remonstrance, towards the conclusion of which he intimated that the Roman see ought in the first instance to have been informed of any complaints raised against the bishop of Alexandria.^g

The year 342 is not eventful in the Athanasian history. About the opening of it, the Eusebians, who had managed the Dedication Council, made an attempt to gain credit with the young Western emperor Constans. He had (perhaps unexpectedly, since Constantine II. had fallen in civil war with him) shewn himself friendly to Athanasius, who at his request had sent him from Alexandria some bound copies of the Scriptures (Ap. ad Const. 4). Narcissus, Maris, and two other prelates, appeared before Constans at Treves, spoke in support of the decisions against Athanasius, and presented a creed which might, at first sight, appear all but to confess the "Homousion." But Constans, doubtless swayed by Bishop Maximin, who would not admit the Eastern envoys to communion, dismissed them ^e This is implied in Ap. ad Const. 4. Vales, Obs. Eccl. i. c. 5. Cf. Apol. 20.

^f The view ascribed to him was akin to Sabellianism on the one hand, for it made the Logos only an eternal power in God, coming forth at certain times into energy; and to Etonism on the other, for it made Jesus the "Son of God" only as the temporary organ of that energy. That he really did hold this, Newman and Dörner agree. His disciple, it must be remembered, was Photinus. Montfaucon thinks him scarcely excusable. Möhler treats him as misrepresented.

^g Apol. 35. Julius's claim is exaggerated by Socrates and Sozomen into a general one. It clearly alludes to the case of the two Dionysii in the 3rd century (Hist. Tracts, p. 56; Hussey, Rise of Papal Power, p. 6). Athanasius speaks of the Roman see as "an apostolic throne" (Hist. Ar. 35).

from his presence (Ath. de Syn. 25; Soz. iii. 10; Hil. Fragm. iii. 27).

Athanasius remained at Rome until the summer of 343, when "in the fourth year" from his arrival, he received a letter from Constans, by which he was ordered to meet him at Milan (Ap. ad Const. 3, 4). Surprised at the summons, he inquired as to its probable cause; and learned that some bishops had been urging Constans to propose to Constantius the assembling of a new council, at which East and West might be represented. On arriving at the great capital of Northern Italy, which was to be so memorably associated with the struggle between the Church and Arianism, he was admitted, with Protasius bishop of Milan, behind the veil of the audience chamber, and received with "much kindness" by Constans, who told him that he had already written to his brother, "requesting that a council might be held." Athanasius left Milan immediately afterwards, being desired by Constans to come into Gaul, in order to meet Hosius, the venerated bishop of Cordova, and accompany him to the Council, which both sovereigns had now agreed to assemble on the frontier line of their empires, at the Moesian city of Sardica. And there, about the end of 343,^b some 170 prelates met, a small majority being Westerns.

It soon appeared that united action was impossible. The majority, ignoring the Councils of Tyre and Antioch, and treating the whole case as open, could not but regard Athanasius as innocent, or, at least, as not yet proved guilty; and he "joined them in celebrating the Divine mysteries" (Hil. Fragm. iii. 14). The minority, on reaching Sardica, had simply announced their arrival, and then shut themselves up in the lodgings provided for them at the palace, and refused to join their brethren until the persons whom they denounced as convicted men should be deprived of seats in the Council. The answer was, that the Council was prepared to go into all the cases which could be submitted to it: each party would be free to implead the other. Witnesses were ready to attest the sufferings of the orthodox, to tell of forged letters and of organized terrorism; even to exhibit wounds inflicted, and hands that had been fettered, by Eusebian violence. The Eusebian bishops, although urged to confront their adversaries, and even assured that they might privately state their case to the presiding bishop Hosius, withdrew from Sardica on an idle pretext, and, in spite of a formal summons from that majority, established themselves as a council at Philippopolis within the Eastern empire, renewed the sentences against Athanasius, put forth new ones against Julius, Hosius, and others, drew up an encyclic, and adopted a creed (Apol. 48, 36; Hist. Ar. 15; Apol. 45; Hist. Ar. 44; H. A. 16; Hil. de Syn. 34; Fragm. 3). The prelates at Sardica proceeded with their inquiry, recognized in consequence the innocence of Athanasius,¹ and excommunicated eleven Eusebian bishops, as men who "separated the Son from the Father, and so merited separation from the Catholic Church." They enacted several canons, including the famous one providing for a reference, in certain circumstances, to "Julius bishop of Rome," in "honour of Peter's memory," so that he might make arrangements for the rehearing of a prelate's cause. It need hardly be added that they would have no creed but the Nicene. They wrote letters of sympathy to the suffragans of Athanasius and the Churchmen of Alexandria, urging the faithful "to contend earnestly for the sound faith and the innocence of Athanasius," and to remember that "although the Catholic Church had suffered many an outrage, yet he that endured to the end should be saved."²

The bold line taken at Sardica provoked the advisers of Constantius to fresh severities; and the Alexandrian magistrates received orders to behead Athanasius, or certain of his clergy expressly named, if they should come near the city. Five Alexandrian clergy were banished into Armenia. Many Catholics, we are told, were terrified into dissembling their belief; many fled into the deserts, in order to avoid the dominant party (Hist. Ar. 19, 18, 20). The Council, supported by Constans, endeavoured to move Constantius by sending to him two delegates, Vincent, bishop of Capua, and Euphrates of Cologne.¹ They reached Antioch at Easter 344. Stephen, the Arian patriarch of Antioch, devised an atrocious plot against Euphrates. It was detected, and visited by his deposition; and Constantius, in an honest revulsion of feeling, recalled the banished clergy from Armenia, and wrote to stop the persecution of Athanasius's adherents (Hist. Ar. 20, 21). Athanasius, himself still kept under the emperor's ban, had gone from Sardica to Naisus, and thence, at the invitation of Constans, to Aquileia. There, in company with the bishop Fortunatian (for, he observes, he never saw Constans alone), he was admitted to more than one audience; and whenever Constans mentioned Constantius, he replied in terms respectful towards the latter. Of his sojourn in this city, near the walls of which Constantine II. had met his tragical end, we read, that on one occasion, a large church, while still undedicated, was filled

^b The discoveries of the Maffei Fragment and the Festal Letters have had the effect of throwing back the dates of the Sardican Council and the second return of Athanasius. The received date of 347 for the Council (Soc., Soz.) is proved to be too late (even apart from the difficulty as to Euphrates of Cologne). For Athanasius's return was some time after the death of Gregory, which was (says Athanasius, in Hist. Ar. 21) some ten months after the deposition of Stephen of Antioch, which was soon after the Easter subsequent to the Council. But not to say that the Fragment gives Oct. 346 for Athanasius's return, the 19th Festal Letter, for 347, was written after it. Therefore the Council cannot be placed later than the end of 344, which is Mansi's date, received by Gieseler; and cf. Newman, Hist. Tracts, p. vi. But Hefele's date, the end of 343, is more probable. The "Mærostitich" Confession was presented by Eusebian deputies at Milan in the spring of 345. It could not have been presented within three months after the Sardican Council.

² Apol. 36-13. Maffei published letters of the Council and of Athanasius to the church in the Marcotis; and one of Athanasius to the Alexandrian clergy.

by a vast congregation, including Constans, who retained, amid his moral deterioration, a respect for religion which combined with his personal kindness to affect Athanasius's judgment of his character (Ap. ad Const. 4, 3, 15, 7; Hist. Ar. 44). He had peremptorily, and even with a threat of civil war, urged his brother to reinstate Athanasius (Soc. ii. 22). The death—according to Theodoret, the murder—of Gregory, about February 345 (Hist. Ar. 21), gave Constantius an occasion for yielding the point. He therefore wrote to Athanasius, affecting to be solicitous of the Western emperor's assent to an act of his own free clemency. He wrote two other letters (Apol. 51; Hist. Ar. 22), and employed six "counts" to write encouragingly to the exile; and Athanasius, after receiving these letters at Aquileia, made up his mind, at last, to act on those assurances; but not until Constantius could tell Constans that he had been "expecting Athanasius for a year." Invited by Constans to Treves, Athanasius made a diversion on his journey in order to see Rome again; it was some six years since he had been cordially welcomed by Julius, who now poured forth his generous heart in a letter of congratulation for the Alexandrian Church, one of the most beautiful documents in the whole Athanasian series; Julius dwelt on the well-earned worth of Athanasius, on his own happiness in gaining such a friend, on the steady faith which the Alexandrians had exhibited, on the rapture with which they would celebrate his return; and concluded by invoking for his "beloved brethren" the blessings "which eye had not seen, nor ear heard."^m Athanasius travelled northward, about midsummer; visited Constans, passed through Hadrianople (Hist. Ar. 18), proceeded to Antioch, and saw Constantius for the third time (Ap. ad Const. 5). The reception was gracious: the emperor valued himself on his impassive demeanour (Ammian. xvi. 10). Athanasius, without vilifying his enemies, firmly desired leave to confront them (Ap. ad Const. l. c.; Hist. Ar. 22, 44). "No," said Constantius, "God knows, I will never again credit such accusations; and all records of past charges shall be erased." This latter promise he at once fulfilled, by orders sent to the authorities in Egypt; and he wrote letters in favour of the archbishop to the clergy of Egypt and the laity of Alexandria. One thing he asked, that Athanasius would allow the Alexandrian Arians a single church. Athanasius promptly replied that he would do so, if a church might be granted at Antioch to the "Eustathian" body, which held aloof from the crypto-Arian bishop Leontius, and whose services, held in a house, he had been attending. The emperor would have agreed to this, but his advisers stood in the way.ⁿ

From Antioch Athanasius proceeded to Jerusalem, where an orthodox council met to do him

ⁿ See Socr. ii. 23, Soz. iii. 20. They were called after bishop Eustathius (Hist. Ar. 4), deposed by Arians in 330. For Leontius, see De Fugâ, 26; Theod. ii. 24; Hooker, v. 42, 9. Many of the orthodox continued to worship in his churches (e. g. Flavian and Diodore). Constantius's absolute dependence on his advisers is scornfully noted in Hist. Ar. 69, 70.

honour, and to congratulate his church.^o And now he had but to return home, and enjoy the welcome which that church was eager to give. This he did, according to the Festal Index, on October 21 (Paophi 24), 346. We see in Gregory Nazianzen's panegyric^p a picture of the vast mass of population, distributed into its several classes, and streaming forth, "like another Nile," to meet him at some distance from Alexandria; the faces gazing from every eminence at the well-known form, the ears strained to catch his accents, the voices rising in emulous plaudits, the hands clapping, the air fragrant with incense, the city festal with banquets and blazing with illuminations—all that made this return of Athanasius in after times the standard for any splendid popular display. Characteristically, the kindhearted Gregory dwells on his hero's gentle bearing towards old opponents, and his peace-making zeal in allaying feuds. The 'Arian History' (25) says little of the exterior brilliancy of his restoration, but dwells with real beauty of style and tone on its practical results in multiplying acts of charity, in deepening religious earnestness, and in sanctifying family life while it stimulated exceptional self-devotion.^q

V. From his second return to his third exile.—His 19th Festal Letter, for 347, begins with a thanksgiving for having been "brought from distant lands," and ends with information as to recent appointments of bishops, among whom was Arsenius, now canonically established at Hypsele; others were doubtless Catholics, whom the archbishop had set in the places of Arians.^r The Egyptian prelates, in council, received the decrees of Sardica. More than 400 bishops of different countries, including Britain, were now in communion with Athanasius; he had a multitude of their "letters of peace" to answer. Many persons in Egypt who had sided with the Arians, came by night to him with their excuses: it was a time "of deep and wondrous peace" (Hist. Ar. 25), which lasted for a few years. Valens and Ursacius had already, it seems, anathematized Arianism before a council at Milan;

^o Philostorgius's statement (l. iii. 12) that he urged the bishops of Palestine to embrace the Nicene faith, but all refused except one, is a clear calumny.

^p Greg. Naz. Orat. 21. It appears that Gregory's description, which he connects with the third return, should rather belong to the second. The Festal Index favours this view: it is taken by Montfaucon and Mûbler, though not by Tillemont and Neale. The grandeur of the popular demonstration seems certainly most suitable to a return which had the fullest measure of imperial sanction. Stanley connects it with the first return (East. Ch. p. 274).

^q "Chaereu," i. e. "Chaereus's land" (cf. Vit. Ant. 86), was "the first outpost of the city" (Stanley, East. Ch. p. 274). "Usque ad centesimum lapidem," says the Latin version of the Festal Index.

^r Pachomius did not live to hear of this return; but Antony sent a message to Athanasius by some monks of Tabenne, whom the archbishop welcomed with great kindness (Act. SS. Mail. iii. 326).

^s Soz. iii. 21, says that he was accused of having made similar substitutions even while passing through foreign countries. Both Soz. and Socr. ii. 24, say that he was charged with ordaining in the dioceses of other bishops in Egypt. See Vales, in Soc. Le Quien holds that he had a right to perform ordinary episcopal functions throughout Egypt. So Neale, Intr. East. Ch. i. iii.

but they deemed it expedient to do more. In 347 they appeared at Rome, and presented to Julius a humble apologetic letter, having already written in a different strain to Athanasius, announcing that they were "at peace with him."¹ He believed at the time that they were sincere; they afterwards ascribed their act to fear of Constans (Hist. Ar. 29). This motive, if it existed, was ere long removed; the revolt of Magnentius brought Constans to an ignominious death at the foot of the Pyrenees, in February 350.

This tragedy was a severe shock to Athanasius. He received, indeed, letters from Constantius, assuring him of continued favour, and encouraging him to pursue his episcopal work. The Alexandrian authorities were also commanded to suppress any "plotting against Athanasius." Thereupon, in presence of high state officers, including the bearers of these letters, Athanasius desired his people, assembled in church, "to pray for the safety of the most religious Constantius Augustus." The response was at once made, "O Christ, help Constantius!" (Ap. ad Const. 9, 10, 23; Hist. Ar. 24, 51). He had leisure for writing *On the Nicene Definition of Faith*² and On the Opinions of Dionysius, his great predecessor in the 3rd century, whose language, employed in controversy with Sabelianism, had been unfairly quoted in support of Arianism.³ [DIONYSIUS.] And he brought out, at this time, what is called his Apology against the Arians, although he afterwards made additions to it.⁴ It may have been about this time that he chose the blind scholar Didymus, already renowned for vast and varied learning, to preside over the "Catechetical School." [DIDYMUS.] When Magnentius sent envoys to Constantius, one of them visited Alexandria; and Athanasius, in speaking to him of Constans, burst into tears. He at first had some apprehension of danger from Magnentius; but it was soon evident that his real danger was from the Arianizing advisers of Constantius. Valens and Ursacius, having now recanted their recantation, were ready to weave new plots; and Liberius, the new bishop of Rome, was plied with letters against him, which were outweighed, in the judgment of a Roman synod, by an encyclic of 80 Egyptian prelates; and Rome remained faithful to his cause. (See Liberius' letter to Constantius, Hil. Fragm. 5. Another letter in which Liberius is made to say that he had put Athanasius out of his communion for refusing to come to Rome when summoned, is justly regarded as a forgery.) This was in 352; and Athanasius, in May 353, thought it advisable to send five bishops,⁵ one of them being his friend Serapion of Thmuis, and three presbyters, to disabuse Constantius of bad impressions as to his conduct. Five days later, May 23, Montanus, a "silentiary" or palace chamberlain, arrived with an imperial letter forbidding him to send envoys, but purporting to grant a request from himself to visit the court of Milan. Athanasius, detecting an attempt to decoy him, replied that as he had never made such a request, he could not think it right to use a permission granted under a misconception; but that if the emperor sent him a definite order, he would set forth at once (Ap. ad Const. 19-21). Montanus departed; and the next news that Athanasius received from Europe was such as to make him forget all personal danger. The Western usurper had been finally overthrown in August; and Constantius, having gone to Arles for the winter, was induced by the Arians to hold there, instead of at Aquileia, the council which Liberius and many Italian bishops had requested him to assemble.⁶ The event was disastrous: Vincent, the Roman legate, was induced to join with other prelates in condemning Athanasius; but Paulinus of Treves had inherited Maximin's steadfastness, and preferred exile to the betrayal of a just cause.

In the Lent of 354, the Alexandrian churches were so crowded that some persons suffered severely, and the people urged Athanasius to allow the Easter services to be held in a large church which was still unfinished, called the Caesarean. The case was peculiar (Ap. ad Const. 15; Epiph. Haer. 69, 2): the church was being built on ground belonging to the emperor; to use it prematurely, without his leave, might be deemed a civil offence; to use it before dedication, an ecclesiastical impropriety. Athanasius tried to persuade the people to put up with the existing inconvenience: they answered, they would rather keep Easter in the open country. Under these circumstances, he gave way. The Arianizers were habitually courtiers, and ready, on occasion, to be formalists likewise; and this using of the undedicated imperial church was one of several charges now urged at court against their adversary, and dealt with in his Apology to Constantius; the others being that he had stimulated Constans to quarrel with his brother, had corresponded with Magnentius, and that he had not come to Italy on receiving the letter brought by Montanus. A letter which he wrote before the Easter festival of this year, or perhaps of 355, is particularly interesting; he seeks to recall Dracontius, a monk who had been elected to a bishopric, and had weakly fled from his pew duties. The earnestness, good sense, and affectionateness of this letter are very characteristic of Athanasius. He dwells repeatedly on the parable of the Talents, reminds Dracontius of solemn obligations, and warns him against imagining the monastic life to be the one sphere of Christian self-denial.⁷ And the calm contemplation of

² In this treatise he guards the Catholic sense of the title "Son," gives some account of the Council's proceedings, and defends the language adopted by it, adducing ante-Nicene authorities. (He upholds Origen's orthodoxy.)

³ He urged that Dionysius had been speaking simply of Christ's Manhood. See Liddon's Ramp. Lect. p. 425.

fast-approaching trials, which would make a severe demand on Christian men's endurance, corresponds exactly to that "discernment" of the "signs" of 354-5, in which Athanasius cannot have been wanting.

For, in the spring of 355, he would hear of the success of Constantius in terrorizing the great majority of a large council at Milan, which had been summoned at the urgent desire of Liberius. A few faithful men, such as Eusebius of Vercellae, Lucifer of Caliaris, Dionysius of Milan, after a momentary weakness, and Maximus of Naples, who was suffering at the time from illness, alone refused to condemn Athanasius (Hist. Ar. 32-34); and in standing out against the incurable tyrannousness of Caesarism, as thus exhibited, must have felt themselves to be contending both for civil justice and for Nicene orthodoxy.^c

That some coup d'état was meditated against Athanasius, must have been evident, not only from the emperor's passionate eagerness to have him condemned, and from the really brutal persecution which began to rage throughout the empire against those who adhered to his communion (Hist. Ar. 31), but from the appearance at Alexandria, in July or August, 355, of an imperial notary, named Diogenes, who, though he brought no express orders, and had no interview with Athanasius, used every effort to get him out of the city. Failing in this, he departed in December; and on January 5, 356, Syrianus, a general, with another notary named Hilarius, entered Alexandria. The Arian party exulted in their approaching triumph: Athanasius asked Syrianus if he had brought any letter from the emperor. He said he had not. The archbishop referred him to the guarantee of security which he had himself received; and the presbyters, the laity, and the majority of all the inhabitants, supported him in demanding that no change should be made without a new imperial letter—the rather that they themselves were preparing to send a deputation to Constantius. The prefect of Egypt and the provost of Alexandria were present at this interview; and Syrianus, at last, promised "by the life of the emperor" that he would comply with the demand. This was on January 18; and for more than three weeks all was quiet. But about midnight on Thursday, February 8, when Athanasius was at a night-long vigil service in St. Theonas's church, preparatory to the Friday service, Syrianus, with Hilarius, and Gorgonius, the head of the police force, beset the church with a large body of soldiers. "I sat down," says Athanasius,^d "on my throne," (which would be at the extreme end of the church.) "and desired the deacon to read the Psalm" (our 136th), "and the people to respond, For His mercy endureth for ever," and then all to depart home." This majestic "act of faith" was hardly finished, when the doors were forced, and the soldiers rushed in with a fierce shout, clashing their arms, discharging their arrows, and brandishing their swords in the light of the church lamps. Some of the people in the nave had already departed, others were trampled down or mortally injured; others cried to the archbishop to escape. "I said I would not do so, until they had all got away safe. So I stood up, and called for prayer, and desired all to go out before me. . . . and when the greater part had gone, the monks who were there, and certain of the clergy, came up to me and carried me away."^e And then, he adds, he passed through the mass of his enemies unobserved, thanking God that he had been able to secure in the first instance his people's safety, and afterwards his own. As on a former occasion, he deemed it his duty to accept an opportunity of escape, especially when the sacrifice of his life would have been ruinous to the cause of the Church in Egypt (see Augustine, Ep. 228, 10); and he therefore repaired to a place of concealment in the country, "hiding himself," as the Arian History, c. 48, employs the prophet's words, "for a little moment, until the indignation should be overpast."

VI. From his third to his fourth exile.—On leaving Alexandria, Athanasius at first thought of appealing in person to Constantius, who could not, he tried to hope, have sanctioned the late outrage. But he was deterred by the news of one woe following upon another (Ap. ad Const. 27, 19). Bishops of the West who had refused to disown him were suffering under tyranny, or had been hurried into exile. Among the latter class was the Roman bishop himself, who had manfully spurned both gifts and menaces (Theod. ii. 16); and Hosius, for addressing to Constantius a remonstrance full of pathetic dignity, had been sent for to be detained at Sirmium. Then came news which touched Athanasius more closely. It was given out that one George,^f a Cappadocian of evil reputation and ruthless temper, was coming to supersede him; and that a vague creed, purporting to be simply Scriptural,^g but in fact ignoring the Nicene doctrine, was to be proposed for his suffragans' acceptance. This last report set him at once to work, with characteristic promptitude and energy, on a Letter to the Egyptian and Libyan Bishops. But he had soon to hear of a repetition of the sacrileges and brutalities of the days of Gregory. As before, Lentⁱ

^f The protest says that he fainted; and this, at the last moment of such a scene, and amid such a pressure and confusion, is not unlikely.

^g Though coarse, corrupt, and violent, "he collected a valuable library" (Gibbon, iii. 171). He had been recommended by an Arianizing synod at Antioch. See Soz. iv. 8, with Valesius's note. In Hist. Ar. 75, he is said to have been fraudulent as a contractor of stores at Constantinople.

^h Compare, on this phase of Arianism, such passages as De Decret. 21. The principle on which Athanasius went was Waterland's,—that "the sense of Scripture is Scripture."

ⁱ Comp. Ap. ad Const. 27; De Fugâ, 6; Theod. ii. 14. Other cruelties are narrated in Hist. Ar. There is a difficulty, in that Athanasius's language appears inconsistent with the date given in the Festal Index and Maffei's Fragment, which defer George's arrival until Feb. 24, 357, although the Fragment says that on June 15, 356, the churches were given up to the adherents of ^c "The arts of the court party," says Neander (iv. 72, E. T.), "were aimed not barely against the person, but also against the doctrines of Athanasius." He adds that "it was not the State, it was only the Church, which in those times of despotism and servility had such men to slay" as these brave confessors.

^d Ap. pro Fugâ, 24. Compare Hist. Ar. 81, the protest of the Catholic laity.

^e His love for, and practical knowledge of, the Psalter is beautifully shown in his Letter to Marcellinus. He was wont to have the Psalms recited rather than sung (Aug. Confess. x. 50).

was the time chosen for the arrival of the usurper. Easter brought an increase of trouble in the persecution of prelates, clergy, virgins, widows, the poor, and even ordinary Catholic householders. On the evening of the Sunday after Pentecost, when "the brethren" had met for worship, apart from the Arians, in the precincts of a cemetery, a military commander, named Sebastian, a fierce-tempered Manichean, whose sympathies went with George, came to the spot with more than 3000 soldiers, and found some virgins and others still in prayer after the general congregation had broken up. On their refusal to embrace Arianism, he caused them to be stripped, and beaten or wounded with such severity that some died from the effects, and their corpses were kept without burial. This was followed by the banishment of sixteen bishops, doubtless for rejecting the new-made creed; more than thirty fled, others were scared into an apparent conformity, and the vacated churches were given over to men whose moral disqualifications for any religious office were compensated by their profession of Arianism. Tragical as were these tidings, Athanasius still clung to his purpose of presenting himself before Constantius, until he learned that one imperial letter had denounced him as a fugitive criminal who richly merited death, and another had exhorted the two Ethiopian sovereigns to send Frumentius to Alexandria, that George might instruct him in the knowledge of "the supreme God."^k

Then it was that Athanasius, accepting the position of a proscribed man who must needs live as a fugitive, "turned back again," as he says, "towards the desert." and sought for welcome and shelter amid the innumerable monastic cells. Antony had died at the beginning of the year, desiring that a worn-out sheepskin cloak (the monk's usual upper dress), which when new had been the gift of Athanasius, might be returned to him (Vit. Ant. 91). But many "abbots," who had imbibed Antony's spirit, would deem either their coenobitic settlements only too much graced by receiving their archbishop as a sufferer for the truth's sake; and many a young monk would think that the "discipline" which he had

"Gregory" — meaning, of course, George — by Heraclius and Cataphronius, the men who are named in Hist. Ar. 55, as setting on the young pagans to attack the Casarean church on a Wednesday, before George came, and evidently soon after Athanasius had fled. Perhaps the Fragmentist, knowing that George came in a Lent (and in 356 Lent began Feb. 24), that Heraclius had previously disturbed the Catholics' possession of the churches, and that in June 356 (the exact day, Sunday after Pentecost in that year was June 2) another great outrage took place, was led to mix up these facts with his erroneous notion (in itself sufficiently improbable) of a whole year's interval before the arrival of the intruding bishop, to place Heraclius's arrival about three months too late, and to confound his proceeding, in some degree, with Sebastian's. The exclusion of Catholics from Alexandrian churches is illustrated by a letter attributed to Athanasius, "Which has the most,—he who holds the place of worship, or he who holds the Faith?" A fragment of another letter, preserved by Theodoret, ii. 14, speaks of the Arians as "sitting like demons round the tombs, to debar the dead from burial."

^k Meaning, of the Father (see Arius, in Athan. De Syn. 15). Frumentius continued undisturbed; and, as Le Quien expresses it, "false garrit Philostorgius" about "Theophilus the Indian" "establishing Arianism at Axum." Cf. Philost. iii. 5.

embraced, and which Athanasius had propagated in distant lands, gained a new charm while the person whom he most revered on earth was actually mingling in the routine of prayer and psalmody, meditation and manual toil. As Athanasius appears to have made secret visits to Alexandria,^l he probably spent some time among the recluses of Lower Egypt, on the Nitrian mountain, or in "the wilderness of cells" further inland, or in the yet remoter Scetis; but he also doubtless visited what Villemain calls "the pathless solitudes which surround Upper Egypt, and the monasteries and hermitages of the Thebaid."^m A veil of mystery was thus drawn over his life; and the interest was heightened by the romantic incidents naturally following from the Government's attempts to track and seize him.ⁿ When the pursuit was hot, there would be a rapid and well-arranged flight from one refuge to another, involving probably "hair-breadth 'scapes" and strange concealments which might anticipate the experience of a Jacobite or a Vendean. When comparatively undisturbed, he would still be full of activities, ecclesiastical and theological. The "royal-hearted" exile, "the invisible patriarch," was always effectively governing his church, consoling or stimulating the faithful, keeping in his hands a network of correspondence,^o despatching messages and orders which would be received as loyally as if brought by a deacon of the Alexandrian throne. And with that marvellous power of self-adaptation, prominent among the Pauline qualities which Dean Stanley has so well pointed out in this majestic character, Athanasius made those six years of seclusion available for literary work of the most substantial kind, both controversial and historical. The books which he now began to pour forth were apparently written in cottages or caves, where he sat, like any monk, on a mat of palm-leaves, with a bundle of papyrus beside him, amid the intense light and stillness of the desert.^p ^l Festal Index, p. 358. And compare the Index for 360 on the virgin Eudæmonis, tortured by the prefect when he searched for Athanasius in a small chamber, with Palladius's famous story (Vit. Patr. viii. c. 136) of the young Alexandrian lady who sheltered him in her own house; a story which, although it bears exaggeration on its face, may possibly have some foundation. (See Soz. v. 6.) Cave and Montfaucon think that the lady may have received him for a few days after Syrianus's irruption.

^m Soz. iv. 23; Soz. vi. 29-31; Fleury, xx. c. 1, 7, 9.

ⁿ See Ep. ad Serap. i. 1. The Life of Pachomius gives a vivid scene. A "duke" named Artemius is hunting for Athanasius, and comes to a monastery called Paban. "Is Athanasius here?" Psarphi, the monk in charge, answers simply, "He is indeed the father of us all, but I never yet saw his face." Artemius, after a vain search, asks Psarphi to pray for him. But, as an Arian bishop is his companion, he is repelled by the answer, "We may not pray with those who are in communion with Arians." It is possible that Athanasius, by a visit or by letters, encouraged the intensely ecclesiastical population of Oxyrynchos, who, when their bishop joined the communion of George, at once disowned him, and procured for themselves an orthodox chief pastor,—supposing that in this matter we may trust the authority of Marcellinus and Faustinus (Sirmond. i. 251).

^o He tells Serapion that the letters he has received are a source of comfort, and make him feel as if his friends were with him (i. 1). Compare Hist. Ar. 40.

^p The story of his being concealed for six years in a dark dry cistern, which Rufinus appears to believe (i. 181)

(Kingsley's Hermits, p. 130, 19), which might well harmonize with his meditations and his prayers. The fondness of Athanasius for the illustration of "the Light and the Ray" is well known. He finished his Apology to Constantius,¹ a work which he had for some time in hand, and which he still hoped to be able, in better days, to deliver in the emperor's presence. He met the taunts of "cowardice" directed against him by the Arians, with an Apology for his Flight,² in which he dwelt on the precept and example of Christ, and on the conduct of eminent saints; enlarging at the same time on the fury of the persecution, and referring to the banishment of orthodox bishops. To the same period belong the Letter to the Monks,³ with the Arian History (not now extant as a whole), which it introduces (and as to which it is difficult to resist the impression that part of it, at least, was written under Athanasius's supervision, by some friend or secretary⁴); a Letter to Serapion, bishop of Thmuis, giving an account of the death of Arius, the details of which he had learned from his presbyter Macarius, while he himself was resident at Treves;⁵ and, above all, the great Ora- tion may be founded on his having once during those years lain hid in such a place. Compare De Fugâ, 17. Every cave and glen was known to the monks.

¹ Throughout this Apology he addresses Constantius with the forms of loyal respect. This was necessary, if it was ever to be actually presented; and he may have forced himself, even at this time, to hope that Constantius might amend his conduct. Still it was going rather far to talk of Constantius's "well-known benignity" (c. 32); (his cruelties towards his relatives are referred to in Hist. Ar. 69). But Athanasius never afterwards spoke of him in this tone. See De Fugâ, 26, Hist. Ar. 76, De Syn. 55. He did indeed, in Hist. Ar. 69, make allowance for his imbecile credulity, which made him a tool in the hands of worse men.

² The Apologia de Fugâ was written between the lapse of Hosius and that of Liberius—probably about the end of 357. The Arians who taunted him, he says, professed friendly feelings towards him. He considers the opportunity of escape granted him in Feb. 356 as parallel to those of which SS. Peter and Paul availed themselves (c. 25).

³ In this letter he says he has complied with their request for an account of the persecution and a refutation of Arianism. The refutation is identified by the Bollandist Life with the Orations; Montfaucon and Newman think it is lost. For some reason, Athanasius requests the monks not to copy or even retain the letter and the "History."

⁵ Neander (iv. 53, E. T.) blames Athanasius for imputing deception to Arius in regard to the profession of belief which he had tendered to Constantine. But if the statement in this letter be true, he really did say that he had not taught what Alexander had imputed to him. And according to Athan., od Ep. Aeg. 18, he told Constantine that he had never held or taught otherwise than the profession, couched in Scriptural words, contained. Neander says, Athanasius had no right to assume that Arius must take those words as he himself did. But the point is, that Constantine would naturally take them in a sense which, at least, was not that condemned at Nicea.

tions or Discourses against the Arians. These last have been described by Montfaucon as "the sources whence arguments have been borrowed by all who have since written in behalf of the Divinity of the Word;" and although it cannot be denied that in some details of their argument a modern reader will detect what seems irrelevant or forced, or otherwise unsatisfactory, and that the close reasoning which Erasmus and other writers have so justly admired in Athanasius is occasionally embellished, as the taste of that age would consider, by forms of polemical oratory, yet all candid readers will appreciate the richness and fulness of the Scriptural exegesis; the steady grasp of the great idea of Christ's real and Divine Sonship,⁶ in which the whole Catholic doctrine was involved; the keen penetration with which Arian objections are analysed;⁷ the incidental exposure of earlier heresies, like that of Paulus of Samosata;⁸ the "distinct" and luminous protests, by anticipation, against "later heresies, like the Nestorian and Eutychian; and the solemn earnestness with which the orthodox conclusions are exhibited as ministering to the deepest needs of the Christian soul.⁹ The first discourse is occupied with an exposition of the greatness of the question at issue; with proofs of the Son's eternity and uncreatedness, with discussion of objections, and with comments on texts alleged in support of Arianism (i. e. Phil. ii. 9, 10; Ps. xlv. 7, 8; Heb. i. 4). The second, written after some interval, pursues this line of comment, especially on a text much urged by Arians in the LXX. version (Proverbs viii. 22).¹⁰ The third¹¹ explains texts in the Gospels, and in so doing sets forth the Christ of the Church as uniting in Himself true Godhead and true Manhood; and it then passes to the consideration of another Arian statement,

⁶ E. g. Orat. i. 15, ii. 3, 5, 22, 23 (where, as indeed elsewhere, He, as true Son, is contrasted with angels), 32, 34, 45. Parts of the Discourses, it may be observed, are reproductions of what he had written before, e. g. in De Decret. (Cf. Or. i. 30 sq., De Decr. 23 sq., on the Arian "sophism" about "Ingenerate.")

⁷ E. g. Orat. i. 14, 27, 29; see also ii. 26. With this acute analysis should be compared the lucid statement of such plain arguments as that from the Baptismal Form, ii. 41. In this, as in other ways, Athanasius could be "all things to all men."

that the Sonship was a result of God's mere will,* Differing from other writers, Dr. Newman † considers the fourth discourse to be an undigested collection of notes or memoranda on several heresies, principally that which was, as we have seen, "imputed to his friend Marcellus, and to persons connected with him;" an imputation which Athanasius, about 360, began to think not undeserved, although, as if wishing to hope the best, he refrained from naming Marcellus while opposing what might be called Marcellianism. It may be felt by readers who have no bias against the theology of the Discourses, that this tenderness towards an old associate (which we shall see Athanasius exhibiting on another occasion) is in striking contrast with the exuberance of oburgation^b bestowed on the Arian "madmen" and "foes of Christ." But, not to urge that the 4th century had no established rules of controversial politeness, and that the acerbity of Greek disputation and the personalities of Roman society had often too much influence on the tone of Christian argument, one must remember that Athanasius is not attacking all members of the Arian communion, but representatives of it who had been conspicuous, not for heterodoxy alone, but for secularism in its worst form, for unscrupulousness, and for violence. And if some elements of human passion mingled with his indignation at what he deemed an apostasy from Christ, allowance must surely be made for the position of a man whom this party had been striking at for thirty years with a persistent energy of hatred; who knew that amid a general persecution his life was now being specially sought (De Fugâ, 9; cf. Stanley, East. Ch. p. 282); who, driven at sixty from the throne of a prince among bishops into outlawry under the ban of a malignant † Newman on Athan. Treat. ii. 502. He regards Athanasius's arguments as rather heads for argument, on the identity of the Word with the Son, &c., as levelled against what was held by Marcellus or his school.

‡ So Newman. Montfaucon thinks he did not begin to suspect Marcellus before A.D. 358. The statement in the 2nd Hilarian Fragment, that he broke off communion with him before 349, is derived from questionable authority, and is inconsistent with De Fugâ, 3, "Ancyra is mourning for Marcellus," and Hist. Ar. 6. It was probably after the third exile that Epiphanius, on asking Athanasius what he thought about Marcellus, inferred from a significant smile that he considered him to be "not far from heresy," but to have "made a defence for himself" (Haer. 72, 4). Perhaps Epiphanius is alluding to the defence made at Rome (Hist. Ar. 6), but hinting that it seemed no longer to satisfy Athanasius. Or it may be (if Epiphanius spoke to Athanasius as he passed through Palestine towards Alexandria in 346) that Athanasius was thinking of suspicions which had not unreasonably been entertained before that defence.

§ Dr. Newman has collected (Athan. Treat. ii. 341), and Dean Stanley has gently commented on, some cases in which Athanasius makes a rather large use of a precedent derived from such Scripture language as "brood of vipers." See also the vehement language in Orat. ii. 4. He does not omit to taunt Asterius, the old Arian writer whom he quotes (and from whom Arius borrowed an argument), with having sacrificed under persecution: e. g. il. 24; cf. De Decret. 8. He says (Orat. iii. 59) that later Arians have become ashamed of such plain-spoken formulas as "the Son is a creature" (cf. De Decret. 28), and seek to convey their doctrine in less startling language, autocrat, might seem to have, humanly speaking, no better earthly prospect than a few more years of perilous wandering, to be saddened by a deepening consciousness of defeat, and to be closed by death in some "wilderness of cells." Yet it would have been very unlike Athanasius the Great to give way to despondency, or to think that he had "spent his strength for nought" in a cause which his faith told him had in it all the elements of ultimate victory. The spirit in which he had chosen a psalm of thanksgiving as his church's answer to the din of a fierce onslaught enabled him to look through the present darkness, to foresee the future by manful hope, to keep his spirit braced for any exertion, to enjoy heartily the comfort of friendly letters, and to follow up his Discourses by four Letters to Serapion of Thmuis, his friend "beloved and longed for," of which the second briefly repeated the teaching of the Discourses, while the others were directed against a theory then reported to him by Serapion as springing up, and afterwards known as Macedonianism; which, abandoning the Arian position in regard to the Son, strove with singular inconsistency to retain it in regard to the Spirit, whom it declared to be neither a Divine Person nor a Divine attribute, but a ministering creature, "differing only in degree from the angels."¹ Athanasius met this error by contending for "a Trinity real and undivided," in which the Spirit was included with the Father and the Son; and replied to the pointed cavils which, in the eristic style of the old Arians, were being now directed against His coequal personality.

The general aspect of Church affairs was very unhelpful. At Constantinople an Arian persecution had again set in. But the defection of Hosius in 357, and Liberius in 358, after hard pressure and cruel usage, from the steadfastness which Athanasius had so much admired, must have wounded him to the heart. Yet he speaks of them with characteristic and most generous tenderness, and with full recognition of the trials under which they had given way (Hist. Ar. 45, 41; Apol. 89; De Fugâ, 5).^k Hosius, indeed, although he signed a strongly Arian formula,—the second of Sirmium, commonly called the "Blasphemia," and written by Potamius bishop of Lisbon,—refused to admit the personal charges against Athanasius; and Liberius, though disowning his communion on the alleged ground of those charges, accepted a creed of less pronounced heterodoxy.^l But in the person of its chief the ¹ The Exposition of Faith must have been written before this period, for it makes no reference to this view. On the position of the "Pneumatonachi," see Epiphanius, Haer. 74, 1. There is a passage of much interest on the Procession in Ad Serap. i. 20; and in the fourth letter Athanasius gives a characteristic exposition of his view of the unpardonable sin.

^k He made additions to the Apologetics and the History.

^l It was apparently a semi-Arian digest of several formularies (Newman, Athan. Treat. i. 162). He felt that Liberius was persuaded to regard the Homousion as a cloak for Sabellianism, and so "hat er nur das nicänische Wort, nicht den orthodoxen Glauben aufzugeben" (Concilien-gesch. i. 673). He rejects as spurious four letters ascribed to Liberius, i. e. not only the one beginning "Studens paci," but three others, "Pro deifico," "Quia scio," "Non doceo," in the first of which, as we have it, are inserted Hilary's anathemas against Liberius (HIL

Roman Church was temporarily dishonoured; and in the next year, 359, the general body of Western bishops, at the Council of Ariminum, were partly harassed and partly cheated into adopting an equivocal but really Arian confession, which was also adopted at the beginning of 360 by the legates of the Eastern Council of Seleucia.^m An account of the earlier proceedings of these two councils was drawn up, in the form of a letter, by Athanasius, who, on the ground of a few words in the opening of this Letter on the Councils of Ariminum and Seleucia, has been thought by Tillemont and Gibbon to have been present, at any rate, at the latter place. This, however, is very improbable; and the words in question (ἀπερ ἑώρακα) may be taken in a less literal sense. The treatise is remarkable for his considerateness towards those of the Semi-Ariansⁿ whose objections to the Nicene Creed were rather verbal than real, while the second creed of Sirmium had driven them into open hostility to the Arians, properly so called, which they had expressed in their Council of Ancyra in 358. Athanasius, then expressly naming their leader, Basil of Ancyra,^o welcomes them as brothers who mean essentially what Churchmen mean. He will not for the present urge the Homoousion upon them. He is sure that in time they will accept it,^p as securing that doctrine of Christ's essential Sonship which their own symbol "Homoiousion" could not adequately guard (De Syn. 41). But while exhibiting this large-minded patience and forbearance, he is careful to contrast the long series of Arian creeds with the one invariable standard of the orthodox: the only refuge from restless variations will be found in a frank adoption of the creed of Nicaea (ib. 32; cf. Ad Afros, 9).

In the end of 360, the Arian party was in a position too plainly artificial to be permanent. The Semi-Arians had fallen into disgrace with Constantius, once their ardent disciple, but now under the influence of the men who had carried what Neander calls the "vapid" and indefinite Fragm. 6). The correspondence between Liberius and Athanasius is, he says, acknowledged to be spurious: but Liberius's letter to Constantius is genuine. Both Hosius and Liberius returned to Catholicism.

^m The form of Arianism which thus triumphed was the vague Acaelan theory, which adopted the "Homoion" as its symbol, and often served as a stepping-stone to the "Anomoion" of ultra-Arianism. The "Creed of Ariminum" was what is called the "Dated" Creed (3rd Sirmian) of May 22, with two alterations which made it still more unorthodox: but it was signed in the sense of Valens's anathemas, one of which, however, in fact implied that the Son was a creature. Athanasius' criticism of the preamble of the "Dated Creed" is more rhetorical than just: but its point is, that the exposition of what the framers called "the Catholic Faith" was dated in a consular year. The Nicene Fathers, he adds, wrote, "This is the faith of the Catholic Church (De Syn. 3-6).

ⁿ See Newman, Arians, c. 5, s. 2. Observe that in the Discourses Athanasius does not bring the Homoousion forward (Athan. Treat. 1, 17).

^o It is remarkable that he should speak thus of one who had superseded Marcellus in his bishopric, and had been condemned at Sardica.

^p It is necessary to observe that this passage has been sometimes misapprehended, as if Athanasius had offered absolutely to waive the Homoousion in such cases. Cf. De Decr. 21.

formula of Ariminum, and who were secretly playing into the hands of those thorough-going ultra-Arians whom they found it for the present convenient to disavow. They had gained a point by placing in the see of Constantinople a man capable of singular profanity, named Eudoxius, who had previously been bishop of Antioch, where, at the beginning of 361, he was succeeded by Meletius, an Armenian bishop of known moderation, winning eloquence, and impressive piety. This prelate, soon after his installation, astonished and provoked his patrons by a sermon of reverential tone and essential orthodoxy, which has been preserved by Epiphanius (Hæc. 73, 29). He was promptly deposed, banished, and superseded by Euzoios, who had been associated with Arius in his original excommunication. But the orthodox members of what might be called the Established Church of Antioch, while abhorring Euzoios, found themselves repelled by the Eustathians (Soz. iv. 28), who had for their pastor a presbyter named Paulinus; and an open schism between two congregations of essentially the same faith was the unhappy consequence. Euzoios, in the following autumn, was visited by Constantius, who received from his hands a long-deferred baptism, on the eve of his westward march to crush, as he hoped, the revolt of his cousin Julian. But he was struck down by fever at the foot of Mount Taurus; and his death, on Nov. 4, 361, gave the empire to a prince who had long renounced Christianity in secret, and had recently avowed his adherence to Paganism.

On Nov. 30 the accession of Julian was formally proclaimed at Alexandria. The Pagans, in high exultation, thought that their time was come for taking vengeance on the Arian bishop, whom they had once before tumultuously expelled for oppressive and violent conduct, especially for his attacks on Pagan worship,^q and who, on the very day of his return, had rekindled their fury by threatening to destroy a temple under the odious epithet of a "sepulchre." They rose in irresistible force, threw George into prison, and on Dec. 24 barbarously murdered him, drew his body through the city on a camel's back, and, after burning it, flung the ashes into the sea.^r The Arians set up one Lucius in his place; but Julian, as if to show his supercilious contempt for the disputes of "Galileans," or his detestation of the memory of Constantius, permitted all the bishops whom his predecessor had exiled to return to their homes; and Athanasius, taking advantage of this edict, reappeared in Alexandria, to the joy of his people, Feb. 22, 362.

One of his first acts was to hold a Council for the settlement of several pressing questions. (1.) There were many bishops who deeply regretted their weak or thoughtless concessions at Ariminum: how were they to be treated? (2.) It had become urgently necessary to give some advice to Paulinus and his flock at Antioch, now that Meletius's return had increased the existing difficulty, for while Paulinus, owing to Euzoios's respect for his high character, was allowed to officiate in a little church within the "New Town," Meletius occupied "the Apostle's Church" in the "Old Town" by the Orontes. (3.) A dispute had arisen between two sets of Churchmen as to the word "Hypostasis:"* a considerable number, including those who had emerged from Semi-Arianism, had formed the habit of asserting "three Hypostases" in the Godhead; the majority, however, adhered to the older phrase, "one Hypostasis." The latter charged the former with Arianizing, and were charged in return with Sabellianizing: could anything be done to prevent a breach? (4.) Lastly, some persons were thought to reduce the Incarnation to an association between the Word and a saintly human individual;† while others seem disposed to minimize the human element in the mystery, by excluding from Christ's manhood a reasonable soul. The work before the Council was that of harmonizing and reconciling—a work most congenial, as Gregory Nazianzen says, to Athanasius, and to the excellent Western bishop, Eusebius of Vercellae, who was on his way home from exile in the Thebaid, and whose presence in Alexandria had been an immediate cause of the assembling of the Synod. His companion, Lucifer of Caliaris, a very earnest but a rigorous and impetuous man, had preferred to go on to Antioch. It was resolved (1) that any persons who had forfeited their right to Church communion might regain it by simply professing the Nicene Creed, and condemning the heresies of the day;‡ (2) that on these terms the congregation in the "Old Town" might be united to the other community, which was considered to represent the faithful "Eustathians." As to the theological points raised, mutual explanations proved the difference to be the result of misunderstanding. Those who spoke of three Hypostases were found to mean three "really existing Persons;" those who spoke of one Hypostasis used the term as equivalent to "essence" (Epiph. Haer. 73, 17). The Council suggested that the Nicene language should be simply adopted by both sides.‡ Again, it appeared that there was no disposition to deny either the actual Incarnation of the Word, or the completeness of the Manhood assumed by Him. A Synodal letter, or "Tome," addressed "to the Antiochenes" (i. e. to Paulinus and his flock), and composed by Athanasius, is one of the noblest documents that ever emanated from a Council. But it came too late to establish peace at Antioch. Lucifer, instead of waiting for the Council's decision, had taken upon him to consecrate Paulinus‡ as the legitimate bishop of Antioch, and so perpetuated the division which his wiser brethren had hoped to heal; while his indignation against the "Ariminians" made him form a schism of his own, rather than acquiesce in their admission to communion on any other footing than that of lay penitents. The line which he took must have grieved Athanasius, who had held him in high esteem as a sufferer for the faith.‡

^q See Soc. iii. 2, Soz. v. 7, for his exposure of the Pagan idols and ornaments found underneath a temple of Mithra, where he was building a church. The statements as to his expulsion and return, in the Maffian Fragment, are inconsistent with each other. Athanasius refers to his expulsion, De Syn. 31.

The Pagans of Alexandria had been rebuked by Julian for the murder of George; but he lent a ready ear to their denunciations of Athanasius as a man whose influence would destroy their religion. He assured them that he had never intended Athanasius to resume "what is called the episcopal throne;" peremptorily commanded that he should leave Alexandria; and in another letter, addressed to the praefect Ecdicius, he menaced the "foe of the gods, who had dared, in his reign, to baptize Greek ladies" (alluding to conversions from Paganism, which Athanasius since his return had effected), with a heavier punishment to follow upon his expulsion.‡ The Imperial edict was communicated to Athanasius by Pythiodorus, a Pagan philosopher, on Oct. 23 (= Paophi 27, Fest. Ind., Fragm. Maff.). The faithful gathered around him weeping. "Be of good heart," he said; "it is but a cloud; it will soon pass." He instantly embarked to go up the Nile. But Julian's implied orders were not forgotten; some Government agents pursued his vessel. They met a boat coming down the river, and asked for news of Athanasius. "He is not far off," was the reply. The boat was his own—he himself, perhaps, the speaker (Theod. iii. 9).

* See Newman, Arians, c. 5, s. 1; Athan. Treat. i. 70. The senses of ὑπόστασις are enumerated by Dean Liddell in his sermon on "Where two or three," &c.—(1) the sediment of a liquid; (2) a groundwork; (3) solid reality; (4) essence, as in Heb. i. 3; (5) personality. The Nicene anathemas had used it in sense (4). Athanasius so uses it (another term which he uses in the same sense is εἶδος, De Syn. 52, c. Apoll. i. 2) in Orat. iii. 65, iv. 1, 33, &c., but apparently in sense (5) in Orat. iv. 25, 35. In De Syn. 36, "three hypostases" appears as an Arian phrase: in De Decr. 26, Dionysius of Rome is cited as denying "three partite hypostases foreign to each other."

† A foreshadowing of Nestorianism. Athanasius had already been emphatic in guarding against such a notion of merely moral union between the Father and the Saviour who would reduce the latter to the level of the saints (Orat. iii. 10, 18; De Syn. 48; and see infra as to his later writings).

‡ We are not called upon to approve the extent to which, according to Athanasius's Letter to Rufinianus, written some years later, the conduct of the Ariminian bishops was held excusable as an instance of "economy." (In De Sent. Dion., Athanasius uses "economy" in a perfectly unobjectionable sense, as meaning the considerateness which, without compromise of truth, will adapt teaching to the recipient's capacity. On "economy," see also Vales. in Philostorg. vi. 3; Newman's Arians, c. 1, s. 3.) Rufinus has some touching words (l. 25) on the Council's compassionate gentleness towards these "fallen ones;" contrast the hard sarcasm of the Luciferians, Marcellinus and Faustinus (Sirmoind. l. 242 sq.). "Quis est qui... pacem peridorum Deo placere confidat?" See Jerome, adv. Lucif. 19, 20.

‡ This was an impracticable suggestion at that point of the debate; and the Nicene anathemas implicitly sanctioned "One Hypostasis," v. supra. Meletius and his friends spoke of three, Paulinus and the Latins of one. Jerome, in 377, asked Damasus whether "three hypostases" was a tenable phrase; for himself he thought it Tritheistic. Soer., iii. 7, makes a complete mistake as to the line taken by the Council—as if it had proscribed the words "ousia" and "hypostasis." It is observable that Didymus, who had worked under Athanasius, uses "hypostases" for "persons," De Trin. i. 11.

‡ Valesius is clearly mistaken in thinking that the consecration of Paulinus preceded the sitting of the Council and was approved by it (on Soc. iii. 6, 9).

‡ The statement that Athanasius translated into Greek Lucifer's Latin work against Constantius (Marc. et Faust.) cannot be relied on; and the "Letters of Athanasius to Lucifer" have a doubtful appearance.

‡ Such is the sense of ἐπινοεῖσθαι, according to Heyler, Julian. Epist. p. 187. See Gibbon, iii. 176 (c. 23). Julian's letter fixes Dec. 1 as the last day on which Athanasius should be allowed to be in Egypt. The Fragment says that after his departure two of his presbyters were banished at the urgency of Pythiodorus.

His facilities of information had given him warning of the peril, and his presence of mind had baffled it. He sailed on towards Alexandria, but concealed himself at Chaereu, the first station from the capital; then proceeded to Memphis, where he wrote his Festal Letter for 363; and then made his way to the Thebaid.

VII. From his fourth exile to his death.—It was probably about this time,^b shortly before Easter 363, that Athanasius was met, while approaching Hermopolis, by Theodore of Tabenne. Seeing the banks of the Nile thronged by bishops, clergy, and monks, the archbishop exclaimed, in Isaiah's words, "Who are these that fly as a cloud, and as the doves to their cotes?" Night apparently favoured this demonstration; Athanasius, having disembarked, mounted an ass which Theodore led, and pursued his way amid a vast body of monks bearing lanterns and torches, and chanting psalms. "It is not we that are fathers," he broke forth enthusiastically; "it is these men devoted to humility and obedience." He stayed some time at Hermopolis and Antinoe, for the purpose of preaching; then proceeded southwards to Tabenne, observed everything, even to the seats of the monks, and warmly commended the abbot. "Remember us," said Theodore, "in your prayers." The answer was characteristic. "If I forget thee, O Jerusalem!" At midsummer, according to another narrative,^c he was at Antinoe, apprehensive of being arrested and put to death, when Theodore and another abbot named Pammon came to see him, and persuaded him to embark with them in Theodore's closely covered boat, in order to conceal himself in Tabenne. The wind was against them; Theodore's monks began to tow the boat; Athanasius was in prayer, agitated by the prospect of martyrdom, but gaining calmness from his vivid faith. "Even if I am killed," he said—here the two abbots smiled at each other; and Theodore, according to the story, assured him that Julian had at that very hour been slain in his Persian war. The day of Julian's death was 26th June, 363.

"The cloud had passed," and Athanasius returned by night to Alexandria. After his arrival, which was kept secret, he received a letter from the new emperor Jovian, desiring him to resume his functions, and to draw up a statement of the Catholic faith. Athanasius at once assembled a Council, and framed a synodal letter,^d in which the Nicene Creed was embodied, its Scripturalness asserted, and the great majority of Churches (including the British) referred to as professing it: Arianism was condemned, Semi-Arianism pronounced inadequate, the Homoousion explained as expressive of Christ's real Sonship, the coequality of the Holy Spirit maintained in terms which partly anticipate the language of the Creed of Constantinople. On Sept. 5, Athanasius sailed to Antioch, bearing this letter. He was most graviously received, while the rival bishop Lucius and his companions were rebuffed with some humour and some impatience by the blunt soldier-prince, who, however, during his brief reign, showed himself as tolerant as he was orthodox. The general prospects of the Church must now have seemed brighter than at any time since 330. Liberius was known to have made a full declaration of orthodoxy; and many Western bishops, responding to the appeals of Eusebius and the illustrious Hilary of Poitiers, had eagerly renounced the Ariminian creed and professed the Nicene. But the local troubles of Antioch were distressing; Athanasius was at first disposed to recognise Meletius, but the latter, keenly annoyed by the consecration of Paulinus (although Lucifer alone was responsible for that proceeding), held aloof from all proposals of accommodation, or put off Athanasius with vague promises (Basil, Ep. 89, 258). The consequence was that Athanasius, who, ever since he had worshipped with the Eustathians in 346, had given them his warm sympathy, now recognized their bishop as the true head of the Antiochene church, on his appending to his signature of the Tome a full and orthodox declaration, which, according to Epiphanius (Hær. 77, 20), Athanasius himself had framed.

Having written his Festal Letter for 364 at Antioch, Athanasius reached home, apparently, on Feb. 13,^e a few days before Jovian's death. Valentinian I. succeeded, and soon afterwards assigned the East to his brother Valens. The Alexandrian Church was not at first a sufferer by this change of monarchs; and 364-5 may be the probable date for the publication of the Life of Antony, which Athanasius addressed "to the monks abroad," i. e. those in Italy and Gaul.^f But, ere long, his troubles to some extent reappeared. According to the Egyptian documents, it was the spring of 365^g when Valens issued an order for the expulsion of all bishops who, having been expelled under Constantius, had been recalled under Julian, and thereby announced that he meant to follow the Arian policy of Constantius. The Maffean Fragment tells us that on May 5 this order reached Alexandria, and caused a popular ferment, only quieted on June 8 by the prefect's promise to refer the case of Athanasius to the emperor. If we may combine his statement with Sozomen's (who, however, places these events in a subsequent year), we should suppose that the prefect was but biding his time; and on the night of Oct. 5, Athanasius, having doubtless been forewarned, left his abode in the precinct of ^e See Mansi's proposed correction of Fragm. Maff. as to the time.

^f It is very probable that he himself sent to Treves, in remembrance of his own sojourn there some thirty years previously, the copy which two young officers of the provincial government, walking one afternoon in the gardens beside the city wall, found in a cottage occupied by monks, and the reading of which "kindled" in them an instant resolution to exchange their secular prospects for the monastic "service" of God. The story contributed somewhat to the conversion of Augustine. See his Confess. viii. 15.

^g The usual date is 367; and it has been said that Valens was not an Arian until baptized by Eudoxius that year. But he was under the influence of that ultra-Arian when he banished the deputies of the semi-Arian Council of Laupacus in the spring of 365.

^b Vil. Pach. Montfaucon places this incident in the period following the third exile; Tillemont defers it to 365: but both the Fragment and the Index connect a journey to the Thebaid with the fourth exile, and the Fragment names Hermopolis and Antinoe.

^c Narr. ad Ammon.: Op. li. 695. The frank exhibition of Athanasius's sensibility to physical fear gives the story an air of truth.

^d Valsius, on Theod. i. 3, thinks the letter was drawn up at Antioch by Athanasius, and some bishops who accompanied him thither.

St. Dionysius's church, and took refuge in a country house near the New River.^b It was not an hour too soon: the prefect, with a military commander, beset the church that same night, broke open the outer gates, and searched the building, even to the roof, in vain. For four months the archbishop's concealment lasted; until Barasides, or Bresidas, an imperial notary, having brought an order for his return, came to the country house with a great multitude, and led Athanasius back into his church, Feb. 1 (Mechir 7). 366. His quiet was not again disturbed, except by such events as a Pagan riot on July 21, 366, in which the Cæsarean church, completed by George just before his death, was burned; or the attempt of Lucius, on Sept. 23, 367, to establish himself within the enclosure of another church—the consequence of which was that the magistrates, in order to save him from the populace, placed him in the hands of the military power “to be removed from Egypt.” Athanasius was free to devote himself to his proper work, whether of writing or of administration. His Festal Letter for 367—which had been known from Greek MSS. long before the discovery of the series—contained a list of the books of Scripture which, so far as regards the New Testament, agrees precisely with our own (see, too, De Decr. 18). The canonical books are described as “the fountains of salvation, through which alone” (a mode of speaking very usual with Athanasius) “is the teaching of religion transmitted;” a second class of books is mentioned, as “read” in church for religious edification; the name “apocryphal” is reserved for a third class, to which heretics have assigned a fictitious dignity (Westcott, On the Canon, pp. 487, 520). To this period has been assigned the comment on doctrinal texts which is called a treatise On the Incarnation and against the Arians;ⁱ but its entire genuineness may be reasonably doubted, for it uses the phrase “Three Hypostases,”^k whereas his next work identifies hypostasis with essence (Ad Afros, 4), and it also refers John xiv. 28, not as he had done in Orat. i. 58, to the Divine Sonship, but, like Didymus, Cyril, and the Latins, to the assumed Humanity. In or about 369 he held a council at Alexandria, in order to receive letters from a Roman council held under Damasus, the successor of Liberius, and also from other Western prelates, excommunicating Ursacius and Valens, and enforcing the authority of the Nicene Creed. Hereupon Athanasius, in a synodal letter addressed To the Africans, i. e. to those in the Carthaginian territory, contrasts the “ten or more” synodal formulas of Arianism with the Nicene Creed, gives some account of its formation, and exposes the futile attempt of its present adversaries to claim authority for the later, as distinct from the earlier, proceedings of the Ariminian council. Another letter was written to Damasus, expressing some surprise that Auxentius, the Arian bishop of Milan (see Hist. Ar. 75) had not been put under the same ban with Ursacius and Valens; and the suggestion was adopted by a subsequent Roman synod, and by others in Spain and Gaul.

It appears that on Sept. 22, 369, Athanasius, who had in May of the previous year begun to rebuild the Cæsarean church, laid the foundations of another church, afterwards called by his own name (Fest. Ind.). About this time he shewed in two remarkable acts, on the one hand, his superiority to mere technical formalism, and, on the other, his resolution to enforce “ecclesiastical discipline” in “the cause of moral righteousness” (to borrow Dr. Freeman's words, in his Norman Conquest, about Anselm). The people of two towns in Pentapolis—Palæbisca and Hydrax—wished to have a bishop of their own in the person of a young layman named Siderius. The aged prelate of the diocese to which they belonged was persuaded to consent; and Siderius was actually consecrated by a single bishop, and without any sanction from the “Evangelical throne.” Yet Athanasius, hoping that the young bishop's practical ability might be turned to good account in a district troubled by Arianism, not only overlooked the double irregularity of the consecration, but afterwards promoted Siderius to a more important see (Synesius, Ep. 77). Again, we find Athanasius excommunicating a cruel and licentious governor in Libya, and signifying the act by circular letters. One of these was sent to Basil, who had just become exarch, or archbishop, of Caesarea in Cappadocia, and had received, perhaps at that time, from Athanasius,^l a formal notification of the proceedings of the Council of 362 (Ep. 204). He immediately announced to his own people the sentence pronounced in Egypt; the strong sense of Church unity made such a step both regular and natural, and he wrote to assure Athanasius that the offender would be regarded by the faithful at Caesarea as utterly alien from Christian fellowship (Ep. 60). This led to a correspondence, carried on actively in 371. Basil, who had troubles of all kinds weighing upon his spirit, sought aid in regard to one of them—the unhappy schism of Antioch—from “the keen insight, the practical energy, the evangelical sympathy,” of the widely venerated man who must be supposed to feel with special acuteness the contrast between former peace and present confusion (Ep. 66). What he wanted, as he explained more distinctly in his next letter, was, that Athanasius should promote the recognition by the Westerns of Meletius as the rightful bishop of Antioch, and should induce Paulinus to enter upon some negotiation.^m The bearer of his letter was Dorotheus, Meletius's deacon, whom Athanasius, probably about Easter 371, sent back, with one of his own priests, to convey his answer to Basil. In the autumn Basil wrote again (Ep. 69), and the tone which he adopts towards Athanasius is very remarkable. He calls him the ⁱ Newman speaks of it with an “if genuine” (Atham. Treat. ii. 494).

^k He had used it long before. In illud, Omnia Mihi, 6, if the reading there be correct: but would he have used it after the Council of 362 had advised that neither “One” nor “Three Hypostases” should be asserted as a formula?

^l The Benedictine biographer of Basil considers that he received it some years before he became a bishop, in answer to a question whether he ought to communicate with Eustathius of Sebaste (Vit. Bas. viii. 8).

^m Basil fully recognizes both congregations as forming “the sound portion” of the Antiochene church (Ep. 69); and he gives Meletius an admonition to be conciliatory (Ep. 89).

foremost person (literally, the summit) of the whole Church, the man of "truly grand and apostolic soul, who from boyhood had been an athlete in the cause of religion"—"a spiritual father," whom he longed earnestly to see, and whose conversation would amply compensate for all the sufferings of a lifetime (Ep. 69, 80, 82). But although Athanasius consented to act as a medium between Basil and the Westerns (Ep. 90), he could not, with consistency or with dignity, take any direct part in favour of Meletius, whose bearing, in 363, had disappointed his pacific efforts, and whose rival's position he had unequivocally recognized.^a Even Basil, when Meletius's friends, Eastern bishops of like antecedents, desired that Athanasius would write to them as a body, felt that this might be asking too much (Ep. 82); and on the whole, as Dr. Newman expresses it (Church of the Fathers, p. 73), "nothing came of the application;" but when some Cappadocian monks complained of Basil's reserved language as to the Divinity of the Holy Spirit, Athanasius reproved them in a letter, the gist of which is evident from his extant letters, to John and Antiochus, and to Palladius. Basil, he insisted, was one who might well be trusted, for he was one of whom the Church might indeed be proud;^b it was captious to imagine an unsound motive for his cautious and gradual exposition of the truth.

But one of these letters of Basil (Ep. 69) had apparently a remarkable result. He complained of the countenance still given to Marcellus by the Westerns, who were therefore looked upon in the East as indifferent about any heresy that happened not to be Arianism. Athanasius, as we have seen, had written against the views ascribed to Marcellus, and had begun to regard him, at least, with more or less suspicion; but now, in consequence of Basil's letter (see Montfaucon, Coll. Nov. ii. p. 71 sq.; Newman, Ath. Treat. ii. 503), Marcellus, fortifying himself with commendatory letters from Athanasius's friends, the bishops of Greece and Macedonia, sent his deacon Eugenius, with others, as a deputation to Athanasius. On their arrival, Athanasius of course put questions to them as to doctrine. In reply, they presented to him, in the name of Marcellus "and a great multitude" who adhered to him, a statement which was explicit^c on all points save one, the permanence of Christ's Humanity and Kingdom. This point, however, might be supposed to be included in the rest: Athanasius might be only too glad to accept as satisfactory this representation of the belief of his former friend, who was now drawing to the close of a prolonged and troubled life. It is probably by accident that his own "name does not appear among the extant signatures" (Newman) by which four Egyptian prelates accepted the statement with "Amen."

But if his final opinion of Marcellus was thus lenient, he was far from tolerating, in these latter years of his life, any theories which seemed definitely heterodox respecting what may be called the human side of the Incarnation. If, in his Letter to Adelphius, he condemned a certain class of Arians, and vindicated against their cavils the adoration paid to Christ's Manhood, that is, to His one Person Incarnate; if, in his Letter to Marinus, he denounced those who spoke of the man Christ as simply a saint^d with whom the Word had become associated; if he was also, in his Letter to Epictetus, bishop of Corinth—a tract called forth by a communication from Epictetus,^e—most earnest against some who, while "glorifying in the Nicene confession," represented Christ's body as not truly human, but formed out of the essence of Godhead. This was, in fact, the second proposition^f of the heresy called Apollinarian; the first being that which had attracted the attention of the Council of 362, and had been disclaimed by those whom the Council could examine,—as to the non-existence, in Christ, of a rational soul, the Word being supposed to supply its place. These views had grown out of an unbalanced eagerness to exalt the Saviour's dignity: but the great upholders of Nicene faith saw that they were incompatible with His Manhood and His Headship, that they virtually brought back Docetism, and that one of them, at any rate, involved a debased conception of Deity. In the next year, 372, he combated both these propositions with "the keenness and richness of thought which distinguish his writings generally" (see Newman, Church of the Fathers, p. 162; Praef. ed. Ben. ii. 7) in two books which bear the title, Against Apollinarian. But he never mentioned the name of his old friend, the bishop of Syrian Laodicea (see Epiph. Haer. 77, 2), as responsible for either of these errors; his wish to believe the best of all whom he had loved or with whom he had acted may have made him reject suspicious which proved to be only too just. These books are remarkable for the masterly distinctness with which the one Christ is set forth as "perfect God and perfect Man" (i. 16): if words occur in ii. 10 which seem at first sight to favour Monothelitism, the context^g shews their meaning to be that the Divine will in Christ was dominant over the human: if in the next chapter the phrase, "God suffered through the flesh," is called unscriptural, the whole argument shews that he is contending against the passibility of the Saviour's Godhead. Inexact as might be some of his phrases, the general purport of his teaching on this great subject is unmistakable; it is, as he says in Orat. iii. 41, that Christ was "very God in the flesh, and

^a See above, as to the Council of 362. Nestorianism seems again foreshadowed in the opinion implicitly combated in c. Apollin. i. 9, 13, 21; ii. 7.

^b See Neale, Hist. Alex. i. 272. The original of this letter was kept in the archives of the Alexandrian church, and by it Cyril proved to Paul of Emesa that some copies had been corrupted.

^c It was chargeable on the school of Apollinarian.

^d Not to cite De Incarn. et c. Ar. 21, which distinctly attests two wills in Christ, the Sixth General Council, in condemning Monothelitism, appealed to some words of "the most wise Athanasius," which appear among his "Fragmenta varia." "It was necessary that the will of the flesh should be moved, but that it should be subjected to the will Divine."

^e Montfaucon, indeed, thinks that Athanasius was "reconciled to Meletius."

^f Probably Athanasius had heard about this time of Basil's majestic courage when assailed by the Praetorian praefect Modestus and by Valens (371-2).

^g E. g. it asserts an Eternal Son, who is identical with a Personal Word; and it condemns both Sabellianism and Photinianism.

very Flesh in the Word." In truth, these later treatises, like the great Discourses, exclude by anticipation both the forms of heresy, in reference to the Person and Natures of Christ, which troubled the Church in the next three centuries. (See especially i. 11, ii. 10.) Athanasius, in the fruits of his work, was "in truth the Immortal" (Christ. Remembr. xxxvii. 206): he was continually "planting trees under which men of a later age might sit." It might indeed be said of him that he "waxed old in his work" (Eccles. xi. 20); but the time of work for him—a time so loyally and unweariedly employed from the days of his youthful attendance on Alexander—came to an end in the spring of 373. The discussions⁶ about the year of his death may be considered as practically closed; the Festal Index, although its chronology is sometimes faulty, may be considered as confirming the date of 373, given in the Mafféan Fragment, supported by other ancient authorities, and accepted by various writers. The exact day, we may believe, was Thursday, May 2, on which day of the month Athanasius is venerated in the Western Church.⁷ He had sat on the Alexandrian throne, as his great successor Cyril says in a letter to the monks of Egypt, "forty-six complete years;" had he lived a few weeks longer, the years of his episcopate would have been forty-seven. Having recommended Peter, one of his presbyters, for election in his place, he died tranquilly in his own house, "after many struggles," as Rufinus says (ii. 3), "and after his endurance had won many a crown," amid troubles which Tillemont⁷ ventures to call a continual martyrdom.

Such was the career of Athanasius the Great, as he began to be called in the next generation. Möhler has reason to say that "the narrative of his life is a panegyric which words can only enfeeble." And yet one would not "willingly let die" the words in which many great writers have felt constrained to do homage to such a life and such a soul. If Gregory Nazianzen's eulogy is too rhetorically gorgeous⁸ for modern taste,

⁷ The Greek Church honours him, with Cyril, on Jan. 18. The day given in Fragm. Maff. is May 3.

Hooker's will live while English is spoken; and Gibbon's admiration for such manifest nobleness (iii. 70) is significant as contrasting with his general antipathy to Church heroes. (Stanley, East. Ch. p. 276.) Four points, perhaps, ought especially to dwell in our remembrance: (1) the deep religiousness which illuminated all his studies and controversies by a sense of his relations as a Christian to his Redeemer; (2) the persistency, so remarkable in one whose natural temperament was acutely sensitive; (3) the combination of gifts, "firmness with discretion and discrimination," as Newman expresses it, which enabled him, while never turning aside from his great object, to be, as Gregory Nazianzen applies the apostolic phrase, "all things to all men;" and in close connection with this, (4) the affectionateness which made him so tender as a friend, and so active as a peacemaker,—which won for him such enthusiastic loyalty, and endowed the great theologian and Church ruler with the powers peculiar to a truly loveable man. That he was not flawless,—that his words could be somewhat too sharp in controversy, or somewhat unreal in addressing a despot, that he was not always charitable in his interpretation of his adversaries' conduct, or that his casuistry, on one occasion, seems to have lacked the healthy severity of St. Augustine's,—this may be, and has been, admitted; but after all, and looking at the whole man, we shall not be extravagant if we pronounce his name to be the greatest in the Church's post-apostolic history.

The list of his genuine writings, besides those which have been mentioned in this account of his life, would include his Exposition of the Psalms; his work on the Titles of the Psalms, a series of short exegetical comments, verse by verse; two letters to monks; the Greater Discourse on Faith (which Newman describes as "hardly more than a set of small fragments from his other works"), and numerous fragments, exegetical, homiletical, polemical, and historical. Of these fragments^a there must have been many specimens and collections in the literature of the next succeeding ages. "When you meet with a saying of Athanasius," said Abbot Cosmas in the sixth century, "and have not paper on which to copy it, copy it on your clothes."

Among those writings which have been ascribed to him, but which are of doubtful genuineness, is a little tract on the Incarnation, which contains the phrase afterwards so productive of controversy, "one Incarnate φύσις of God the Word."^b [CYRIL.] But Montfaucon and Möhler, ject in J. B. Robertson's Memoir of Möhler, p. xcviil.: a brief but pregnant rationale of his strength as a theologian in Dorner's Person of Christ, ii. 248, E. T.: and compare the forcible words of Canon Robertson, Hist. Ch. i. 193, ed. 1. Bp. Pearson, in Vindic. Ign. p. 1. c. 3 (l. 235) briefly recounts his troubles.

^a On his last works, e. g. against the Manicheans, a Commentary on Ecclesiastes, see Præf. ed. Ben. iii. Socrates, i. 13, refers to a work called 'Synodicon' by Athanasius, which is lost. The treatise or letter De Decret. had been preceded by another (c. 5), which also is lost.

^b In Cont. Apollin. i. 12, he seems to use φύσις for "personal substance" or "person." On the other hand, he uses φύσις for nature in several passages where he recognizes, more or less explicitly, a human φύσις (as the Council of Chalcedon afterwards declared) in the Person of the Incarnate Saviour (Orat. ii. 70, iii. 43, 58, iv. 36; c. Apoll. i. 6, 17, ii. 11').

following Leontius of Byzantium, are disposed to regard it as a forgery; and Tillemont inclines that way (although, he says, "Quelleque parti que l'on prenne dans cette difficulté, il y a partout beaucoup d'embaras," Mem. viii. 717). Of the undoubtedly spurious^c writings, the Quicumque vult is by far the most eminent instance; in the middle ages it was believed to have been composed by the saint in a well or cavern at Treves. But the sermon On the Annunciation, which used to be quoted by Roman Catholic controversialists, may also be specified; and the Synopsis of Holy Scripture may be considered as certainly belonging to this class. (Westcott, On the Canon, p. 520.)

With regard to editions of Athanasius's works,^d a Latin version of a few of his writings appeared in 1482. Two genuine works, and many spurious ones, were published at Paris in 1520; Erasmus edited some, in Latin, in 1527 (he rejected the first of the doctrinal letters to Serapion, on his own view of internal evidence). Another edition, uniting those of 1520 and 1527, appeared at Lyons in 1532. A Latin version, by Nannius, of a much larger amount of the whole works, was published in 1556. The first Greek edition was the Commelinian, at Heidelberg, in 1600. Soon afterwards, Peter Felckmann edited with much accuracy many Athanasian Fragments. Latin editions followed in 1608 and 1612. The Greek text with a Latin version, Paris 1627, "threw into the shade all previous editions," but the work was loosely executed. Another faulty edition appeared at Leipsic in 1681. Then came the great Benedictine edition of 1698, enriched by the Life from the pen of Montfaucon, who in 1707 published, in one of the volumes of his Nova Patrum et Scriptorum Graecorum Collectio, additional remains collected by his industry. The work on the 'Titles of the Psalms' was edited by Nic. Antonelli at Rome, in 1746; and in 1777 appeared at Padua an edition in four volumes folio, combining the labours of previous editors.

A few English translations of some of Athanasius's works had appeared before the publication of any part of the 'Library of the Fathers.' But the volume of 'Historical Tracts of St. Athanasius,' and the two volumes of 'Treatises in Controversy with the Arians,' published in that series at Oxford in 1843-4, under Dr. Newman's editorship, must (whatever exceptions may be taken to a few passages in the notes) be always ranked among the richest treasures of English Patristic literature. [W. B.]

ATHANASIUS. (1) Bishop of ANAGASTUS in Cilicia Secunda and metropolitan, a disciple of St. Lucian of Antioch (Philost. H. E. iii. 15), reckoned by Arius, in his letter to Eusebius Nicom., among the bishops who coincided with him in doctrine (Theodt. H. E. i. 5). The great Athanasius (de Synod. p. 886) accuses him of having, previous to the Council of Nicaea, written blasphemies equal to those of Arius, of which he gives a specimen. He is said by Le Quien, on the authority of the Lib. Synod. Graec., to have supported Arius at the Council of Nicaea. Philostorgius (H. E. iii. 15) tells us that when Aetius was expelled from his master's house, after his unlucky victory in argument, Athanasius received him and read the Gospels with him.

(2) An Arian bishop, who succeeded Philip in the see of SCYTHOPOLIS, c. 372. He is charged by Epiphanius with pushing his Arian tenets to the most audacious impiety, asserting that the Son and Holy Spirit were creatures, and had nothing in common with the Divine nature (Epiph. Haer. lxxiii. c. 37, p. 885).

(3) Bishop of PERRHA, a see dependent on the Syrian Hierapolis. This Athanasius becomes known to us in connexion with Domnus II., bishop of Antioch, in the middle of the 5th century. He was present at the first council of Ephesus, and supported Cyril of Alexandria and signed with him. Grave accusations, the nature of which is not specified, having been brought against him by his clergy, Athanasius declined to meet them when summoned for that purpose by his metropolitan Panolbius of Hierapolis, and voluntarily resigned his see. Repenting, apparently, of his weakness, he took a journey to Constantinople, and moved the synod assembled there to tears by his representations of the violence to which he owed his deposition. He prevailed upon Proclus of Constantinople and Cyril of Alexandria to espouse his cause; and they wrote synodical letters on his behalf to Domnus, bishop of Antioch. Domnus in consequence summoned a council to consider the matter. The date is uncertain, but it was not till after the death of Cyril, and therefore subsequent to A.D. 444. Athanasius refused to appear, on the ground that Domnus was his personal enemy, and was unanimously condemned by default and deposed from his bishopric, to which Sabinianus was consecrated. After "the Robber Synod" of Ephesus, A.D. 449, had made the ambitious and unprincipled Dioscorus of Alexandria the temporary ruler of the Eastern Church, Sabinianus was in his turn deposed, and Athanasius reinstated at Perrha. Sabinianus appealed against his deposition to the Council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, where both he and his rival signed as bishop of Perrha. His case was fully heard, and it was determined that the original charges against him should be investigated by Maximus at Antioch; and, if substantiated, that his deposition should be confirmed; but if disproved, that he should be restored to his episcopate. We are in complete ignorance of the issue of this investigation. (Labbé, Conc. iv. 717-754; Liberatus Diae. in Breviario, Labbé, v. 762; Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 479; Christ. Lupus, ii.) [E. V.]

ATHANASIUS, bishop of ANCYRA (A.D. 360-369). His father, who bore the same name, was a man of high family and great learning, and had held important offices in the State (ἐθνῶν καὶ πόλεων ἀρχὰς διευθύναντος); but was reputed harsh and unfatherly to his children. This rumour, reaching St. Basil's ears, led him to write a friendly remonstrance, and hence arose a correspondence of which one letter is preserved (Jep. 24). The son Athanasius was raised to the see of Ancyra by the Arian Acaecius of Caesarea, through whose influence his predecessor Basilus had been deposed at a synod held at Constantinople, A.D. 360 (Sozom. iv. 25; Philostorg. v. 1). But notwithstanding this inauspicious beginning, he gave unquestionable proofs of his orthodoxy by taking an active part in the Synod of Tyana (A.D. 367), at which the Nicene symbol was accepted (Sozom. vi. 12). By St. Basil he is commended as "a bulwark of orthodoxy" (Ep. 25), and Gregory Nyssen praises him as "valuing the truth above everything" (c. Eunom. i. ii. 292). Owing to some misunderstanding however, Athanasius had spoken in very severe terms of St. Basil, misled, as Basil conjectures, by the fact that some heretical writings had been fathered upon him; and the bishop of Caesarea sends an affectionate letter of remonstrance (Ep. 25), in which he speaks of Athanasius in the highest terms. At his death Basil writes a letter of condolence to the Church of Ancyra, on the loss of one who was truly "a pillar and foundation of the Church" (Ep. 29). This seems to have happened A.D. 368 or 369 (see Garnier, Basil. Op. iii. p. lxxvii sq.). [L.]

ATHENAGORAS.—I. Life. There is scarcely one catalogue of the ancient writers of the Church, wherein we find mention of Athenagoras or his works. He is not noticed by Eusebius, Jerome, Photius or Suidas. But in a fragment of the book of Methodius, bishop of Tyre, (3rd cent.), De Resurrectione Animarum against Origen, there is an unmistakable quotation from the Apology (c. 24, p. 27 B) with the name of Athenagoras appended. This fragment is given by Epiphanius (Haeres. 64, c. 21) and Photius (Cod. 224, 234). Scanty as this information is, it yet assures us of the existence of the Apology in the 3rd cent., and its ascription to Athenagoras. Much more is told us by Philippus Sidetes, deacon of Chrysostom (5th cent.) in a fragment preserved by Nicephorus Callistus (Dodwell, Diss. in Irenaeum, 429) to this effect: "Athenagoras was the first head of the school at Alexandria, flourishing in the times of Hadrian and Antoninus, to whom also he addressed his Apology for the Christians; a man who embraced Christianity while wearing the garb of a philosopher, and presiding over the academic school. He, before Celsus, was bent on writing against the Christians; and studying the divine Scriptures in order to carry on the contest with the greater accuracy, was thus himself caught by the all-holy Spirit, so that, like the great Paul, from a persecutor he became a teacher of the faith which he persecuted." Philippus says, continues Nicephorus, "that Clemens, the writer of the Stromata, was his pupil, and Pantaenus the pupil of Clemens." But Philippus' statement about Pantaenus is not true, according to Clemens and Eusebius; his character as an historian is severely criticized, and his book pronounced valueless by Socrates Scholasticus (Hist. Eccl. vii. 27) and Photius (Cod. 35, p. 7, Bekker); and his assertion that the Apology was addressed to Hadrian and Antoninus is contradicted by its very inscription. Nevertheless, as he was a pupil of Rhodon (head of the school in the reign of Theodosius the Great) he may be supposed to have had some facts as the groundwork of what he has said. The only other source of information about Athenagoras is the inscription of his Apology, with such internal evidence as may be gathered from his works themselves. The inscription runs thus: "The embassy (πρεσβεία) of Athenagoras of Athens, a Christian philosopher, concerning Christians, to the Emperors

Marcus Aurelius, Antoninus, and Lucius Aurelius Commodus, Armeniaci, Sarmatici, and, greatest of all, philosophers." Without at present considering the peculiar difficulties involved in this inscription (of which below), we learn from it in general that Athenagoras was an Athenian and a philosopher, which character and profession he evidently retained after his conversion. His connexion with Athens (probably his birth there) and profession of philosophy are thus substantiated; and the manner in which he became converted to Christianity may very well have been as described by Philippus, whose account that he was head of the Academies is probably but an exaggeration of the fact that he had belonged to that sect. That he was ever leader of the Catechetical school of Alexandria can by no means be asserted. Clarisse (§ 8) inclines to believe it, on the ground that Philippus was unlikely to have mentioned a writer so little known as Athenagoras had he not found his name in Rhodon's catalogue. In the same section of the Commentatio is the acute conjecture that the treatise De Resurrectione was written at Alexandria rather than Athens, from c. 12, p. 52 A, where the builder of a house is represented as making stalls for his camels. And on a supposed Alexandrian tinge in the philosophy of Athenagoras vide Brucker (Hist. Crit. Philosophiae, iii. 405 sq.). Of his death nothing is known; the idea that he was martyred apparently arising from a confusion between him and Athenogenes. That the Apology was really intended to be seen and read by the emperors is obvious; how it reached them is less clear: we are hardly entitled to assert that it was in any formal or public manner delivered to them by Athenagoras himself, an idea which may be due to the title it bears, of πρεσβεία or "Embassy." πρεσβεία, however, according to Stephanus (Thesaur. Ling. Graec. iii. col. 543), is occasionally used for an apology, intercession, or deprecation.

11. Genuine Works. These are, 1. The Apology. 2. The Treatise on the Resurrection of the Dead.

1. Apology. Genuineness. The testimonies to this work are the inscription which it bears, and the quotation by Methodius given above. Some indeed have supposed that when Jerome speaks of an apology delivered by Justin Martyr to Marcus Antoninus Verus and Lucius Aurelius Commodus (since these obtained the empire after Justin's death), he refers to the Apology of Athenagoras and attributes it to Justin; but it appears that he intends Marcus Aurelius and Lucius Verus (Mosheim, Dissert. ad Hist. Eccles. pertinent. i. 279) to whom Justin's Lesser Apology was given, (vid. Prolegomena to Maranus' Justin, pt. iii. c. 8, § 4, p. 93 sqq.). Attempts to prove the work in question to be that of Justin (vid. Le Moyne, Varia sacra ii. 171), or of a later author (vid. Semler, Introduction to Baumgarten's Theolog. Streitigkeiten ii. 70 note) have alike failed. There is nothing whatever in the writings of Athenagoras unsuitable to their assigned age; and Athenagoras' name was not sufficiently known to have been selected for the author of a supposititious book.

Date. This is a difficult question; some have taken the Commodus of the inscription for Lucius Aelius Aurelius Verus (died A.D. 169), son-in-law and brother of Marcus Antoninus. But Lucius Aelius Aurelius Commodus, Antoninus' son and successor, must be intended: for Verus dropped the name of Commodus after obtaining a share in the government, and could never have had the title of Sarmaticus; for Sarmatia was not conquered till after his death. Commodus indeed had no share in the government of Sarmatia; whence Mommsen, following Tentzel, but without MS. authority, would read Γερμανικοῖς for Ἀρμενικοῖς. As little right had Commodus to the title of "philosopher." Athenagoras may have only intended to include the son in the honours of the father. At all events, the illustration (at c. 18, p. 17 D) of the Divine government, taken from that of the two emperors, father and son, seems conclusive. We have also allusions to the profound peace of the empire, appropriate only between A.D. 176, when Avidius Crassus' insurrection was crushed, and A.D. 178, when the outbreak of the Marcomannic wars occurred. The Apology cannot well have been of later date than A.D. 177, since in that year arose the fearful persecution of the Christians of Vienne and Lyons, upon the accusations brought by their slaves; whereas in c. 35, p. 38 B, Athenagoras declares that no slaves of Christians had ever charged their masters with the crimes popularly imputed to them: nor is there any allusion whatever to this persecution, which would hardly have been passed over in silence. We are therefore led to conclude that the Apology was written between the end of A.D. 176 and that of A.D. 177.

Analysis. The Apology consists of categorical answers to the three charges usually brought against the Christians, of (a) atheism, (b) incest, and (c) cannibalism. (a) They worship one God (1), and can give a reason why. (2) The philosophers have held like views; (3) Polytheism and (4) its worship are absurd, modern, and the work of demons. (b) Incest is most contrary to their pure and even ascetic life. (c) They are even more humane than the heathen, condemning abortion, infanticide, and gladiatorial games as murder.

2. Treatise on the Resurrection. Genuineness and date. There is no independent external evidence for the authorship of this work; but there is no reason whatever to doubt that, as its inscription informs us, it is from the pen of Athenagoras. It closely agrees with the Apology in style and thought, and all that has been said above of the internal evidence for the genuineness of the former work applies equally to this. That such a treatise was in Athenagoras' mind when he wrote the Apology appears from the words near its close, c. 36, p. 39 C, "let the argument upon the Resurrection stand over;" from which words we may not unfairly gather that the Treatise on the Resurrection shortly followed the former work. This is the only clue to its date which we possess.

From the closing sentences of c. 23 (p. 66 C) it seems that the Treatise we are considering was intended as a lecture. The words there used, "We have not made it our aim to leave nothing unsaid that our subject contained, but summarily to point out to those who came together what view ought to be taken in regard to the Resurrection" must allude not merely to a few friends who might happen to be present when the book was read, but to a regular audience. From a reference, c. 1, p. 41 B, to an occasional mode of arranging his arguments, it may be supposed that Athenagoras was in the habit of delivering public lectures upon Christianity. The arrangement, too, and peculiar opening of the treatise decidedly favour the view, that it was a lecture, which has been somewhat enlarged or modified for publication.

Analysis. The work consists of two parts: I. The removal of the objections, (1) that God wants the power (2) or the will to raise the dead. (1.) He does not want the power to do it, either through ignorance or weakness—as Athenagoras proves from the works of creation; defending his positions against the philosophic objections, that the bodies of men after dissolution come to form part of other bodies; and that things broken cannot be restored to their former state. (2.) God wants not the will to raise the dead—for it is neither unjust to the raised men, nor to other beings; nor unworthy of Him—which is shown from the works of creation. II. Arguments for the Resurrection. (1.) The final cause of man's creation, to be a perpetual beholder of the Divine wisdom. (2.) Man's nature, which requires perpetuity of existence in order to attain the true end of rational life. (3.) The necessity of the Divine judgment upon men in body and soul, (a) from the Providence, (b) from the justice of God. (4.) The ultimate end of man's being, not to be attained on earth.

III. Athenagoras as a writer. To most of the Apologists Athenagoras is decidedly superior. Elegant, free from superfluity of language, forcible in style, he rises occasionally into great power of description, and his reasoning is remarkable for clearness and cogency; e.g. his answer to the heathen argument, that not the idols, but the gods represented, are really honoured. His treatment of the Resurrection is for the most part admirable. Even where the defective science of the day led him into error, e.g. in answering the question, apparently so difficult, as to the assimilation of the materials of one human body into another, the line taken is one that shews no little thought and ability; and his whole writings indicate a philosophic mind, which amply justifies the title given to him in the inscription of his two works.

His style, however, is not unfrequently somewhat obscured by difficult elliptic or parenthetical passages, and anacolutha (for examples of which see the Apology c. 1, p. 2 C; c. 20, p. 19 B; c. 22, p. 23 B; and De Resurr. c. 18, p. 60 D). Among his peculiar words and phrases, Clarisse notices his use of ἄγειν in the sense of ducere, to think, and τὰ ἐπισυμβεβηκότα Θεῷ for the attributes of God.

IV. His philosophy. Mosheim represents Athenagoras as having been the first of the Eclectics. It is far more true to say that he shared in the eclecticism which then pervaded all philosophy. That he had been a Platonist appears, on the whole, from his continual reference to Plato, and the thoroughly Platonic view which on many points pervades his works. We easily recognize this view in his language about matter and the soul, angels, natures sensible and intelligible, and the contemplation of God as the end of man's being; and also in that referring to the Son of God as the Logos and Creator (except that this is not at all peculiar to Athenagoras), more especially in his calling the Word "idea (or archetype) and energy" in the work of Creation. He also appears to allude slightly to the doctrine of reminiscences (De Resurr. c. 14, p. 55 A) where it is said that "when the dispute turns on first principles, there is need only of recollections which stir up the natural concept." The Platonism of Athenagoras was modified however by the prevailing eclecticism (cf. e.g. the Peripatetic doctrine of the mean, so alien to Plato Resurrect. c. 21 p. 64 B), and still more, of course, by his reception of Christianity, which necessitated the abandonment of such views as the unoriginated nature of the soul. With all this agrees excellently so much of Philippus Sidetes' account as connects Athenagoras with the Academics; whose Platonism was precisely such as is here described. Allusions to the other philosophers are abundant; e.g. to Aristotle and the Peripatetics, Apol. c. 6, p. 7 A; c. 16, p. 15 D, to the Stoics; ib. c. 6, p. 7 B, to the Cyrenaics and Epicureans; Resurr. c. 19, p. 62 B. We see from Apol. c. 7, p. 8 A, that he regarded the Gentile Philosophers as possessing some measure of divine light in their minds, but unable thereby to come to the full knowledge of God, because this could only be obtained by revelation, which they never sought.

V. Theology, &c. Athenagoras' proof of the divine unity rests on the propositions, expressed or implied, that God is perfect, self-existent, uncompounded; the Creator, Sustainer, and Ruler of the universe. Were there more gods than one, they could not coexist and co-work as a community of beings similar to each other, in the same sphere; for things self-existent and eternal cannot be like a number of creatures formed all on one pattern, but must be eternally distinct and unlike. They could not be parts of one whole, for God has no parts. There could be no place for another God in connection with this universe; for the Creator is over and around His own works. Another God, confined to some other universe of his own, could not concern us; and so would be but a finite being.

The Son of God. In God, since He is an eternal, rational Mind, there dwelt from eternity the "Logos" ("Reason," "Expression," or "Word"), as His Son, and in the Son dwelt the Father. To bring matter into existence, and afterwards give it form and order, the Divine Word "came forth" (i.e. the eternal Son assumed, towards the finite, the office and relation of "the Word" or Manifestor of God), to be the Archetype and Effectuating Power of creation (Apol. c. 10, p. 10 D). His Incarnation is only indirectly mentioned, in the supposition at c. 21, p. 21 D (ib.), of God assuming flesh according to a divine dispensation.

The Holy Ghost is said to be the Spirit Who spoke by the prophets, and an Emanation from God (Apol. c. 10, p. 10 D), flowing forth and returning as a ray from the sun. It has hence been much disputed whether Athenagoras believed the blessed Spirit to be a distinct Person, or not. His expressions greatly resemble those used by some whom Justin condemns for their denial of the personality of the Son; "they say that this virtue is indivisible and inseparable from the Father, as the sunlight on earth is indivisible and inseparable from the sun in the heavens" (Dial. c. Tryph. c. 128, p. 358 B).

But it must be remembered that the Apologists present the actings and offices of the three blessed Persons of the Godhead in creation, &c., rather than Their eternal subsistence: and of necessity do this in a form intelligible to a heathen mind; yet so as not to be confounded with polytheism. It is not doubted that Athenagoras held the personality of the Father, but with "God the Father, and God the Son" (Apol. c. 10, p. 11 A), he joins as third, the Holy Spirit; so also c. 12, p. 62 D, and again c. 24, p. 26 D. That two divine Persons and an impersonal emanation should be thus enumerated together, by so philosophic a writer as Athenagoras, is not conceivable. The angels, too—indubitably personal beings—are mentioned as holding a place after the Trinity, in Christian theology (c. 10); and it is worthy of notice, that in the passage cited above from Justin, angels as well as the Word are described by the persons whom that writer is condemning, as temporary appearances; as if it were the Sadducees, or some similar Jewish sect, of which he is speaking. We are, therefore, decidedly of opinion that the personality of the Holy Spirit is held by Athenagoras; cf., however, Clarisse.

Man he holds to be composed of body and soul, the latter immortal, with spiritual powers of its own (Apol. c. 27, p. 31 A); but assigns the rational judgment not to the soul alone, but to the whole compound being, man; perhaps implying that in the actings and expression of thought both the mind and the bodily organs share. Hence he shows that the soul without the body is imperfect; that only when embodied can man be justly judged, or render to God perfect service, in a heavenly life. The sin and misery of man are described, in the Platonic manner, as entanglement with matter (Apol. c. 27, p. 30 C), and missing the true aim of his existence (Resurr. c. 25, p. 68 B); which is said to be the state of the majority, a prevalence of evil which Athenagoras only mentions so far as to connect it with the influence of the demons, i.e. of the fallen angels, or their offspring by human wives, a view common with the Apologists. The evil angels he regards as having fallen by misuse of free will, the like account which it is plain he would give of the fall of man; cf. Apol. c. 25, p. 29 B. Of infants, he remarks (Resurr. 614, p. 55 D) that they need no judgment, inasmuch as they have done neither good nor evil. The nature of the scheme of redemption is not treated of by Athenagoras.

VI. Was Athenagoras a Montanist? This idea was suggested by Tillemont, who finds it upon two points in the opinions of Athenagoras, his account of prophecy, and his absolute condemnation of second marriages. In the Apology, c. 9, p. 9 D, Athenagoras' view of inspiration is thus given; "who" (i.e. the prophets) "rapt in mind out of themselves by the impulse of the Spirit of God, uttered the things with which they were inspired; the Spirit using them as if a flute player were breathing into his flute." With this has been compared the language of Montanus (Epiphanius Panar. Haer. 48, c. 4, p. 405), where the prophet is said to be as a lyre, the Spirit like the plectrum. So Tertullian Against Marcion, c. 22. Yet similar language is found in Justin (Dial. c. Tryph. c. 115, p. 343 A); and Athenagoras may only mean that the prophet was carried beyond himself by the Holy Spirit, and that the words uttered were not his own. The severe condemnation of second marriage, in the works of Athenagoras, is doubtless a point of contact with the Montanists; but the same view is very common with the Greek fathers (vid. Hefele's Beiträge, vol. i. lect. 2). Moreover, of the authority and office of the Paraclete, in the sense in which Montanus is generally said to have understood that name, there is no trace in the writings of Athenagoras.

VII. Quotations of Scripture, early writers, &c. The inspiration of Scripture is strongly stated by Athenagoras, e. g. Apol. c. 9, p. 9 D. He is seldom careful to quote exactly, so that it is not always certain what version is employed; probably the Septuagint throughout. From the N. T. he often quotes or borrows phrases, without mentioning whence they come. It is treated as authoritative amongst the Christians; its maxims being used as samples of their discipline and practice. Vid. Lardner, Credibility, . . . ; Clarisse, Athenag. § 55.

It has been disputed whether or not Athenagoras makes any reference to the works of other Christian writers, particularly the Apology of Justin Martyr, which some consider him to have made the foundation of his own. Certainly the resemblance between them seems too great to be the result of accident alone. Both Justin and Athenagoras urge that Christians were unconvicted of any crime, that the mere name does not deserve punishment, and that they were no more Atheists than the poets and the philosophers; and both, in a similar manner, show the unworthiness of sacrificial worship. They give very much the same view of the Christian way of life; and both lay great stress on chastity, and on the confining of marriage to its sole end, the begetting of children. Nearly the same account of the fall of the angels is found in both: the same books are quoted, often the same passages; by both the very same phrases are occasionally employed. This correspondence is especially seen between the exordium of Justin's first Apology and that of Athenagoras. Hence Clarisse inters (Comm. in Athenagor. § 57) that Athenagoras intended to rearrange and epitomize the work of his predecessor. In the Treatise on the Resurrection, c. 8, p. 48 C, is an apparent imitation of Tatian, Or. ad Graec. c. 6, p. 146 B.

VIII. Editions. The treatise of Athenagoras On the Resurrection appeared separately at first, edited by Petrus Nannius (Louvain and Paris, 1541). It subsequently appeared in the Micropresbyticon, 1550, and in the Orthodoxographia of Heroldus, 1555. Both the works of Athenagoras issued from the press of Henricus Stephanus, under the care of Conrad Gesner, 1557; and both appeared in the collections of Lang, Morell, 1615 and 1636; Fronto Ducaeus, 1624; Maranus, 1742; Gallandi (Venice, 1766), and Oberthür, 1779. Separate editions of the works of Athenagoras were published by Fell (Oxford, 1682), Rechenberg, 1685, and Dechair (Oxford, 1706), who collated several MSS., and added copious notes, with several dissertations. The Apology was edited by M. Jo. Gottlieb Lindner, 1774, and Dr. Paul Ludwig, 1856. The best edition of Athenagoras is that of Otto (Jena, 1857); its text is based on the three earliest MSS. (viz. the Cod. Paris. CDLL, Cod. Paris. CLXXIV., and Cod. Argentoratensis), with which the rest have been collated, some for the first time.

IX. Spurious works. From a careless expression of Gesner, in reference to the books of Antoninus, Περὶ τῶν εἰς ἑαυτὸν, a notion arose of the existence, amongst Gesner's books, of a work by Athenagoras with the above title; an idea which, though wholly erroneous, was entertained by Scultatus, and at one time by Tentzel, with some others.

About the close of the 16th century there appeared a French romance, entitled "Du vray et parfait Amour," purporting to be a work of Athenagoras, translated by M. Fumée, Seigneur de S. Guillaac. Not only, however, do its many anachronisms and whole character prove it the work of some later author; but, moreover, that author is generally taken to have been Fumée himself. Certainly no Greek original has ever been produced. The main objects of the book seem to have been the display of the writer's architectural knowledge, and the defence of alchemy.

ATHINGANI. [PAULICIANS.]

ATLAS. [MANES.]

ATTICUS, archbishop of Constantinople, succeeded Asracius the usurper of Chrysostom's see, in March 406, and held it for 20 years. He died Oct. 10, 426.

Atticus was born at Sebaste in Armenia. He early embraced a monastic life, and received his education from some Macedonian monks near that place. But he was of too ambitious a nature to be content to remain in a small provincial town, and we soon find him at the imperial city. Here the heretical views he had derived from his early teachers which would have been a bar to his ecclesiastical advancement, were speedily exchanged for the orthodox faith. He was ordained presbyter, and soon became known as a rising man of no great learning, but of sound common sense and practical power, who could hold his own in argument with better men than himself, and by his adroitness in concealing his ignorance and making the most of his knowledge, was often credited with higher theological attainments than he possessed. He had good natural abilities, and he spared no pains to make up for the deficiencies of his early education by diligent study, often devoting whole nights to reading. Atticus gained no reputation as a preacher. His sermons, mediocre in style, had neither learning nor eloquence to recommend them, and the nice Byzantine ear was offended by his rough Armenian dialect. As a presbyter he wrote out his sermons and learnt them by heart; but as a bishop he preached extemporaneously. But the contrast between his discourses and those which his golden-mouthed predecessor had delivered from the same ambo was keenly felt. They were listened to coldly without applause, and no shorthand writer was employed to take them down (Soc. vii. 2; Soz. viii. 27; Niceph. xiii. 29, xiv. 27). The statements of Palladius with respect to the enemies of Chrysostom are always to be received with caution, and it would be hardly safe on his authority to convict Atticus of ignorance of the Scriptures, and infrequent preaching.

The precise grounds of quarrel between Atticus and Chrysostom we do not know; but he proved himself one of Chrysostom's most bitter and uncompromising adversaries. If not, as Palladius asserts (c. xi.), the architect of the whole cabal for the overthrow of Chrysostom, he certainly took a very leading part in carrying it into execution. The organization of the synod of the Oak owed much to his practical skill. He and Arsacius appeared as witnesses against the archbishop on the charge of illegally confiscating the property of the see, and eagerly clamoured for his immediate condemnation. "His guilt was clear, why should there be any further delay?" (Phot. Cod. 59.)

We have not the means of distinctly tracing Atticus' share in the subsequent events by which the overthrow of Chrysostom was finally accomplished; but all we know of his character and conduct, and the position he occupied as one of the leaders of the party resolved on the archbishop's destruction, confirms the conviction that he was very far from being idle. Chrysostom was an obstacle to his advancement, to be removed out of his way. Nor was he likely to be very scrupulous as to the means. Among the voices that were clamouring round the feeble emperor, seeking to force his fluctuating mind to a decision favourable to their own interests, that of Atticus must have been one of the loudest, and least readily silenced.

The expulsion of Chrysostom took place June 10, 404. His successor, the aged Arsacius, did not long enjoy the reward of his intrigues. His death followed in little more than a year, Nov. 5, 405. Few questions could be more important to the party now triumphant than the choice of the new archbishop. It had proved a mistaken policy to place on Chrysostom's throne a mild but inert old man, to be used as a tool in carrying out their measures, and a screen for their acts of violence and cruelty. The large majority of the people of Constantinople still regarded Chrysostom as their lawful bishop, and held aloof from the religious assemblies of the intruder. They were supported in their resistance by Pope Innocent and the Western Church, together with a considerable number of the most highly esteemed Eastern prelates. A wise head and a vigorous hand were needed to meet the emergency. Four months of intrigue ended in the selection of Atticus, March 406.

The appointment of Atticus took place while the Occidental deputies despatched by Honorius in Chrysostom's behalf were on their way to Constantinople. The news of it greeted them on their arrival. What share he had in the ignominious treatment of these envoys is unknown. Palladius, however (c. iv.), does not scruple to suggest that he was the author of the base attempt to bribe them to desert the cause they had come to maintain, and the instigator of their subsequent ill-treatment (Niceph. xiii. 33).

Vigorous measures were at once adopted by Atticus in conjunction with the other members of the triumvirate to which the Eastern Church had been subjected, Theophilus of Alexandria, and Porphyry of Antioch, to crush the adherents of Chrysostom. An imperial rescript was obtained imposing the severest penalties of confiscation of property, loss of rank, fine, and banishment on all, of whatever rank or condition, who dared to reject the communion of the patriarchs. A large number of the bishops of the East persevered in the refusal, and suffered a cruel persecution; while even the inferior clergy and laity were compelled to keep themselves in concealment, or to fly the country. The small minority of Eastern bishops who for peace's sake deserted Chrysostom's cause were made to feel the guilt of having once supported it. They were compelled to leave their sees and take other dioceses in the inhospitable regions of Thrace, where they might be more under Atticus' eye and hand (Soc. vii. 36; Niceph. xiii. 30; Pallad. c. xx).

Unity seemed hardly nearer when the death of Chrysostom (Sept. 14, 407) removed the original ground of the schism. A large proportion of the Christian population of Constantinople still refused communion with the usurper, and continued to hold their religious assemblies, more numerous attended than the churches, in the open air in the suburbs of the city (Niceph. xiv. 23, 27). Stung to the quick, Atticus employed all means—force and persuasion, threats and bribes—to reduce the recusants to submission. But he obtained no decisive result. Chrysostom's adherents demanded that the archbishop's name should be restored to the diptychs of the church. On no other terms would they listen to propositions of reunion. This was a step for which Atticus was not prepared. To do so would be to nullify his own episcopate. It was in vain that Porphyry's successor, Alexander of Antioch—the first who had dared to replace the revered name on the rolls of the church—visited Constantinople and used his personal influence with his brother patriarch; in vain that the people of the imperial city, excited by his presence, made the demand openly of their archbishop. At last fear extorted from Atticus what higher considerations failed to obtain. The popular excitement was growing dangerous. To oppose the general wish was no longer safe. The emperor, tearing for the public peace, counselled yielding to the universal voice. At last by a tardy act of justice, most unwillingly granted, Chrysostom's name took its place on the registers and in the public prayers of the Church of Constantinople. When Atticus had been once forced to yield he became earnest in his desire that all who had taken part with him in his previous line of conduct should now imitate him in his concession. The support of Cyril of Alexandria, who had recently inherited the throne and to the full the violent and despotic spirit of his uncle Theophilus was of the first importance. Two deacons of Alexandria, Peter and Aedesius, had happened to be in Constantinople on a mission to Cyril during the visit of Alexander of Antioch. To them, therefore, as well as to the patriarch, Atticus wrote urging that his example should be followed. These letters, together with Cyril's reply, have been happily preserved to us by Nicephorus (H. E. xiv. 26, 27). Few are more strikingly characteristic. The apology of Atticus, mean, insincere, cowardly, extenuating the importance of his act, laying the responsibility of it on others—the people so violent—the emperor so urgent—lamenting that a sense of expediency should have compelled him to take a step his judgment disallowed, contrasts most forcibly with the incisive severity and bitter irony of Cyril's reply, while with pitiless hand he dissects Atticus' excuses, and with withering scorn exposes their futility and dishonesty. "He would as soon be induced to place the name of Judas on the rolls as that of Chrysostom. Atticus must retract his steps, and remove it at all hazard."

Atticus' endeavours were vigorously directed to the maintenance and enlargement of the authority of the see of Constantinople. He obtained a rescript from Theodosius subjecting to it the whole of Illyria and the "Provincia Orientalis." This gave great offence to pope Boniface and the emperor Honorius, and the decree was never put into execution. Another rescript declaring his right to decide on and approve of the election of all the bishops of the province, was more effectual. Silvanus was named by him bishop of Philippolis, and afterwards removed to Troas. He asserted the same right to ordain in the cities of Bithynia, and put it in practice at Nicaea A.D. 425, the year before his death (Soc. vii. 25, 28, 37).

Atticus also displayed great vigour in combating and repressing heresy. He wrote to the bishops of Pamphylia, and Amphilochius of Iconium, calling on them to drive out the Messalians (Photius, c. 52). The zeal and energy he displayed against the Pelagians are highly commended by pope Celestine, who goes so far as to style him "a true successor of St. Chrysostom" (Labbe, Concil. iii. 353, 361, 365, 1073; cf. S. Prosper. p. 549; S. Leo. Ep. cvi.; Theodt. Ep. cv.). His writings were quoted as those of an orthodox teacher both by the Council of Ephesus and that of Chalcedon (Labbe, iii. 518, iv. 831). Technical orthodoxy threw all moral deficiencies into the shade. The heart of Atticus when not biased by theological or personal hatred was kind, and his generosity great. When the persecution c. 420 drove the Christians out of Persia he gave them shelter, and induced the emperor to befriend them (Soc. vii. 18). His charity was not limited to his own diocese but extended to neighbouring cities. During a famine at Nicaea he sent 300 pieces of gold to the presbyter Calliopius, for the benefit chiefly of the "pauvres honteux" (Soc. vii. 25). Adamantius, a Jew physician driven from Alexandria by the popular fury, found refuge with him at Constantinople. Orestes, the praefect, when attacked at the same time as a heathen, asserted that he had been baptized by Atticus (Soc. vii. 13, 14). One pleasing trait in his character is his kindness to the Novatians when harried by the orthodox at Constantinople. He pleaded in their behalf that they had been fellow-sufferers with themselves in the Arian persecutions, and held the true faith regarding the Trinity. Socrates supplies us with some interesting details of a conversation with the aged Asclepiades, who had been bishop of the Novatians at Nicaea for 50 years (Soc. vii. 11, 25). Atticus was then near his end, which took place Oct. 10, 426.

Atticus was more an actor than a writer; and of what he did publish little remains. A treatise on Virginity combating by anticipation the errors of Nestorius, addressed to Pulcheria and her sisters, is mentioned by Marcellinus, Chron. sub ann. 416, and Gennadius, de Scrip. Eccl. c. 52. We have remaining a brief courteous letter to the 6th Council of Carthage, A.D. 419, accompanying a transcript of the Nicene Canons (Labbe, Concil. ii. 1673); the letters to Cyril and his deacons mentioned above (Niceph. xiv. 26); that to Calliopius (Soc. vii. 25), and the fragments quoted at Ephesus and Chalcedon.

Socrates, who is a partial witness, attributes to him a sweet and winning disposition which caused him to be regarded with much affection. Those who thought with him found in him a warm friend and supporter. Towards his theological adversaries he at first showed great severity, and after having terrified them into submission, changed his behaviour and won them by gentleness (Soc. vii. 41; Soz. viii. 27). Socrates attributes to him a peculiar talent in naming places, but the examples he gives are very trivial (Soc. vii. 28). [E. V.]

ATTILA (Ἀττίλας: Teut. Etzel, Hung. Ethela, Scand. Atli, Angl.-Sax. Atla), king and general of the Huns. The principal facts of his life, with a sketch of his personal and moral characteristics having been already given in the Dictionary of Greek and Roman Biography, it remains now (1) to expand what is there only hinted at—his influence upon Christendom as it is to be gathered from (a) historical and (b) legendary sources,—and (2) to examine his reputed claim to be the Antichrist. For the first point M. Amédée Thierry's Histoire d'Attila (Paris, 1864), especially the 4th part in vol. ii. pp. 221–436 has been chiefly consulted: the second position is maintained by the Hon. and Rev. W. Herbert in his poem and historical treatise on Attila.

1. (a). The immediate effect of the inroads of the Huns was to promote Christianity. Early in the 5th century Oktar or Ouptar, brother of Attila's father Mundzuk, led a horde of 10,000 Huns against that part of the Burgundian tribe which still inhabited the district between the Hercynian Mountains and the Maine. The Burgundians, who had hitherto submitted to a theocratic government composed of a permanent high-priest called Sinistus and elective kings (Amm. Marc. xxxviii. 6), finding themselves powerless to cope with these enemies, consulted a bishop (perhaps St. Severus of Trèves), and were baptized. As Christians they obtained the success hitherto denied them, and routed the Huns, Oktar having died suddenly on the eve of battle (Socr. H. E. vii. 30).

The historical portrait of Attila, as drawn by his contemporary Priscus, who was attached to the embassy of Maximin in 449 (Exc. leg. ad ann. 449), and by the Gothic bishop Jornandes (Reb. Get. 35), who, though writing a century later, had recourse to trustworthy sources of information, has been overlaid by modern historians, e. g. Malespini (Hist. di Firenze, c. 36) and even Chateaubriant (Etol. Hist. t. 1) and Herbert, with the fabulous or monstrous details of 9th century hagiography.

It is still more difficult to separate between history and legend in tracing out the immediate effect of Attila's ravages in Europe. The rapid series of events between the Hunnish attack on the Eastern Empire in 441 and the Battle of Châlons in 451 has been compared to a deluge of rain which sweeps a district and leaves no further trace than the debris which the torrent has washed down. In Eastern Europe this figure does not accord with fact; for, though Attila's kingdom was dismembered at his death, the great body of Huns, who had followed him from the wilds of Central Asia, settled permanently in the wide plains of the Lower Danube. Nor in Western Europe did the terror inspired by Attila's name disappear as speedily as the local effects of the ruin which he caused. Viewed as a special instrument of Providence, "a Messiah of grief and ruin," whose mission it was to chastise the sins of Christians, the "scourge or rather flail of God" had an abiding influence over Western Christendom, growing more formidable in his gigantic and spectral proportions as tradition gave place to legend, and this in turn to myth: while the virtues and merits of the saints who had thwarted him by bold resistance or prudent submission shone forth the brighter, the darker became the picture of their oppressor.

The following is a brief summary of the facts and results of Attila's Western incursion. Portents in sky and earth announced to the inhabitants of Gaul that the year 450 was the opening of a terrible epoch (Idat. Chron. ann. 450). Servatius, bishop of Tongres, visiting Rome to consult SS. Peter and Paul, was informed that Gaul would be entirely devastated by the Huns, but that he would be suffered to die in peace before the desolation came (Paul. Diac. in Bouquet, Rec. i. p. 649). The distracted state of the country having been reported to Attila by a chief of the bajaudii named Eudoxius, who had fled to him in 448 (Prosp. Turon. Chron.), Attila himself, being strengthened by an alliance with Genserich, king of the Vandals (Jorn. Reb. Get. 36), had two direct pretexts for his attack—his claim to the hand of Honoria, and the vindication of the rights of the elder son of a Frank prince, whose younger brother, placing himself under Roman protection, had been established by Aëtius in the possession of their paternal territory (Prisc. Exc. leg. p. 40). Theodoric, king of the Goths, whose alliance was sought at once by Attila and by Valentinian, inclined to the side of order, and the Hun, who now took the rôle of chastising his rebellious subjects, the Visigoths, attaching to himself in his march many Franks, Burgundians, and Thuringians, if we may believe Sidonius Apollinaris (Paney. Avit. v. 324), proceeded with five or perhaps seven hundred thousand warriors of all nations to the banks of the Rhine, which was crossed by one division under his own command, near Coblenz, by the other at Augst, near Basle. He installed himself at Trèves, the Roman metropolis of Gaul, which was pillaged. Metz appeared impregnable, and after a fruitless investment he withdrew, discouraged, to a place called Scarpona, whence, on the information that a breach had been made in the walls, he returned to Metz, arriving on Easter-Eve, April 8, slaughtered indiscriminately priests and people except the bishop, and reduced the city to ashes, all the churches perishing except the oratory of St. Stephen (Paul. Diac. ap. Bouquet Rec. i. p. 650). Reims, already deserted by its inhabitants, was easily reduced; but its bishop, Nicasius, in his episcopal robes, surrounded by priests and deacons, met the conquerors on the threshold of the church, and a Hun struck off his head while he was presenting the words "Quicken me according to Thy word" (Ps. cxix. 25). His sister Eutropia struck the murderer in the face, and fell by her brother's side. But the general massacre which followed was checked by a sudden panic among the barbarians (Frodoard. Martyr. Remens. p. 113). Tongres, Arras, Laon, and Saint-Quentin also fell. The inhabitants of Paris had resolved on flight. Their intention was frustrated and the city saved by the resolution and devotion of St. Geneviève (Genovefa), the maiden of Nanterre, who was warned in a vision that Paris would be spared. The Parisians reluctantly remained in the city, and Attila did not approach it (Act. SS. Boll. Jan. i. 143-147). Meantime the second division of the Huns on their march to Strassburg had been attacked by the Burgundians under Gundicarius. The complete failure of this attack induced the Salian and Ripuarian Franks to retire to a rallying-point on the Loire, and there fell almost simultaneously before the westward march of the Huns, the principal strongholds on the Rhine between Constance and Mayence. The two divisions effected a junction between the Somme and the Marne. Two points should be noticed in Attila's action at this time—he did not wish to wage war against Christianity, though doubtless some of his followers were stimulated against the Catholics by the rancour of polemical zeal: Attila fought against Rome, not against its Church; and secondly, it was not his intention to give up Gaul to indiscriminate pillage; he hoped to crush the Visigoths first, and then to cope separately with Aëtius and the Roman forces. With this view, about April 10th, he left Metz for Orleans, wisely selecting the route of the plains. See an accurate description of this march in Thierry's Hist. d'Attila, i. 154. Defensive precautions were taken, and Anianus (St. Agnan), bishop of Orleans, hastened to Arles, to apprise Aëtius of their danger. Aid was promised by June 23rd (Bouquet, Rec. i. p. 645). Much time was wasted in the vain endeavours of Aëtius to procure the assistance of Theodoric. But the influence of the senator Avitus of Clermont prevailed where the politic arguments of the Roman general were powerless, and Orleans was relieved only when the gates had actually been opened to the Huns, and pillage was beginning. A graphic account of this siege is given in the Vita S. Aniani in Bouquet, Rec. i. p. 645. Attila retreated precipitately towards Châlons-sur-Marne, in the Campi Catalaunici. Near Troyes he was met by its bishop, Lupus (St. Loup), who entreated him to spare the defenceless inhabitants of Champagne. Attila consented, on condition that he should accompany the army to the banks of the Rhine; the presence of so honourable a hostage would no doubt be of some advantage to him.

The military movements which followed this retreat, including the famous battle of Châlons, are beyond the scope of the present article. The subject has long occupied the attention of French historians and antiquarians, and the results of their investigations are well summed up and weighed by M. Thierry, l. c., pp. 172-188, 428-437, and in the article Attila of the Nouv. Biog. Gén.

In the spring of 452 Attila had re-united his forces and penetrated into Italy by the passes of the Julian Alps (Presp. Aquit. Chron.), Aëtius being occupied in consulting for the safety of Valentinian, whom he sent to Rome. Attila received his first check at the walls of Aquileia, then "one of the richest, the most populous, and the strongest of the maritime cities of the Adriatic coast" (Gibbon, Rom. Emp. iv. 240). It resisted obstinately for three months, and Attila was almost yielding to the popular belief that the city, when ably defended, was impregnable, when he observed some storks preparing to leave their nests in the city with their young ones (Jorn. Reb. Get. 42). Interpreting the omen in his own favour, he pressed the siege with redoubled vigour, and a century afterwards, Jornandes (ib.) could scarcely trace the ruins of Aquileia. The terrified inhabitants of the Venetian towns, Concordia, Altinum, and Padua attempted resistance, and fled to the lagunes, whence shortly after was to spring Venice. In Liguria, Jornandes mentions the sacking of only Milan and Pavia. Local tradition assigns, with great probability, the same fate to Verona, Mantua, Brescia, Bergamo, and Cremona. Suidas (s. v. Μεθιδόλανον and Κόρυκος) tells the well-known anecdote of the picture at Milan. (See Gibbon, iv. 241.) The effects of summer heat and the scarcity of provisions in the plains of Lombardy equally with the promptings of unsated ambition determined Attila to march on Rome, notwithstanding the dissuasions of some of his followers, who remembered that Alaric had not long survived its capture (Jorn. ib.). An embassy, sent by the senate and people of Rome, with instructions to obtain, if possible, at any cost, Attila's peaceful evacuation of Italy, met the invaders on the Mincio, near Mantua, and Virgil's farm. At its head were two illustrious senators and Pope Leo the Great, who had been bishop of Rome since 440. In Leo there were united with high ability and rare eloquence a commanding presence and a strength of character which had made him renowned in the political as well as the religious world (Vita S. Leon. Mag. ap. Act. SS. Boll. Apr. ii. 17-21). His fame may have preceded him, at least, his appearance in pontifical robes, bespeaking the influence of religion, awoke in Attila some feeling akin to awe, and he retired as before a power superior to his own. The names Lupus and Leo, the preservers of Troyes and Rome, gave a point to the jest that Attila, though invincible by men, succumbed to the power of the beasts (Sigon. De Occid. Imp. xiii.). In leaving Italy by the Noric Alps for Pannonia, Attila, after the pillage of Augsburg, was crossing the little river Lech, when a weird woman threw herself before him, shouting three times, "Back, Attila" (Olahus, ut supr. ii. 6). After sending a defiance to Marcian at Constantinople, he celebrated a fresh marriage with a bride of great beauty, whom Jornandes calls Ildico, probably a corruption of the Teutonic Hiltgund or Hildegond, and was found suffocated in his own blood on the following morning, from the bursting of a blood-vessel, according to the best authorities, though not without suspicion of some foul play. See a summary of the various accounts in Thierry's Attila, i. 218. An able comparison between the conquests of Attila, of Zingis Khan, and of Timour, and their effects is traced by Dr. J. H. Newman in his Lectures on the History of the Turks in its Relation to Christianity, Dublin, 1854. The personal character of Attila would bear the palm in such a review for humanity, justice, and moderation. All alike "powerful to destroy, helpless to construct" (though Attila showed diplomatic skill, Zingis, also a Pagan, laid down the maxim of religious toleration, and Timour, a zealous Mahometan, patronized literature), failed to establish a permanent kingdom.

(b) The legendary history of Attila is drawn from three principal sources—the Latin, Germanic, and Hungarian traditions. Little more can be attempted here than to show their distinctive characteristics with a few illustrations. The traditions are remarkable alike for their number and for their diversity. M. Thierry reduces them under these two heads—Latin and Germanic.

The Latin legends spring from ecclesiastical sources, and are enshrined in the acts of the saints. They are referable to a natural reaction from the panic fear which prevailed in Europe during Attila's conquests. Since every one had trembled at him, it became a point of honour to prove that they did so with good reason. Hence a multitude of traditions of siege and capture are to be traced in the early local history of places which Attila had never approached, and in the view of the Middle Age Attila was as universal a type of devastation as Julius Caesar of construction. The author of the second life of St. Lupus, written at the end of the 8th century (Act. SS. Boll. Jul.), states that no considerable town or fortress in Gaul escaped the Huns. Thus, in spite of the chronological discrepancy, the legend has attributed to Attila in 451 the martyrdom of St. Ursula and the 11,000 virgins, who are supposed to have set out from Brittany in 383. An imaginary siege of Paris is described in 451, with the evident intention of bringing into contrast Attila and St. Geneviève. Local vanity, as well as the desire to honour the saints, has given rise to strange perversions of history. The plain of Catalens, near Toulouse, has been substituted for that of Châlons, in Champagne; Attila and his armies have been drawn across the whole width of France, which he never traversed, necessitating the pillage of Lyons, Arles, &c., which he never approached; and the defeated remnants of his army have been actually despatched under one of his captains into Spain, to conquer the Moors. The legendary Attila thus becomes the champion of Christianity. Trèves was supposed to have preserved traces of his power, and these rather constructive than destructive. The beautiful Roman "column of Igel" received the name of "Attila's triumphal arch"; and the miracles of St. Mathias (Act. SS. Boll. Feb. iii. 448) distinguish by Attila's name the bridge that spans the Moselle at Trèves. Strassburg, under the name Argentoratum, had been entirely demolished by Attila. The city, gradually rebuilt during the two following centuries, took its present name from its situation on the Roman military road (Strata-burgum), but the Alsatians, dissatisfied with this etymology, supposed that Attila had made four roads through the city walls, so as to open free communication between Gaul and Germany; and in reply to the objection of Schöpllin in his Alsatia Illustrata, that Attila could not well give German names to towns, the defenders of the tradition appealed to an ancient medallion over the Kronenburg gate, probably intended to represent a burgo-master, as an image of Attila. (See proofs in Thierry, l. c. 228-230.)

"Attila, the scourge of God," is, as Thierry shows, the culminating point of the Latin legend. Undoubtedly the great and distinguishing feature of the war in the eyes of the 5th century Christians would be the threefold repulse of Attila from Orleans by St. Agnan, from Troyes by St. Loup, and, above all, from Rome by St. Leo. In any age so signal a triumph of the Church's spiritual weapons over the hosts who were held to symbolize the powers of darkness, would have arrested general attention, in the 5th century it absorbed it, and every history of the campaign took its colour from the Divine interposition which guarded the Church and the Saints. It was the final and conclusive answer to the few still surviving murmurs of the heathen party which referred all the misfortunes of the empire to a national desertion of the ancient polytheism. In vain was Attila's retreat traced to the action of the stars. Christendom triumphantly rendered honour to St. Leo, and with him to his God. Sidonius Apollinaris, in withdrawing the promise which he had made to Prosper, bishop of Orleans, successor to St. Agnan, of writing a history of the war of Attila, discloses the most salient features of his proposed scheme—"the praises due to the very great and holy pontiff Anianus, equal to Lupus, and not inferior to Germanus—how the city of Orleans was besieged, forced, broken into, though not sacked" (Sidon. Apollin. Ep. viii. 15). An ecclesiastical historian, imbued with the spirit which prompted St. Augustine's De Civitate Dei, would have brought out into strong prominence two figures, the barbarian, the agent of God's wrath—the priest, the agent of His mercy.

The next age materialised the hidden workings of God's Providence; and the motive power which compelled Attila's departure became in the legend the figure of St. Peter with a drawn sword, to whom was afterwards very naturally added St. Paul. This tradition, first found in Paul Warnefrid, a writer of the 8th century, was generally adopted by subsequent writers, consecrated by the Roman Breviary, and immortalized by the genius of Raphael. In like manner the touches of genuine character and action which mark the contemporary lives of SS. Agnan, Loup, and Geneviève disappear in proportion as their later biographers try to invest their persons with traits of the marvellous and supernatural.

The title flagellum Dei, though, no doubt, well known before, first appears in the legend of St. Loup, written in the 8th or 9th century, by a priest of Troyes (Act. SS. Boll. Jul. v. 67-72). Italy and Gaul both claim the honour of its invention. The Italian legend ascribes it to St. Benedict, who was not born till after Attila's death; the Gallic tradition places it in the mouth of a hermit of Champagne, who, when brought to Attila, replied to his question as to the issue of the battle of Châlons—"Tu es flagellum Dei—but God breaks, when he pleases, the instruments of His vengeance. God will take this sword from thee, and will give it to another" (Thwroc. Chron. Hung. i. 15). Thierry shows that there is nothing improbable in this legend, which preserves the language and ideas of the 5th century. Cf. the apostrophe to Sennacherib in Isaiah x. 5, 15, with Isidore of Seville's expression about the Huns (Hist. Goth. ad ann. 457). "They are the rod of the Lord's anger." The legend however, makes Attila assume the hermit's saying as a new title. "The star falls, the earth quakes, I am the hammer of the world" (Chron. Hung. i. 16). It is interesting to trace the effect of this dominant idea on the story of St. Loup's encounter with Attila at Troyes. History represents Troyes as defenceless, without competent garrison or fortifications. St. Loup meets the king, who consents to spare the city on condition of detaining him as a hostage. The legend is obliged to place this interview after the battle of Châlons. Troyes has recovered its ramparts, when Attila approaches it at the head of a vast army. Mounted on his war-horse, he gives an imperious order that the gates should be opened. "Who art thou" says the bishop, "who tramplest under foot the earth?" "I am Attila, king of the Huns, the scourge of God." "Welcome, then, scourge of the God whom I serve! Enter, and go where thou wilt!" (2^a Vita St. Lupi, 45, ap. Boll. Act. SS. Chron. Hung. i. 16). Accordingly, the legend continues, Attila enters the city with his army, but they see nothing, for they are smitten with supernatural blindness until they have passed out by the opposite gate. So, in the version of the siege of Metz, given by Paul Warnefrid (Episc. Mett. ap. Bouquet, Rec. i. 650), the oratory of St. Stephen appears to the barbarians, who are trying to demolish it like a great rock. The Italian legends imitate those of Gaul. Cf. the Life of St. Geminianus, bishop of Modena, composed about the 10th century, in Act. SS. Boll. Jan. ii. 1097. "If thou art the servant of God," says Attila, "I am the scourge of God. Disobedient servants are deservedly beaten." The tendency to impersonate the opposing powers of good and evil sometimes warrants the introduction of the devil as the instigator of Attila in his acts of violence and persecution; so in the martyrdom of SS. Nicasius and Eutropia (Surius Vit. SS. 14 Dec.), the Prince of Darkness appears near the gate of Reims. Attila is endowed with diabolical attributes—sarcasm, pride, malice, and hideous ugliness, joined with credulity and a certain comical good nature, such as characterizes the Bon diable of modern French pleasantry. The ecclesiastical legends even show an affinity to those of Teutonic origin in sometimes representing Attila as generous, chivalrous, and ready to promote all good ends. Thus he appears in the history of the fabulous siege of Ravenna, written by Agnellus, an Italian priest, in the 9th century. Here Attila gladly accedes to the request of John, the archbishop, who approaches him at the head of a magnificent procession of ecclesiastics, to spare the city, on condition (to save his credit as a conqueror) that the gates should be taken off their hinges. This was done. The streets were decorated, and the citizens assisted the triumphal procession of the Huns through the city—an instance, naïvely remarks Agnellus, of the old proverb, that Attila had recourse to artifice before arms. There are two further versions of this legend, which mix up Attila in the polemical discussions which prevailed during the exarchate of Ravenna, between the archbishops of Ravenna and the court of Rome, as to the tenure of the pallium by the former, and, according to the bias of the writers, the archbishop John is presented as a Catholic or an Arian. We actually find Attila a champion of the Pope and an extirpator of heresies. Hence descends the last and strangest conception—a moral Attila—who preaches modesty, encourages good marriages, and portions virtuous maidens (cf. Olah. Vit. Att. 9; Desericius, De initiis Hung.). These stories are found in the writers of the 15th and 16th centuries, received and recorded as immemorial traditions. A telling story of this class is that of the flattering poet Marullus, who, on referring back Attila's origin to the gods, was sentenced by the king to be burnt alive, with his poem, but was spared at the last moment (Sigonius, Occid. Imper. xiii.). A Greek philosopher of the age of Justinian, named Damascius, had reported, by a pardonable mistake, that a great battle was fought under the walls of Rome against Attila, after which, the phantoms of the dead rose again and continued the fight with great fury for three days and nights. This story travelled to Rome, and was soon accepted there as fact. The theatre and particulars of this great combat were pointed out, and the interview between Attila and St. Leo was transferred from the Mincio to the Tiber. For further illustrations of the legendary Attila's exploits in Italy, see Thierry, ii. 254 sq.

The Germanic or Teutonic legends of Attila differ very widely from those of Latin origin. They present him as a magnificent, hospitable, and wise king—wise, indeed, as Solomon, but richer, more powerful, above all, more generous than he. It is one of the strangest contradictions in the Middle Ages, that while the Scourge of God was reprobated in the churches, the good and hospitable king was celebrated by the Minnesinger in the castles. The barbarian tradition took its rise among the Eastern Germans, and was adopted, with modifications, by those of the West. Remembering that Attila always treated honourably the chiefs of the Teutonic tribes which submitted to him, as Ardaric of the Gepidae, Walamir and Theodemir of the Ostrogoths, and that the subsequent conquests of Odoacer and Theodoric in Italy were the result of the development of Attila's designs, we can well imagine that he would, with the bold descendants of these warriors, rise to the rank of a national hero, a type of royal majesty in union with almost superhuman bravery and strength. In these legends little respect is paid to chronology. Theodoric, who was born only eight years before Attila's death, and Hermanaric the Great, who died twenty-five years before his birth, are always associated with him—Attila invariably retaining his superiority. The patriotic traditions of Germany always took the form of poetry (cf. Jorn. De Reb. Get. 3; Tacitus, De Mor. Germaniæ; Eginhard, Vita Caroli Mag. 29). The oldest extant monument of the Attila-legend is a fragment of an 8th century MS., discovered at Fulda, being part of a poem on the adventures of Theodoric, whom Attila reinstates in his kingdom of Verona, having defeated Odoacer in the battle of Ravenna. This fragment is a proof that the German epopee was circulating in Gaul during the Merovingian epoch in the Frank dialect.

The same legend was current in England at a very early date. See the description of three poems, scarcely later than the 8th century, in Grimm's Deutsche Heldensage, p. 21, Gott. 1829. The most curious of these is, according to Thierry, the Lied vom Wanderer, or Traveller's Song, describing the fancied pilgrimage through Europe of an English bard, who visits Greece with the Odyssey in hand, explores Italy by the help of the Aeneid, and thus puts the German legends under contribution for history and geography. "On the East of England I found the country of Hermanaric, the furious, the felon. Attila was reigning over the Huns, Hermanaric over the Goths, Ghibic over the Burgundians. His son Gunther gave me a bracelet as the meed for my songs. I received another from Hermanaric, who wished to keep me with him for a long time." The poem of Beowulf also mentions the Burgundian king Ghibic, and his son Gunther, potentates of the Rhine, who are both historical persons. The former is cited in the Burgundian laws; the latter is identical with the Gundicarius, who actually opposed Attila, near Constance, in 451.

But in Iceland and Scandinavia the German legend received its fullest development. The two poems entitled Atla-Mál and Atla-Quida, i.e. The narrative, and Song of Attila, are the most important of several rhythmical pieces. They generally follow the same version as the English poems just mentioned, making the Rhine the chief seat of events, and placing Theodoric in the second rank of importance. The analysis of these poems which own a common origin, but vary greatly in their details, is given with minute care by Thierry (t. ii. pp. 276-341). The subject being beyond the scope and limits of the present article, the reader is referred to his very interesting disquisition. The episode of Walter of Aquitaine, a hero hostile to Attila, created by the Visigoths of Spain, and the celebrated Nibelungenlied, are the principal offshoots from the primitive stock of tradition. In the latter mythical poem Attila becomes a friend of the Christians, and presents his son Ortlieb for baptism. The poem was written by Piligrinus, Bishop of Passau from 971 to 991, and Apostle of the Hungarians, with the evident intention of aiding him in the propagation of the faith during an age of perpetual war and civil commotion. (See Hund, Metrop. Salisburg. i. 200.)

Hungarian Legends.—The popular poetry to which the Magyars as a nation were passionately addicted being the means of preserving heathen associations and memories, was at first strictly anathematized by the Church, but in 1061, under the reign of Bela 1st, this rigour produced so strong a reaction in favour of Paganism, that Christianity was driven to purify the poems instead of banishing them. Through the Hungarian schools, which exercised a religious and literary criticism over the national songs, the traditional descent of the Magyars was traced from Magog, son of Japhet, and king of Scythia, through a line of biblical and mythical patriarchs, including Nimrod, down to Attila, ancestor of the Duke Arpad, and common patrons of the Magyars and the Huns. The oldest of these strange genealogies is the work of an anonymous chronicler, who wrote probably in the 11th century. (See Thierry, ii. 351.) The second, called Chronica Hungarorum, was composed by a bishop, Chartuicius, for King Coloman, and dates between 1095 and 1114. The third and most important is the Chronicle of Simon Keza, dedicated about 1282 to Ladislaus III., in imitation of which the Chronicle of Buda was composed during the 14th century in rude leonine verses.

In the Hungarian legends Attila, Arpad, and St. Stephen, the first Christian king of Hungary, are invariably the dominant characters, and in this epic trilogy Attila is pre-eminent. "The inseparable patron of the Magyar people, he changes when they change, and lives through all the stages of their national existence. . . . When the Magyars become Christians, it is to the merits of Attila that they owe this blessing. Attila paved the way for their conversion ages before by his docility under the hand of God, whose scourge he was" (Thierry, ii. p. 362). Such is the systematic idea developed throughout these legends, which are not indeed either history or tradition, but an original conception, grand and poetical, well calculated to elevate and purify the taste which could only be satisfied with national epics, analogous to the Aeneid and Iliad. How far the Attila of Hungarian legend resembles and differs from the Attila of history, may be seen in Thierry ii. 364-383, his connexion with Arpad and St. Stephen in the following pages, and modern traces of the name and influence of Attila in Hungary and in the East from p. 413 to 422.

In 1838, the Hon. and Rev. William Herbert, afterwards Dean of Manchester, published a poem in 12 books, under the title Attila, or the Triumph of Christianity, to which he appended an historical treatise on "Attila and his Predecessors." His object in this work is thus explained in his dedication to Mr. Hallam:—"The foundation of the pagan empire of Rome was the noble subject of the Aeneid. That which I have chosen is the firm establishment of Christianity by the discomfiture of the mighty attempt of Attila to found a new Antichristian dynasty upon the wreck of the temporal power of Rome, at the end of the term of 1200 years, to which its duration had been limited by the forebodings of the heathens." This undertaking has been conducted by the author with great spirit and laborious research, but his authorities are chiefly drawn from those compilers who gave currency to the Italian and Hungarian traditions about the 16th century. For instance, he apparently assigns an equal historical value to the fact of the discovery of the mysterious sword-blade by the Scythian shepherd, which rests on the unimpeachable authority of Priscus and Jornandes, and to the fabulous title of Attila, first recorded by Olahus, a Hungarian prelate of the 16th century (Bonfin., Rev. Ungar. Dec. p. 865, ed. 1606), who elsewhere (ib. p. 888) gravely proves that Attila lived 124 years. The following is the style:—"Attila, son of Bendegioz, descendant of great Nemroth (i.e. Nimrod), nurtured in Engadi, by the grace of God, King of the Huns, Medes, Goths, and Danes, the terror of the world: to which title he added later, on account of the hermit's words, 'The Scourge of God'" (cf. Thierry, ii. 369). Mr. Herbert's ingenious arguments (pp. 348-364) which deserve a careful study, go to prove, not the assumption of the character of Antichrist by Attila himself, but that Christian writers, after the long blending of history with myth, traced in this mighty impersonation of the principle of evil a resemblance to the Antichrist of Scripture. Hence the almost diabolical features, and the goat's horns, in the frontispiece to the ancient Italian legend of Attila frequently printed at Venice in the later years of the 15th century. (See note in Thierry, ii. 424.) Dante is content to place Attila in the seventh circle of the Inferno, where the tyrants are tormented by Centaurs—

"There Heaven's stern justice lays chastising hand
On Attila, who was the scourge of earth;
On Sextus, and on Pyrrhus."

Canto xii. 133, transl. Cary.

See a curious allusion to the fabulous destruction of Florence by Attila in Dante, Infern. cant. xiii. 144, and cf. Thierry, ii. 255-258.

The leading authorities for the life of Attila are enumerated in Gibbon's Roman Empire (ed. Smith), iv. 191 (notes). Other writers have been sufficiently indicated above. [C. D.]

AUDITORES. [MANES.]

AUDIUS or AUDAEUS, the founder of an Anthropomorphite sect, of which an account is given under ANTHROPOMORPHITAE.

AUDOENUS, formerly called DADO, S. (St. Ouen, or Ouein), son of Autharius and Aiga, brother of St. Ado, who shared with him the blessing of St. Columban, and (if we may trust Fridegodus) of Rado (Act. SS. Boll. Aug. 4, 797), was successively referendarius to Dagobert of France, and bishop of Rouen. He was born about 609 at Sancy near Soissons, and was educated at his parents' home, Ussy-sur-Marne. While still a youth he was sent to the court of Clothaire II., where he formed a most intimate friendship, based on their mutual love of asceticism, with St. Eligius, whose biographer he became. Ouen states in this life—first published with mutilations by Surius, then verbatim by D'Achery (Spicilegium, t. v. 190), and with notes by Ghesquiere, in Act. SS. Belgii, iii. 198-310—that he and Eligius were consecrated bishops at Rouen and Noyon respectively on the same day, i.e. May 14, 640.* Shortly before this they had been associated in opposing the introduction of the Monothelite heresy and the spread of simony; and Ouen alone had travelled into Spain, where his prayers, like those of Elias, says his biographer, relieved the country from a seven years' drought. The same virtue is ascribed to his relics as they were conveyed back to Rouen by Duke Rollo. Before his episcopate he also greatly helped his brother in the foundation of the monastery of Jouarre near Meaux, and himself in 634 founded that of Rebaix. He was ordained priest by Deodatus, bishop of Mâcon, before his journey into Spain. After his episcopate he ordained St. Geremar to the diaconate, and St. Wandregisilus to the priesthood; reconciled the latter to St. Filibert, abbat of Jumièges, whom he had previously imprisoned under the influence of a false charge preferred by Ebroin; attended the 3rd Council of Châlons-sur-Saône (644); translated the relics of St. Marculf, abbat of Nanteuil (658); and successfully opposed the tyranny of Ebroin. He subscribed to the privilege of Clovis for St. Denis in 653, and to several other similar documents. He was present at the death of St. Wandregisilus in 667; and about that time bestowed the veil on St. Angadrismia. In 673 he attended the funeral of Childeric. He persuaded a nobleman named Waningus to found the monastery of Fécan. At a certain spot near Evreux, where he saw a fiery cross in the sky, an abbey was built in 692, called Cruix S. Audoeni, afterwards known as Cruix S. Leufredi; he also promoted the foundation of many other monasteries and churches. Devotion carried him as far as Rome; and on his return he was sent by Thierry to Cologne, at the instance of Warato, who succeeded Ebroin as mayor of the palace, to negotiate terms of peace with Pepin, duke of Austrasia. Returning from this mission, he fell sick and died at Clichy, near Paris, on August 24, 683, having requested the king to appoint as his successor Ansbert, abbat of Fontanelle.

St. Ouen's history does not end with his death. His body was carried to Rouen, and laid in a spot which he had himself prepared in the church of St. Peter, now replaced by the magnificent church, begun in 1318, which is dedicated to St. Ouen. The sacred body was transferred by St. Ansbert to a more honourable position in the same church; and rested there 165, or perhaps 185 years, till through fear of the devastations of the Normans it was removed from place to place into the diocese of Trèves. It was reinstated at Rouen on the conversion of Rollo, and enclosed in a golden chest by Duke Richard I. in the 10th century. This act of piety, says the legend, was in acknowledgment of a severe admonition delivered in a vision by the saint, whose remains had been almost plundered by two monks from France (Boll. l. c. p. 823). What really became of the relics after this Cuper (Boll. pp. 803-805) leaves to be determined by Norman and English hagiologists. The former have asserted that they remained at Rouen till 1562, when they were burnt by some zealous Calvinists who pillaged the monastery, and that during the 11th century they were carried round the diocèse to stimulate the alms of the faithful for the erection of the new church. On the other hand William of Malmesbury states (lib. 5, De Pontificibus, ed. Gale, p. 371) that Emma, widow of Ethelred, when a refugee in Normandy about 1077, bought the relics of the monks and transferred them to Canterbury. And there is a third account by Capgrave of some clergy bringing the body to Edgar in 956.

A long account of his posthumous miracles, by a monk named Fulbert, is given edited from MS. by Cuper, Boll. l. c. 825-840.

Four days in the year were formerly consecrated by the people of Rouen to the memory of St. Ouen. The following places in England have churches under his patronage: Bromham, Beds; Gloucester, Hereford, and perhaps Bristol, if Ewin represents Owen or Ouen (Parker's Calendar, p. 274).

His writings. 1. The Life of St. Eligius—a very valuable and important piece of early history—was probably written before 672, when some fragmentary memoirs had already appeared. It contains two books; the first gives the life of St. Eligius up to his episcopate, the second ends with the first translation of his remains in 660. The work shows that St. Ouen had some knowledge of general literature, and of the Fathers of the Church, especially St. Augustine. The manner of execution is far from faultless. He is careless about chronological order, too diffuse, and gives a disproportionate space to miracles, especially in the second book, where however is found the invaluable though much-abused sermon on the character of a good Christian, vindicated and in part translated by Dr. Maitland, Dark Ages, 100-122. As to its style, the author apologises for its simplicity, saying that the absence of rhetorical ornament is best in keeping with the humility of his friend, and that he himself prefers substance to show. It is dedicated to a bishop (perhaps a suffragan of Rouen) named Rodobert, whose note of commendation is appended. A complete list of the earlier editions of this work may be seen in the Hist. Lit. de la France, iii. 625-628, whence this notice is drawn. Four translations into French (two of which, viz. by M. Charles de Barthelemy, Paris, 1847, and by M. l'Abbé Parenty, Arras, 1851, contain curious and learned notes) are enumerated in Nouv. Biog. Gén.

2. A MS. Life of St. Remi, attributed by Possevin to St. Ouen, was seen by him at the Abbey of St. Gall. Some other fragments are of no importance. [C. D.]

AUDOMAR, or as he was afterwards called ST. OMER, was the only son of a noble of the neighbourhood of Constance in Alemannia. Shortly after the arrival of the great Celtic missionary Columbanus on the shores of the Lake of Constance, he presented himself at Luxeuil, and brought with him his father, Riulphus, whom he had persuaded on the death of his mother to espouse the monastic life. Both were admitted by the abbot Eustacius, and there the father remained till his death. Audomar, however, left Luxeuil for the country of the heathen Morini, whose district extended from Boulogne to the mouth of the Scheld, and was appointed by Dagobert to the see of Therouane about A.D. 637. After some years perceiving that the missionary work to be done could not be carried on successfully without assistance, he requested abbot Walbert of Luxeuil to send him three of his former brethren. The abbot sent him Mommolin, Ebertrammus, and Bertin, whom Audomar placed in an estate called Sithin, on the banks of the Aa, which a heathen noble, whom he had baptised, had bestowed upon him. Here in a sort of island, situated amidst a vast marsh, scarcely to be approached except in a boat, rose the celebrated abbey known at a later period by the name of St. Bertin, from the youngest of the three monks from Luxeuil. After thirty years of self-denying labours which recovered the heathen tribes of Morinia from their idolatries, St. Omer died about A.D. 667, bequeathing his name to the existing town, which was built round the cemetery originally intended for the monks of St. Bertin. *Acta SS. AUGENDUS, a Carthaginian (Cyp. Ep. 41), who joined against Cyprian in the faction of Felicissimus. In Ep. 42 he is excommunicated by bishop CALDONIUS, Cyprian's commissary during his retirement, along with Repostus, Irene, Paulus, Sophronius, Soliassus. Possibly the same Augendus (Cyp. Ep. 44) reappears as a deacon of Novatian's sent to Carthage with the presbyter MAXIMUS, who becomes the Novatianist bishop in Carthage. In this case on the breaking up of Felicissimus' party, he would after his excommunication, accompany Novatus to Rome and join Novatian, and return as Novatus did (Cyp. Ep. 50) to push the Novatianist cause against Cyprian. [E. B. W.]

AUGULUS, AUGURIUS, or AUGUSTUS, M., an alleged martyr in Britain, bishop of Augusta or London, under Diocletian (Martyrol. Feb. 6). [A. W. H.]

AUGUSTINUS, AURELIUS, ST., was born, Nov. 13, A.D. 354, at Tagaste (Tajelt), a town of Numidia. His parents were of humble origin. His father, Patricius, seems to have been a violent, vulgar man; but God had placed near him the most precious of all guardian angels, a Christian mother. No person in the Ancient Church is so well known as Monnica,* none is more worthy of our affectionate veneration. Purified and subdued, yet preserving all her natural ardour, Monnica became a blessing to her family; she won over to Christ her husband, first, and then her beloved son, the object of her anxiety and of her prayers. Everywhere her holy love pursued him, while she was more persevering in her efforts to save him than he was in his endeavours to ruin himself; as indefatigable as Charity, like charity she kept on hoping against all hope. A long time elapsed before Monnica's prayers were answered. Through a scruple which astonishes in the middle of the 4th century, but which would have been perfectly understood two hundred years before, she postponed her son's baptism, dreading lest she might be too hasty in giving him the seal of faith, and foreseeing the frailty of that unsubdued nature (Confess. i. 11). Augustine took away with him from his home only a few vague recollections of Christianity; he says himself that he kept within his soul the echo of the name of Jesus Christ which he had so often heard his mother pronounce; and, like those melodies which suddenly conjure up before us a whole phase of our past life, that sacred name, whenever it resounded in his ear, recalled to him his mother's piety and the God of his infancy.

Augustine's sins are known. He yielded to the violent passions of youth, and fell a victim to the temptations which assailed him on all sides (Confess. ii. 3; iii. 1). He could not, however, find satisfaction in the sad pleasures of debauchery; he was stricken down by an illness which could find its cure only at the foot of the cross. He endeavoured to find peace in literary pursuits, and threw himself into that direction with intense energy. The longings of his soul, however, were not satisfied; nor was he a man who would seek in rhetoric a compensation for the loss of faith (Confess. iv. 2). He was not like his fellow countryman Apuleius, whose greatest pleasure was to arrange words in harmonious order, and who had no desire beyond that of calling forth applause. Augustine could not be comforted so easily; and, notwithstanding all the success he obtained, he still felt sick at heart. He endeavoured to find in the theatre and amidst the games of the circus a kind of intoxicating forgetfulness, but the only result was that his evil passions there received a fresh impulse. Even friendship proved to him an insufficient remedy; it became the source of his bitterest sorrows, and the loss of a friend rendered life insupportable (Confess. iv. 4).

The perusal of Cicero's Hortensius purified and developed in Augustine the love of truth, whilst it spoke to him in beautiful language of God and of immortality (Confess. iii. 4, viii. 7). And yet he was not capable of appreciating truth in its noblest shape. He confesses himself that, at that period of his life, the study of the Holy Scriptures produced no impression upon him. The simplicity and occasional ruggedness of the style offended him. Before escaping from the fascinating charms of error and the unruliness of passion, Augustine was to wander still further. He lost his way in two of the many false directions which attracted his contemporaries: heresy and pantheism.

At an epoch of syncretism, heresy exercised great influence; it favoured the popular tendencies of the age, and seemed to bring about a reconciliation between the popular religions and Christianity. It sheltered, so to speak, the old substratum of heathen ideas under the standard of faith. On the one hand, it gave satisfaction to the pride of metaphysicians, for instead of salvation through conversion and humiliation, it preached salvation through silence. The old Eastern dualism was revived, sometimes under its grossest form, sometimes with extraordinary subtlety, evil being uniformly stripped of its moral character, and represented as a metaphysical necessity. [GNOSTICISM.]

Manichaeism was one of the numerous manifestations of that inveterate dualism, being a combination of Parsism with Christianity. Already the old religious ideas of Zoroaster had long been modified by the teaching of the Gospel, and the Bundelesh, a book added to the Zendavesta, bears the evident mark of that kind of compromise. From the same alliance proceeded Manichaeism which, however, allowed a greater share to Christian ideas. In that singular system the kingdom of light and the kingdom of darkness are seen to stand out in bold contrast to one another. Between them a war has broken out, and by means of evil spirits, darkness has invaded light: out of that twofold element the world has been formed. Jesus Christ and the Paraclete came from the sun, to teach us how we should cast aside the principle of night. This principle being assimilated by the Manichaeans to matter, the result was the encouragement of Asceticism, and then, by a natural reaction, the indulgence of licentiousness. [MANICHAISM.] Augustine embraced the Manichaean heresy at the age of 19, A.D. 373, and for the space of nine years was more or less under its influence (Confess. iii. 11, iv. 1).

From Manichaeism, Augustine went over to Neo-Platonism, and he was right in congratulating himself on the change (Confess. viii. 10). This system of philosophy may be considered as a desperate attempt made by Hellenism to spring into new life, through an association with the mysticism of the Hindus. It was far superior to Gnosis. The Neo-Platonists did not aim at an embodiment of Christianity: on the contrary, they attacked it, but at the same time they borrowed from it many of its doctrines. They, too, spoke of union with God; but that union was absorption; the annihilation of the creature lord in the contemplation of the sole and sovereign Being. The ecstasy of Neo-Platonism was an exact transcript of Brahminical asceticism. Although St. Augustine could not find a resting-place in such a system, yet he derived some advantage from his acquaintance with it. Whilst pondering the impersonal Logos of Philo and Plotinus, he gradually rose to an ideal which connected itself with the reminiscences of his childhood, and, thus prepared, he returned to the perusal of the Holy Scriptures. But the hour of deliverance had not yet struck; and all those diligent studies were doomed to remain barren until Augustine had taken a final leave of the dissipations of his youth. From Carthage he went to Tagaste, where he gave lectures on rhetoric; but he soon returned to the metropolis of proconsular Africa (Confess. iv. 7). While teaching at Carthage he published his first work in his twenty-seventh year, entitled De Apto et Pulchro, which he dedicated to Hierius, a Roman orator, known to him only by his high reputation. This work is now lost; and indeed the author himself seems to have been singularly careless about it, for when he wrote his Confessions he had lost sight of it altogether, and says he does not remember whether it was in two or three books. It was at Tagaste that he became acquainted with Alypius, who after being his pupil soon proved to be his dearest friend (Confess. vi. 6). From Carthage Augustine went to Rome in 383 with the view of finding a stage more worthy of his talents as a teacher of rhetoric; but his hopes of glory were blighted, and he almost succumbed to a violent illness. Not long afterwards Monnica, whom his departure from Africa had well nigh driven to despair, joined him at Milan (385), where he expected a high position as a public teacher. The sight of Ambrose, conspicuous by his austerity, and by the stamp of power and greatness visible in his person and in his eloquence, impressed Augustine in the strongest manner. He was never weary of listening to the Bishop of Milan, who seemed like a Christian tribune of the people, preserving in the religion of Christ the masculine vigour of the old Roman nationality. "He received me like a true father," says Augustine (Confess. v. 13). "Touched by his eloquence, my heart opened itself to the truth of what he said" (Confess. v. 14). The life of the Bishop of Milan spoke, however, more clearly than the sermons which he preached. Augustine resumed with profit the study of the Holy Scriptures; he had a kind of foretaste of the beauty and majesty of his mother's religion; he was drawn towards it, and almost won over to it. If conversion had not yet come, it was because he had not yet learnt to be subdued. The difficulties which stopped him seemed solely of an intellectual kind; but they were really moral ones; he did not believe, because he would not believe; and if he would not, it was because he felt at what cost he must follow Christ. He still kept dragging along the chain of guilt, and, in order to deceive himself, he opposed to the Gospel objections of a metaphysical kind. Meanwhile the call from above resounded with increasing strength: Augustine was at the same time roused and irritated, attracted and repelled. At last a violent crisis came, a struggle even unto blood, which he has himself described to us with sincere and impassioned eloquence (Confess. viii. 7, 8).

Scarcely was Augustine converted than he retired into solitude, the better to prepare himself for his baptism, which took place at Milan on the 25th of April, 387. He was then 33 years of age. His friend Alypius, and his son Adeodatus, the monument of his sins and of the grace of God, were baptized at the same time. On his way back to Africa with Monnica, he had the grief of seeing her die at Ostia; yet he felt that he enjoyed, through the Lord, closer communion with her whom he had lost, than he had ever done in the stormy days of his youth (Confess. ix. 11). At last he landed on that African soil where he was to display as much zeal in the service of God as he had before shown ardour in the pursuit of folly: a successor of Tertullian and of Cyprian, he was to surpass his illustrious forerunners both by his activity and by his genius; though, on returning to Africa, he had no other thought than that of burying himself in retirement from the world.

Augustine spent a few years in his native town, Tagaste, where with some friends he formed a kind of holy community, living almost after the fashion of Coenobites, on an estate jointly belonging to them (August. Epist. 225). It was then that he had the joy of leading to Christ, by his letters, Nebridius, one of the dearest friends of his youth, who died shortly after his baptism (Confess. ix. 3). Augustine's works on Genesis, on True Religion, and on Music, belong to this epoch (August. Vita Possid. 3). In 391 he went to Hippo on a visit to the imperial commissioner, a friend of his (Vita Possid. 3); the bishop, Valerius, prevailed upon him to stay, ordained him a priest (Vita Possid. 4), sought his help and his advice in every business concerning the Church, and made him his colleague or associate in the episcopate in 395. He then entered upon a career of labour and of struggles when all his qualities shone forth. The illustrious Christian was also a distinguished prelate: he retained all the austere habits of an ascetic, in a position which imperial favour rendered most brilliant; his house was a monastery, where he lived frugally with his clergy. Self-denying, prodigal in his charity towards the poor, his only object was the salvation of souls. He knew, as St. Paul did, how to make himself a servant unto all; and, arrayed in the dignity which came to him unsought, he preserved the broken and contrite heart of a true penitent (Vita Possid. c. 22; also Confess. x.).

The influence of Augustine reached far beyond the limits of his diocese. He was invested with a kind of moral supremacy freely acknowledged by the Catholic Church. His influence as a theologian will be considered afterwards. At present we must review the part he took in the violent dispute which the schism of the Donatists had occasioned in Africa.

This schism was connected with a general tendency which had agitated the Church for nearly two hundred years. During the third century the Montanists had claimed, on behalf of the Christian community, the right of self-government, and asserted a system of rigorism; but the Montanists damaged their cause by the most deplorable exaggeration. Under the plea of strictness, they professed principles which only tended to discourage the sincerest penitents. On the other hand, the pretended revelation of which they boasted, and the sickly enthusiasm they encouraged, did much to throw them into disrepute. The ideas, however, which had given rise to Montanism survived. They inspired the sect of the Novatians, and at a later period that of the Donatists; while past exaggerations disfigured them, and gave to them a false direction. [DONATISTS.]

It is not our business to describe here all the episodes of the struggle between the Donatists and the orthodox Church. Strengthened by the Imperial protection, the latter condescended to back up the arguments of discussion with the argument of force. A short respite took place during the reign of Julian the Apostate, whose policy consisted in facilitating the divisions of Christendom. Afterwards the Donatist bishops, who at one time were nearly 300 in number, allowed themselves to be led to delusive conferences, presided over by an Imperial delegate, appointed for the purpose of taking care that the deliberations were carried out, and pledged beforehand to the orthodox side. The Council of Carthage (A.D. 410) decided that all bishops refusing to be reconciled to the Church, after three requests to do so, should be brought back by force within its pale, with their flocks. Thus ended the Donatist schism. The victors were really more to be pitied than the vanquished, because the triumph of violence over the free convictions of the soul is always barren. In these stormy debates Augustine played the foremost part, and he contributed powerfully to place within the grasp of the Church the dangerous weapon of persecution. Unfortunately, he made use of his powerful eloquence to vindicate the conduct of the orthodox party, and gave utterance to the most dangerous theories respecting the constitution of the Church and the rights of coercion in religious matters, for which the sanction of his illustrious name obtained universal assent.

The point at issue between Augustine and the Donatists was the idea of the Church. Holiness, the Donatists argued, is above all the characteristic of the Church of Christ; and whenever that holiness has been either marred or compromised, the Church cannot be said to exist, although a regular succession can be traced back uninterruptedly to the Apostles. According to them, catholicity was independent of external circumstances. "The name of Catholic," they said, "should not be given to provinces or to nations. He alone is a true Catholic who is a tried Christian" (Collectio Chartar. edit. du Pin. viii. 301, 302.) The Donatists concluded from this that no church deserved the name of church which had admitted within its pale faithless or unworthy members, especially persons who, during the last persecution, had been guilty of fraud. From so tainted a community separation was absolutely necessary at any cost. There is, answered Augustine, only one church, namely, that which, by an uninterrupted succession, can be traced back to the Apostles. It is the hallowed ark which alone floats on the waters of the flood, and out of its walls there is no salvation. "No one," said he, "can have Jesus Christ, the head of the church, unless he belongs to Christ's body" ("habere caput Christum nemo poterit, nisi qui in ejus corpore fuerit," De Unitate Eccles. 49), and the body of Christ is the orthodox Church. Those persons, therefore, commit a serious error who think that the existence of the Church depends upon the holiness of its members. We must attach ourselves exclusively to the divine character of the institution. The Church is founded by God upon the rock or an immutable and sovereign will; if we make it depend on the dispositions of men, we shift its foundations from the rock to the quicksands. Thus, whilst the Donatists placed holiness above catholicity, Augustine reversed the order; and no one has carried the theocratic idea farther than the Bishop of Hippo.

Augustine did more than persecute the Donatists; he maintained the right of persecution against them. We must acknowledge that on this point their language was blameless, but they had not always acted consistently. Misfortune, however, enlightened them, and they eloquently expressed ideas of toleration which were a strange anachronism at the beginning of the fifth century (Neander, Church Hist. iii.).

On the other side, Augustine argued that all punishment is not ipso facto martyrdom. On Calvary, near the cross of the Just One, might be seen the crosses of the two thieves who were suffering a righteous condemnation. There are sufferings which are salutary chastisements. God, through trials, compels us into the right way. Why should not the State do the same thing? Can the State be indifferent to truth? Ought it not to prevent the invasion of error? If the civil power punishes criminals, are not the promoters of heresy a hundred times more dangerous? "Puniantur homicida, puniantur adultera, puniantur caetera quantalibet sceleris sive libilinis facinora; sola sacrilegia volam a regnantium legibus impunita" (Contra Gauden. l. 20). He who prevents the free circulation of poisons, should he not also prevent the diffusion of error? (Epist. Parmen. i. 16). Truth alone is wholesome; and as it is the possession of the Church, we must oblige souls to enter into the Church ("compelle intrare," Epist. 93 ad Vicent.). On Augustine's struggles with the Donatists, see Vita Possid. 119.

It is as a divine that Augustine has left the most lasting proofs of his genius; in the theological field all his moral and intellectual qualities found free scope, and his authority there still remains unchallenged. He has accomplished for Christian psychology what Athanasius did for Christian metaphysics; and as it is on psychological questions that he has shed most light, we are naturally tempted to consider him chiefly from that point of view. But we must not forget the share he took in all the theological disputes of the day. His first writings, dating from the epoch which followed immediately upon his conversion, form a transition between the philosopher and the divine. To that period belong his three books Against the Academicians, his work On the Happy Life, and his Soliloquies. The first distinctly theological treatise he composed was a Refutation of Manichaeism, in which he sought to point out the rock upon which he had once made shipwreck, and to expose the real substance of a doctrine of which the appearance was attractive. And while engaged in refuting a heresy which begins by eliminating man's moral principle, Augustine asserted that principle with an energy which he afterwards thought to be imprudent; for the views on liberty and responsibility which he then maintained do not harmonize with the system he finally adopted.

Setting aside the question of Divine grace, which exhibits all the originality of his thought, Augustine adopts, on all points, the Catholic doctrines of his age. He accepts fully the conclusions of the Nicene Council, and defends them, when necessary, with the usual vigour of his reasoning. As an exegetical writer he suffered, in common with all the fathers, the disastrous influence of the allegorical method. There is, indeed, no surer method of inflicting barrenness on the study of the Scriptures. When the real meaning is not apprehended, the imagination allows itself full play, and the most absurd ideas pass current. Augustine also gives way too often to the passion for discovering types everywhere. There are types, no doubt, of a broad character, which arrest the mind at once; the slightest glance is enough to discover them. Those which cannot be ascertained without some difficulty are, generally speaking, of human invention. With this qualification, we must admit that Augustine turned an erroneous method to very good account, and that he drew abundantly treasures of edification from the well of Scripture. "The Holy Scriptures," says he, "are accessible to all, although a few only understand them thoroughly. Like unto a familiar friend, the Bible communicates simply to the heart of the ignorant its deep meaning." ("Ea quae aperte continet quasi amicus familiaris sine fuco ad cor loquitur indoctorum," Epist. 137.)

Augustine was one of the first to state the doctrine of the plenary inspiration of Scripture in its most rigorous meaning. He wrote a well-known treatise, in which he tried to reconcile even the slightest discrepancies in the narrative of the Evangelists. And yet he was very far from being fanatically attached to the letter of the sacred volume. We may even think that he exaggerates, to some extent, the spirituality of the Gospel in the following words: "Grounded upon faith, hope, and charity, man needs the Holy Scriptures only for the purpose of instructing others. Many live in the depth of the wilderness supported by these three virtues, without any copies of the sacred volume." ("Itaque multi per haec tria etiam in solitudine sine codicibus vivunt," De Doctrin. Christian. i. 39.)

As a preacher, Augustine was essentially biblical; his sermons form a consecutive exposition of the books of the Old and New Testaments. They have the defects of his exegetical writings; but whenever he allows the utterances of his heart to flow forth, he produces the greatest results. His sermons are remarkable for their simplicity; thought and feeling manifest themselves continuously together without any rhetorical effort. The pastor and the theologian are united; and it is seldom that we are reminded of the accomplished scholar of Carthage and Rome. We are told that one day Augustine had prepared an eloquent discourse, designed to produce a strong impression upon cultivated minds. Suddenly, in the midst of his preaching, he broke the thread of his argument, abandoned the period which he had begun, and discussed at once a more simple and more popular subject. On his return home, he told a friend that he had yielded to an irresistible impulse of the Holy Spirit, which had urged him to set aside his original plan. Hardly had he said this when a man, knocking at the door, entered, bathed with tears, and confessed himself to be won over to the cause of Christ. He had been struck by that very portion of the discourse which had been suggested to Augustine by the sudden inspiration.

The whole philosophical series of St. Augustine's writings is extremely remarkable; he often associates, with much skill, Plato and St. Paul. His general views on the relations between reason and faith are full of depth; he shows that faith is not only necessary in religion, but that it is the condition of everything beautiful and great. Thus friendship begins by an act of faith (De Utilitate Sred. 12, 13). Reason can arrive at truth only by being subordinate to faith. "It was necessary," says he, "that God, through a kind of popular clemency, should lower the authority of the divine intellect so as to make it the inmate of a human body. ("Populari quadam clementia divini intellectus auctoritatem ad ipsum corpus humanum declinavit," Contra Acad. iii. 19, 20). St. Augustine admits that faith strengthens reason, and exalts it instead of lowering it; and we know that he had the honour of forestalling Descartes in the expression of the famous formula: "[ego] cogito, ergo sum."

We must now approach the great struggle which nearly split up the Western Church into two parties, just as Arianism had been on the point of producing a schism in the Eastern one. Pelagius was the first to raise the stormy controversy on the relation between divine grace and human freedom. Such a question was quite in accordance with the genius of the Western Church. Unmoved by the metaphysical subtleties which occupied the church at Alexandria, and much more inclined to questions of a practical than of a speculative character, it might have been safely foretold of the doctors of the West that, if ever they approached the ground of deep theology, it would be on the side where practice is intimately connected with theory; they would take up a problem of psychology, not anthropology, rather than one of pure metaphysics. Pelagius, the originator of the dispute on grace, was a Breton monk. Having entered a convent at an early age, he had lived in peace and solitude, far from the world and its temptations. He had never experienced those severe backslidings which enable us to measure the depths of human corruption. His life, always regular in its course, had been spent quietly under the protecting shadow of the cloister. There, no doubt, he had also acquired that dangerous spiritual pride which monkish asceticism uniformly tends to beget. Thus Pelagianism has for its commentary the life and character of Pelagius, just as Augustinianism takes us back to the great miracle of the conversion of St. Augustine, who, wrested as it were by main force from his sins and his pride, fell prostrate and broken at the foot of the cross.

Animated by an ardent zeal for the propagation of his doctrines, Pelagius repaired to Rome in the year 409, with Caelestius, the most distinguished of his disciples. He then went into Africa, but did not stay there; Caelestius, whom he left behind him, and who had received the order of priesthood, sowed heresy in the church of Carthage, whilst Pelagius diffused his ideas in Palestine. Condemned by a synod held at Carthage in 412, Caelestius joined his master trusting to that Eastern Church which was then the hope of all heretics. The expectation of both these men was not deceived; the synod of Diospolis (415) decided in favour of Pelagianism, notwithstanding St. Jerome's resistance. Acting under the inspiration of St. Augustine, the African Church, by way of retorting on that of Palestine, once more pronounced the condemnation of the heresy (416). This decision received the confirmation of the Bishop of Rome, Innocent I. Pelagianism seemed to be vanquished, when its upholders had the good fortune of winning over to their side Sozimus, the successor of Innocent, the first act of whose primacy was to proclaim the orthodoxy of the heretical doctrines. The African bishops nevertheless maintained their decision in a new synod held at Carthage in 418. Having obtained the support of the emperor Honorius, they regained the Roman prelate by his influence. After this defeat, Pelagianism reappeared a little later in the south of Gaul with a few slight modifications which took nothing away from its essential character. Whilst allowing more to the merits of Jesus Christ, the semi-Pelagians had nevertheless not abjured the pernicious doctrine of the merits of works. Augustine renewed the contest: his works On Predestination and On the Gift of Perseverance had the same result as his polemical treatises against Pelagius. The Marseille priests were condemned by the synod of Valence in 436.

When confronted by Pelagius' denial of divine grace, St. Augustine could not assume the calm attitude of a theologian. We feel that his indignation masters him: he longs to beat down human pride; he follows it from one lurking-place to the other; and he stops only when he has annihilated both pride and man himself in the presence of God and of His sovereign grace. Who comes and talks to us about the capacity for good which is in our nature? Our nature wills nothing but evil, and can do nothing but unmitigated evil. Our fall has been a complete one: it has not been limited to one man; in Adam all have sinned, in him all have been condemned. "By their birth all receive the taint of the ancient death which he has deserved" (Epist. ad Vital. 5). "After his sin, Adam having been driven away from Eden, his entire posterity, which by his sin he had infected and corrupted in himself, as in the stem of the human family, has been included with him in the bonds of death and of damnation" (De Fide, Spe, et Charit. 10). St. Augustine pictures to himself humanity as if, like Lazarus, it were lying in its tomb. He rolls the funeral stone against the door of the sepulchre, and engraves upon it the mournful epitaph, "Without God, without hope." Mankind has not one spark of the divine life; it can only recover life through a resurrection, which, for it, is like a second creation. It is the work of that mediator "who by his one sacrifice has appeased the anger of God" (De Fide, 13). Son of God and Son of man, equal to the Father, our mediator having ascended to heaven, the efficacious grace of God is imparted to men, not for any merit or for any will on their part (Epist. ad Vital. 5), but solely in the name of an entirely gratuitous act of God's mercy. Man is quite passive in the scheme of his salvation; the Father draws him powerfully to the Son, and if he remains in the faith it is because he has received the gift of perseverance. "When God preserves a just man from all scandal, and makes him appear before His presence spotless and full of joy, what gift does He bestow upon him, if not that of perseverance in what is good?" (De Corrept. et Gratiis, 32).

In order the better to show the complete passiveness of man in the economy of salvation from the beginning to the end, St. Augustine quotes the example of children who are saved through baptism exactly as adults are through faith. "In the reception of grace, not only do those children manifest no act of their own will which can be regarded as a merit, but we even see them cry and struggle when the holy sacrament of baptism is administered to them" (De Gratia et lib. arbit. 13). This comparison between children and adults is full of significance. Not only does the divine vocation suppress every merit in the sight of God, but likewise excludes from the fact of salvation every participation of our own will. If it be asked, whence comes the difference which exists amongst men? Augustine answers by stating the decree of predestination which has beforehand determined the number of the elect who are to replace the fallen angels. "Let us fully understand," says St. Augustine, "the character of that divine vocation which makes the elect, and by virtue of which they are chosen, not because they have believed, but in order that they may believe. Divine grace, we know, is not given to all men, and it is through a righteous judgment that those upon whom it is not bestowed are deprived of it." "How can one say," adds he, "that all men would receive grace, if those to whom it is not given did not reject it of their own free will, because God will have all men to be saved,—how can we say this, when we consider that there are so many children to whom grace has never been given, and that several of them die without having received it, although there is in them no act of the will opposing itself to the reception of that gift? It even sometimes happens that the parents of a child eagerly long to have him baptized, and yet the child does not receive the sacrament, because God, not willing that he should, causes him to die before baptism is administered. It is evident, therefore, that those who resist so clear a will do not understand the meaning of the expression, 'God will have all men to be saved,' since there are so many men who remain unsaved, not because they refuse to be saved, but because God wills not that they should" (Epist. ad Vital. 5, 6).

By these assertions Augustine attained the extreme point of reaction against Pelagianism: he could go no farther. He had stripped man of everything; and we are led to ask ourselves whether on such a system man himself exists as a moral creature; though we must add that St. Augustine stopped short of the idea of a positive decree of perdition. (On the controversy with Pelagius and his followers, see, in addition to the works already named, the Vita Possid. 18.)

St. Augustine was not satisfied with attacking heresy and schism: he also wrote the De Civitate Dei, one of the noblest apologetical works which the ancient Church can boast of. It was commenced about 413, and was not finished before 426. That treatise was composed, if we may so say, in the glare of the conflagration kindled by the barbarians in the midst of the Roman world. Rome had already been once taken; and the end had come to that vigorous society which, after a period of the most extraordinary development, was now falling to pieces, eaten up by inward corruption, and also shaken to its foundations by the violent attacks of the Teutonic tribes. All hearts were agitated with unutterable anxiety; every one felt that the scenes he had witnessed were nothing as compared with those which were to take place. Society was moving towards an unknown goal, unknown and yet but too clearly foreseen. Christians themselves ran the risk of being discouraged by the gloomy future, so much the more so because the heathens accused them of having brought about all these disasters by renouncing the time-honoured deities of their country.

Augustine wrote the De Civitate Dei with the intention of refuting these absurd calumnies, and also of giving fresh courage to his fellow Christians. Every page bears the stamp of his fervent piety. His eloquence and his indignation are unequalled when he exposes that corrupt paganism which, after bringing down upon Roman society evils of every kind, dared to lay these woes to the charge of the Christian faith, which was alone capable of saving the world. Taking a rapid survey of the history of Rome, he asks what the gods of heathenism had ever done for the prosperity of the state and for public morality. All the riches of learning are enlisted in the service of truth. Sometimes the sharpest irony is introduced; sometimes the entreaties of true charity give a new character to the reasoning, and the author's style becomes, so to say, transfigured by reflecting the rays of divine truth. We fancy we can hear Augustine himself addressing the people in the Forum, and there, surrounded by the smoking ruins of the city of men, declaring the stability of the city of God.

The effect which his eloquence produces is all the greater, because we feel that, Christian as he is, he remains still a citizen. Christianity has not inspired him with a selfish contempt of human sufferings, under the pretext that they form part of the plan mapped out in prophecy. He mourns over the calamities of Rome; but his tears do not conceal from him the destinies of the City of God, which appear to him so much the more glorious, as the city of men is more degraded and corrupt.

We must not think, he argues, that God places in complete opposition to each other the city of God and the city of men, society and the church. The Christian, he acknowledges, must discharge his duties as a citizen, and society is the sphere within which our moral activity finds its appointed scope for exertion. Peace, security, the respect of rights, obedience to the laws, every element of the prosperity of society, are in St. Augustine's eyes of paramount importance. It follows that, according to him, we may belong to the City of God, and at the same time take an active interest in the prosperity of our country, even when only the material improvement of our fellow-citizens is concerned; for, to quote his own expressions, "A certain amount of ease in our circumstances enables us to bear more easily, and to feel less, the weight of that mortal body which oppresses the soul." In short, the city of men, in St. Augustine's judgment, is not society, which is of God's appointment, but the world, which wages war against God. He opposes the destinies of the world to those of the Church; and the city of men, such as it appeared to him four centuries after Christ, formed a dismal picture, which unfortunately has lost none of its reality even at the present day. And if we look, for instance, at the description he gives us of the corrupt state of Roman society, we cannot imagine Augustine speaking to us in different language (De Civit. Dei, ii. 20).

What hope could he still retain? He had seen the Roman citizens who had flocked to Carthage for the purpose of avoiding danger, immediately after the siege of Rome, hurrying to the games of the circus and the dramatic performances; thus exhibiting the saddest sight in the world, because it was the mark of irredeemable wickedness (De Civit. i. 33).

There was another sign, still more distressing, to which St. Augustine draws our attention,—that hypocrisy which at the hour of danger had crowded the churches with impious men or professed heathens, who, after the peril was passed, had began again to blaspheme the Saviour (De Civit. i. 1). It is in the presence of those ruins that St. Augustine describes the glory of the City of God, and foretells its progress; a society spiritual in its character, and whose native country is an abiding one, "eternal in the heavens" (De Civit. preface). And it is precisely that aspiration towards the eternal and the immutable which distinguishes the city of God from the city of men (De Civit. xix. 14). There alone is true wisdom; for we cannot apply the qualification of true to that wisdom which, with the utmost prudence and vigour, the greatest firmness and moderation, does not aim at that end where God is to be all in all in the certainty of eternity and the enjoyment of perfect peace (idem). True wisdom shines forth with the fullest brilliancy at those terrible epochs when the false wisdom of this world, aiming only at the finite and the perishable, sees its ephemeral works crumble away like the tower built upon the sand; while the city of God "remembers that those who are its enemies to-day will be its citizens to-morrow" (i. 35). He dwells particularly on that thought. As the trials of the present moment are greater, so the energy with which Christians must bear them should be greater likewise. "When Christians are called upon to enlighten, to warn, to reprove and to correct, they are too often held back by a fatal dissimulation, originating either from idle indifference, or from the fear of man. . . . Were it not for this, they might have saved many of their fellow-creatures." The public calamities which have afflicted the believers appear to him both a chastisement for their cowardice, and a pressing exhortation for them to confess their Master. Thus, the city of God, in these evil days, amidst this frightful manifestation of evil, is called upon to make a fresh start. This is not the time for discouragement, but for a painful and fruitful contest, carried on in the perfect and everlasting peace which God has conquered on behalf of His Church (i. 29).

Two other works of St. Augustine deserve special mention, his Confessions in 13 books, written in 397, and his Retractationes, written in 428, the year before his death. His Confessions contain an account of his life down to the time of his mother's death. The last three books are occupied with an allegorical explanation of the Mosaic account of the Creation. The Retractationes consist of a review of his own works, and frequently point out the errors into which he had fallen.

Augustine died on the 28th of August, 430, in the 76th year of his age, at the moment when the armies of the Huns surrounded the city of Hippo. He belonged to that class of men who, though dead, yet speak. Ardent in his affections, comprehensive and deep in his learning, he had the greatness and also the want of moderation which we discover in all strong and impassioned natures. He could do neither good nor evil by halves. From a dissolute youth he recoiled into extreme asceticism, and from metaphysical freedom into the most stringent system of authority. He was the staunchest champion of orthodoxy; nor did he sufficiently respect the claims of conscience. He sacrificed the moral element to God's sovereignty, which he maintained most unflinchingly. But, on the other hand, his love for Christ and for the souls of his fellow men was quite as decided; nay, it was its very vehemence which often carried him beyond the bounds of moderation. Therefore it is that in more than one respect he committed mistakes, the influence he has exercised has been equally wide and beneficent. He still claims the honour of having brought out in all its light the fundamental doctrine of Christianity; despite the errors of his system, he has opened to the Church the path of every progress and of every reform, by stating with the utmost vigour the scheme of free salvation which he had learnt in the school of St. Paul.

Bibliographical Notice.—The earliest edition of the collected works of Augustine is that of Amer-bach, which appeared in nine volumes folio, at Basle, 1506, and was reprinted at Paris in 1515. This edition did not, however, contain the Epistolae, the Sermones, and the Enarrationes in Psalmos, which had been previously published by Amerbach. In 1529, the works of Augustine were again published at Basle, from the press of Frobenius, and under the editorship of Erasmus, in ten volumes folio. This edition, though by no means faultless, was a considerable improvement upon that of Amerbach. It was reprinted at Paris in 1531–32; at Venice, with some improvements, in 1552, and again in 1570; at Lyons in 1561–63, and again in 1571. It was also issued from the press of Frobenius at Basle, with various alterations, in 1543, in 1556, in 1569, and in 1570. In 1577 the valuable edition of Augustine prepared by the learned divines of Louvain, was published at Antwerp, by Christopher Plantin, in ten volumes folio. It far surpasses in critical exactness all the preceding editions; and though, on the whole, inferior to that of the Benedictines, it is still held in high estimation. No fewer than sixteen of the "Theologi Lovanienses" were employed in preparing it for publication. It has been very frequently reprinted: at Geneva in 1596; at Cologne in 1616; at Lyons in 1664; at Paris in 1586, in 1603, in 1609, in 1614, in 1626, in 1635, and in 1652. The Benedictine edition of the works of Augustine, in eleven volumes folio, was published at Paris in 1679–1700. We subjoin an index to the contents of this edition.

Tomus I., published in 1679.—

Vita S. Augustini; Index generalis.

This edition of St. Augustine's works was very sharply criticised by Richard Simon (see Bibliothèque critique, &c., par Sainjore, vol. iii. p. 101), but it is still held in high estimation, and has served as a model to later savants (Leclerc [who calls himself Joannes Pherepous], professedly at Antwerp, but in reality at Amsterdam, 1700-1703, 12 vols. fo.; Gaume, Paris, 1836-1839, 11 vols., in 22 parts, large 8vo.; Antonelli, Venice, 1858-1860, 14 vols. fo.; Migne, Paris, 1841, 10 vols. large 8vo.). Leclerc added to the Benedictine edition, notes and other matter; his twelfth volume contains the poem of Prosper de Ingratis, the commentary of Pelagius on the Epistles of St. Paul, and several treatises referring to the life and writings of St. Augustine (see *Histoire de la nouvelle édition de S. AUGUSTINUS, ST., archbishop of Canterbury. 1. Authorities. The authentic materials for the life of the first archbishop of Canterbury are almost entirely comprised in the first and second books of Bede's 'Ecclesiastical History.' Some additional points, however, are brought out in (a) Gocelin's Life of St. Augustine, contained in the Acta Sanctorum of May 26, and written during the 11th century, in a singularly turgid and rhetorical style; (b) Thorn's Chronicles of St. Augustine's Abbey; (c). A few letters of Gregory the Great; (d). The lives of Gregory the Great by Paul the Deacon and John the Deacon (Cent. viii. and ix.).

2. Origin of his Mission to England. The mission of Augustine to England was due to circumstances of peculiar interest. While Gregory the Great was still a monk in the famous monastery of St. Andrew, which he had himself founded on the Caelian Mount at Rome, he was one day passing through the market-place of the city, at a time when it was crowded with people attracted by the arrival of new cargoes of merchandise. Amongst the bales of goods exposed for sale^a he noticed three boys, distinguished for their fair complexion, the sweet expression of their faces, and their light flaxen hair.^b Struck with pity, he inquired from what part of the world they had come, and was answered, "From Britain, where all the inhabitants have the same fair complexion." He next proceeded to inquire whether the people of this strange country were Christians or pagans, and hearing that they were pagans, with a deep sigh,^c remarked that it was "sad to think that beings so full of light and brightness should be in the power of the Prince of Darkness."

He next asked the name of their nation. "Angles," was the reply; whereupon, playing with the word, he answered, "Rightly are they called Angles, for their faces are as the faces of angels, and they ought to be fellow-heirs with the angels of heaven." "And from what country," he proceeded, "do they come?" "From Deira," was the reply, that is, from the country between the Tyne and the Humber, including Durham and Yorkshire. "Rightly," he answered, "are they named Deirans. From the ire of God are they plucked, and to the mercy of God are they called." "And who," he inquired once more, "is the king of this province?" "Ella,"^d was the answer. The word reminded him of the Hebrew expression of praise, and he answered "Allelujah! the praise of God shall be chanted in that clime." Years passed away after this memorable interview, but the sight of those fair-haired boys was never forgotten by Gregory. He himself immediately afterwards went from the market-place to the Pope, and requested permission to go and win over the English people to the Christian faith. He set out from the city with all secrecy, and had advanced three days' journey toward the Alps when he was overtaken by messengers. The Abbot of the monastery of St. Andrew was so generally beloved that the populace had burst in upon the Pope in the Church of St. Peter and clamoured for his recall.*

3. Mission of St. Augustine. Gregory was obliged, therefore, to return. But in the year A.D. 590 he himself succeeded to the Pontifical Chair, and five years afterwards an opportunity occurred of carrying out the desire of his heart. Twenty-two years before, or A.D. 568, Ethelbert became King of Kent, and soon took up a high position among the English princes. Two years afterwards he married a Christian princess, Bertha, a daughter of Charibert, King of Paris. It had been agreed, as a condition of the marriage, that the queen should be allowed to enjoy the free exercise of her religion,^f and she had been attended to the Kentish court by a French bishop named Liudhard.

It is a proof of Ethelbert's tolerant spirit that he allowed the bishop to celebrate the worship of the God of the Christians in the little church of St. Martin, a relic of Roman-British times outside the walls of Canterbury, and it is only probable that Bertha, who must have heard what a Clotilda had been able to effect with a Remigius by her side, should have endeavoured, during a union of twenty years, to influence her husband in favour of the Christian creed. When such was the feeling of their queen, it is not surprising that many of the people of Kent would be anxious to receive instruction in the faith she professed. That they made application to the Frankish bishops for missionaries is a fact we learn from one of Gregory's letters,^g and it was probably intelligence of this which induced him to write to the presbyter Candidus, administrator of the patrimony of St. Peter in Gaul, directing him to bring up English youths of seventeen or twenty years of age, that they might be trained in different monasteries, and become missionaries in their native land.^h At length, in the sixth year of his pontificate, he resolved to send forth a band of forty monks from his own monastery on the Caelian Hill, headed by their prior Augustine, to commence a direct mission in England.

4. The Journey to England. Literally nothing appears to be known of the future Archbishop of Canterbury previous to his selection to head the mission. But we can hardly doubt that he must have evinced special gifts which recommended him to Gregory. Whatever zeal, however, he may have possessed himself, did not animate the breasts of his companions. In the summer of A.D. 596 they set out, traversed rapidly the north of Italy, and, crossing the Gallic Alps, reached the neighbourhood of Aix, in Provence. But here their courage began rapidly to fail. The accounts they received of the savage character of the Saxons filled them with alarm, and they prevailed on Augustine to return to Rome and obtain for them from Gregory a release from their arduous task.

But Augustine had to deal with one who had learnt to crush all human weakness, and to recognise no call but that of duty. He was forthwith sent back with a letter to his timid brethren, wherein they were urged to accomplish what, by God's help, they had undertaken, to suffer nothing to deter them, and to remember that the more arduous the labour the greater would be their eternal reward. Thus urged by an authority they could not resist, and furnished with letters to the Bishops of Tours, Marseilles, Vienne, and Autun, as also to the Metropolitan of Arles, after the lapse of a year the missionaries slowly bent their steps from Aix to Arles, from Arles to Vienne, thence to Tours, and so through Anjou to the sea-coast. There having provided themselves with interpreters, they set sail, and landed at Ebbe's Fleet,ⁱ in the Isle of Thanet.

5. The Interview with King Ethelbert. Once safely landed, they sent the interpreters to announce to Ethelbert that they had come from the great capital of the West, that they were the bearers of joyful tidings, and could promise him glory in heaven, and a never-ending kingdom in the presence of the living and true God. Ethelbert received the messengers in a friendly spirit, but begged that for the present they would remain on the other side of the Stour, and would abstain from entering Canterbury. He further stipulated that his first interview with the missionaries should not take place under a roof, but in the open air, from a fear of the charms and spells he fancied they might exercise over him.^k

Accordingly the Saxon king crossed the Stour and repaired to the Isle of Thanet, and there, either in the open space^l near Ebbe's Fleet, or, according to another account, under an ancient oak in the middle of the island, awaited the coming of Augustine. To make a deeper impression on the monarch's mind, Augustinus came up from the shore in solemn procession, preceded by a verger carrying a large silver cross, and followed by one bearing aloft on a board, painted and gilded, a representation of the Saviour. Then came the rest of the brethren and the choir, headed by Honorius and the deacon Peter, chanting a solemn litany for their own as also for the eternal welfare of the people amongst whom they had come. Arrived in the king's presence, ⁱ Four spots claim the honour of the landing—(1) Ebbe's Fleet, the usual landing-place in the Isle of Thanet; (2) a place called the Boarded Groin, which, however, must then have been covered by the sea; (3) Stonar, near Sandwich; (4) Richborough, which, however, was not in the Isle of Thanet. See Stanley's Memorials of Canterbury, p. 55.

Ethelbert bade them seat themselves upon the ground. He himself could not understand Latin, and Augustine could not speak Anglo-Saxon. So the priests whom Augustine had brought from France did their best to interpret, while Augustine explained the meaning of the picture which was borne aloft, and told the king how the Merciful One there represented had left His throne in heaven, died for the sins of a guilty world, and opened the kingdom of heaven to all believers.^m Ethelbert listened attentively, and then, in a manner at once politic and courteous, replied that the promises of the strangers were fair, but the tidings they announced were new and full of meaning he did not understand. He could not give his assent to them and leave the customs of his people, but he promised the strangers kindness and hospitality, together with liberty, to celebrate their services, and undertook that none of his subjects, who might be so disposed, should be prohibited from espousing their religion. Thus successful beyond their expectations, Augustine and his companions again formed a procession, and crossing the ferry to Richborough, advanced to the rude city of Canterbury, then embosomed in thickets,ⁿ chanting as they went along one of the solemn Litanies which they had learnt from Gregory, and took up their abode in the Stable-gate,^o near the present Church of St. Alphege, till the king should finally make up his mind.

6. The Baptism of Ethelbert. Thus admitted into the city, the missionaries devoted themselves to prayer and fasting, and commended the Word they preached by their own self-devotion and pure and chaste living. This made a still more favourable impression, and they were before long allowed to worship with the queen in the Church of St. Martin, and were thus encouraged to carry on their labours more openly and with renewed zeal. At last Ethelbert avowed himself ready to accept Christianity, and was baptized on the Feast of Whitsunday, June 2, A.D. 597, in all probability at St. Martin's Church.^p

The conversion of their chief was, as is illustrated again and again in the history of Mediaeval Missions, the signal for the baptism of the tribe. At the next assembly, therefore, of the witan,^q the matter was formally referred to the authorities of the kingdom, and they decided to follow the example of Ethelbert. Accordingly on the 25th of the December following, upwards of ten thousand^r received baptism in the waters of the Swale, at the mouth of the Medway, and thus sealed their acceptance of the new faith.

Thus successful in the immediate object of the mission, Augustine repaired to France, and was consecrated the first Archbishop of Canterbury by Virgilius, the Metropolitan of Arles. On his return he took up his abode in the wooden palace of Ethelbert, who retired to Reculver, and this, with an old British or Roman church hard by, became the nucleus of Augustine's cathedral. Another proof of the king's kindness was soon displayed. To the west of Canterbury, and midway between it and the church of St. Martin, was a building, once a British church, but now used as a Saxon temple. This Ethelbert, instead of destroying,^s made over to the archbishop, who dedicated it to St. Pancras, in memory, probably, of the young Roman martyr, on the tombs of whose family the monastery on the Caelian Mount at Rome had been built. Round this building now rose another monastery, at the head of which Augustine placed one of his companions, Peter, as its first Abbot.

Before, however, these arrangements were completed, he sent Peter and Laurence to inform Gregory of the success of the mission. They were to recount to him how the country of the fair-haired slaves he had once pitied in the Roman forum had received the faith, how Augustine himself had been advanced to archiepiscopal dignity, and they were to beg for answers to certain questions respecting the conduct of the mission, which caused him no little anxiety.^t

The messengers went their way, and executed their commission. Gregory was overjoyed at the receipt of the intelligence,^u and after an interval sent over a reinforcement of fresh labourers for the mission, amongst whom were Mellitus, Paulinus, and Justus. They brought ecclesiastical vestments, sacred vessels, some relics of apostles and martyrs, a present of books,^v and the pall of a metropolitan for Augustine himself, who was thus made independent of the bishops of France. In a lengthened epistle Gregory sketched out the course which the archbishop was to take in developing his work. London was to be his metropolitan see, and he was to consecrate twelve bishops as suffragans. Moreover, whenever Christianity had extended to York, he was to place there also a metropolitan with a like number of bishops under him.^w As to the differences between the Roman and Gallican liturgies (such as Bertha probably followed in her Church of St. Martin), Augustine was directed to select from either whatever appeared to him pious, religious, and right, to collect it into a volume, and establish it as the liturgy of the Anglo-Saxon Church, ever remembering, as a guiding principle, that "things are not to be loved on account of places, but places on account of good things."^x As to the line of conduct he was to assume towards the Gallic bishops, he was told that it was no part of his duty to interfere with them, or to rebuke and judge; but "as a man passing through his neighbour's corn-field, though he might not put in the sickle, yet might pluck and eat a few ears," so, if occasion required, Augustine might venture to use towards them the language of gentle admonition. As to the British bishops, they were all entrusted to his care, "that the unlearned might be instructed, the weakened strengthened by persuasion, the perverse corrected with authority."^a

7. Conference between Augustine and the British Bishops.—The course he was to pursue being thus defined, Augustine invited the British clergy to a conference, which was arranged to take place at a spot on the confines of Wessex, near the banks of the Severn, under an oak, long after known as Augustine's oak.^b Prepared to make considerable concessions, he yet felt that three points did not admit of being sacrificed. He proposed that the British Church should (1) conform to the Roman usage in the celebration of Easter;^c and (2) the rite of baptism; and (3) that they should aid him in evangelising the heathen Saxons.^d The discussion was long and fruitless. At last the archbishop proposed that an appeal should be made to the Divine judgment. A blind Saxon was introduced, whom the British clergy were unable to cure. Augustine supplicated aid from above, and the man, we are told, forthwith recovered his sight.

Convinced but unwilling to alter their old customs, the vanquished party proposed another meeting. Seven British bishops met on this occasion, together with Dinoh, abbot of the great monastery of Bangor, in Flintshire. Before the synod assembled, they proposed to ask the advice of an aged hermit whether they ought to change the traditions of their fathers. "Yes," replied the old man, "if the new-comer be a man of God." "But how," they asked, "are we to know whether he be a man of God?" "The Lord hath said," was the reply, "take my yoke upon you and learn of me, for I am meek and lowly. Now if this Augustine is meek and lowly, be assured that he beareth the yoke of Christ." "Nay, but how are we to know this?" they asked again. "If he rises to meet you when ye approach," answered the hermit, "hear and follow him; but if he despise you, and fails to rise up from his place, let him also be despised by you."

The synod met, and Augustine remained seated, nor did he rise at their approach. It was enough. It was deemed clear that he had not the Spirit of Christ, and no efforts of the archbishop could induce the British clergy to yield one of his demands. "If he will not so much as rise up to greet us," said they, "how much more will he contemn us if we submit ourselves to him?" Thereupon Augustine broke up the conference with an angry threat that, if the British clergy would not accept peace with their brethren, they must look for war with their foes, and if they would not proclaim the way of life to the Saxons, they would suffer deadly vengeance at their hands.^e

Thus unsuccessful in his efforts Augustine returned to Canterbury, and there relaxed none of his efforts to evangelise the Saxon tribes. As all Kent had espoused the Faith, it was deemed advisable to erect a second bishopric at Rochester. Over it Augustine placed his companion Justus, and Ethelbert caused a cathedral to be built, which was named after St. Andrew, in memory of the monastery dedicated to that Apostle on the Caelian Hill at Rome, whence the missionaries had started.^f At the same time, through the connection of the same monarch with the king of Essex, who was his nephew, Christianity found its way into the adjacent kingdom, and the archbishop was enabled to place Mellitus in the see of London, where Ethelbert built a church, which was dedicated to St. Paul.

8. Death of Augustine. This was the limit of Augustine's success. It fell, indeed, far short of Gregory's grand design; but this had been formed on a very imperfect acquaintance with the condition of the island, the strong national prejudices of the British Christians, and the relations which subsisted between the different Anglo-Saxon kingdoms. On the 12th of March, 604, Gregory died, and two months afterwards, according to some authorities, or a year after, according to others,^g Augustine followed his patron and benefactor, and was buried in the cemetery which he himself had consecrated, by the side of the Roman road, that then ran over St. Martin's Hill from Richborough to Canterbury.^h

Several points, which have respect to the missionary labours of Augustine, will be found discussed under the head of MISSIONS. AUNARIUS or AUNACHARIUS, S., bishop of Auxerre, early in the 7th century. Commemorated on September 25. He was of high birth, and was educated at the court of king Guntram, but while still a youth wishing to assume the clerical habit, he was admitted to ordination after instruction by S. Syagrius, bishop of Autun, and in time was raised to the bishopric of Auxerre. He governed the Church with great wisdom, and is to be noticed for the following disciplinary acts:—1. He caused solemn litanies to be said daily in the chief towns of his diocese by rotation, and on the first day in every month in the twelve largest churches and monasteries. 2. For the more solemn performance of the daily offices in his cathedral church, he enforced the attendance of secular and regular clergy in order. 3. In 581 he summoned a diocesan synod of seven abbots, thirty-four priests, and five deacons, for the restoration of discipline among the clergy, and the suppression of pagan superstitions among the people. For its Acts, see Labbé, Concilia, vol. v. col. 967, 980. He also caused the lives

AURELIAN, A.D. 270-275. The few facts which connect the name of this emperor with the history of the Christian Church are as follows:—(1) He is said (Vopiscus, c. 20) to have reproached the Roman Senate for not consulting the Sibylline books, as their fathers would have done, at a time of danger and perplexity. "It would seem," he said, "as if you were holding your meetings in a Church of the Christians instead of in the Temple of all the Gods." The words imply, it is clear, a half-formed suspicion that the decline of the old faith was caused by the progress of the new, and shew that the buildings used for the worship of Christians were becoming more and more conspicuous. The decree of Gallienus recognising Christianity as a religio licita had apparently stimulated their activity in this direction. (2) Startled by the rapid progress which the rival creed was making, Aurelian is said to have resolved towards the close of his reign on taking active measures for its repression. The edict of Gallienus was to be rescinded. A thrill of fear pervaded the Christian population of the empire. The emperor was surrounded by counsellors who urged on him a policy of persecution. His death, however, hindered the execution of his plans, and the conflict was for a time deferred. (3) In the interval we find him connected, singularly enough, with the action of the Church in a case of heresy. Paul of Samosata had been chosen as bishop of Antioch in A.D. 260. A synod of bishops including Firmilianus of the Cappadocian Caesarea, Gregory Thaumaturgus, and others, had condemned his teaching; but on receiving promises of amendment had left him in possession of the see. Another (A.D. 270) deposed him and Domnus was appointed in his place. Paul, however, relying perhaps on the support of Zenobia, queen of Palmyra, refused to submit to their decision and kept possession of the episcopal residence. Such was the position of affairs at Antioch when Aurelian, having conquered Zenobia, became master of the city. The orthodox bishops appealed to the emperor to settle the question at issue, so far as it affected the rights of property, and he gave judgment that the house should belong to those to whom the bishops in Italy and in Rome had addressed their epistles. So far as the Christian society was recognised at all, it was better that it should be as a society having a centralized organization, the heads of which were under the immediate control of the imperial government. (Euseb. H. E. viii. 27-30.) [E. H. P.]

AURELIAN, praefect of the east and consul, succeeded Proculus as praefect of Constantinople in 392. His name appears in the title of several of Theodosius' laws (Cod. Theod. Chronol. tom. i. p. 127, tom. vi. p. 352). On the fall of Eutropius in 399, he was charged with the duty of conducting the eunuch to his place of banishment in Cyprus; and when he was recalled to Constantinople, Aurelian presided at the commission at Chalcedon, by which he was condemned and executed (Cod. Theod. tom. xi. p. 312; Philostorg. xi. 6). In 400 he became consul. During his consulship he owed his life to the mediation of Chrysostom. Gainas had marched his troops to the neighbourhood of Constantinople, and refused to lay down his arms unless the heads of Aurelian and Saturninus were given him. The feeble Arcadius dared not refuse, and the two highest functionaries of the state were sent out to the camp of Gainas at Chalcedon. Chrysostom, "as the common father of his flock," on hearing of their impending fate, set out at once for the barbarian's headquarters, and gave him no rest, until he had obtained a promise to spare their lives. Gainas, however, did not set his prisoners free till he had made them suffer all the horrors of death. The sword was actually drawn and raised as if in act to strike. They were then banished to the Goths, whence they returned on the fall of Gainas (Soc. vi. 6; Soz. viii. 4; Zosim. v. p. 759; Chrysost. Homil. iii. pp. 405 sq.; ed. Montf.). He is probably the same to whom Synesius addressed several letters (Ep. xxxi. xxxiv. xxxviii.), from the first of which, written in 416, it would appear that he held a second prefecture under Theodosius II. with the title of Patrician. We learn from an epigram (Anthol. lib. iv. c. 4, § 17, H. Stephens 1566) that a gilt statue was erected to him by the senate of Constantinople for having delivered the city from serious apprehension. He built a church at Constantinople dedicated to St. Stephen, in which St. Isaac was buried (Ducange, Urb. Constant. descriptio, vol. iv. p. 138). [E. V.]

AURELIUS, MARCUS, Emperor, A.D. 161-180. The policy adopted by Marcus Aurelius towards the Christian Church cannot be separated from the education which led him to embrace Stoicism, and the long training which he had, after he had attracted the notice of Hadrian and been adopted by Antoninus Pius, in the art of ruling. In the former he had learnt, as he records with thankfulness, from his master, Diognetus (Medit. i. 6), the temper of incredulity as to alleged marvels, like those of seers and diviners. Under HADRIAN and ANTONINUS PIUS he had acquiesced, at least, in a policy of toleration, checking false accusations, requiring from the accusers proofs of some other crime than the mere profession of Christianity. It might have been expected that he would have adhered to the same line of action. Philosophical scepticism, natural humanity, strict conscientiousness might all seem to give guarantees for the maintenance of a system under which Christians would have been comparatively free in the profession of their faith. It is startling at first to find that he takes his place in the list of persecutors along with Nero and Domitian and Decius. The annals of martyrdom place in his reign the death of Justin Martyr at Rome (A.D. 166), that of Polycarp at Smyrna (A.D. 167), that of Blandina and Potheinos, and the other sufferers at Lyons (A.D. 177). The latter year seems indeed to have witnessed an outburst of popular fury against the new sect, and this could not have been allowed to rage without the emperor's sanction, even if there were no special edicts like those of which Melito speaks (Euseb. H. E. iv. 26) directly authorizing new measures of repression. It was accordingly an era of Apologies; Justin had led the way under Antoninus Pius, and the second treatise that bears his name was probably written just before his own martyrdom under Aurelius. To the years 177 and 178 are assigned those which were written by Melito, Tatian, Athenagoras, Apollinaris, and Theophilus, perhaps also that of Miltiades. The causes of this increased rigour are not difficult to trace. (1) The upward progress of Christianity brought its teachers into rivalry with the Stoic philosophers, who up to this time, partly for good and partly for evil, had occupied the position of spiritual directors in the families in which there was any effort to rise out of the general debasement. They now found themselves brought into contact with men of a purer morality and a nobler fortitude than their own, and with a strange mysterious power which enabled them to succeed where others failed. The opposition of the Cynic Crescens to Justin (Apol. ii. 3) may fairly be looked on as a representative instance of what was going on throughout the empire. Just in proportion, therefore, as the emperor was true to his Stoicism, surrounded by Stoic teachers, was he likely to be embittered against their rivals. (2) A trace of this bitterness is found in his own Meditations (xi. 3). Just as Epictetus (Arrian, Epict. iv. 7) had spoken of the "counterfeit apathy" which was the offspring not of true wisdom, but "of madness or habit like that of the Galilaeans," so the emperor contrasts the calm considerate preference of death to life, which he admired, with the "mere obstinacy (παράταξις) of the Christians. "The wise man," he says, "should meet death σεμνῶς καὶ ἀτραγῆδως." The last word has, there seems reason to believe, a special significance. Justin, towards the close of his second Apology, presented to this emperor, had expressed a wish that some one would stand up, as on some lofty rostrum, and "cry out with a tragic voice, Shame, shame on you who ascribe to innocent men the things which ye do openly yourselves. . . . Repent ye, be converted to the ways of purity and wisdom (Μετάνεσθε, σωφροσύνητε)." If we believe that his acts were in harmony with his words, or that what he wrote had come under the emperor's eye, it is natural to see in the words in which the latter speaks so scornfully of the "tragic airs" of the Christians, a reference to what had burst so rudely upon his serene tranquillity. (3) The period was one of ever-increasing calamities. The earthquakes which had alarmed Asia under Antoninus were but the prelude to more serious convulsions. The Tiber rose to an unprecedented height and swept away the public granaries. This was followed by a famine, and the famine by a pestilence, which spread like the famous plague of Athens, from Egypt and Ethiopia westward. Everywhere on the frontiers there were murmurs of insurrection or invasion. The year 166 was long known as the "annus calamitosus," and it was in that year that the persecution broke out and that Justin suffered. These calamities had at once a direct and a reflex action. They roused the superstition of the great mass of the people, and a wild fanaticism succeeded to an epicurean atheism. The gods were wroth, and what had roused their anger but the presence of those who denied them? "Christianos ad leones" seemed the remedy for every disaster. The gods might accept that as a piacular offering. And, on the other hand, the Christians saw in them signs of the coming judgment, and of the end of the world; and now in apocalyptic utterances, now in Sibylline books, uttered, half-exultantly, their predictions of the impending woe (Comp. Tertull. ad Scap. c. 3). All this, of course, increased the irritation against them to the white heat of frenzy (Milman's History of Christianity, B. ii. ch. 7). They not only provoked the gods, and refused to join in sacrifices to appease them, but they triumphed in the miseries of their fellow-citizens.

Two apparent exceptions to this policy of repression have to be noticed. (1) One edition of the edict πρὸς τὸ κοινὸν τῆς Ἀσίας, though ascribed by Eusebius (H. E. iv. 13) to Antoninus Pius, purports, as given by him, to come from Aurelius. As the edict is unquestionably spurious (this variation being one indication of the spuriousness) it does not enter into the history of the period except as showing the wish of some Christians, at a later stage in the conflict, to claim the authority of the philosopher in favour of his brethren. (2) There is the decree mentioned by Eusebius (H. E. v. 5) on the authority of Tertullian (Apol. c. 5, ad Scap. c. 4, p. 208) and appended to Justin's first Apology, which purports to be addressed to the Senate, informing them how, when he and his army were in danger of perishing for want of water in the country of the Marcomanni, the Christians in his army had prayed to their God, and refreshing rain had fallen for them, and a destroying hail on their enemies, and bidding them therefore to refrain from all accusations against Christians as such, and ordering all who so accused them to be burnt alive. The decree is manifestly spurious. The history of the facts connected with it will be found under LEGIO FULMINATRIX.

An interesting monograph, entitled M. Aurelius Antoninus als Freund und Zeitgenosse des Rabbin Jehudas ben Nasi, by Dr. A. Bodek (Leipzig, 1868), may be noticed as maintaining that this emperor is identical with the Antoninus ben Ashauerus, who is mentioned frequently in the Talmud, and whom the writer shows to have been on terms of intimacy with one of the leading Jewish teachers of the time. If this hypothesis be accepted, it suggests another possible element in his scorn of Christianity. [E. H. P.]

AURELIUS, Martyrs. (1) A reader, and confessor, at Carthage under St. Cyprian, who it appears could not write (Cypr. Epist. xxxviii. Fell), and who is said to have been martyred, but possibly he is confounded with (2) an Asiatic bishop who wrote against the Cataphryges (Euseb. H. E. v. 19), placed by Baeda (Nov. 12) in Africa: see Baron. Nov. 12. [A. W. H.]

AUSONIUS, DECIMUS^a MAGNUS, was the son of Julius Ausonius, a physician of Cosium (Basas), in Aquitania (Aus. Idyll. ii. 2), a man eminent for his professional skill no less than for his private worth (Parent. i.). His mother, Aemilia Aonia, was descended from the ancient nobility of the Aedui (Parent. ii.). The young Ausonius, who was born at Burdigala (Bordeaux) early in the 4th century, was destined ere long to fulfil the twofold destiny thus foreshadowed in his parentage. His poems, which are singularly communicative as to his private history, display him to us in riper years both as student and courtier, professor and praefect, poet and consul. Owing probably to the high promise of a horoscope drawn for him by Caec. Agriculus Arborius, his maternal grandfather (Parent. 4, 17), special care seems to have been taken of his education by his female relatives (Parent. ii., v., vi., xxv.), one of whom, his aunt Dryadia, had taken a vow of chastity. From the professors of his native town he derived the first rudiments of Greek and Latin, and his education was completed by his uncle Arborius, who taught rhetoric at Toulouse (Parent. iii. 12; Clar. Urb. xii.). Upon his return to Bordeaux he practised for a time at the bar, but abandoned this calling for the more congenial one of a schoolmaster. At the age of 30 he was promoted to the chair of rhetoric in his native city, and not long after was invited to court by the then Christian Emperor Valentinian I., who appointed him tutor to his son Gratian (Praef. ad Syagr. 15-26). About this time he married Attusia Lucana Sabina, from whom he was separated by death after a brief union, and for whose sake he continued a widower during the remainder of a long life (Parent. viii. 18). Some of his most touching verses are addressed to this lady. Ausonius was held in high regard by the emperor and his son, and accompanied the former in his expeditions against the Alemanni. It was no doubt during the residence of the court at Trèves at this time that he composed his Mosella. Many of his lighter pieces also seem to belong to this period, those especially which reflect the loose morality of the camp. From Valentinian he obtained the title of Comes and the office of Quaestor, and on the accession of Gratian became successively Praefect of Latium, Libya, and Gaul, and finally, A.D. 379, was raised to the consulship (Praef. ad Syagr. 35, &c.; Epigr. ii., iii., de fast.). The letter of Gratian conferring this dignity, and the poet's grateful reply, are both extant. After the death of Gratian, A.D. 383, although he seems to have enjoyed the favour of Theodosius (Praef. ad Theodos.), it is probable that he returned to the neighbourhood of his native city and spent the remainder of his life in studious retirement (Ep. xxiv.). His correspondence with Paulinus evidently belongs to these later years. The date of his death is unknown, but he was certainly alive in A.D. 388, as he rejoices in the victory of Theodosius over the murderer of Gratian at Aquileia (Clar. Urb. vii.).

^a The nomen and prænomen of the poet are not found in the earlier authorities. One MS. has Decius, a manifest error. In others the name Paconius is added, probably from a confusion between the poet and his father, who, as a physician, might have been so styled.

The question of the poet's religion has always been a matter of dispute. Voss, Cave, Heindrich, Muratori, &c., maintaining that he was a pagan, while Jos. Scaliger, Fabricius, Funccius, and later M. Ampère, uphold the contrary view. Without assenting to the extreme opinion of Trithemius, who even makes him out to have held the see of Bordeaux, we may safely pronounce in favour of his Christianity. The negative view rests purely upon assumptions, such as that a Christian would not have been guilty of the grossness with which some of his poems are stained, nor have been in such intimate terms with prominent heathens (Symmach. Epp. ad Auson. passim), nor have alluded so constantly to pagan rites and mythology without some expression of disbelief. On the other hand he was not only appointed tutor to the Christian son of a Christian emperor, whom he seems at any rate to have instructed in the Christian doctrine of prayer (Grat. Act. 43); but certain of his poems testify distinctly to his Christianity in language that is only to be set aside by assuming the poems themselves to be spurious. Such are (1.) the first of his idylls, entitled Versus Paschales, and commencing Sancta salu-tiferi redeunt solennia Christi, the genuineness of which is proved by a short prose address to the reader connecting it with the next idyll, the Epicedion, inscribed to his father. (2.) The Ephemeris, an account of the author's mode of spending his day, which contains not merely an allusion to the chapel in which his morning devotions were performed (l. 7), but a distinct confession of faith, in the form of a prayer to the first two Persons of the Trinity. (3.) The letters of the poet to his friend and former pupil St. Paulinus of Nola, when the latter had forsaken the service of the pagan Muses for the life of a Christian recluse. This correspondence so far from being evidence that he was a heathen (see Cave, &c.), displays him to us rather as a Christian by conviction, still clinging to the pagan associations of his youth, and incapable of understanding a truth which had revealed itself to his friend, that Christianity was not merely a creed but a life. The letters are a beautiful instance of wounded but not embittered affection on the one side, and of an attachment almost filial tempered by firm religious principle on the other. Paulinus nowhere chides Ausonius for his paganism; on the contrary, he assumes his Christianity (Paulin. Ep. ii. 18, 19), and this is still further confirmed by a casual passage in one of the poet's letters to Paulinus, in which he speaks of the necessity of returning to Bordeaux in order to keep Easter (Ep. viii. 9). To say that Ausonius was a Christian in the same sense as Paulinus would be going too far, but he was one of those spirits that hovered on the border-land which still separated the new from the old religion; not ashamed, it is true, to pen obscenities beneath the eye and at the challenge of his patron, yet in the quiet of his oratory feeling after the God of the Christians; convinced apparently of the dogma of the Trinity, yet so little penetrated by its awful mystery as to give it a haphazard place in a string of frivolous triplets composed at the dinner-table (Gryph. Tern. 87): keenly alive to natural beauty, and susceptible of the tenderest affection, he yet fell short of appreciating in his disciple the more perfect beauty of holiness, and the entire abnegation of self for the love of a divine master. And yet the spirit which breathes in the poet's letters to Paulinus is a marked advance upon the careless tone of his more youthful productions; and it is possible that his collected works, as they have come down to us, include much that their author would have disowned at the close of his long life.

Epigrammaton Liber, a collection of 150 epigrams on all manner of subjects, political, moral, satirical, amatory, many of which for terseness and power of sarcasm are only surpassed by those of Martial. Ephemeris (see above.) Parentalia, a series of tributes to the memory of those of his family and kindred who had died before him, many of which are full of pathos, and prove that the poet's natural warmth of heart was not affected by the coldness and corruptness of his age. Professores Burdigalenses, a similar series, in commemoration of those who held the different chairs of public instruction at Bordeaux during his lifetime. Epitaphia Heroum, from the Greek; Tetrasticha de Caesaribus; Ordo Nobilium Urbium; Ludus Septem Sapientum; Eclogarium, consisting of short poems on the calendar; Gratiarum Actio pro consulatu, in prose; Tres Praefatiunculae; Periochae, or short headings for the several books of the Iliad and Odyssey; most of which last are but ingenious trifles, and represent perhaps the mere sweepings of the poet's study, collected and published after his death. Of a different nature, with some exceptions, are his Idyllia, a collection of 20 poems, comprising amongst others the Horatian "Vilula," the "Rosae" of doubtful authenticity, the "Cupido cruci affixus," a graceful piece of badinage suggested by a picture in the imperial triclinium at Trèves, and above all the "Mossella," a poem in praise of his favourite river, which he describes with all the warmth of home affection, and the minuteness of a pre-Raphaelite painter. The Epistolae are on the whole the most interesting, because the most heartfelt, of the works of Ausonius; they are 25 in number, and addressed to various friends: that to his father on the birth of a grandson is very elegant and tender; but the epistles to St. Paulinus of Nola, before alluded to, prove more than any of his works that the poet was capable of earnestness when his heart was stirred, and that had he lived in nobler times he might have turned his more than common ingenuity to better account.

The Editio Princeps of Ausonius was published at Venice in a folio vol., 1472, without a printer's name, along with the works of Proba, Calpurnius, and others. It is very scarce. The poems were first edited separately at Milan, fol., 1490, by J. A. Ferrari; this edition, however, is incomplete. The first complete edition is that of Taddeo and Angelo Ugoletto, Parma, 4to., 1499. The edition of Elias Vinetus appeared at Bordeaux in 4to., 1575, along with Jos. Scaliger's Lectiones Ausoniae. The best edition is the Variorum of Tollius, 8vo., Amstel., 1671. The works of Ausonius are published in Migne's Patrologia, vol. xix., from a collation of several editions, of which the principal are Gryph., Lugdun. 8vo., 1540, and that in the Collectio Pisaurensis, 4to., 1766.

AUTHADEIA (Iren. 108) [OPHITES]. [II.]

AUTOGENES (Iren. 108) [OPHITES]. [II.]

AUTPERTUS (Iren. 165, [auct. Val.] 169) [VALENTINUS]. [H.]

AUTPERTUS (AMBROSIUS), a distinguished monk and abbot of the Benedictine Order, born in France, probably early in the 8th century; died at his monastery in Southern Italy, A.D. 778 or 779.

i. Name.—Though simply termed Autpert in a chronicle to be cited below, his full designation in its Latinized form is Ambrosius Autpertus. The latter name is variously spelt. Autpertus, Authpertus, Anspertus, Ansbertus. We have no conjecture to offer respecting the meaning of this name; but it appears to have been not uncommon in after times, as we find at least two Autperths of some eminence in the 9th century. The popularity of the name Ambrosius (Ἀμβρόσιος), of course dates from the time of the great Bishop of Milan.

ii. Authorities.—1. The notice by himself, appended to his book on the Apocalypse (Bibliotheca Patrum maxima, tom. xiii. sub fine. Lugduni, 1677). 2. A brief mention by Paulus Diaconus, De gestis Longobardorum, lib. vi. cap. 40 (Bib. Pat. max. tom. xiii. p. 161.). 3. Chronicon Monasterii Sancti Vincentii prope Vulturum flumen, in provincia Capuana: from which excerpta are given by Duchesne in his Historie Francorum Scriptores, tom. iii. p. 672 (Parisii, 1641). This Chronicle, though apparently written in the sincerest good faith, requires to be read with some caution, for its author has evidently the strongest esprit de corps, and does not display much critical power. 4. Tritheim has collected what he could with the zeal of a member of the same illustrious order, but without any great discrimination (Domini Johannis Trithemii Abbatis Sparheimensis de Scriptoribus Ecclesiasticis Liber Unus, Coloniae, 1546).

iii. Life.—Autpert was born in the south of France, most probably in Provence. He seems to have attained to some degree of secular distinction, as Charles the Great, in a sort of charter, given by Duchesne from the Chronicon (see above, No. 3), calls him his Orator. This has been magnified by the author of the Chronicon, who represents him as a favourite with Pepin, as tutor to Charles, and an active arch-chancellor of the imperial court. We agree with the learned Benedictines, Martene, Durand (Veterum Scriptorum collectio, Paris, 1733), in seeing no sufficient warrant for these assertions.

But Autpert, whatever his station, saw fit to retire from the world, at that time a very rough and tumultuous world. The river Vulturus (Volturno), (famous in the campaigns of Rome against Samnium and in the struggle with Hannibal, as again also in the contests of our own day), had witnessed the rise of a Benedictine monastery, said to have been founded by three brethren named Paldo, Tato, and Jason. Its fame had spread widely in the 8th century; but it was overthrown and destroyed towards the close of the succeeding age by the Saracens who invaded Italy from Africa, A.D. 872–882. In this monastery Autpert spent many years, during which he displayed in an exemplary manner the virtues appertaining to his station, and was evidently a diligent student of Holy Scripture and of the writings of the principal Latin Fathers. His chief work, the commentary on the Apocalypse, was composed, he tells us, during the Pontificate of Paul I. (A.D. 757–767); but it is dedicated to Paul's successor, Pope Stephen IV. (768–772), who had encouraged him in his studies and defended him against detractors. Autpert speaks of Desiderius (i.e. Didier) as king of the Lombards during the composition of his book, and of Arrigis as duke of the province which he inhabits; evidently the province of Benevento, of which Arrigis* was duke. Now Didier was the last king of the Lombards, and was dethroned by Charles the Great in 774 (see Gibbon, chap. 49), and Arrigis submitted to the same great conqueror in 786, and consented to hold his duchy as a fief. Consequently it must have been after the completion of this book that Autpert was elected abbot, and in that capacity obtained from Charles a confirmation (præceptum) of all the rights hitherto enjoyed by his monastery. The document is given by Duchesne; it is chiefly curious as a study of local geography. Autpert held the abbacy for about the last year and a quarter of his life. A later legend reports that having been afflicted with a stammering in his speech, he gained perfect freedom of enunciation through the favour of the blessed Virgin. His death, as has been said, took place in A.D. 778 or 779. Some have confounded him with a later Autpert, who was abbot of Monte Cassino under the Emperor Lothair.

Writings.—Tritheim remarked in 1546 that only few of Autpert's writings have come down to posterity. He had only been able to find the following:—In Cantica Canticoorum, lib. i. In Psalterium, lib. i. Donum Sapientiae. Epistolarum ad diversos, lib. i. De Cupiditate, lib. i. In Apocalypsin Joannis lib. decem.

There have also been ascribed to him—Liber de conflictu vitiorum et virtutum inter Ambrosii et Augustini opera repertus. Sermo in Assumptionem B. Mariæ xviijimus inter Sermones Augustinianos de Sanctis. Sermo de lectione S. Evangelii, qui ad calcem operum S. Ambrosii in edit. Paris. reperitur. Vita SS. Paldonis, Tatonis et Jasonis una cum historica Monasterii sui relatione a Mabilonio edita. Homiliae de S. Matthia de purificatione B. M. et aliae Homiliae. (These last are either lost or else preserved in the library at Monte Cassino.)

This second list is ab-judged away from our Autpert, and we should think justly, by Cave: who would assign all to the abbot of Monte Cassino except the lives of S. Paldo, &c., which he ascribes to a third and later Autpert. For remarks on Autpert's writings see the general notice of Gallican divines of the primitive and earlier middle age. [VINCENTIUS.] [J. G. C.]

AUXENTIUS, a bishop of MOPSUESTIA in A.D. 360, by whom the heretic Aetius was hospitably received on his banishment (Philost. H. E. v. 1, 2; Suidas, i. 491). He is said by Philostorgius to have been brother of Theodore of Tarsus, but the chronology is confused. Philostorgius (apud Suidam sub voc.) relates a very pleasing tale of his having been an officer and notary in the army of Licinius, and having at once thrown up his commission rather than obey the emperor's command to lay a bunch of grapes at the feet of a statue of Bacchus. On this ground Baronius places him in the Roman martyrology (Dec. 18), but his authority for doing this is questioned by Tillemont, Mémoires, vi. 786-7, who is inclined to believe that Auxentius was an Arian, as his patronage of Aetius would indicate. [E. V.]

AUXILIUS, bishop of CARTHAGE, at the beginning of the 5th century. Chrysostom wrote to him from Cucusus, A.D. 406, commending the zeal he had shown in promoting the peace of the church (Chrysost. Ep. cxlix.). He was present at the councils held at Carthage, A.D. 411, 412, 416, that of Cirta, A.D. 412, and Milevium, A.D. 416 (Labbe, Concil. ii. 1336, 1510, 1519, 1533, 1544). [E. V.]

AVIDA, the name of the antagonist in the Dialogue on Fate ascribed to Bardeisan (Cureton's Spicileg. Syr. 1-15). It is written 'ΑΒΕΙΔΑΣ in the common texts of Epiphanius, i. 477 A, but ΑΒΕΙΔΑΣ in the Venice MS. [BARDEISAN.] Hilgenfeld (Bardesanus d. letzte Gnostiker, 74 f.) supposes Avida to represent Avitus, one of the original names of Elagabalus, with whom there are other reasons for thinking that Bardeisan came in contact; and refers to Eusebius's statement (H. E. iv. 30) that the Dialogue was addressed to "Antoninus," Antoninus being one of the Roman names assumed by Elagabalus. But the grounds are insufficient. [H.]

AVITUS, ALCIMUS ECDICIUS,* son of Isicius or Hesychius, Archbishop of Vienne in Narbonian Gaul, was born about the middle of the 5th century. His father belonged to a family of senatorial rank. His mother, Audentia, was, in all probability, a sister of M. Maecilius Avitus, Emperor of the West, A.D. 456. The mother of Sidonius Apollinaris the poet, who, in a letter to Alcimus Avitus, speaks of their near relationship and the identity of their youthful pursuits, seems to have been another sister of the same illustrious family (Sidon. Apoll. Ep. iii. 1, 61). The life of a student presented greater attractions to the young Avitus than the possession of wealth and rank, and though in after years he addresses Roman senators as still one of their own order (Ep. xxxi.), we find that at an early age he bestowed his patrimony upon the poor, and retired into the seclusion of a monastery close to the walls of his native city. Here he devoted himself to study, and gained so high a reputation for piety and learning that in 490 A.D., upon the death of his father, he was elected to succeed him in the archbishopric. In 494 A.D. he gave fresh proof of his charitable disposition by completing the ransom of the Italian captives whom Epiphanius, Bishop of Pavia, came to seek at the Burgundian Court (Ennod. Vit. Epiphani. p. 234 B, ed. Migne). The fame of Avitus rests partly upon his poetry and partly upon the important part he was called to play in the controversies of his time. In 499 A.D. Vienne was captured by Gundobald, King of the Burgundians, who was at war with Clovis, King of the Franks; and in the same year Avitus, as Metropolitan of S. and E. Gaul, took the lead in a conference between the Catholic and Arian bishops held in presence of Gundobald at Sardiniacum near Lyons (Greg. Turon., ii. 34). The king was convinced by the earnest entreaties and powerful reasoning of Avitus, several of whose extant letters are addressed to him, but could never be induced to recant his errors publicly. After his death,

* Ecdicius seems to have been a family name, since it was borne by a son of the Emperor Avitus, who is celebrated in history for the defence of Clermont against the Visigoths, A.D. 473-4.

* Arrigo is a common form for Enrico in modern Italian; just as we have Farry for Henry.

Avitus and his brother Apollinaris,^b bishop of Valentia, incurred the displeasure and persecution of Sigismund, his son and successor, by their excommunication of Stephanus the royal treasurer; but Sigismund, we are told, having been cured of a fever by the hood of Apollinaris obtained for him by his wife's entreaties, renounced his errors, allowed himself to be instructed by Avitus in the true faith (Labbe, Bibl. MSS. vol. i. p. 693) and was finally persuaded, by way of expiation for the murder of his son Sigeric, to found a monastery at Agaunum (St. Maurice in the Valais) in honour of St. Maurice the Martyr and his Theban legion (Greg. Turon., l. ii. c. 5; Adon. Viennens., Chron. ad ann. 492).

At the instance of his royal patrons, Avitus published treatises in confutation of the Nestorian, Eutychean, and Sabellian heresies; he also wrote against the Pelagian errors of Faustus, abbot of Lerins, and obtained great success in the conversion of the Jews who had settled in his diocese (Venant. Fortun., l. v. c. 5).

From a letter of Pope Hormisdas to Avitus (Ep. x.), we gather that he was made vicar apostolic in Gaul by that pontiff; and in 517 A.D. he presided in this capacity at the Council of Epanne (Concilium Epaenense) for the restitution of ecclesiastical discipline in Narbonian Gaul. But his influence seems to have extended far beyond the limits of his own diocese, as is shown by his correspondence with several historical personages at Rome, e.g. Faustus, Symmachus, Vitalianus, &c. He appears also to have exerted himself to terminate the dispute between the Churches of Rome and Constantinople which arose out of the excommunication of Acacius [ACACIUS]; that this was accomplished before his death we gather from one of his own letters. (Ep. iii. vii.)

Avitus died Feb. 5, A.D. 523, was buried in the monastery of St. Peter and St. Paul at Vienne, where the greater part of his youth was spent, and in due time received the honours of canonization. An epitaph preserved by Baronius, and prefixed to his works in most editions, is a glowing testimony to the estimation in which his piety and genius were regarded by the age in which he lived.

The extant works of St. Avitus are as follows:—

(1) A poem in five books on subjects drawn from Genesis and Exodus: De Origine Mundi; De Peccato Originali; De Sententiâ Dei; De Diluvio; De Transitu Maris Rubri; this is dedicated to his brother Apollinaris, and consists of 2611 hexameter lines. The first three books might almost have suggested the idea of Milton's 'Paradise Lost,' to which they bear a curious and in many points interesting analogy.

Besides these five books Labbe mentions (Nor. Bibl. MSS. Coron. Poet.) the unpublished MSS. of six more that bear the name of Avitus, and continue the Jewish history as far as the Book of Judges. They are in a very corrupt state and Sirmond, who examined them (Opusc. tom. ii. ad jn. Op. Alc. Av.), doubts their authenticity.

(2) De Consolatoriâ Castitatis laude, a poem in 666 hexameters, addressed to his sister

Fuscina, a nun, in which he mentions the name of his mother Audentia.

(3) A collection of 91 letters, which is all that remains of the nine books of correspondence ascribed to him by Gregory of Tours. Several are of historical interest, especially that addressed to Clovis (Ep. xli.) upon his baptism.

(4) A homily, De Festo Rogationum, from which the religious observance of Rogation days took its origin. [MAMERTUS.]

A second homily representing the Rogation of the third day, which was discovered in the library of the Grande Chartreuse, and first published in 1717 by Dom. Marten. (Theaur. Anecd. p. 47.)

A homily preached on the occasion of the dedication of a church erected by Maximus, bishop of Geneva. It was reconstructed from certain papyrus leaves discovered in the Imperial library of Paris by M. Leopold Delisle and published in 1866. The title of this homily is connected with the previously discovered fragments of another (vi. and vii., ed. Sirmond) delivered at the inauguration of the monastery of S. Mauricius at Agaunum, Sept. 22, A.D. 522. At the same time were published two fragments of a homily, In dedicatione Basilicæ Genœæ quam hos(is) inc(enerat), the title of which was already known.

(5) Seventy-two short fragments of homilies, sermons, &c., together with the titles of five homilies that are still missing, edited by Père Sirmond (Opusc. tom. ii.).

(6) The Collatio Episcoporum contra Arianos coram Gundobaldo rege, first published in D'Achery's Spicilegium, 1655 ff. (tom. iii. p. 304, ed. Paris, 1725).

These remains contain much that is valuable with reference to the history, doctrine, and discipline of the Church in the 5th century.

The poems of Avitus were first printed at Strasbourg in 1507 from a MS. in the possession of Beroaldus; were published separately at Basle, 1546, with notes by Menrad Molther; and subsequently at Paris, 1643, by Jacob Sirmond, together with the letters, the miscellaneous fragments, and the first of the above-mentioned homilies. The whole of the extant works of Avitus are contained in Migne's Patrologia, vol. lix., except the discoveries of M. Delisle, for which the reader is referred to Études sur des Papyrus du VI^{me} Siècle, by MM. Delisle and Rilliet, Geneva, 1866, a valuable contribution to the biography of St. Avitus. [E. M. Y.]

AXIONICUS, one of the "Eastern" school of Valentinians, coupled with Bardeisan (Ἀρθησιδάνης) by Hippolytus (Haer. vi. 35). Early in the third century, when Tertullian wrote against the Valentinians (c. 4), Axionicus "alone at Antioch vindicated the memory of Valentinus by complete keeping of his rules." [H.]

AZADANES and AZADES, Martyrs, a deacon and a eunuch, martyred in Persia under Sapor II. c. A.D. 341 (Sozom. ii. 11; Menolog. April 14; Assemani, Act. Mart. i. 42 sq.; Martyrol. Rom. April 22). The latter was a favourite of the king, and was put to death instantly, upon his own mere profession of Christianity, to the king's great grief. [A. W. H.]

AZAZEL. In some verses by a Catholic writer quoted by Irenæus (80) the Gnostic Mar-

^b This was the name likewise of their cousin Sidonius, of his father, and son, to the latter of whom four of the letters of Alcimius Avitus are addressed.

cus is said to be enabled by "his father Satan" to practise magic arts through the agency of "the angelic power Azazel." In the book of Henoch one of the chief among the angels who fell by reason of the "daughters of men" bears this name (viii. 1; ix. 6; x. 4, 8; xiii. 1 f., &c.); and he is apparently referred to in other Jewish writings of various ages (Grabe and Harvey on Iren.; Eisenmenger, Entd. Jud. i. 823). The name is curiously coincident with the Azazel of Lev. xvi. 8, 10, 26 (אֲזַזִּיל, A. V. "scapegoat"), by many supposed to be a demon, and by Origen (c. Cels. vi. 43) identified with the devil. An evil spirit so called is also referred to by Arabic writers (Reland de Reliq. Mth. 137, Utrecht 1705, etc.): and "among the devils" recognised by the modern Samaritans "the greatest is Azazel" (Petermann in Herzog, R. E. xiii. 372.) Traces of possibly kindred divinities in other nations are collected by Movers (Phönizier, i. 367 ff.): cf. Chwolsohn (Die Ssabier, ii. 246 f.). [H.]

BAANNES (Βαάννην τὸν ῥυπαρόν) or BAANES, a Paulician, mentioned in the Greek form of abjuration (ap. Cotelier, Patres Apost. i. 545; Photius, contra Man.). His followers were called Baanῖται (Fabricius, Bibl. Gr. vii.). [E. B. C.]

BABAEUS, a leading member of the Nestorian church planted by Barsumas in Persia [BARSUMAS], who though originally a layman, and as such married, succeeded Acacius as archbishop or patriarch of Seleuceia, after a two-years' vacancy of the see, in the year 496. Babaeus thus became the head of the Persian church, in which capacity he summoned a synod by which the Nestorian body was completely organized. Among the canons passed by this synod was one granting permission to bishops or presbyters to marry once. (Assemani, Bibl. Orient. iii. pars. ii. 79, 381, 429; Neander, Ch. Hist. iv. 285, Engl. trans.). [E. V.]

BABEL (Βάβελ), in the book of "Baruch" of the Gnostic JUSTINUS, the name of the first of the twelve "maternal angels" born to Elohim and Edem (Hipp. Haer. v. 26, p. 151). She is identical with Aphrodite, and is enjoined by her mother to cause adulteries and desertions among men, in revenge for Edem's desertion by Elohim (p. 154). When Heracles is sent by Elohim as "a prophet of the uncircumcision" to overcome "the twelve evil angels of the creation," i. e. the maternal angels, Babel, now identical with Omphale, beguiles and enfeebles him (p. 156; x. 15, p. 323). She may possibly be the Baalti or female Baal of various Semitic nations, though the intrusive β is not easily explained. But it is on the whole better to take Babel, "confusion" (Joseph. Ant. i. 4, § 3, Ἐβραίου γὰρ τὴν σύγχυσις Βαβέλ καλοῦσιν), as a form of BARBELO, which probably has the same meaning. The eclecticism of Justinus would account for his deposition of Barbelo from the first to the second place, where she is still above Hachamoth. [H.]

BABYLAS (1) St. and martyr, bishop of Antioch from A.D. 237 or 238 until his martyrdom, A.D. 250 or 251, under Decius, either by death in prison for the faith (Euseb. H. E. vi. 39), or by direct violence (St. Chrys. de St. Bab. c. Gentes, tom. i.); other authorities—Epiphanius (de Mens. xviii.), Sozomen (v. 19), Theodoret (H. E. iii. 6)—simply calling him martyr, while St. Jerome (de Scriptt. Eccl. liv. lxii.) gives both accounts in different places. The Acta of Babylas (Actt. SS. Jan. 24) place his martyrdom under Numerian, by a confusion (according to Baronius' conjecture, ad ann. 253, § 126) with one Numerius, who was an active officer in the Decian persecution (Tillemont, M. E. iii. 729). The great act of his life was the compelling the emperor Philip, when at Antioch shortly after the murder of Gordian, to place himself in the ranks of the penitents, and undergo penance, before he was admitted to church privileges (κατέχευε λόγος, according to Eusebius, H. E. vi. 34, but asserted without qualification by St. Chrysostom, as above, while the V. St. Chrys. in Actt. SS. Sept. tom. iv. 439, transfers the story, against all probability, to Decius, and assigns it as the cause of St. Babylas' martyrdom). But his fame has arisen principally from the triumph of his relics after his death over another emperor, viz. Julian the Apostate, A.D. 362. The oracle of Apollo at Daphne, it seems, was rendered dumb by the near vicinity of St. Babylas's tomb and church, to which his body had been translated by Gallus, A.D. 351. And Julian in consequence, when at Antioch, ordered the Christians to remove his shrine (λάρνακα), or rather (according to Amm. Marcell. xxii.), to take away all the bodies buried in that locality. A crowded procession of Christians, accordingly, excited to a pitch of savage enthusiasm characteristic of the Antiochenes, bore his relics to a church in Antioch, the whole city turning out to meet them, and the bearers and their train tumultuously chanting psalms the whole way, especially those which denounce idolatry. On the same night, by a coincidence which Julian strove to explain away by referring it to Christian malice or to the neglect of the heathen priests, the temple of Apollo was struck by lightning and burned, with the great idol of Apollo itself. Whereupon Julian in revenge both punished the priests and closed the great church at Antioch (Julian Imp. Misopog. Oryp. ii. 97, Paris, 1630; St. Chrys. Hom. de St. Bab. c. Gent. and Hom. de St. Bab.; Theodoret, de Cur. Graec. Affect. x. and H. E. iii. 6, 7; Sozerat. iii. 13; Sozom. v. 19, 20; Rufin. x. 35; Ammian. Marcell. xxii. pp. 225, 226). St. Chrysostom also quotes a lamentable oration of the heathen sophist Libanius upon the event. The relics of St. Babylas were subsequently removed once more to a church built for them on the other side of the Orontes (St. Chrys. Hom. de St. Bab.; Sozom. vii. 10). Three, either boys or young men, were said to have suffered martyrdom with him (St. Chrys. Hom. de St. Bab.; Theodoret, H. E. iii. 6; Philostorgius, vii. 8; Suidas, s. v. Βάβυλας; and, confounding him with the Babylas to be next mentioned—the Syr. Martyr in Journ. of Soc. Lit. Oct. 1865, Jan. 1866). Leontius, the Arian bishop of Antioch, is said to have written a life of him, about A.D. 352 (Chron. Alex. p. 630). The Greeks placed his day upon Sept. 4, the Westerns upon Jan. 24.

(2) One of the name, sometimes confused with his better known namesake, is said to have been martyred, with eighty-four of his scholars, at Nicomedia, under Maximian, about A.D. 310 (Tillemont, M. E. iii. 404, 405; Baron. Jan. 24).

[A. W. H.]

BACCHUS, martyr, a Roman officer martyred with Sergius under Maximian (supposed to be a mistake for Maximin), the latter at Rasaphe or Sergiopolis in Syria, the former somewhere near the Euphrates (Niceph. vii. 14; Acta in Surius; Tillemont, M. E. v. 491; Baron. Oct. 7). See SERGIUS, whose fame almost eclipsed that of his fellow-martyr. One of the cardinal deacons at Rome derived his title from SS. Sergius and Bacchus. And a church was built in their honour by Justinian at Constantinople (Procop. de Aedif. Justinian. i. 4).

[A. W. H.]

BACCHYLUS, or BACCHYLIDES (iber Synod.), bishop of Corinth at the end of the 2nd century, who took a leading part, in conjunction with Polycrates of Ephesus and Theophilus of Caesarea, in the Quartodeciman controversy. In the year 196 Bacchylus summoned one of the councils which were held, apparently at the desire of Victor bishop of Rome, in various parts of the Christian world, to declare that the practice of their churches was in accordance with that of the Roman church. Eighteen bishops assembled at Corinth under his presidency, and pronounced against the Quartodecimans (Labbe, Concil. i. 601). Bacchylus also wrote a letter in his own name (idēos, Euseb. v. 23), but expressing the sentiments of all the bishops of Achaia on the point, which Jerome commends as a graceful composition—"elegantem librum" (Hieron. de Script. Eccl. c. 44). This letter seems to have been lost before Jerome's time, and to have been known only by tradition—"quarum memoria ad nos usque perdurat" (Hieron. Chron. anno 2212; Tillemont, iii. 106, 663).

[E. V.]

BACHIARIUS, a monk of the early part of the 5th century, the author of two short treatises printed in the Biblioth. Vet. Patr. of Galland, vol. ix. and the Patrologia of Migne, vol. xx. He is commemorated by Gennadius (c. 24) as "vir Christianae philosophiae, nudus et expeditus vacare Deo disponens, etiam peregrinationem propter conservandam vitae integritatem elegit." Gennadius attributes to him several works, only one of which he acknowledges to have read, viz. the Libellus de fide Apologeticus, addressed to the bishop of Rome. Gennadius's perusal of this work must have been careless, for he entirely mistakes its object, which was not, as he states, to "defend himself against those who condemned him for leaving his country and adopting a migratory life" ("querulos et infamatores peregrinationis suae") of which there is not a word in the Libellus, but to satisfy the bishop of Rome of his orthodoxy, who regarded him with suspicion on account of his being a native of a country tainted with heresy, and required a confession of his faith. What this country was there is nothing in his Libellus to determine. Galland argues in favour of Spain, which at that time was infested with Priscillianist and Origenistic errors. Bachiarius affirms that he had left his native country because of its heresy (Lib. § 1), and claims to be regarded a native not of the land of his birth but of his baptism (ib. § 2). Bachiarius's profession of faith is thoroughly orthodox in all leading points. Its date is fixed approximately at about the middle of the 5th century, by his denial of the tenets of Origen regarding the soul and the resurrection life, and those of Helvidius on the perpetual virginity of the Virgin (§ 3, 4), and by his omission of the Son when speaking of the procession of the Holy Ghost ("Spiritus Sanctus a Patre procedens, Patri et Filio coaeternus," § 3). This confession is an interesting document, and will repay perusal. It was first printed by Muratori (Anecd. Latin. ii. 939).

The other work of Bachiarius which has survived is entitled Ad Januarium liber de Reparatione lapsi. It is addressed to Januarus, the head of a monastery, in behalf of one of his fraternity whom he had expelled on account of immorality with a nun, and whom, notwithstanding his penitence, Januarus refused to receive back. Bachiarius rebukes the abbot and his monks very sharply for their uncharitable severity, and exhorts them to restore the penitent. He charges the lapsed to quit the partner of his sin, and not, as he was proposing to do, consummate his crime by marriage, to return to his monastery, and atone for his guilt by severe penance. The letter displays a very thorough acquaintance with the facts of Scripture history, and very happy power in the application of them.

Bachiarius has very strangely been confounded by Cave, Bale, and others with Mochta, a disciple of St. Patrick. [MOCHTAEUS.]

[E. V.]

BACOLA, a Mercian abbot, who attests charters of Offa in 777 (Kemble, C. D. i. 159, 179) and later.

[S.]

[S.]

BADENOTH, the name of "Badenoth episcopus" is attached to a Kentish charter of 765 (Kemble, C. D. i. 137; Mon. Angl. i. 166). The name is given in some lists of the bishops of Rochester in the middle of the 9th century, where it is perhaps a mistake for Tatnoth. There was no bishop of this name in 765; the bishop of Rochester then being Eardulf. The title is probably a clerical error.

BADOHEARD. [BEADUHEARD.]

BADUDEGN (A. S. Beadotheng), a serving brother of the monastery of Lindisfarne, who, according to Bede, was miraculously healed of the palsy at the tomb of S. Cuthbert. He was alive when Bede wrote (Bed. H. E. iv. 31).

[S.]

BADULF (BALDULF, BADWLF, BEADULF), was consecrated to the see of Whithern, July 17, 791 at Hearnrahaleh by Eanbald, archbishop of York, and Ethelbert, bishop of Hexham (Chr. Sax. 791; Sim. Dun. 790). In 796 he assisted at the consecration of archbishop Eanbald II. and at the coronation of Eardulf, king of Northumbria. (Ibid. ad ann.) He was the last bishop of Whithern of the Anglo-Saxon succession, whose name is preserved (Will. Malmesb. G. P. iii.).

(2) Beadwulf, abbot of Glastonbury (W. Malmesb. Ant. Glast. ed. Gale, 314).

BADUVINI (1) (BEADWIN, BADEWINE), the first bishop of Elmham in East Anglia, appointed on the division of the bishopric consequent on the illness of bishop Bisi (Bed. H.E. iv. 5). The date of his nomination is given by Florence of Worcester as 673. His name as witness is attached to a Mercian charter of 693 (Kemble, Cod. Dipl. xxxvi.). He died before 706, in which year Nothbert was bishop.

(2) A priest who attests the decree of the Council of Clovesho of 716 (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 301); possibly the person who mediated between Wilfrid and Aldfrid about 704 (Edd. V. Wilfr. 84). [S.]

BAEDA. [BEDA.]

BAEDAN (BAETAN, BAOTAN) is probably only a different form of Baithen. Several saints appear under this name.

(1) BAEDAN MOR, son of Lugaidh—Jan. 14. In Mart. Doneg. he is called "Abbot of Inis-mor A.D. 712:" in the same Martyrology, at Aug. 6, his mother's name is given as Cainer, of Cluain-da-saileach, and the names of his brothers, who were saints, were Mochua (or Cronan), Lasrain, Garbhán, Baoithín, Senchán, and Ruadhán. Through his father he was come of the race of Cathaoir Mór, who is said to have reigned in Ireland from A.D. 120 to 122 (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, pp. 15, 213; Four Masters, by O'Donovan, i. p. 102, n. 1).

(2) Son of Breacan—Nov. 29. But in putting him on this day neither Mar. O'Gorman nor Cath. Maguire gives a place where he is venerated. In Adamnan's St. Columba (i. c. 20) there is mention made of "quidam Baitanus," who is said to be "gente nepos Niath Talairc," and who sets out to seek a desert in the ocean, yet dies at the Oakwood of Galgaich (Daire Calgaich, now Londonderry), and is there buried—who again is given by Colgan among the disciples of St. Columba: but Colgan cannot decide as to the identity of the two (Tr. Thaum. pp. 343, c. 20; 377, n. 43; 487, c. 10). He is given also among the saints of Derry (Ib. p. 506, § 3). At Culdaff (dioc. Derry, co. Donegal) there is a custom of plunging diseased cattle into a pool of the river and praying at the same time to St. Bodhan (Stat. Acc. Irel. ii. p. 161).

(3) Of Cluain-tuaisceirt, now Clontuskert, near Lanesborough, in the barony of South Ballintober and co. Roscommon. His obit is put by the Four Masters in 804. (Four Masters, by O'Donovan, i. p. 415, and n. 4.) [A. P. F.]

BAERE, a Kentish abbot, witnesses a charter of Sigræd, between 759 and 765 (Kemble, C. D. i. 139; Mon. Angl. i. 163). [S.]

BAETHALLACH, Bp. of Ath-truim (Trim)—Oct. 5. In Mart. Doneg. (by Todd and Reeves, p. 267) he is brother of Corbmac and successor of St. Patrick, and is descended from Colla Uais, king of Erin. Colgan in his Life of St. Corbmac the younger (Acta SS. p. 361, n. 4) calls his father Colman, of the race of Suibhne, king of Meath, and his mother Funecta "femina liberis pluribus et sanctis felix et celebris." To these there were born four sons, St. Corbmac (Feb. 7 or 17), bishop of Ath-truim, who died in 741; Rumondus, who died in 742; Baethallach, abbot of Ath-truim, who died in 751; and Ossan, who was venerated at Ath-truim on Feb. 17, but the time of Ossan's death and the circumstances of his life are unknown. [A. P. F.]

BAGLAN, ST., son of Dingad, to whom some churches in Carnarvonshire and Glamorganshire are dedicated (Rees' Welsh Saints, 275). [C. W. B.]

BAITHEN, a name of many forms and very frequent occurrence in Irish hagiologies. Colgan (Acta SS. p. 369, n. 3, and p. 437, n. 1) gives also Baithin, Baoithin, Boethan, Baothan, with their Latin terminations; and others like Baedun, Buadan, &c. might have been added (see Reeves, Adamnan, pp. 49, 409). Many appear as mere names or with a simple designation, but others have a history, more or less distinct: such as—

(1) Son of Alla, of Cluain-de-an in Down—Oct. 6. He is believed to have flourished at the close of the 6th century, as he is always mentioned in company with other three Baithens, who were connected with St. Columba, or lived about the same time (Colgan, Acta SS. p. 369, n. 2; Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. ii. p. 413). He is perhaps the Baithen commemorated at Tech-baithin in Airteach (now Tibohine, co. Roscommon; Ib. 370, n. 21).

(2) Son of Cuana, and given in Mart. Doneg. as "bp. of Teach-Baoithin in Airteach of Connacht, or in the West of Midhe." Both Colgan (Acta SS. p. 370, n. 21) and Lanigan (Ecol. Hist. Ir. ii. p. 413) seem to prefer assigning him to Tech-Baithin in West Meath—Feb. 19. He was of the race of Enna Finn, son of Niall of the Nine Hostages (king of Ireland, A.D. 379–405; Todd's St. Patrick, p. 250; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, p. 53); and Kelly puts his residence near the hill of Useach, Westmeath (Cal. Ir. Saints, p. 75). He flourished about 640, as he was a disciple of St. Columba and a contemporary of St. Mochoemocus, who died on 13th March, A.D. 655. Kelly, however, gives this Baithen's date as about 592, and Colgan (Tr. Thaum. p. 470) about 620, and again (Ind. Chron. to Acta SS.) 593. It is said that when St. Columba saw him at the Synod of Drum-Ceatt he counted him the handsomest man in Ireland, and prophesied that his spiritual graces would equal his beauty of form: but in place of being elated St. Baithen in his humility prayed to the Giver of this beauty to withdraw it, and ever after he was known as "ban, i.e. candidus vel exsanguis" (Colgan, Acta SS. p. 369; Tr. Thaum. p. 434). He is supposed to have written the Irish acts of St. Columba (Colgan, Acta SS. 369; Tr. Thaum. p. 470). He was revered in many churches, named after him Tech-Baithin, "The House of Baithen" (Ib. Acta SS. p. 369), and is identified with the Bp. Baitanus addressed, among others, in the letter on the proper time of Easter and on the Pelagian heresy by Pope John IV. A.D. 640, as given in Bede, E. II. ii. 19; Colgan, Acta SS. p. 17, n. 11; Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. ii. p. 413).

(3) Son of Finnach—May 22. He was of the race of Laoighseach Leannor, son of Conall Cearnach (possibly the Alcuin who is tabled to have been present at the crucifixion of our Lord: Todd's St. Patrick, p. 198, n.; p. 406, n.), and had his church at Inis-baithin (the island of St. Baithen), now "within the townland of Inishboheen, or Inishboyne, to which it has given its name, in the parish of Dunganstown, barony of Arklow, county of Wicklow" (Ibid. pp. 297-8). Colgan thinks he was a disciple of St. Ciaran, who had to perform several miracles on account of St. Baithen's incaution, and thus must have flourished about A.D. 550 (Acta SS. p. 369 text and n. 2; p. 463, c. 36); but Todd (ut supra) says he "is supposed to have flourished about the close of the sixth or beginning of the seventh century. The exact date of his obit has not been preserved in the Irish annals." (Four Masters, by O'Donovan, i. p. 374, n. 4.)

(4) Ab. of Iona—June 9. He was son of Brendan, and pupil, cousin, and successor of St. Columba at Iona. He was one of the twelve companions of St. Columba who came with him from Ireland; and, though sent at times on such a mission as to be Superior of the monastery of Campus-Lunge, in Ethica, now Tiree, or to take charge of the monks at their labours at home (see Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. 162), he was always closely associated with St. Columba till his death, when he became his successor, as marked out by the words of the dying saint: "Here I must stop—at the end of this page (in transcribing the Psalter): what follows let Baithen write" (Colgan, Acta SS. p. 336, c. 5; p. 369; p. 588; Ussher, de Brit. Eccl. Prim., Dubl. 1639, pp. 694 sq.) He is called "S. Columbae alumnum et successorem" by St. Adamnan (S. Col. iii. c. 2), and "familiarissimum discipulum," by Notker Balbulus (iii. 22). He is also known as Comin. (See Ussher, ut supra, p. 694, and Colgan, Acta SS. p. 588, and Tr. Thaum. p. 488, n. e.) The curious story of the three empty chairs shown to him in heaven, which were prepared for St. Ciaran, St. Columba, and St. Baithen himself, is given in Colgan (Tr. Thaum. p. 402, Fifth Life of St. Columba, c. 81); Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, p. 163; Bishop Forbes, Kul. of Scott. Saints, p. 274.) He ruled four years (Dr. Reeves says three) in Iona after St. Columba's death, and resigned his soul to heaven on the same day of the same month in which St. Columba expired (June 6), A.D. 600. (Colgan, Acta SS. p. 408, c. 3; p. 449, col. 2; Tr. Thaum. p. 18, n. 23; p. 480, c. 3; p. 498, col. 2; Mart. Doneg. p. 165; Bp. Forbes, ut supra; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. pp. 250, 259.) But Ussher (de Brit. Eccl. Prim. Dubl. 1639, p. 962) fixes his obit at A.D. 598, and is followed by Dr. Grub (see his useful note in Eccl. Hist. of Scotland, i. p. 70), while the Bollandist Acta SS. (Jun. tom. ii. p. 234) prefers to put it in 601. It is entered in the Four Masters at 595, and in the Annals of Ulster at 597. He was son of Brendan, St. Columba's uncle, and born, according to Tighernach, in 536, and "his principal church was Teach-Baithaen, now Taughboyne, in the barony of Raphoe, and county of Donegal. It is stated in the Annals of Clonmacnoise, A.D. 596, that he died in the 66th year of his age" (Four Masters, by O'Donovan, i. p. 221, n. 1). There is a curious story given by E. O'Curry (Lect. on Manners and Cust. Anc. Ir., ed. by Sullivan, iii. pp. 32-3) with regard to his early education.

The Felire gives—

"Baetini ard Aingleach Coluim cille Caindleach."

—(See Ulster Journal of Archaeol. vol. ii. pp. 239, 240; Todd, St. Patrick, p. 299; Bp. Forbes, Kul. of Scott. Saints, p. 274; Dr. Reeves, Adamnan, p. 372, et al. in Index.) In p. 182 Dr. Reeves gives also an account of his kindred to St. Columba, the coincidence of their festivals, and the Acts of St. Baithen, putting his obit in A.D. 599 and age 66 years. For an account of St. Baithen and his peculiarly gentle disposition see Montalembert (Monks of the West, Edinb. iii. pp. 213-5).

(5) Baetan or Boetan Mac Ua Corbmaic, Abbot of Cluain-mic-Nois, A.D. 663 (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, p. 61)—March 1. Mart. Tallaght calls him "Baitanus Episc. Cluana" (Kelly, Cal. of Ir. Saints, p. xvii), and Colgan (Acta SS. p. 437) says he died bishop there in A.D. 663 (compare Tr. Thaum. p. 377, n. 63). He was descended from an ancient Connaught family, and succeeded Aedlugh, son of Camman, in 651, as Abbot of Clonmacnoise, which is now called also "The Seven Churches," on the east bank of the Shannon in King's county. Colgan (Acta SS. p. 437) and Four Masters (by O'Donovan, at A.D. 663, p. 275) attach him by birth to the sept of Connaicne-mara, i.e. the inhabitants of Connaicne-mara, or the barony of Ballynahinch in the north-west of the province of Galway.

(6) Baetan of Monu—March 23. Mart. Doneg. (by Todd and Reeves, p. 85) says: "This may be the Baetan, brother of Corbmac and Eimhin, who are of the race of Eoghau-mor, son of Oilíoll Olum:" and Colgan (Acta SS. p. 728) gives on this day Boedan, Ab. of Killboedain, son of Eugenius, and one of the six brothers of St. Corbmac. According to this last account, he was the sixth son, and followed his elder brothers Corbmac and Diernit into the scene of their missionary labours in Lethconn or the northern half of Ireland. He afterwards took up his abode and built his church at Killboedain, afterwards called Killoscoba or Killoseada, in Dalradia, under the patronage of the three noble families of Cinel-Decil, Clann-Scoba (Clann-Serlo), and Silmiridhin. At first they devoted houses and lands to St. Baithen, but the first-named family afterwards transferred their affections to St. Cuan and St. Colman, and at last the place was not only deserted but had its name changed. St. Baithen perhaps returned to his native province of Munster, and died Ab. of Moin (Moen-sis) or Moanmore. He is supposed to have lived about the beginning of the sixth century. (See Colgan, Acta SS. p. 728, and at p. 751 sq., in his Life of St. Corbmac (March 26); Kelly, Cal. Ir. Saints, p. 103. On Shilvodan or Kill-boedain, see Reeves, Eccl. Antiq. Down and Connor, pp. 302-3.)

(7) Son of Maonan, of Lannleire—June 18. Mart. Tallaght gives "Furodrain ocus Baithin," and Mart. Doneg. has also this saint along with his brother Furadhran, Ab. of Lanuleire, now the old church of Lyn, on the east side of Lough Ennell, in the barony of Fartullagh, and co. Westmeath (Four Masters, by O'Donovan, i. p. 342, n. 7).

(8) Baitan or Boetan of Cluain-an-Dobhair, which was situated somewhere in the present King's County. Aengus and Marianus in their Festologies commemorate him on Dec. 1; and though he is come of the same Connemara family, yet he appears to be different from Baithen, son of Ua Corbmac (ut supra). Little, however, is known of him (Colgan, Acta SS. p. 437, n. 2). The Mart. Doneg. p. 335, identifies him with Mobaol (Dec. 13) of Cluain-fionnabhair, or of Cluain-da-an-dobhair, in Ui-Muireadhaigh, the name of both their fathers being called Sinell; while Colgan (Acta SS. p. 598, c. 3, App.), in giving an account of the saints belonging to the house of Mochoemocus and race of Conmacus, mentions "Beodan, who is also Mobeocus, son of Sinell &c., Abbot of Cluain-dobhair, Dec. 13."

(9) Baithonus, Bathanus, Bothanus, Bp.—Dec. 25, A.D. 639. He is said by Camerarius (p. 203) to be connected with all Scotland, but specially with Shetland and Thule, and he may have been one of the five bishops addressed in the epistle of Pope John IV. A.D. 640 (while yet but pope elect) to the nation of the Scots, warning them to keep the true Easter and to avoid the errors of Pelagius (Bede, H. E. ii. c. 19). But at the same time it may be mentioned that Colgan (Acta SS. p. 17, n. 11) identifies the Baithonus in the epistle with St. Baithen, son of Cuanach, bp. of Tech-baithen, who flourished about A.D. 640 (see above, Baithen (2) and was a Scotch bishop in Hibernia, not Alba (see also Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. p. 413). In Berwickshire is the parish of Abbey of St. Bathans (N. S. A. "Berwickshire," p. 105; O. S. A. vol. xii. 61-64). The Register of the Priory of St. Andrews (p. 31), giving the taxation of the churches in the archdeaconry of the Lothians, assigns one mark to the "Ecclesia Sti. Boythani." The parish of Gifford, or Yester, in East Lothian, was anciently called St. Bothans (N. S. A. "Berwickshire," p. 105). The parish of Bowden is supposed also to take its name from this saint. "In the charter granted by King David I. to the Abbey of Selkirk, mention is made of Bothenden, which seems to favour the conjecture of this parish being named after St. Bothan or Bodwin, and the site of this town is still pointed out near the village" (O. S. A. vol. xvi. p. 230). Perhaps Bothwell is called after him (O. S. A. vol. xvi. p. 300). Ballebodan, or Kilbodan, in the parish of Ardochattan, may take its name from him, though the patron of the parish is St. Modan, but the m and b are interchangeable in Gaelic (Orig. Par. ii. pp. 148, 186). There is a Kilbedane in the lordship of Morven and Sheriffdom of Inverness (Ibid. ii. p. 191). But Camerarius gives a St. Bothanus, bp. of Dunblane in Scotland at the 18th of January, though his reference does not exhibit the name (Bp. Forbes, Kal. of Scott. Saints, p. 276). [A. P. F.]

BALAAMITES, the name is derived from the allusion in Rev. ii. 14. There were in the church of Pergamus those who held "the doctrine of Balaam, who taught Balac to cast a stumbling-block before the children of Israel, φαγεῖν εἰδωλόθυτα καὶ πορνέυσαι." The presence and activity of these teachers is urged as a matter of blame: it argues want of vigilance, and slackness of effort on the part of the "angel" of that church. The city watered with the martyr-blood of Antipas is in danger of being transformed into "Satan's throne," and of becoming the head-quarters in those parts of the opposition to Christ and His Gospel. Incidental notices of the Balaamites occur in 2 Pet. (ii. 15), and Jude (11). The picture given is a sad, if not a worse, parallel to that given in Rev. They are "false teachers," leading many to follow their "lascivious ways" (ἀσελγείας) . . . "alluring through the lusts of the flesh"; "cursed children which have forsaken the right way, and are gone astray following the way of Balaam the son of Bosor, who loved the wages of unrighteousness." While they "promise liberty" to their followers, "they themselves are the servants of corruption" (2 Pet.) Or they are "ungodly men turning the grace of God into lasciviousness (ἀσελγείαν), and denying the only Lord God." Woe to them "for they have gone in the way of Cain, and run greedily after the error of Balaam" (Jude). As in the Old Testament history Balaam is the representative of a class which claiming prophetic power, debased divine inspiration to the suggestion of sensual and covetous practices; so in the history of the Church they who sought to introduce sensuality and idolatry, manners and customs, which to the far-seeing eye of men like unto the "Apostle of Love" could only prove a stumbling-block—are disciples and imitators of Balaam.

The existence of this class of teachers and taught is a matter of history. The identity of the Balaamites with the Nicolaitans, associated with them in the context of the passage in the Rev. (ii. 15), may be a matter of dispute [NICOLAITANS], but there need be none with reference to the substantial identity of their habits and teaching. In practical results the διδαχὴ Βαλαάμ and the δ. Νικολαϊτῶν were equally detestable.

That διδαχὴ, whether it came from east or west, from Samaritan or Gnostic false prophet, was simply a caricature of the truth. "You are free," was the sum of the false creed; "free from law, from sin, from subjection of any kind: use your liberty—if you will—for the practice of sin; meats offered to idols cannot harm you; sensuality cannot hurt you." This doctrine, boasting to be divinely inspired, would act mischievously in two ways: in some, it would quench religious scruples; in others, it would excite coarse passions. In times of persecution, the convert—trembling at the alternative, sacrifice or die—would gladly accept the suggestion that the former was a matter of "indifference." In a less, but equally real, degree, the same doctrine would quiet the mind of the man consciously or unconsciously eating meats already offered in heathen sacrifices. It would then be an easy step to participate in the heathen festivals, and introduce the orgies of the Bacchanalia into the Agapae of the Christian Church.

The melancholy distinction of being foremost tempters of the church of Pergamus to this offence, is coupled with the name of Balaamites. They encouraged among the Christians the practices to which the Moabites had encouraged the Israelites: they advised and introduced after the example of Balaam a false freedom—a freedom of the flesh. The πορνεία to which Balaam and Jezebel had incited the people of God, was not of necessity that of a lawless indiscriminate connection, but that of forming matrimonial engagements with forbidden races; it was none the less an infraction of the Mosaic law (Lev. xviii.), to be repudiated for its consequences and results. To a πορνεία capable of being cloaked with a kind of legitimacy, but incapable of honest and Christian results, the churches of Pergamus and Thyatira were in danger of being seduced. The abstinence recommended in the decree of the church at Jerusalem (Acts xv.), was to be wrested into tolerating εὐδολόβητα and πορνεία. Men would allege themselves able to indulge their sin, and themselves continue sinless.

Such miserable imposture was denounced with an earnestness and eloquence worthy of Moses or Elijah. These "Apostles" are "liars;" "they are not Jews, but the synagogue of Satan," "their doctrine the depths of Satan:" to yield to them is to forfeit the hitherto glorious praise of "holding fast the name and not denying the faith of the Lord:" to resist them and overcome them is to be rewarded "with the food of the hidden manna, and a knowledge of the new name which no man knoweth."

For the literature upon this subject see NICOLAÏTANS. [J. M. F.]

BALANUS (BALLOIN, BALLONUS)—Sept. 3. Given in the Table of Mart. Doneg., by Mar. O'Gorm., Cath. Maguire, &c. He is said by Colgan (Acta SS. p. 602, n. 5) to have been brother of St. Gerald (March 13), and one of the four sons of Cusperius, king of England (unknown). When Colman, bishop of Lindisfarne, resigned his see after the Synod of Whitby in 664, Balanus and his brothers accompanied him to Iona, and retired with him into Connaught in Ireland. Balanus took up his residence at Techsaxon—"the house of the Saxons," named probably from himself and brothers—in the parish of Ath-na-riogh (Athenry and diocese of Tuam). (Grub, Ecl. Hist. Scot. i. 88-97; Bede, E. H. iii. c. 27; iv. 4.) He flourished in the close of the seventh and beginning of the eighth centuries (see Colgan's Life of St. Gerald (March 13) in Acta SS. p. 599 sq. and notes). [A. P. F.]

BALDRED (BALTHERUS), H.—March 6, A. D. 608. After the translation of St. Kentigern to the society of angels, in A. D. 530, at the reputed age of 183 [see KENTIGERN], St. Baldred who had been his suffragan, became famous in Laudonia. He betook himself to the eremitic life in remote desert places and islands of the sea, among which is one termed Bass, where he for a long time dwelt upon the memory of his model St. Kentigern, and above all meditated on the bitter passion of Christ, in fasting, and weeping, and wailing. He also taught the faith in the three parochial churches of Aldhame, Tynninghame, and Prestoune, which had been subjected to him by St. Mungo. Here he performed some miracles of healing, and according to the tradition, a rock which impeded the navigation moved beneath him to the shore. It is still called the Tumba or Scapha of St. Baldred. At length, worn out by extreme old age, he died in the house of the parish priest of Aldhame. His three churches each demanded his body; and when the people could not agree, being advised to pray to God to give them a sign, on the morrow they found three bodies laid out, each with the same exequial pomp, and each congregation carried off one to its own church, where it is kept with great honour unto this day. (Brev. Aberd. pars hyem., fol. lxxiii. and lxxiv.) A similar legend as to the triplication of his body is narrated of the great Welsh saint, Thelias. (See Capgrave's Leg. Aur. fol. cclxxxi. verso.) Two bodies of St. Patrick and of St. Monenna were also under similar circumstances produced. Camerarius, who makes the day the 29th of March, refers to John Major, In quart. Sent. Distinct. 10, quaest. 4, where, in treating of the Holy Eucharist, he seeks to prove, by the example of the body of St. Baldred, that the same body can be in diverse places, simul et semel. He is called St. Kentigern's suffragan in the Martyrology of Aberdeen, but Bower is the first to give him this title. The church of St. Baldred of Tynninghame had the right of sanctuary (charter of Malcolm the Maiden, Robertson's Stat. Ecl. Scot. vol. ii. p. 261). At Preston Kirk, some places adjoining the church still bear the name of the ancient tutelar saint, as Baldred's Well and Baldred's Whill, a poor or eddy in the river. (O. S. A. vol. xi. p. 87; N. S. A. vol. vi. "Haddington," pp. 21, 58.) His cave is also shown on the coast near Aldhame (Gordon's Scotichronicon. i. p. 52). St. Baldred appears as St. Baltherus in a Fragmentum Historiae de Pontificibus Eboracensibus, given in Mabillon (Acta Sanct. Ord. Ben. pars 2^a, p. 208), where two miracles are attributed to him. He walked on the sea like St. Peter, and obtained the pardon of the soul of a deacon, who before death had fallen into carnal sin. Simeon of Durham gives his date at A. D. 756, if he be not referring to what appears to be another Baltherus, who was anchorite of Durham, and of whom at the above date Roger Hoveden says in his Annals,—"In the same year Balthere the Anchorite, having followed the life of the saints, departed to the Lord:" this last died and was buried at Lindisfarne; but after being translated to Durham cathedral, the relics were stolen along with those of Venerable Bede and others. (See Bishop Forbes, Kal. of Scott. Saints, pp. 273-4; Colgan, Acta SS. p. 687, c. 64, and p. 694, n. 32; Bede, Ecl. Hist. Pref. pp. xxi-xxii., Bohn's ed.) Alban Butler (vol. iii. p. 55) calls Balredre immediate successor of St. Mungo, and puts his obit in A. D. 608. [A. P. F.]

BALSAMUS, a mythological name among the Spanish Priscillianists, according to Jerome [BARBELO]. It is evidently Beel-Samin, "the Lord of Heaven," a well-known divinity of the Phoenicians, Carthaginians, Mesopotamians, &c. See Chwolson, Ssabier, ii. 158 f. [H.]

BALTHERE (1) A famous anchorite who lived at Tynningham in East Lothian. He died in 756, on the 6th of March (Sim. Dun. Chron. ad 756, Hist. Dun. ii. 2). Alcuin commemorates his sanctity and his victory over evil spirits (De Pontif. et Sanctis Ebor. vv. 1318-86). His church at Tynningham was destroyed by the Danes in 941 (Sim. Dun. ad ann.); it possessed extensive estates, which afterwards belonged to the patrimony of S. Cuthbert. Mabillon states that his name occurs in the Benedictine calendars on the 27th of November, and that his relics were removed to Durham in the 11th century (AA. SS. O. S. B. Saec. iii. pt. 2, 509), and refers to an article on the subject in the Bollandist

Acts, Mar. 6. (See Bishop Forbes, Kalendar of Scottish Saints, s. v. Baldred.)

BANBAN. In Irish hagiology there are several Banbans usually given, but two at least of these are probably the same person, Banban the Wise, attached to separate days, May 1 and 9. Colgan (in Tr. Thaum. p. 176, n. 67,) names four Banbans, and is of opinion that the "Mauranum cognomento Barbanum, alias Banbanum. cognatum (Sti. Patricii), Deique Prophetam fidelem" (Vit. Trip. or Sept. Vit. pars ii. c. xx.), to whom St. Patrick committed the "Domnach Mor," or large basilica in Magh-Sleacht, co. Cavan, was Banban the Wise, whom again, in Quint. App. de Patr. et Gen. Sti. Patricii, c. 4, n. 12 (p. 229), Colgan supposes to be a son of Richella, sister of St. Patrick, as elsewhere (p. 231) he calls him "Sti. Patricii nepos seu cognatus." (Ib. Acta SS. p. 259, c. 3.) In the Hymn of St. Patrick given at A.D. 448 in the Four Masters, it is said, "His sister's son was Banban of fame," though he is not given in a similar list of the household in Colgan's Vit. Trip. (pars iii. c. 98); but O'Donovan adds in a note (Four Masters by O'Donovan, p. 139, n. °) that in the copy of Flann's poem, in the Book of Lecan, the reading is "Seannan was his brother" (or cousin) "of fame," and that, as neither name has been identified with true history, it is more than probable that both owe their existence to the errors of the transcribers. In Tr. Thaum. (p. 176, n. 67), he is called "presbyter;" but at May 1, the Mart. Tallaght calls him "bishop." There are other Banbans, such as the bishop of Leithglinn (Leighlin, county Kildare), who died A.D. 777; another bishop, put by Mart. Doneg., Mar. Gorm. &c. on Dec. 3; and a "Banbhan, son of Donnghal, of the race of Fiacha Suighdhe, of Feidhlimidh Reachtmbar" (king of Ireland, A.D. 164-174, or, according to the Four Masters, 111-119). (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 176, n. 67; Mrt. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, pp. 117, 363; Four Masters, by O'Donovan, i. p. 383, A.D. 777.) [A. P. F.]

BAPTISM, in the sense now given to it, expressed in the N. T. by βαπτισμα, not βαπτισμός: in Latin more commonly by Baptismus than by Baptisma. For its origin, ritual, &c., see the Dict. of Christ in Ant. and of the Bible. That there was "a doctrine" respecting it, even in apostolic times, is expressly stated in Heb. vi. 2, where βαπτισμῶν may have been used out of consideration for Hebrew ears, or suggested by a sojourner in Italy, or perhaps is due to the abbreviated way of writing βαπτισμάτων in MSS. The employment of the plural number is easily explained out of the N. T. itself, where the "baptism of John" is often distinguished from that of "Christ;" and by that of Christ is meant sometimes His own death: sometimes the baptism administered by His disciples during His lifetime; sometimes the baptism administered by them after His Ascension, or handed down to His church. In dogmatizing on this last, it had of course to be distinguished from, as well as illustrated by, the others. What the apostles themselves taught about it must be gathered from their practice no less than their words; in both of which they doubtless conformed rigidly to what they had learnt from their Lord. Between it and the baptism first instituted by Him, there were some characteristic differences, as well as some points in which they coincided. First, the matter employed was common to both. This He must have settled among the first acts of His ministry: for one of the first things His disciples seem to have been commissioned to do for Him was to baptise, and to baptise with water, like the Baptist (John iv. 1-3). As little can it be doubted but that they baptised in His name; and to this form, as we shall see, they themselves adhered probably through life; though for this form He substituted another Himself, in terminating His earthly ministry, which they passed on to His church. Again, one was designed to be provisional, the other permanent; and in the former the Holy Ghost was not received. During His lifetime we are told expressly, "the Holy Ghost was not yet given, because that Jesus was not yet glorified" (Ib. vii. 39). But, even after His Ascension, as long as baptism was administered in this form, the Holy Ghost was not imparted in it, but at times preceded (Acts x. 44-48), at times followed its reception (Ib. viii. 16-17). It was the not distinguishing between these two baptisms instituted by our Lord that led St. Augustine to misapply to the second the following remark which is most true of the first. "Haec distinctio inter acceptionem baptismi, et acceptionem Spiritus Sancti, satis nos instruit, ne habere hos continuo Spiritum Sanctum putemus, quos habere baptismum non negamus" (Serm. 269, § 2, ed. Ben.). As long as baptism continued to be administered in the "name of the Lord Jesus," it preserved its original characteristics, and this distinction existed in fact; but when baptism came to be administered in the name of the Trinity, this distinction ceased, because the Holy Ghost was bestowed ever afterwards on every recipient of baptism at the font.

When the first form was disused, we might as well attempt to define, as when the observance of the law of Moses became obsolete. Certain it is, that in the Acts of the Apostles, we never hear of the apostles themselves baptising, or indeed of anybody superior to a deacon baptising at all; or, again, of anybody being baptised in any name but that of "the Lord," or "the Lord Jesus." Baptism formed no part of the commission given to the twelve when they were first sent forth; nor, again, to the seventy who followed them (Luke ix. and x.). Even St. Paul, in admitting that he baptised some few at Corinth with his own hands, expressly says: "Christ sent me, not to baptise, but to preach" (1 Cor. i. 17). And there are numerous passages in his epistles which shew that baptism in the name of the Lord Jesus was the baptism with which he was familiar (Rom. vi. 3; 1 Cor. i. 13, and vi. 11; Gal. iii. 27; Col. ii. 11), as it was certainly the baptism he received himself (Acts xxii. 16). True, we know from St. Matthew—yet from him alone (xxviii. 19)—that baptism formed part of the commission given by our Lord to the eleven on leaving them, and was to be administered by them in the name of the Trinity. If we compared the words spoken by Him on this occasion nakedly with the words spoken by Him in instituting His other sacrament, we might be at a loss to understand on what principle they allowed themselves so much latitude in interpreting the first, while clinging so tenaciously to the text of the last. But the first rite having been in use among them for some time, they had their previous practice to guide them, and they would naturally be for retaining all that they were not distinctly told to change. When, therefore, they continued baptising by deputy, as they had done before, we may be sure they had His leave for it; and when they continued employing the form which He had first given them, we may be sure He had trusted them with discretionary powers when it was to be disused for the second. It would naturally fall into disuse when the first of the gospels had become current; and there is positive proof that in less than 100 years from their death the second form had become law everywhere.

So much, then, for its form and matter in their hands. We must enquire further, 1, the light in which they regarded it; 2, the effects they attributed to it; 3, the conditions on which it was bestowed; and 4, the persons charged with its administration.

1. They looked upon it as a rite that had been long prefigured; the fulfilment of what had been again and again foreshadowed. According to St. Peter it had been prefigured by the deluge; by the passage of the Israelites through the Red Sea, according to St. Paul (1 Pet. iii. 20-22; 1 Cor. x. 2); the latter, again, drew a sharp contrast between it and circumcision (Col. iii. 10-13). Our Lord had twice spoken of His crucifixion as His impending baptism (Luke xii. 50; comp. Matt. xx. 22, and Mark x. 38). St. Paul taught, conformably, that all who had been "baptised into Christ,"—or, through baptism, made one with Him—had been "baptised into His death"—in other words, "buried with Him"—that, like as He was "raised from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so they should walk in newness of life" (Rom. vi. 3-6; Col. ii. 12). Christian baptism was, therefore, from his stand-point, the medium by which people were brought into living fellowship with Christ, and made veritable partakers of His death and resurrection. If it was symbolical in one sense, it was doubly real in another. If their death was a figure, their new life was a fact attested by their own consciousness. It was that second birth, of which they had heard their Lord tell mysteriously years before, "Except a man be born again—born of water and of the spirit," in other words—"he cannot enter into the kingdom of God" (John iii. 3-5). The paraphrase of the apostle fixed the drift of those words, and accounted simultaneously for the peremptory declaration contained in them. Everybody now recognised intuitively what was meant by the old and the new man; each discovered for himself that what the gospels had called the baptism of the Holy Ghost was a power acting upon the soul, and no dream.

Another of its features dwelt upon by St. Paul was that the gift conveyed in it was purely gratuitous; in other words, was not bestowed upon man for any merit of his own. "Not by works of righteousness which we have done, but, according to His mercy, He saved us by the washing of regeneration and renewing of the Holy Ghost" (Tit. iii. 5), as it is said: while by this phrase, "the washing of regeneration," its bestowal was associated indissolubly with the baptismal rite.

A further point in his teaching—in fact, a palpable corollary from it—was that Christian baptism once received could not be repeated, though it was often administered to those who had been baptised by John. Probably John himself never baptised anybody twice. But Christian baptism had a reality, no less than a meaning, which that of John had not, being the application of the death of Christ to its recipients in each case. Consequently, there could be "no more sacrifice for sin" where that was spurned (Heb. x. 26, and vi. 4). Post-baptismal apostasy was equivalent to "crucifying the Son of God afresh." As surely there was but "one baptism," as there was but "one Lord," "one faith" (Eph. iv. 5), one sacrifice upon the cross for sin.

2. This estimate of baptism in apostolic times alone shews how real its effects were supposed to be. "And now, why tarriest thou? Arise, and be baptised, and wash away thy sins, calling upon the name of the Lord," said Ananias to the persecutor of his brethren (Acts xxii. 16). "But ye are washed, but ye are sanctified, but ye are justified, in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God," said he to them afterwards, in describing its effects on sinners in general, which he had then tested in his own person (1 Cor. vi. 11). In other words, that they were "sanctified," or made holy; that they were "justified" or had their sins cancelled, was due to their having been "washed," that is, baptised with water, "in the name of the Lord Jesus," and made temples of "the Spirit of God." On the day of Pentecost, after St. Peter had finished his sermon, the multitude, "being pricked in their heart," said unto Peter and to the rest of the apostles, "Men and brethren, what shall we do?" Peter, as their spokesman, replied unhesitatingly, "Repent, and be baptised every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost" (Acts ii. 37-8). As there is no limitation expressed or implied in these passages, it is clear that the remission of all sins is contemplated, and consequently that each recipient of baptism went up from the fount sinless—as sinless as Adam and Eve were before they began life; as competent to abstain from sin as they were before they fell. This, indeed, on the face of it, implied that the future was left in his own hands; yet certainly the hope—the confident hope—was in those days that nobody who had once "put on the Lord Jesus" would ever put Him off. It then seemed a moral impossibility that any should. "He cannot sin, because he is born of God," says St. John (1 John iii. 9). If he did, another passage seems to say, there was no hope for him. "For it is impossible for those who were once enlightened, and have tasted of the heavenly gift, and were made partakers of the Holy Ghost . . . if they shall fall away, to renew them again unto repentance" (Heb. vi. 4-6). But these passages must be read side by side with the countless, and almost passionate, exhortations addressed by every apostle whose words are preserved, to Christians to do well, to be true to their calling, to flee lusts, to repent, to recover themselves, which would all bo meaningless, if there were no such thing as post-baptismal sin, "no place of repentance" for post-baptismal sinners. "Confess your faults one to another," says St. James, "and pray that ye may be healed" (v. 16). Could this have been said by one who considered baptised Christians beyond sinning? "Lest when I come again, my God will humble me among you, and that I shall bewail many which have sinned already, and have not repented of the uncleanness, and fornication, and lasciviousness which they have committed" (2 Cor. xii. 21). How could St. Paul have written this had he held that post-baptismal sinners would repent in vain?

3. It followed from hence logically that the effects of baptism, notwithstanding the reality of the grace bestowed in it, and its power for good at all times as designed by God, were liable in practice to be modified by man, according to his dispositions in receiving it and turning it to account through life. The grace given to him, instead of coercing his will, was efficacious only so far as he co-operated with it, or allowed it free course, and no further. The moment it was opposed or slighted it became inoperative, and unless he repented and supplicated for its return in earnest it died out, leaving him in a far worse state than if it had never been received. This was no new experience for the apostles. Their Lord, who had just left them, they knew to have been true man as well as true God. Yet, though He had walked about among them for years, He had been rejected by the majority by far, even of those who had seen His miracles. Notwithstanding, His human nature was just as much a reality when His hands and feet were nailed rudely to the cross, as when the hem of His garment was touched in faith. In the same way, baptism was not a sham, because there were many Judases who received it. If God were not true to His engagement in every case, how could man ever be proved false to his? The apostles, when they dilated on the glorious privileges it conveyed, were not unmindful of the conditions it involved to be received with profit. "Repent, and be baptised," said St. Peter (Acts ii. 38). Repent first. And what was the repentance denoted by the word then used by him (μετανοεῖν) but a changed mind, not a temporary feeling or flow of tears? If it never amounted to this, or if it ever relapsed, there was a proportionable eclipse of grace. Thus it was a life-long condition. Again, when the eunuch asked Philip, "See, here is water: what doth hinder me to be baptised?" "If thou believest with all thine heart, thou mayest," was the reply. These words may not be found in some MSS.; but they are certainly not the gloss of a later age, as Alford thinks (on Acts viii. 37). A later age would not have been satisfied with so short a profession. Here, then, is another condition, namely faith; and this had not merely to be life-long but to be increased (Luke xvii. 5; comp. 2 Pet. i. 5) and was a complex term. For to be saving it had to work by love (Gal. v. 6); and love was the fulfilling of the entire law (Rom. xiii. 10). God did His part invariably; but if man ever failed in doing his, what he received was as good as lost in this world, and certain to tell against him in the next. The apostles leave us in no doubt that they knew this only too well. "We, then, as workers together with Him, beseech you that ye receive not the grace of God in vain" (2 Cor. vi. 1); says one: "To him that knoweth to do good, and doeth it not, to him it is sin" (James iv. 17): says another. "And if the righteous scarcely be saved, where shall the ungodly and the sinner appear?" (1 Pet. iv. 18) asks a third, which the first illustrates by a simile, and then answers reluctantly, "Whose end is to be burned" (Heb. vi. 8).

4. It was from an overwhelming sense, doubtless, both of the grace bestowed in baptism, and of the "necessity" laid on them of providing that "every creature" should have the offer of it, that the apostles employed others to baptise for them, as has been said; indeed, if we went back a point further on that head, we should find that those who baptised for Christ originally must have been laymen, for the apostles themselves were not ordained then. In the same way deacons must have been allowed subsequently to administer baptism almost as soon as they were ordained. For unless the Philip who baptised the eunuch was the deacon, not the apostle Philip, why should the apostles have sent Peter and John down from Jerusalem (Acts viii. 5-17 and 38) to impart to his earlier converts what he could not? Still even this shews there was a complement to it, which they retained in their own hands. "Remission of sins" is distinctly said to have been conveyed by the baptism which was then in use; but "the gift of the Holy Ghost" is as distinctly said not. This the baptised are recorded to have received subsequently by the laying on of the hands of the apostles, and visible manifestations of it in each case followed (Acts viii. 18, and xix. 6). These last passed away with the apostolic age, and then another change took place, which is partly theological and partly practical. We learn from Acts v. 14, that multitudes of both sexes—women as well as men—"were added to the Lord" thus early, but there is no reference to children, express or implied, as yet. In 1 Cor. vii. 14, however, we are apprised incidentally that infant baptism was then practised. This admits of no doubt. The apostle is contemplating mixed marriages that had been blessed in their results, and he reasons as follows:—"The unbelieving husband is sanctified in the wife," and vice versa. The proof of this is, that, if it were not so, "your children would have been unclean," i. e., have remained unbaptised; "but now they are holy," i. e., have been baptised. The words "unclean" and "holy" cannot, in the original, mean anything else. But there are other passages which are still more conclusive—"Children, obey your parents in the Lord" (Eph. vi. 1; Col. iii. 20). Nobody would think of contending that any children but such as had been made Christians are addressed.

It was this circumstance, doubtless, which led to a continuation of the apostolic custom of laying hands on the baptised by the successors of the apostles. This, under other circumstances, might have seemed a blind following of the apostles, and an empty form. For, after baptism had come to be administered in the name of the Trinity, and the Holy Ghost, in consequence, to be given at the font itself, why should there have been any subsequent imposition of hands, had the majority of those who were brought to the font been always adults? But from the time that infant baptism became a custom, it must have been felt at once that the majority brought thither, being such as could not answer for themselves, might reasonably continue to receive imposition of hands from the heads of the church as before, though not on the same grounds as before, nor yet as soon. For, if it was no longer their first introduction to the gift itself, it would nevertheless serve to remind them of the presence of the gift within them, and of their consequent obligations, at the earliest age they could be supposed capable of appreciating either. Infant baptism in this way supplied grounds for the ceremony which we call confirmation; but this should not lead us to confuse two things, in other words, prevent our recognising that the apostles laid their hands on the baptised for one purpose, and their successors for another.

II. If we turn from the teaching of the apostles to that of the fathers, we shall find the identity between them so strong, as almost to lay us open to a charge of tautology for epitomising both. We must, therefore, be brief in our citations from the fathers, where there is nothing distinctive to remark upon. First of all, there was but one opinion among them about the form and matter of the rite, then obligatory. St. Justin says: "Whosoever are persuaded and believe that the things said and taught by us are true, and promise to the best of their ability to live thus, are taught to pray and ask with fasting from God the remission of their past sins, all of us praying and fasting with them. Then they are brought by us to where there is water: and that they may be regenerated in the same way in which we ourselves were regenerated, they are forthwith washed in the water, in the name of the Father and Lord of all, and of our Saviour Jesus, and of the Holy Ghost" (Apol. i. 61). "The law of baptising has been imposed and the form prescribed," says Tertullian: "Go teach the nations," said He, "baptising them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost" (De Bapt. c. 13). "Such," he says in another place, was "the command given by Christ to the eleven, in returning to His Father, after His resurrection" (De Praescrip. c. 20). Origen on the Romans still more decisively (v. 8): "You may ask this also, perchance: why, when our Lord bade His disciples baptise all nations in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, the apostle should, in referring to baptism, have made mention of the name of Christ alone in this place, where he says: 'As many of us as were baptised into Jesus Christ,' &c. For, unquestionably, no baptism is accounted valid, except in the name of the Trinity." On the remaining four points they were not less explicit: and substantially, not less unanimous. All of them followed the apostles in recognising types of baptism in the O. T., even if they pushed this now and then too far. "Noah," says St. Clement, "by his ministry preached regeneration to the world" (Ep. i. 9). "When the elements of the world had been ordained," says Tertullian, "and inhabitants had to be given to it, it was water that was first commanded to bring forth creatures endued with life. Water was the first to bring forth animals, in order that it might be no new thing in baptism for water to have life-giving properties" (De Bapt. c. 3). "Is any perplexed," says St. Cyprian (Ep. 76, ad fin. Ed. Ben.), "because some who are baptised when sick, are still assaulted by unclean spirits, let him know that the pertinacious wickedness of the devil has power up to the saving water, but in baptism it loses all its venomous influence—a type whereof we see in king Pharaoh, who, long struggling and treacherously delaying, could resist and prevail till he came to the water: but having come thither, was conquered and destroyed. That sea the apostle Paul declares to be the mysterious image of our baptism (1 Cor. x. 1-2)." "And we," says St. Justin, "who have come to God by Christ, have received, not that circumcision which is according to the flesh, but the spiritual circumcision, which Enoch and his companions kept, but which we who were born sinners have received, by the mercy of God, through baptism, and which all may receive thus" (Dial. c. Tryph. c. 43). A vast collection of passages carefully translated, and quoted at length, on this head may be seen in Dr. Pusey's Tract on Baptism (No. 67 of Tracts for the Times) p. 301 and onwards, in which the meaning of every type, rite, and prophecy bearing upon baptism in the O. T. is exhausted, and many sayings of our Lord in the N. explained. His own baptism similarly received abundant comment, illustrating its significance from the literal account given of it in the gospels alone. Thus "Jesus," says St. Cyril of Jerusalem, "sanctified baptism, when He was baptised Himself. He was baptised, though sinless, that He might bestow grace and worth on those who receive baptism" (Cat. iii. 11). "St. Luke," says St. Augustine, "first records the baptism of our Lord, and then traces His pedigree: making seventy-seven generations between Him and God, through Adam—in other words, symbolising by this number, the abolition of all sins in baptism. Not that there was anything in Him to be removed by baptism: but that He descended in His own Person to show the benefit that we should gain by it—and though it was the baptism of John that He received, yet in His case it was accompanied by a sensible revelation of the Trinity of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, thus consecrating the baptism of Christ Himself, in which Christians were to be baptised subsequently—the Father, in the voice that was heard from heaven; the Son in the Man-Mediator; the Holy Spirit in the dove" (Serm. li. § 33, Ed. Ben.).

As to the light in which they regarded baptism themselves, there is probably no subject on which they kept closer to Scripture. They called it "the bath, the holy bath, regeneration, second birth, illumination, God's mark, or seal." "Before a man receives the name of the Son of God," says St. Hermas (iii. 9, 16), "he is doomed to death: but on receiving that seal, he is freed from death, and consigned to life. But that seal is the water, in which men descend that are due to death: and out of which they ascend handed over to life. To them, therefore, was that seal preached: and by using it, they enter into the kingdom of God." Then follows a digression on the apostles, whose preaching it was. "That was rightly said by the Shepherd," says St.

Clement of Alexandria (Strom. vi. circa med.), in reproducing the whole passage. St. Irenaeus (iii. 17) in the same way speaks of our Lord "giving His disciples the power of regeneration, when He bade them go and teach all nations, baptising them in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost." "Happy the Sacrament of water," says Tertullian, "which is ours, and in which the ill effects of our original blindness having been washed away, we are set free for eternal life. . . . True to our prototype, Jesus Christ, whose name is Ἰησους, we that are named after Him are born in water, and cannot otherwise live than by remaining in it" (De Bapt. c. 1). "Let us therefore," says St. Cyprian (De Zelo et Liv. c. 8), after quoting Col. iii. 1-6, "who, according to the carnal sins of the old man, having both died, and are buried in baptism, and who have risen together with Christ in heavenly regeneration, let us both think and do the things which are of Christ as the same apostle again teaches and admonishes (1 Cor. xv. 47-9)." "On entering the baptistery," says St. Cyril (Cat. xx. 2), "you put off your garments—a type of the old man which you have put off also. Stripped of your garments, you were naked, imitating Christ on the Cross: Who thus 'having spoiled principalities, made a show of them openly, triumphing over them in it.' Afterwards, you were brought to the font, as Christ was from the cross to the sepulchre. There, each one was asked if he believed on the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. Then, having made this salutary confession, you went down into the water thrice, and came out again: thus symbolising in figure the days passed by Christ in the grave." The difficulty, in extracting such passages, is where to stop. Equally striking is the incorporation, which Dr. Pusey fills pages in shewing (p. 35 et seq., and p. 58 et seq.), of those texts, John iii. 3 and Tit. iii. 5, into "every baptismal Liturgy, from Britain to India." That there was but one baptism is a further point which the fathers were unanimous in insisting upon: so much so, that a profession to that effect was at length inserted in the creed of the church. Hence, in affirming that the baptism of blood, or martyrdom—the baptism with which our Lord was baptised after that of John, as Tertullian says (De Bapt. c. 16)—was of equal, if not superior, efficacy to that of water, they did not mean that when baptised Christians were martyred, they were rebaptised: but only that those who were martyred, if they had not been baptised previously, were baptised then. In the same way, there was no real difference in principle between those who were for baptising heretics coming over to the church, and those who were for receiving them with imposition of hands only. Firmilian vindicated his practice from custom, as well as pope Stephen (ap. S. Cypri. Ep. 75; comp. what Dionysius of Alexandria says in Euseb. H. E. vii. 7). St. Cyprian and the Easterns who supported him held that baptism administered by heretics was no baptism at all: consequently, that there was no question of re-baptising them, when that rite was administered to them for the first time in the church. Any that had been baptised in the church, he says, in express terms, he never received otherwise than by imposition of hands, did they fall away and return (Ep. 74, ad fin.).

Firmilian (Ep. 75) seems to have been peculiar in baptising those who had received baptism from regularly consecrated bishops, become heretics. But this was exceptional to the question then at issue, which was, whether heretics coming over to the church, who had never been in the church before, were to be baptised or not. "Some of my colleagues," he says, "unaccountably suppose that heretics ought not to be baptised: because, say they, there is but one baptism. Now, why is there but one, except because the church is one: and there can be no baptism outside the church? (Ep. 71). . . . If you grant that heretics can baptise," he says in another place, "you cannot deny there are as many churches as heresies" (Ep. 76). He argued, in general, from the unity of the church, and from that alone. Had it been the eucharist, instead of the baptism of heretics that was being discussed, his opponents would have agreed with him to a man. Even St. Augustine (De Bapt. c. Don. i. 15-18, and iv. 23 et seq.), the most outspoken of them all, maintained that heretical baptism, though valid, carried with it no remission of sins, nor had any saving efficacy whatever, till its recipients joined the church. For some reason or other, the tendency from apostolic times downwards has been to minimise restrictions both in administering and receiving baptism, and to multiply them in administering and receiving the eucharist. As anybody might receive baptism, anybody might confer it. Anybody might be the means of bringing anybody to Christ. Lay-baptism, as has been pointed out, would seem to have been authorised by our Lord Himself; deacon-baptism by His apostles. In the same way, according to the teaching of the fathers, to which we shall return again, anybody might baptise. They were led to say this on the same principle that they administered baptism to infants: namely, from the sense they entertained of its overwhelming necessity to salvation—a necessity which they were unanimous in finding laid down in those words of our Lord which St. John records, and in the Epistle of St. Paul to the Romans—overwhelming, indeed, yet not absolute. St. Augustine may suffice to be cited on both points. "Hear the gospel," he says (Serm. cxcv. 8 and 16), "you that are for sending unbaptised infants into the kingdom of heaven—hear the gospel: 'Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God.' It is the Lord who speaks thus: whom nobody resists, but he that is no Christian. . . . Wherefore let no man deceive us. The Scripture is of the clearest: the authority of the highest; the faith most catholic. Everybody that is born is condemned: nobody save the regenerated is set free." Further on, he quotes St. Cyprian in his favour, as follows:—"Moreover, if the greatest of sinners may obtain remission of their worst sins on believing, and baptism and grace are denied to none, how much less ought it to be denied to the infant, who, just born, has never sinned, except that he has inherited the contagion of the old death transmitted to him from Adam, through his birth according to the flesh; and who therefore may come with all the more assurance to receive remission of sins, as the sins which are forgiven him are not his own" (§ 19, and St. Cypri. Ep. 59). That infant baptism was not unknown in apostolic times has been already shown; and it was current in the next age, as the following passage from St. Irenaeus proves:—"Christ came to save all through Himself—all, I say, who through Him are born again unto God: infants, and young children, boys, youths, and elders" (Haer. ii. 22). Origen also says:—"By the sacrament of baptism, the uncleanness of our birth is put away, and therefore infants are baptised" (Hom. xix. in St. Luc.). Yet, even then, we find Tertullian (De Bapt. c. 18) debating whether infants might not have their baptism deferred advantageously till they grew up. "Quid festinat innocens aetas ad remissionem peccatorum?" is his terse remark: and from this letter of St. Cyprian we see that it was a moot point still. Only, let us remember, that the question, as it was then argued, had a twofold aspect and a twofold application—a twofold aspect: as it was influenced 1. by the stern notions then prevalent on the subject of post-baptismal sin; and 2. by the completeness of the remission of all sins whatsoever, which everybody believed was obtained at the font;—a twofold application: as it was argued in the interest of adults as well as infants. Constantine the Great, it is well known, deferred his baptism to his dying day. There were numbers who were for imitating him in the days of St. Chrysostom. "Now should it happen," he says, "that death coming upon us unexpectedly, which God forbid, we depart hence uninitiated, no matter how many good things we may have acquired, there will be nothing in store for us, save gehenna and the venomous worm: the fire unquenchable, and chains insoluble" (Hom. in Joh. xxv. 3; comp. ib. xviii. 1). But it is just here that St. Augustine comes in again, taking his text, as before, from St. Cyprian. "That martyrdom is sometimes a substitute for baptism, the same blessed Cyprian showed abundantly from the case of the unbaptised robber, to whom it was said 'To-day shalt thou be with me in paradise': and from constant reflection on whose circumstances I have learnt myself, not only that suffering for Christ's sake may compensate for the defect of baptism, but that faith and conversion of heart also may, where there has not been sufficient time for administering the baptismal rite. For this robber was crucified, not for Christ's sake, but for his own crimes. Nor was it that he suffered because he believed; but that he believed whilst he suffered. Thus it has been made plain to us through this robber, of what force that saying of the apostle:—'With the heart man believeth unto righteousness, and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation'—is, even where the visible sacrament of baptism cannot be had. But this is then made good to us invisibly, when what has precluded its administration has been the dictation of necessity, not any scorn of religion" (De Bapt. c. Don. iv. 29).

This extract alone shows how far he was from considering baptism absolutely necessary to salvation even in Christian lands, where people were not deprived of it by their own negligence, but by circumstances beyond their control. Nor must it be forgotten that he said this, with his view bounded by the horizon of the Roman empire. Can we suppose that he would have stopped there, had his range been enlarged and his eyes opened to the countless millions outside that circle, to whom, fifteen centuries from his own time, the glorious gospel is not yet known, simply because it has not yet been preached? His answer to the second question of Deogratias, in point of fact, covers their case (Ep. 102).

It was due to his logic, rather than to his circumstances, perhaps, that he was oppressed with difficulties about unbaptised infants. This, in his own words, was his position. He was convinced that man had fallen into sin of his own free will, and from no fault of God, nor any supposed necessity whatsoever. He was equally convinced he could not be freed from the effects of his sin by any power or act of his own, but only by the grace of God through Jesus Christ, the indispensable Mediator between God and man. He held, therefore, that whosoever departed this life, young or old, without the grace of Christ and without His sacrament, was gone to be punished; and at the judgment-day would rise with his body to be punished further (Ep. 166, § 5). Infants, who died never having done good or evil, would, if they had not been baptised previously, be condemned for original sin, but for that alone. Thus their punishment would be the lightest conceivable, though they would be excluded from heaven (Ep. 215, § 1).

It was due to his circumstances rather than to his logic, that while maintaining heretical baptism to be valid, he disowned its having any saving efficacy. For as yet there were no heresies old enough to have produced generation after generation of unconscious heretics; as yet the external unity of the Church had known no breach. What St. Augustine wrote was sure to be widely read and long and largely followed: still on both points his judgment has been since modified. Church legislation, indeed, has not been so clear on the latter point as it might have been. The 8th canon of the first council of Arles reads much too pronounced to be genuine. For the 19th of the Nicene canons merely decides against the baptism of the followers of Paul of Samosata: and the 7th of the Constantinopolitan canons—if it was really passed then (Beveridge's Synod. ad l.)—enumerates the heretical baptisms which it allows, and those which it denies as void. Gradually the rule observed in the West, whether it originated at Arles or not, was that baptism administered with water in the name of the Trinity, no matter by whom, was true baptism: and that all heretics, so baptised, were to be received with imposition of hands alone. The Eastern rule differed only from this in maintaining that a wrong belief in the Trinity vitiated baptism, even when conferred in their name. Finally, Novatian having denied that those who lapsed or betrayed their faith to escape persecution could ever afterwards be restored to communion, this point was decided in their favour by the church at large, and his view of it having been adjudged heretical, a system of canonical penance was elaborated, as time went on, for all other forms of post-baptismal sin.

Similarly, there was nothing in the teaching of the fathers on the effects of baptism, but what was at once Scriptural and practical. They were faithful exponents both of the power of baptism as ordained by God, and of its actual issues, as received by man. "For me," says St. Cyprian of himself, "while I yet lay in darkness and bewildering night, and was tossed to and fro on the billows of this troublesome world, ignorant of my true life, an outcast from light and truth, I used to think that second birth, which divine mercy promised for my salvation, a hard saying according to the life I then led: as if a man could be so quickened to a new life in the laver of healing water, as to put off his natural self, and keep his former tabernacle, yet be changed in heart and soul! How is it possible, said I, for so great a conversion to be accomplished? Such were my frequent musings, for whereas I was encumbered with the many sins of my past life, which it seemed impossible to be rid of, so I had used myself to give way to my clinging infirmities, and from despair of better things, to humour the evils of my heart, as slaves born in my house, and my proper offspring. But after that life-giving water succoured me, washing away the stain of former years, and pouring into my cleansed and hallowed breast the light which comes from heaven, after that I drank in the heavenly Spirit, and was created into a new man by a second birth, then marvellously what was before doubtful became plain to me; what was hidden was revealed; what was dark began to shine; what was before difficult now had a way and means; what had seemed impossible could be now achieved; what was in me of the guilty flesh now confessed that it was earthy; what was quickened in me by the Holy Ghost now had a growth according to God" (De Grat. ad Don. § 2, Oxford Tr.). This was his own case: but there were cases widely different from his. "Plainly, the same spiritual grace which is equally received in baptism by believers, is afterwards diminished or increased by our act and conversation: just as the seed which the sower went out to sow in the gospel was equally sown: but according to the varieties of soil on which it fell, some came to nothing, some yielded fruit that sprang up, and increased thirty, or sixty, or a hundred-fold," as he says elsewhere (Ep. 75). "He who has not been baptised," says St. Basil, "has not been illuminated. Without light the eye cannot discern the objects belonging to it, nor the soul attain to the contemplation of God Singularly akin to baptism is Easter-day: for on that day we commemorate the resurrection, and in baptism, there is the power of rising. Let us, therefore, on the day of the resurrection receive this power" (Hom. de Dir. xiii. § 1). "Whence are we Christians," he asks in another place (De Sp. S. c. 10, and comp. the five following), "by faith, perchance some one will reply. But in what way? Having been regenerated by the grace conferred in baptism? Assuredly: for how else? If, therefore, baptism was to me the beginning of life, and that day of regeneration the first of days, it is clear that word must be the dearest of all to me which I pronounced then," viz. the profession he made. St. Chrysostom, whom we might expect more fervid, is even more practical. "Having, then, been counted worthy of these mysteries," as he says in one place, "let us exhibit a life worthy of the gift—a blameless conversation" (Hom. xxv. § 3). And again (De Comp. od Dem. i. 8): "You, when you were baptised, obtained divine grace, and were made partaker of the Spirit, it may be, not to the extent of enabling you to work miracles, but amply sufficient to enable you to lead an upright and correct life: so that it is due to our own carelessness when we go astray. Further, Christ is not going to bestow rewards on those who have merely worked miracles, but on those who have kept His commandments. Those who lead a virtuous life, not those who work miracles, have places assigned them amongst His beatitudes."

To the same effect, others who are less known—St. Chromatius (Tract. in St. Matth. i.), for instance—"Christ's baptism is the washing away of our sins, and the renewal of a saving life. Hear the apostle proving this (Gal. iii. 27 and Rom. vi. 4). By baptism, therefore, we are dead to sin, but live to Christ. We are buried to our former life, but raised to our new life. We have put off the errors of the old man, and put on the garments of the new man." And St. Gaudentius (Serm. viii.)—whose turn of mind on ritual was almost medieval:—"Let the home of a Christian and baptised man be closed to the devil: let it be thoroughly humanised and hospitable. Let it be sanctified by continual prayer. Let psalms, hymns, and spiritual songs be in frequent use there. Let the word of God and the sign of Christ be in its heart, on its lips, and on its brow: in drinking, in conversation, in ablutions, in bed; in going out, in coming in; in joy and in sorrow: that according to the teaching of the blessed Paul, whether ye eat, drink, or do anything whatever, you may do all in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath called us unto grace." Finally, Leidrad, bishop of Lyons at the end of the 8th century (De Bapt. c. 6): "A man is restored by baptism to the pristine condition of the first man before the fall: yet not so, that after baptism, he may consider himself secure while he lives. For he has a struggle to support all his life, with the ruler of wickedness, the devil"

It was plainly no part of their teaching that the grace bestowed in baptism included immunity from sin in future, or was irresistible or indefectible. According to St. Augustine, the whole church was committed to a daily confession of sins in the Lord's Prayer (Serm. 181, § 6 et seq.).

It has been pointed out already, that our Lord in parting from His apostles commissioned them to baptise. Thus they, in strictness, received the charge, though they performed it through others. This explains the theory that has been maintained ever since. "Without the bishop," says St. Ignatius (Ad Smyrn. § 8), "it is neither lawful to baptise, nor celebrate the love-feast." And Tertullian—as if bent on expanding his meaning (De Bapt. c. 17)—"The chief priest, who is the bishop, has the power of giving baptism: and after him, presbyters and deacons, yet not without his authority, for the honour of the church, which must be maintained, to maintain peace. Otherwise laymen have the right as well The word of God," he continues, "ought not to be hidden from any. Wherefore baptism, which is equally derived from God, may be administered by all. Only laymen should consider themselves all the more bound to act with moderation in this matter, seeing that their superiors are similarly bound, lest they should usurp what has been set apart to the bishop ... In other words, they should be content to act in emergencies, whenever the conditions of time, place, or person are imperative." St. Cyril of Jerusalem (Catech. xvii. 35), and St. Jerome (Adv. Lucif. § 9), simply repeat this passage. St. Augustine, when he speaks to the point (Cont. Ep. Parm. ii. 29), is more reserved; but when, arguing against the Donatists in general, he says (De Bapt. c. Don. v. 14): "Per quemlibet enim ministrum detur, illius est baptismus de quo dicitur: 'Hic est qui baptizat'" he concedes all. St. Ildefonse, bishop of Toledo in the 7th century, whose work is a mosaic of quotations mostly from St. Augustine, speaks to the same effect as Tertullian (De Cogn. Bapt. c. 116).

Little more need be said than that the treatises of St. Ildefonse in the 7th, and of Leidrad in the 8th century, prove that the teaching on baptism in their day was not to be distinguished from that of the fathers, save that, perhaps, the instruction on the creed given to catechumens was becoming more and more dogmatic, and had proportionably more stress laid on it. St. Nicetas, in the 5th century, closed his explanation of it by bidding his hearers: "Remember the covenant which they had made with the Lord, viz. the creed which they had confessed before angels and men. And whether they sat, worked, slept, or watched, they were to be turning over this salutary confession in their hearts" (Exp. Symb. ad fin.). The work of St. Ildefonse seems put together, in short, on the assumption that every candidate for baptism should be well acquainted with dogma. There are some passages in it besides on miraculous fonts, which show that superstition was creeping in (c. 105-6).

But both his work, and that of Leidrad, end with a short account of the eucharist, on the unimpeachable principle, "Quod oportet renovatos per baptismum mensae Dominicae applicari." And an apposite quotation is given by the latter (c. 9) from St. Augustine, which may well be transcribed, as it stands, to conclude the subject. "Optimè Punicī Christiani baptismum ipsum nihil aliud quam salutem: et sacramentum Corporis Christi nihil aliud quam vitam vocant. Unde? nisi ex antiquā, et existimo, et Apostolicā traditione, quā Ecclesiae Christi insitum tenent, praeter baptismum et participationem mensae Dominicae, non solum ad regnum Dei, sed nec ad salutem et vitam aeternam posse quemquam hominem pervenire. Hoc enim et Scriptura testatur, secundum ea quae supra diximus. Nam quid aliud tenent, qui baptismum nomine salutis appellant, nisi quod dictum est: 'Salvos nos fecit per lavacrum regenerationis': et quod Petrus ait 'Sic et vos simili formā baptismi salvos facit.' Quid aliud etiam, qui sacramentum mensae Dominicae vitam vocant, nisi quod dictum est: 'Ego sum panis vivus, Qui de caelo descendi': et 'Panis quem Ego dederō, caro mea est pro saeculi vitā': et 'Si non manducaveritis carnem Filii hominis, et sanguinem biberitis, non habebitis vitam in vobis'" (De pecc. mer. et rem. i. 34).

There have been numberless works written on baptism, controversial as well as didactic, but only those which embody the mind of the first eight centuries of the church are to our purpose. Among these may be named Wall on Infant Baptism, Bingham on Lay Baptism, and the learned Editor of the Library of the Fathers, in a note to Tertullian, on heretical baptism. No. 67 of the Tracts for the Times, and Wilberforce on Baptism exhaust the general subject.

BARADATUS (VARADATUS), a celebrated hermit near Antioch, in the 5th century. After many years of utter seclusion in a cell so small that he could neither stand nor lie in it, he was at last induced by Theodotus the bishop of Antioch to come forth. He appeared wrapped in skins from head to foot, with the exception of his mouth and nostrils. Among other eminent monks and hermits, he was consulted by the emperor Leo after the Council of Chalcedon (Theod. Phil. 27; Evag. Hist. ii. 9; Niceph. Hist. xv. 22; *Assem. Biblioth. [E. B. C.]

BARBELITAE, one of the names given to certain Ophitic Gnostics (Epiph. i. 85 B), taken from BARBELO, a personage in their mythology. Theodoret (H. F. i. 13) calls them Barbeliôtæ, apparently on no independent authority. The common text of Irenaeus (p. 107) speaks of multitudo Gnosticorum Barbelo; but Mr. Harvey reasonably suggests that Barbelo came in from the margin. This sentence refers to a "multitude" of heretics, "some" only of whom are said in the next sentence to have "imagined" (ὑπέθευτο) Barbelo. [BORBORIANI.] [H.]

BARBELO (Βαρβηλά Iren., Epiph., Philast., Pist. Soph., Hier.; -ρω Epiph. as an alternative, 92 A, and similarly the Epitome, p. 354 Dind.; -λ, Epit. l. c. bis; -λωθ Theodoret), a mythological personage in several forms of Ophitic Gnosticism. She is obscurely described by Irenaeus (p. 107) as "a never-aging aeon in a virginal spirit," to whom, according to certain "Gnostici," the Innominate Father wished to manifest Himself, and who, when four successive beings, whose names express thought and life, had come forth from Him, was quickened with joy at the sight, and herself gave birth to three (or four) other like beings. She is noticed in several neighbouring passages of Epiphanius, who in part must be following the Compendium of Hippolytus, as is shown by comparison with Philaster (c. 33), but also speaks from personal knowledge of the Ophitic sects specially called "Gnostici" (i. 100 f.). The first passage is in the article on the Nicolaitans (i. 77 f.), but is apparently an anticipatory reference to their alleged descendants the "Gnostici" (77 A; Philast.). According to their view Barbelo lives "above in the eighth heaven;" she had been 'put forth' (προβεβαλῆσθαι) "of the Father;" she was mother of Jaldabaoth (some said, of Sabaoth), who insolently took possession of the seventh heaven, and proclaimed himself to be the only God; and when she heard this word she lamented. She was always appearing to the Archons in a beautiful form, that by beguiling them she might gather up her own scattered power. Others, Epiphanius further seems to say (78 f.), told a similar tale of Prunicus, substituting Caulcau for Jaldabaoth. In his next article, on the "Gnostici" (83 CD), the idea of the recovery of the scattered powers of Barbelo, "the Mother above," stolen from her by "the Archon who made the world, and the other gods and angels and daemons who were along with him," recurs as set forth in an apocryphal Book of Noria, Noah's legendary wife. In both places Epiphanius represents the doctrine as giving rise to abominable immorality. In a third passage (91 f.), enumerating the Archons said to have their seat in each heaven, he mentions as the inhabitants of the eighth or highest heaven "her who is called Barbelo," and the self-generated Father and Lord of all things, and the virgin-born (αὐτολόχουρον) Christ (evidently as her son, for according to Irenaeus her first progeny, "the Light," was called Christ); and similarly he tells how the ascent of souls through the different heavens terminated in the upper region, "where Barbero or Barbelo is, the Mother of the Living" (Gen. ii. 20). Theodoret (H. F. f. 13) merely paraphrases Irenaeus, with a few words from Epiphanius. In the Pistis Sophia Barbelo is named often, but her place is not clearly defined (cf. Köstlin in Baur and Zeller's Jahrbücher for 1854, p. 61). She is one of the gods (p. 359), "a great power of the Invisible God" (373), joined with Him and the three "Thrice-powerful deities" (379), the mother of Pistis Sophia (361) and of other beings (49); from her Jesus received His "garment of light" or heavenly body (13, 128; cf. 116, 121); the earth apparently is the "matter of Barbelo" (128) or the "place of Barbelo" (373). Jerome several times includes Barbelo in lists of portentous names current in Spanish heresy, that is, among Priscillianists; Balsamus and Leusibora being three times associated with it (Ep. 75 c. 3, p. 453 C. Vall.; c. Vigil. p. 393 A; in Esai. lxvi. 4 p. 361 C; in Amos iii. 9 p. 257 F).

Barbelo doubtless represents one of the various attempts to imagine a supreme female principle, the single passive antecedent of creation in its manifoldness. The only plausible etymology of the name that has been proposed is that of Harvey (on Irenaeus, l. c.), and Lipsius (Gnosticismus, p. 115; Ophit. Syst. in Hilgenfeld's Zeitschrift for 1863, p. 445), Barba-Elo, The Deity in Four, with reference to the tetrad (sufficiently ill defined in our present text, at least), which by the report of Irenaeus proceeds from her. Her relation to this tetrad bears however no true analogy to the Col-Arba of Marcus [COLAR-BASUS]; it forms only the earliest group of her progeny; and it is mentioned but once. The root babél, much used in the Targums (Buxtorf, Lex. Rab. 309), in biblical Hebrew balal, signifying mixture or confusion, suggests a better derivation for Barbelo, as denoting the chaotic germ of various and discrete existence: the change from ζ to η is common enough, and may be seen in the alternative form Βαρβηρώ. If the BABEL of Justinus (Hipp. Haer. v. 26; x. 15) is identical

BARCABBAS and BARCOPH. Agrippa Castor, according to Eusebius (H. E. iv. 7. 7), stated that BASILIDES "named as prophets to himself Barcabbas and Barcoph, providing himself likewise with certain other [?] prophets] who had no existence, and that he bestowed upon them barbarous appellations to strike amazement into those who have an awe of such things." In Latin transcripts of this passage (Ruf. l. c.; Hier. de Vir. Ill. 21; cf. Routh, R. S. i. 90) the names appear variously in the MSS. as Barchabas, Barchabbas, Baroabas, and Barcoph, Barcob, Barchabos, Barcho, Barchon, &c. Each name virtually recurs elsewhere. According to Epiphanius (i. 83 CD) some of the Ophitic heretics whom he calls "Gnostici" appealed to a certain prophet called Barcabbas, and quoted from him a "foul narrative" (διήγησιν αἰσχράν), the purport of which may have been immoral, but may also, to judge from his language, have been only directed against the doctrine of virginity. Clement of Alexandria quotes books written by Isidore, the son and disciple of Basilides (Strom. vi. 767), which were "expositions of the prophet Parchor." Lastly, Terebinthus or Buddas, the predecessor of Mani according to the story, and heir of Scythianus's books of magic, conversed, we are told, in Persia with the priests of Mithras, and "disputed about the two principles with a certain Parcus and Labdacus," who apparently were of their number (Epiph. i. 621 A; Acta Arch. et Man. 52 p. 188 Routh), Labdacus being in one account called a son of Mithras (Act. Arch.): it seems not unlikely here that in the dative Πάρκω we have a corruption of Παρκῶρ or Παρκῶφ but it is as old as the Latin version of the Acts. There can be no reasonable doubt that the names Barcoph and Parchor are identical ($\eta\tau$), and Parcus, if genuine, another inflected form. It is possible that Barcabbas is only a duplicate of it with the Greek ending superadded; but on this supposition A. Castor must have combined two different reports of the same fact. The alleged prophecies, we see, were evidently current among different Gnostic bodies, and also among Manicheans. It is remarkable that the use of books of this class by the Gnostics is the most prominent circumstance dwelt on by Porphyry (V. Plot. 16) in his account of Plotinus's controversy with them; and Amelius and himself, as well as Plotinus, wrote treatises against the claims set up for some of the books, especially a claim to have been written by Zoroaster. Now we learn from the passage of Clement already cited that Isidore declared the theological allegories of Pherecydes to have been taken "from the prophecy of Ham." Josephus (c. Ap. i. 3) and other authors maintain that Pherecydes derived his materials from the Egyptians or Eastern nations, but the prophecies of Ham appear never to be mentioned, either in this connection or in any other. There was however a tradition that Mizraim, the reputed progenitor of the Egyptians, Babylonians, and Persians, was identical with Zoroaster, and that he was taught magical arts by his father Ham (Rec. Clem. iv. 27; cf. Hom. Clem. ix. 3 f.); and some even identified Ham himself with Zoroaster (Cassian. Coll. viii. 21 ["quantum antiquae traditiones ferunt"], and later writers; cf. Fabricius, Cod. Pseud. V. T. i. 292–308). Thus it is likely that the prophecies referred to in this article belonged to the apocryphal Zoroastrian literature. [H.]

BAR-COCHBA (בַּר כּוֹכְבָּא), SIMON, the celebrated leader of the Jewish insurrection against Hadrian in A.D. 132, or, according to some less trustworthy accounts, 122. His origin and early life are quite unknown; but Graetz (Gesch. der Juden, iv. 159) supposes that his usual title in Jewish literature, Bar-Coziba (בַּר כּוֹזִיבָּא), indicates that he was born in the town Cozeba or Cezib. The more usual and probable interpretation, however, is that the name was given to him, “the son of a lie,” as a bitter commentary on the false hopes which he had excited as “the son of the star.” Rabbi Akiba became one of his most enthusiastic supporters; he addressed him as the King Messiah, and applied to him the prophecies in Numbers xxiv. 17 (whence his name Bar-Cochba), and Haggai ii. 6, 7. The Jews, already greatly discontented under Hadrian’s rule, flocked from all sides to his standard; and the Christians of Palestine were severely persecuted for not joining the national movement. Ticiuius (Tinius) Rufus, the Tyrannus Rufus of the Talmud, was at that time the governor of Judaea; but when he failed to crush the outbreak, Julius Severus was summoned from Britain. The chief seat of the rebellion was Bethar or Beth Zor (Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. iv. 7, calls it Βίθθηρα), to the S. of Caesarea; but it extended over a great part of Palestine. The Romans pursued a cautious policy, and gradually hemmed in the insurgents, until at last Bethar was besieged. It was taken and Bar-Cochba slain in A.D. 135, in the fourth year of the war; according to tradition it fell on the fatal ninth of Áb, on which the temple had been twice destroyed. Hadrian followed up his victory with ruthless severity towards the conquered Jews. A Roman colony was established in Jerusalem, and a temple to the Capitoline Jupiter erected on the site of the temple; and the name of the city was changed to Aelia Capitolina. Some of Bar-Cochba’s coins are extant; they bear the old Hasmonæan type, but are really Roman coins restamped (Graetz, Geschichte der Juden, iv. 157–197; Dion Cassius, lxi. 12–14). [E. B. C.]

BARCOPH. [BARCABBAS.]

BARDAISAN (בַּרדַּיְסַן; Βαρδαισάνης, also -δισ-, also -σιάνης; Bardanes), a Syrian theologian, commonly reckoned among Gnostics. He was born at Edessa (Barhebraeus, Chron. Eccl. ed. Abbeloos and Lamy, Louvain, 1872, p. 49; Abulpharag. jun. Hist. Dyn. p. 79; Epiph. i. 476 D; Theodoret, H. F. i. 22), and received his name Son of Daisan from his mother having brought him forth on the bank of the river Daisan (“the Leaper,” Σκίπρος of Greek writers), which flows by that capital of Osrhoene or N.W. Mesopotamia (Barheb.; Abulph.; cf. Eph. Syr. ii. 439 F). The date of his birth was July 11, 155 (= 465 Aer. Edess.; see Clinton, F. H. iii. 370, corrected by Schöne’s MSS. of Eus. Chron. s. an. Abr. 1706), according to the Chronicle of Edessa (Assemani, B. O. i. 389; the same year is implied by Barhebraeus, l. c.): and we may safely trust the local and virtually contemporary authority, since Bardaisan as an astrologer would assuredly ascertain and record the exact time of his birth (Hilgenfeld, Bardanes der letzte Gnostiker, 1864, p. 112). His parents, Nuhama and Nahashirama by name (Barheb.), were probably rich and noble, for he was educated with a prince who afterwards became Abgar (Epiph. 477 A). He was famed at the court for his skill in archery, of which a singular example has been recorded by an eye-witness (Julius Africanus, Cest. 29, in Vett. Mathem. Opp. Paris, 1693, p. 275 f.). It is said that, “leaving the heathen doctrine of a priest of Mabug” (Hierapolis, the chief seat of the worship of the Syrian goddess Tharatha or Atargatis), “he embraced the faith, and received baptism; yea he taught the doctrine of the Church at Edessa” (Barheb.); but at what period of his life the change took place is unknown. The scanty records (Dionys. Tellar. ap. Assemani, B. O. i. 423; Chron. Edess. ib. 388 ff.) of the Abgars of Edessa do not suffice to identify with confidence the friend of Bardaisan, or to disclose the facts which lie behind the bald statement of Epiphanius, that after his death Bardaisan “survived till the times of Antoninus Caesar.” But the nearly contemporary chronographer J. Africanus (in Routh, R. S. ii. 307; cf. Eus. Chron. an. Macrin. 1 = A.D. 216) speaks of an Abgar in the early years of the 3rd century as “a holy man,” while the Bardesanist Book of the Laws of Countries (Cureton, Spicil. Syr. 31 f.) notices the abolition of the Edessene custom of mutilation in honour of the goddess Tharatha by an Abgar on his conversion to Christianity. These three accounts Hilgenfeld (18 f.) has with reasonable probability brought to converge upon Bar-Mannu, said to have been Abgar from 202 to 217 (cf. Bayer, Hist. Osrh. 169–180), whom he accordingly salutes as “the first Christian king,” and over whose state he supposes Bardaisan to have exercised a powerful influence. We have as yet however no certain knowledge even of the number of reigns of Abgars about this period, much less of their dates (cf. Scott, On Royal Coins of Mesopotamia, in Numism. Chron. 1856, 21–27; Langlois, Numism. d’Arménie, 48 ff., 70 ff.—authorities kindly supplied by Mr. R. S. Poole); and it is quite possible that Bardaisan’s friend, the Christian ruler, should be sought among the last Abgars of the 2nd century. The terms indeed in which the destruction of “the temple of the church of the Christians” by a sudden flood of the Daisan in 203 is noticed by the public archivists (ap. Chron. Edess. l. c. p. 391), writing a few (Bayer, 171) but evidently only a few years later, are hardly consistent with a complete official adoption of Christianity, even at their own time. But it is likely enough that Christianity had long found at the Edessene court the same kind of recognition which was accorded to it at Rome shortly afterwards by the Orientals Alexander Severus and Philip the Arabian, and that Bardaisan had a share in raising the new faith to a more commanding position on the accession of either Bar-Manu or one of his immediate predecessors, and was his trusted counsellor so long as the state lasted. It is probably to his life as a courtier and yet a theologian that Ephraim alludes when he opposes the “rich robes and beryls,” with which “the devil adorned Bar-

The winter of 216 was spent at Edessa by Caracalla, on his Eastern expedition; and about this time he inveigled Bar-Manu into his power, threw him into chains (Xiph. Epit. D. Cass. lxxvii. 12), and apparently sent him to Rome. It seems likely that Caracalla allied himself with a native party discontented with the rule of Bar-Manu (see a fragment of Dion Cassius, l.c.), and thus lent his aid to a reaction of conservative heathenism. Such, we may conjecture, was the occasion of the persecution in which undoubtedly Bardaisan proved the strength and reality of his faith. "He resisted Apollonius, the companion of Antoninus" (on this view, Antoninus Caracalla), says Epiphanius (l.c.; cf. Eus. H. E. iv. 30), "when exhorted to deny that he called himself a Christian: he stood almost as a confessor, and replied with wise arguments, making a manful defence of true religion, declaring that he feared not death, since he would needs have to encounter it, even if he withstood not the emperor." It was perhaps likewise in consequence of Bar-Manu's fall that Bardaisan set forth on an expedition recorded by Moses of Chorene (ii. 66). "He came here," wrote the historian of Armenia (the native land, there is good reason to believe, of the Abgars then reigning at Edessa; cf. Langlois, 49, 56 ff.), "to try to make some disciples among this wild people of heathens. As he was not received, he next went into the fortress of Ani, read the history of the temples, in which were likewise found related the acts of the kings, added to it that which came to pass in his own time, and translated the whole into Syriac." This narrative of Bardaisan, which Moses names as the chief authority for his own history for the period, and which he says was afterwards translated into Greek, ended at the reign of Chosru I, which commenced about 217. Our last glimpse of Bardaisan exhibits him in yet another light, as an interested investigator of Indian religion. The Neoplatonist Porphyry, born in 233, twice appeals to what he had written on this subject; describing him as "Bardanes, a Babylonian, contemporary with our fathers, who held intercourse with the Indians that had been sent to the Caesar with Damadamis at their head" (De Abst. iv. 17: condensed by Jerome, adv. Jov. ii. 14); and again as "Bardanes of Mesopotamia," who learned certain facts in conversation from "Indians" (Sandales is afterwards named as their spokesman) "that had arrived (reading ἀφικόμενοι for -ομένους) in Syria in the reign of Antoninus of Emesa" (De Styge, ap. Stob. Ecl. I. iii. 56), i.e. Elagabalus, A.D. 218-222. The scene of this conference must remain uncertain. Not many years later Armenia contained a Hindu colony (Ritter, Erdkunde, x. 552 ff., cited by Chwolsohn, Ssabier, i. 370). But it is more likely that Bardaisan met the embassy either at Edessa or at Haran (Carrhae), which was only twenty miles distant, on the great road from India to the West (Chwolsohn, i. 339 ff.). The date supplied by Porphyry is confirmed by Moses of Chorene (l.c.), who states that "Partadzan of Edessa" "flourished as a historian at the time of the last Antonine." Bardaisan lived just long enough to witness the commencement of the brighter reign of Alexander Severus, for he died, as we now know from Barhebraeus (l.c.), in 223, at the age of 68.

It has been usual to place Bardaisan more than a generation earlier, under M. Aurelius (161-180), on the authority of the chief Greek writers (Euseb. H. E. iv. 30, followed by Jerome, de Vir. Ill. 33; Epiph. l.c.; Theodoret, H. F. i. 22). So also the Arabic Fihrist of En-Nedim (ap. Flügel, Mani, u. s. v. 85) dates his teaching from thirty years after Marcion, whom he fixes at the first year of "Titus Antoninus" [Pius], i.e. from 168; and Jerome in his version of the Eusebian Chronicle, at M. Aur. 12, i. e. 172. They or their authorities were doubtless all alike misled by the common confusion between the true Antonines and the obscurer secondary Antonines of the 3rd century. The coincidence of so common a name as Apollonius with that of the Stoic preceptor of M. Aurelius is of no weight: indeed two imperial rescripts are addressed to an Apollonius in the years 225, 238 (Cod. Just. v. 18. 4; viii. 43. 3). It may be added that Hippolytus, somewhere about 225, names him (Ἀρδιστανύης, Haer. vi. 35; cf. vii. 31) with Axionicus, an Antiochian contemporary of Tertullian at an earlier year of the century (Adv. Val. 4), evidently as at least a somewhat recent representative of the "Eastern" school of Valentinians. He is not mentioned by Irenaeus, Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, the contemporary anonymous Latin writer on heresies (Suppl. to Tert. de Praesc.), or Origen. The late date, long ago maintained by Dodwell (Diss. in Iren. iv. 35), Grabe (Spicil. i. 317), and others, has been amply vindicated by Priaulx (J. of Asiatic Soc. for 1862, pp. 289 ff., and later), Merx (Bardanes von Edessa, Halle, 1863), and Hilgenfeld (l.c.), and signally confirmed by the explicit and evidently authentic notices in the recently published Chronicle of Barhebraeus. The theory of two Bardaisans has nothing to recommend it: the various epithets, "Syrian," "Mesopotamian," "Babylonian," "Parthian," might all be applied to a native of Edessa; and the episode attested by Moses curiously explains Hippolytus's designation (vii. 31), "Bardesianes the Armenian."

The theology of Bardaisan offers a more difficult problem. Scarcely anything survives of his writings, for the Book of the Laws of Countries, as we shall see presently, must be adjudged to a disciple. With this single exception, it would seem that the Greek and Latin authors had access to no better source of knowledge respecting Bardaisan's doctrines than vague hearsay, even when, as in Epiphanius's case, they show some acquaintance with his personal history. Bardaisan, Epiphanius says, was at first a distinguished Church teacher, accomplished (λόγιος τις) alike in Greek and in Syriac, and the author of many orthodox books; who at length became corrupted by contact with Valentinians, himself set forth a doctrine of many "principles" and emanations (ἀρχαὶ καὶ προβολαὶ), and denied the resurrection of the dead. The same order of change appears in the Syrian Barhebraeus, who makes him "turn aside to the fictions of Marcion and Valentinus," after "teaching the doctrine of the Church at Edessa, and composing treatises against heresies." Eusebius (l.c.) reverses the history. According to him, Bardaisan was exclusively a Syrian writer, attached at first to the school of Valentinus, but afterwards condemning and refuting the greater part of the Valentinian mythology; supposing himself to have passed over to orthodoxy, yet not altogether successful in washing away the stains of his old heresy. Eusebius not only dwells with emphasis on his controversial dialogues against Marcionism and other heresies that "abounded in Mesopotamia," of which we have independent evidence in the statement of Hippolytus (vii. 31) that he was answered by the Marcionist Prepon; but he writes throughout on the assumption that Bardaisan was on the side of the Church. Again according to Moses of Chorene he "had been a disciple of the sect of Valentinus, which he subsequently rejected and combated: he had not however attained to the truth; only, separating from Valentinus, he had formed a sect of his own: yet he did not falsify history." And once more the tone adopted by Moses in speaking of his works is that of kindly admiration. Yet Hippolytus, as we have seen, about the end of his life, ranks him with the "Eastern" school of Valentinians (vi. 35); and to fathers of the 4th century, who encountered the disciples that bore his name, he appears only as a pernicious heresiarch. To one of these, Ephraim of Edessa, we owe nearly all the trustworthy primary evidence that we possess as to his doctrines. In what writings they were contained is not clearly expressed. Once Ephraim mentions "a book," apparently denying the resurrection of the body, which had saddened him for an hour, till he banished the dark cloud of thoughts which it suggested by turning to Holy Scripture (Carm. ap. Acta S. Ephr. Opp. iii. p. 2). Elsewhere he speaks of the deadly power of the Book of 150 Hymns, after the number of the Psalter, by which Bardaisan had beguiled the people's hearts (554; cf. 558); and he often uses language to the same effect. On the other hand Sozomen (H. E. iii. 16) and Theodoret (H. E. iv. 26; H. F. i. 22) tell us that Harmonius, the son of Bardaisan, who had received a Greek education at Athens, was the first to adapt the Syriac tongue to metrical forms and musical accompaniments, and that his hymns with their tunes continued in use at Edessa till Ephraim composed hymns in the same metres, which were henceforth sung to the familiar tunes. They mention no hymns of Bardaisan; and Ephraim is silent on Harmonius. The best explanation of this contradiction, which has hardly received sufficient attention, is to suppose that the book of hymns mentioned by Ephraim was really written by Harmonius, perhaps in his father's lifetime and at his suggestion. According to Sozomen, Harmonius was "not altogether free (οὐ παντάσῃ ἐκτός) from his father's heresy and from the doctrines of the Greek philosophers about the soul, and the generation and corruption of bodies, and regeneration." But this vague statement, on a matter not coming within the range of Sozomen's own knowledge as a Greek, can hardly be pressed, more especially as he does not mention any difference in Bardaisan's own doctrines at different times. It seems at all events impossible, without further evidence, to divide the double personality; and we must be content to gather our knowledge of Bardaisan's theology chiefly from so much of the substance of the hymns as Ephraim has preserved, whether they came directly from his pen or not. Sometimes indeed Ephraim in words refers only to disciples, and it is conceivable that he has mixed speculations of the later sect with those of its founder. There is however no clear trace of such a confusion; and in practice we may safely treat Ephraim's materials as supplied by Bardaisan himself. A possible exception in the case of the last hymns will be noticed further on.

The 56 Hymns of Ephraim against Heresies (printed with a Latin translation in vol. ii. of Ephraim's Syriac works, edited by P. Benedetti, Rome, 1740, pp. 437-560; translated, except Hymns 1-6 a, more accurately into German by Zingerle, Kempten, 1850), are intended to refute the doctrines of Marcion, Bardaisan, and Mani. Sometimes the three heretics are contrasted in rhetorical antitheses; but they are more usually dealt with separately or in pairs, though in some cases it is not obvious who is intended, the name being often withheld, and the ornate copiousness of Ephraim's style being unfavourable to definite statements. Between Hymns 7 and 50 there is little to be gleaned about Bardaisan: the last two hymns comprise almost all the quotations, which are unfortunately very brief. As a critic of doctrines, Ephraim is harsh and unintelligent, but he leaves no impression of wilful unfairness.

Bardaisan's theology, as known to us, is doubtless a mere fraction of his actual theology. His reception of the Pentateuch, which he seemed to contradict, is expressly attested (438 D, 558 B: the Acta S. Ephr. p. liii. include the "Prophets" and "Apostles"); and there is no reason to suppose that he rejected the ordinary faith of Christians, as founded on the Gospels and the writings of the Apostles, except on isolated points. The more startling peculiarities of which we hear belong for the most part to an outer region of speculation, which it may easily have seemed possible to combine with Christianity, more especially with the undeveloped Christianity of Syria in the third century. The local colour is everywhere prominent. In passing over to the new faith, Bardaisan could not shake off the ancient glamour of the stars, or abjure the Semitic love of clothing thoughts in mythological forms.

Ephraim's most frequent complaint is that Bardaisan in effect taught polytheism, which in words he repudiated (443 ff., 547 ff.). He spoke much, it seems, of numerous eternal "Beings" (Itje), while he anxiously maintained their inferiority (554) to the "One God," and apparently contrasted their accessibility to human comprehension with His "unsearchable height" (555 f.). The human soul is once said to have been made by them (555 F), and once they are represented as having "spoken in the Law" (547 DE: cf. Gal. iii. 19; Heb. ii. 2). For the rest, their nature and office are not explained. If we could be sure that they are the subject of some words attributed to a disciple, "minds of fire" (? Seraphim) cannot comprehend ought which is in the Godhead" (555 D), we might with more confidence accept with Ephraim their separate existence. Indeed we may see by the example of Philo's "Powers" how easily the conception of heavenly "hosts" passes into that of the manifestation of Divine attributes. The significance of the name Beings, which Ephraim treats as profanely stolen from the Highest "Being" (556 DE, 444 AB), might be cited for either alternative.

In approaching the subject of Evil, as dealt with by a speculative Christian of the third century, deeply interested in heathen religions, we expect to find clear records, if not of a formulated doctrine, at least of a decisive position. Recent critics accordingly use what they severally lay down to have been Bardaisan's doctrine of evil as a standard for fixing his place in the history of belief. Yet as a matter of fact the evidence is scanty, unsubstantial, and confused. Ephraim once alludes casually to some designation of the evil spirit as "the dregs of the principle of darkness" (504 c); a phrase which recalls the origin of Ophiomorphus from the despairing gaze of Jaldabaoth in subiacentem faciem materiae, according to a peculiar sect associated by Irenaeus with Ophites (pp. 109 f.: cf. Lipsius in Hilgenfeld's Zeitschrift for 1863, pp. 421 ff.), and of the evil spirit Fetahil from the face of Abatur reflected "in the black water," according to the Mendaite Thesaurus (i. 309, ed. Norberg). But it is more than questionable whether the reference is to Bardaisan, who is neither named nor indicated within many pages; whereas similar language occurs in En-Nedim's account of Mani (Flügel, 86, 192 f.). The Bardesians are however named, though indistinctly, in the midst of one passage directed chiefly against the Marcionites and their doctrine of the intrinsic evil of the Serpent (483 D); and said, more clearly as to the reference, though still obscurely as to the sense, to hold the derivation of the body from the evil one (553 F). It is difficult to believe that Bardaisan's doctrine of evil, whatever it was, could have left but these slight traces in Ephraim's elaborate refutations, if it had held a leading or determinant place in Bardaisan's own thoughts. If we try to find some guidance in the tenets of disciples, we are met by contradictory evidence. The Greek Bardesians of the fourth century, as we shall see, insist on the independent existence of the evil principle from eternity, as against the Church, while they disallow its indestructibility. The Edessene Book of the Laws of Countries, on the other hand, written apparently before the rise of Mani, and in its doctrine of astral destiny retaining the features of the Bardaisan of Diodorus and Ephraim (see further on), is not darkened by any departure from the ordinary Christian language and tone of the period on the subject of evil. It seems on the whole hardly likely that any speculative difference on this subject can have been considerable enough to exercise a decisive influence upon Bardaisan's theology generally.

That his cosmogony postulated an eternal Matter of some sort, though it may be only a principle of Matter, is attested by a solitary passage (468 DE), in which its co-agency with God is contrasted with the hostile position which it assumed among the Marcionites. In another place Wisdom (Hachmuth) appears as called by Him to His aid in the creation of "the heaven and the world" (444 D). This representation may only have translated into dramatic form the familiar words in Prov. viii. 22-31, on which it was assuredly founded. But an easy identification of "Wisdom" with the Holy Spirit (cf. Iren. 236, 253 f., &c.) would associate it with the following fragments of mythology which meet us in Ephraim's concluding hymns.

They are selected by him, it should be observed, without coherence, merely as specimens of Bardaisan's shameless profanity.

From the Father of Life there was a descent of somewhat, whereby the Mother (cf. Gen. iii. 20; and also Movers, Phön. i. 275 f., 586) conceived and bore a son, called "the Son of the Living" (557 B C). Again Paradise is addressed as "Thou fountain of joy, Whose gate by commandment [the Father's] Opens wide to the Mother;—a place Which 'Beings' divine Have measured and founded, Which Father and Mother In their union have sown, With their steps have made fruitful" (558 B C). We are probably still hearing of "the Mother" under another name, when we read (557 DE) that the Holy Spirit (the Semitic feminine Kuach: cf. Orig. in Jo. iv. 63 f. Ru. . . . τὸ καθ' Ἑβραίου εὐαγγέλιον, ἔνθα αὐτὸς ὁ Σωτὴρ φησὶν Ἄρτι ἔλαβέ με ἡ μήτηρ μου, τὸ ἄγιον πνεῦμα, ἐν μιᾷ τῶν τριχῶν μου κ. τ. λ.) thus addressed the elder of two daughters (whose birth Ephraim declines to expound), "Shame of the Dry" and "Image of the Water" by name: Let her who comes after thee [Syr. "the daughter of thy foot"] To me be a daughter, A sister to thee. (A singular phrase in an invocation of the Holy Spirit in the Acts of St. Thomas [Greek recension only, c. 47; cf. Thilo's note, p. 190: ἐλθέ, . . . ἡ ἱερά περιστέρα ἡ τοῦς διδύμοις νεοσσούς γεννώσα, ἐλθέ, ἡ ἀπόκρυφος μήτηρ]) may have the same ultimate source; and the name of the second daughter is curiously like that of the mysterious "Idol of the Water" worshipped at the neighbouring city of Haran, the return of which from a flight to India is said to have been annually awaited with solemn rites at a temple outside the city [En-Nedim ap. Chwolsohn, i. 343; ii. 40 f.; 301 ff.]) Once more we seem to hear an echo of Wisdom's invitation to her guests (Prov. ix. 1-5) in the pleading hymn to the Holy Spirit, When at length shall it ours be To look on thy banquet, To see the young maiden, The daughter thou settest on thy knee and caressest? (557 F). We may perhaps recognise a similar pleading (? of the Church), addressed to the Father, in the words which a female voice uttered in a "secret" (? mystical) hymn (558 A), My God and my Head, Hast thou left me alone? The resemblance to Ps. xxii. 1, repeated on the Cross, gives little help towards interpretation: Ephraim notices it, but only as a profane borrowing of a fair garb from a holy Psalm; by certain Valentinians, probably Ptolemaeus, the cry was transferred from our Lord to the lower Wisdom, when forsaken by the light (Iren. 37 f.); but in Bardaisan we have no trace of the dramatic accompaniments. The mystical hymn of the Church, "the Daughter of Light," in the Acts of St. Thomas (cc. 6, 7 Gr., pp. 150 ff. of Wright's transl. from Syr.), though in a different strain, suggests the more probable application.

The Semitic feeling respecting relations of sex, so unlike the Persian, Neo-Pythagorean, and other Greek modes of sentiment which early found their way into the Church, is everywhere strongly perceptible. Some distinct utterance on this subject probably gave rise to a singular phrase in Barheb. 47, which cannot be referred to Gnostic licentiousness, Bardaisan being entirely free from that stain. Ancestral forms of speech having the same origin, of which one of the mythological names already quoted may afford an instance, will best explain the enigmatic language of Ephraim about the seat of Bardaisan's Paradise (558 B; cf. 557 D and Hilgenfeld, p. 40); the same imagery recurs in two distinct forms of Syrian Gnosis, in the Simonian Apophysis (ap. Hipp. Haer. vi. 14: ἔστω, φησί, παράδεισος ἡ μήτρα κ. τ. λ.) and among the Sethians (ib. v. 19, p. 140 Mill.); and more obscurely in a third, the strange myth of Elohim and Edem as set forth by Justinus (ib. v. 26).

Before leaving the subjects of the last two paragraphs it is right to recall attention to the fact that the evidence is not furnished by any part of Ephraim's long polemic except the last two hymns. It seems not impossible that the Bardesanist hymns here quoted came into Ephraim's hands after the bulk of his own hymns were written, and themselves belong to a later generation than that of either Bardaisan or Harmonius. Such a hypothesis would explain the singular fact that all this strange Mesopotamian heathenism is unknown to every writer on Bardaisan except Ephraim. The only matter at all similar is the language about the Sun and Moon cited two paragraphs on from Barhebraeus and Abulpharagius; and the doctrine recorded by these two late writers, taken from Syriac sources, might easily be genuine Edessene Bardesanism without being as old as Bardaisan. But on the whole it seems best to follow the usual assumption, though with some misgiving.

On the other hand it cannot be doubted that Bardaisan held a doctrine of resurrection which either amounted, or seemed to amount, to a denial of the resurrection of the body (438 C, 551 B, 553 F; Acta S. Eph. p. l.; Barheb.; Epiph.). According to a single obscure phrase of Ephraim (553 F) he connected the soul with the Seven Stars, as another already cited (555 F), which further refuses to the soul the capacity of understanding its own nature and operation, derives its origin from the heavenly "Beings." It seems also tolerably certain, notwithstanding the silence of Epiphanius, that, like some at least of his followers, he attributed to our Lord a "heavenly" body, as distinguished from an ordinary human body. On this point we have the evidence not only of Hippolytus, who probably refers to his Valentinian period (see further on), but also of Philoxenus of Mabug (ap. Cureton, Spic. Syr. p. vi.). This last Syrian writer (about A.D. 500) likewise (ib.) makes him responsible for statements of a Patristic colour, viz. that "the Ancient of Eternity was a boy," and that "the Child of the Virgin was the Highest."

The Seven Stars, i.e. the Sun, Moon, and five planets, with the heavenly bodies generally, evidently held captive Bardaisan's imagination, if not his reason. "He preaches," says Ephraim, "the signs of the zodiac, and observes the birth-hour, and proclaims the Seven, and inquires after times [by a book, 439 A E, 560 C]; therefore hath he accepted seven plagues, and bequeathed them to his disciples" (550 D: cf. 553 F, Acta S. Eph. p. liii.). Supernal "Beings," the rulers of the bright luminaries, were doubtless to him the ultimate powers. Yet he may not always have known how to distinguish the visible from the invisible. According to the literalism of the later Eastern records (Abulph., Barheb.) he called the Sun the Father of Life, and the Moon the Mother of Life, and represented her as periodically "laying aside her garment of light" for joint renewal of the universe (cf. Plut. de Is. et Osir. 43); and doubtless he saw in the two great lights suggestive images of the Father and the creative Spirit. The same association appears in one of Ephraim's last hymns (558 DE), who adds that Bardaisan spoke of male and female deities and their children, and thus expressed his homage, "All praise, O my rulers, O assembly of gods." It is to be observed that elsewhere (457 f.) Ephraim speaks of differences and relations of sex being attributed by "the Chaldees" to the Seven, the Moon and Venus being female; and a similar statement appears in En-Nedim's account of the Haranites, or heathens of Northern Mesopotamia (ap. Chwolson, ii. 38: cf. 273).

To the same spell of astral superstition we may probably refer the origin of Bardaisan's characteristic modification of Chaldee fatalism, the existence of which cannot be doubted, though its precise nature is difficult to ascertain. Diodorus of Tarsus, a weighty Antiochian writer of the 4th century, devoted the 51st and 52nd chapters of his elaborate treatise on Fate, analysed by Photius (Bibl. cod. 223, pp. 221 f.), to a refutation of the Bardesanist doctrine. They of his sect, he tells us, affect to accept the Prophets, and acknowledge the soul to be free from the power of Genesis (the destiny of birth), and to possess free will; but they place the body under the government of Genesis, for they say that wealth and poverty and sickness and health and death, and all things not within our own control (οὐκ ἐφ' ἡμῶν), are a work of destiny (τῆς εἰμαρμένης). This language, as far as it goes, agrees exactly with the doctrine of the Book of the Laws of Countries, and very possibly has no other origin. That Dialogue (p. 11) puts into Bardaisan's mouth a recantation of a doctrine once propounded by him when he loved the Chaldaic art, that the soul of man is capable of a knowledge possessed by few, viz. of men's designs, failures, successes, and outward vicissitudes, as depending on the influence of the Seven Stars (cf. Merx, 36 f.). There is however nothing to show whether the reference, supposing it to be authentic, is to a time before or after Bardaisan's conversion to Christianity. The testimony of Ephraim, occurring again in the midst of a prolix series of arguments against the thoroughgoing heathen fatalism, is probably confused. Censuring the vulgar destiny, Bardaisan, he complains, vainly thought to invent a better, one which should touch only lower things and spare the higher; the theory apparently being that up to birth destiny is supreme, but that its power dwindles with the growth of mind and will (452 f.). Such a doctrine evidently need be no more than a recognition of physical constitution, leaving the question of Providence untouched; and such a recognition of "Nature" is clearly made in the Dialogue (7-10, 13 ff., 27). The references however to the Stars point rather to some form of Chaldaic "Destiny," properly so called; and the Dialogue once more concedes a certain efficacy to astral Destiny, while maintaining the supremacy of Free Will. Thus it is impossible to say how far the Dialogue faithfully represents Bardaisan's own doctrine of the Stars. It may be that the truest impression of his real mind is to be gathered from some striking extracts taken by Clement of Alexandria from a writing of the "Eastern School," of which, as we saw above, Hippolytus makes him a representative. The difference lies chiefly in the significance attached to baptism as the close of the reign of destiny; yet some of the accompanying words show the difference not to be absolute. A few lines only can be given. "Destiny is a concourse (σύνοδος) of many and contrary powers, and these are invisible and inapparent, directing the motion of the stars, and through them having their action (πολιτευόμεναι). . . . From this strife and conflict of the powers the Lord delivers us, and grants us the peace from the battle-array of the powers and of the angels, some being on our side and some against us. . . . For this cause there arose a strange Star and a new, dissolving the old scheme of the stars, shining with a new light not of the world, the Star which takes its course by new and saving ways, even the Lord and Guide of men Himself, who descended to the earth that He might remove them who believed on the Christ out of destiny into His providence. . . . Until baptism therefore destiny is true, but afterwards the astrologers are no longer found to speak truth. It is not however the Bath alone which makes us free, but the knowledge;—who we were, what we are become; where we [originally] were, and where we have been placed; whither we are hastening, whence we are redeemed; what is generation, what is regeneration" (pp. 985 ff.).

The whole of the direct evidence respecting Bardaisan's theology having been now set forth, the difficulty of interpreting the fragments becomes apparent. Supposing that nothing of his personal history beyond his date and country had been recorded, we should find little, if anything, in his doctrines suggesting a Valentinian origin. Yet the statements of writers so various as Hippolytus, Eusebius, Epiphanius, Moses, and Barhebraeus cannot be set aside, notwithstanding their differences of order. The language of Hippolytus requires to be quoted (Hæc. vi. 35). He first mentions the division of the Valentinians into an Eastern and an Italian School, the latter of whom pronounced the body of Jesus to be psychical only, and to have been united to a higher power only from the Baptism. "But they of the East," he then proceeds, "of whom are Axionicus and Ardesianes, assert that the body of the Saviour was spiritual; for there came on Mary a 'Holy Spirit,' that is, the Wisdom, and [also] the 'power of the Most High,' [that is,] the fabricative art, that what the Spirit gave to Mary might be moulded into form." This brief and vague sketch of doctrine contains nothing indubitably Valentinian in itself: but the introductory statement is circumstantial, and the Valentinian character of the "Eastern School" is placed beyond doubt by the solitary remaining notice of its other representative, Axionicus. Tertullian, while dwelling on the differences of the numerous Valentinians of his own day from each other and from their founder, singles out Axionicus at Antioch for the unique fidelity with which he "cherished the memory of Valentinus by keeping his rules inviolate" (Adv. Val. 1, 4). The fact that Tertullian thus isolates Axionicus, while Hippolytus at a later date combines the two names, is not enough to prove that Valentinianism was the latest phase of Bardaisan's creed. We may on the whole with better reason follow the two most trustworthy authorities, Moses and Eusebius, as well as the probability that his final doctrine was that which was perpetuated at Edessa by his disciples in his name. We can see by the writings of Clement and Irenæus, and the vestiges of Hippolytus's lost Compendium, how rank and vigorous was the growth of Valentinianism about the time of Bardaisan's youth and early manhood; while the constant communication between Antioch and Edessa must have brought it within his knowledge. Its brilliant phantasies may easily have dazzled him while yet an immature convert, if indeed it did not constitute an intermediate stage on his way from heathenism to Christianity. It would be no less natural that, when the enchantment passed away, his belief should still retain traces of Valentinian doctrine; or again, that the earlier and inbred images of native heathenism should permanently affect his thoughts, and generate a peculiar and hybrid creed. Strange to say, however, the traces of Valentinianism are all questionable; and the varying constructions of Neander, Lipsius, Merx, and Hilgenfeld are all alike arbitrary. It is only by importing imaginary Tetrads or Ogdoads, and other extraneous mechanism, that the extant fragments (assumed to be his or his son's) can be made to yield even the semblance of forming part of a Valentinian scheme. Whatever they have in common with Valentinianism seems to belong to Syrian ideas pervading the primitive Asiatic Gnosticism out of which Valentinus developed his partially Greek system. The "syzygies" have no special applicability in the face of the general tendency to range divinities in pairs, male and female, in the religions of "Syria, Arabia, and the basin of the Euphrates and Tigris" (Lenormant, Lettres Assyriologiques, ii. 70: cf. Chwolsohn, ii. 252 f.). Indeed "the Father of Life" and "the Mother" constitute the only Bardesanist pair of whom we have any knowledge. Even if the identity of "the Holy Spirit" or "Wisdom" with "the Mother" were less probable than it is, there is not the slightest ground for representing "the Son of the Living" as her consort (with Hahn, 64, 68 f.), or for giving him the name of "Christ" (with Lipsius, passim). In a passage cited by Hahn, Ephraim declares that "Marcion and Bardaisan impudently deny that there was One Creator of the world; for they attributed the works of the Supreme Maker to things made by Him, so as to confound with them the Son and the Holy Spirit" (444 B). The charge here brought against the heretics cannot be that they assigned a share in creation to "the Son" and "the Holy Spirit,"—the strangest of accusations to proceed from an orthodox Father,—but on the contrary that they recognised in creation the action of the First Person alone of the Godhead, and ascribed to creatures what belonged to the other Persons. These creatures may include the Itje or "Beings" (see just above, 444 A), or Matter (as 468 E), but doubtless, as far as Bardaisan alone is concerned, chiefly Hachmuth or "Wisdom," as just below (444 D), where it is expressly said that the glory of co-operating with the Father in creation had been diverted from the Son to a strange woman, Hachmuth. Such language would be inconceivable if "the Son" and Hachmuth constituted a second cosmogonic pair; and yet on this supposition are built all the efforts to construct a Bardesanist genealogy analogous to the great "Gnostic" schemes of syzygies. Hachmuth herself, the creative "Wisdom," has nothing in common either with the lovelorn ambitious Upper Wisdom of Valentinus, or with her forsaken offspring, the Lower Wisdom (Hachamoth) of the visible world; while both the Valentinian Wisdoms, with their human associations, stand apart from the cosmogonic functions apparently assigned by Bardaisan to the daughters of "the Holy Spirit." Once more the feminine representation of the Holy Spirit is too widely spread to be distinctive. Bardaisan shows no knowledge of a Pleroma, or of Aeons (for his Itje present none of the special characteristics of Aeons), or of a Bythos, or of a Horos, or of a separate Demiurge; or again of the speculative ideas which inspired this mythology. He has various isolated resemblances to various Gnostic systems other than the Valentinian; but stands in no coherent relation to any one of them, nor does he appear to have had any analogous scheme of his own. He cannot, in short, as far as our present knowledge goes, be called a Gnostic, without giving the name a sense so vague as to be unmeaning; but he was haunted by images from the same sources which supplied materials to the Syrian Gnosticisms. So again his language has a certain affinity with that of the Syrian Acts of St. Thomas (likewise wrongly called Gnostic), little as they reflect his mind in their singular rigour; in which however they resemble Tatian, another remarkable Syrian heretic of an earlier generation. Lastly coincidences are not wanting with some of the Manichean records (e.g. with regard to the Mother of Life), though Bardaisan's imperfect and subordinate dualism is far removed from the Persian doctrine of Mani.

On the whole, whatever might have come to Bardaisan through the medium of Valentinianism might as easily have come to him directly from the traditions of his race; and both alternatives are admissible. It is on any supposition a singular fact, that the remains of his theology disclose no traces of the deeper thoughts which moved the Gnostic leaders. That he held a doctrinal position intermediate between them and the Church is consistent with the circumstances of his life, but is not supported by any internal evidence. On this, as on many other points, we can only deplore our ignorance about a person of singular interest.

The Greek Fathers speak of "many" works of Bardaisan as known to them through Greek translations (Eus., Epiph., Theodoret). They name Dialogues against the Marcionists (Eus., Thdt.), that is, probably Prepon (Hipp.), as also other heretics (Eus.; cf. Barheb.); and the Apology in which he "resisted Apollonius the companion of Antoninus, when urged to deny that he was a Christian" (Epiph.), evidently identical with what Eusebius calls his "writings on the occasion of the then existing persecution;" and finally, the Dialogue on Fate, in which he "copiously refuted Avidas the astronomer" (Epiph.; cf. Eus., Thdt.). This last treatise is either the Book of the Laws of Countries, on which more presently, or an extract from it. In Eusebius's text (supported by Rufinus and Jerome, de Vir. ill. 33), the Dialogue is described as addressed "to Antoninus;" but it seems probable that there is either a confusion with Avidas, or a transposition of Antoninus from the next clause: the strange suggestion (Hilgenfeld, 74, 151) that Avidas may be a corruption of Aritus, a name of (Antoninus) Elagabalus, is disproved, if disproof be needed, by its occurrence among native Edessene names in the Ancient Syriac Documents published by Dr. Cureton (pp. 14, 18, 63), which also contain another name found in the Syriac Dialogue (p. 13), Shemashgram, borne by a king and a priest of Emesa (Cureton, 77). In describing the later Bardesanists, En-Nedim (ap. Flügel, Mani, p. 162) says that Bardaisan "is the author of the book The Light and the Darkness, of the book The Spiritual Nature of Truth, of the book The Unstable and the Stable, and of many other writings; the heads of the sect wrote likewise on the same subjects, but their writings have not come to our knowledge." The name however of the first book points to doctrines like those previously described by En-Nedim, belonging to a time when the sect had been subjected to Persian or Manichean influence; and the authorship of all three books must accordingly remain somewhat doubtful. All that is really known of the book of 150 hymns, whether the author be Bardaisan himself or Harmonius, has been mentioned already. On their metre, identical with that of the well-known Greek hymn of Clement of Alexandria, Hahn's essay may be consulted (pp. 28 ff.: cf. Augusti, de Hymnis Syrorum sacris, Breslau, 1814). The nature of the book or books which supplied Porphyry with his extracts on Indian subjects is unknown. A treatise of Bardaisan, "a man of antiquity and renowned for the knowledge of events," "on the conjunctions of the heavenly luminaries," is cited by Aphraates (ap. Cureton, Spic. Syr. 40, 102), a Syrian writer of the fourth century, as stating that a period of 60 years is a multiple of all the times of circuit of the Seven Stars, the calculation being made with a view of "showing that this world would last only 6000 years." The names of the signs of the zodiac current among the Bardesanists have been preserved (Land, Anecd. Syr. p. 32), and are shown by Merx (123 f.) to resemble in their peculiarities the Mendaite nomenclature. A much later date must apparently be assigned (Merx, 61 f.) to a secret alphabet fathered upon Bardaisan in a Syriac MS. of A.D. 1352 ("Assemani, Cat. Bibl. Vat. ii. 522"): it is singular that En-Nedim describes two peculiar alphabets as used by Mani and the Marcionites respectively (ap. Flügel, Mani, 85, 166 ff.).

One treatise alone survives to represent Bardesanist literature, the Book of the Laws of Countries. Till lately it was known solely by a copious extract preserved in Greek in Eusebius's Præparatio Evangelica (vi. 9, 10), where it is thus introduced: "I will also set before thee the proofs of these matters [concerning Fate] furnished by a man who was a Syrian by birth, and who was highly accomplished in the Chaldaic science, Bardesanes by name, who is related to have spoken as follows in his dialogues with his companions." The entire treatise however, in the Syriac original, was recognised by Dr. Cureton among the Nitrian MSS. brought to the British Museum (Add. 14,658) in 1843, and in 1855 published by him in Syriac and English, in his Spicilegium Syriacum, with a preface and notes: a German translation with notes is given by Merx (pp. 25-55). In form the book is a dialogue reported by one Philip as taking place at the house of Shemashgram. These and apparently two other young men, Awida and (p. 11) Barjamma, are conversing on the mysteries of Providence, in consequence of doubts raised by Awida, when they are joined by Bardaisan, who speaks with authority as an elder. For some time Awida and Philip take a small part, but in the last third, which gives the name to the whole, the monologue of Bardaisan is nearly uninterrupted. The natural impulse to confuse the author with the chief interlocutor in an anonymous dialogue [ADAMANTIUS] will sufficiently explain the early ascription of this Dialogue to Bardaisan himself by the Greek Fathers; while not many modern readers are likely to agree with Dr. Cureton in thinking the form of composition compatible with Bardaisan's authorship. The date can hardly be many years later than his death. There is an allusion to the abolition of mutilation (Merx, 53) in honour of Tharatha, in Syria and Edessa, by Abgar the king on his conversion, and a statement that "from that day and up to this hour" mutilation had ceased "in the country of Edessa" (pp. 31 f.); which seems to imply the lapse of some little time since the revolution of policy with which Bardaisan appears to have been connected. But it is also said (p. 30) that "but as yesterday the Romans took Arabia and abrogated all their ancient laws," where the allusion seems to be either to the Arabian war waged by Macrinus in 217-8, or to the great conquest of Arabia by Septimius Severus in 195-6: Dr. Cureton must have overlooked these events, as he refers only to the war (of Avidius Cassius) under M. Aurelius, probably about 162-5. The doctrine of the Dialogue may possibly be Bardaisan's own altogether, as it certainly is in some important respects. But it cannot be accepted unreservedly as furnishing a sufficient standard: and the possibility that it may exhibit a modification of Bardesanist views, produced by contact with orthodox teachers, is not to be forgotten. The real difficulty lies in determining the kind of importance attached by Bardaisan to the mythology quoted by Ephraim from the hymns, supposing him to be responsible for it; for of this there is no vestige in the Dialogue. That the Dialogue does not depart widely from the spirit of Bardaisan's teaching may well be believed. If it was the source of the testimony of Philoxenus (quoted by Cureton, p. v.), "Bardaisan, whom his disciples celebrate in their books for his patience and courteous answers to every man," yet it is likely to have preserved a true local tradition of the old man's gracious ways and intelligent faith.

The starting-point of the reply given to Awida's first doubt, as to the creation of man under a liability to sin, is the need of preliminary faith. Many, he says, "have not the foundation of faith on which to build, or of hope on which to rest. And because they doubt even respecting God, they lack moreover the fear of Him which would deliver them from all terrors. . . . Even in respect of that which they do not believe, they are not sure that they rightly deny it, but they fluctuate in their thoughts, and are unable to gain a standing-ground; the taste of their thoughts is rapid in their mouths, and they are always anxious, fearful, and reckless." He replies to Awida's doubt by reference to the special human prerogative of free will, and the power given to man, as created in God's image, to use the lower creation as his minister; to the stars indeed ("elements") he concedes a certain freedom by which they will be judged, but not comparable to that of man, whereby those who have done the will of their Lord are exalted and hallowed and endowed with glorious gifts; "for every thing that exists has need of the Lord of the universe, and of His gifts there is no end." Awida assents, but complains of the difficulty of keeping the commandments. Bardaisan replies that the will of the soul has power to fulfil the two commandments, of abstinence from evil and performance of good, the latter being the easier task, since evil comes from the enemy, whereas good is a man's own, and so he rejoices when he does that which is good. Here Philip recalls a plea of Awida, that Nature is the cause of man's wrong doing. Nature, the answer is, is the cause of those acts and processes of man which he has in common with all creatures that have life: but its inability to bind the souls of men is proved by their diversity of habits and propensities, and also by their conversions from good to evil or evil to good. Once more Philip and Barjamma repeat another allegation that human responsibility is destroyed by the power of Destiny (Genesis). Bardaisan's answer is careful. He rejects alike the Chaldaic doctrine, once held by himself, that the influence of the Seven Stars determines all the doings and fortunes of men, and the opposite position that Destiny has no existence at all; some who hold this last view maintaining that bodily defects and calamities are fortuitous, and others that they are Divine punishments. He asserts that God in the richness of His wisdom "has given to all things the power which has been suitable for each one of them,"—Angels, Rulers (Schitâne), Governors (Medabbrâne), Elements, men, and animals. As then men are subject to Nature in things of the body, so are they subject also to Destiny depending on Nativity (the configuration of the stars at critical moments), which sometimes helps, sometimes disorders the works of Nature (e.g. by causing disease or poverty), according as the Right or the Left Heads and Governors are in the ascendant, while the free will of man constrains Destiny itself: for "it is befitting that the three things, Nature and Destiny and Free-will, should be maintained in their being, until the outflow (or procession, i.e. of events) be accomplished, and the measure and number be fulfilled, as it has been decreed by Him who pre-ordains the manner of life and completion of all creatures, and the state of all beings and natures." On the subject of Nature Awida is convinced: his remaining doubt about free will on account of Destiny is met by Bardaisan with an appeal to experience. A long list is given of special laws and customs which prevail in different nations and tribes, although in each nation men are born under all configurations of the stars: "in all places, every day and at all hours, men are born in Nativities which are disinct from one another, the laws of men overcome the decree, and they are governed by their customs." In the same manner the Chaldaic assignation of seven "climes" of the earth to the Seven Stars is shewn to be of no weight, since each "clime" includes different sets of laws, local laws themselves are sometimes entirely changed, and national customs are sometimes independent of locality: above all, in whatever place may be "the new race, consisting of ourselves who are called Christians, whom at every place and in all lands the Christ has established by His coming," "the laws of the countries do not separate them from the laws of their Christ; nor does the Destiny of the Governors compel them to use things which in their eyes are unclean; but sickness and health, riches and poverty, which do not come within the scope of their free will, befall them wherever they may be." This limited power, the speaker concludes, proceeds from "that great and holy Will" "which nothing can hinder." He permits their resistance for a time, though they are "bound by the deeds which are done, and by the plans which have been devised for their welfare." "But there will be a time when even the injury which still subsists in them shall be brought to a close by the teaching which will lie in another combination. Then, at the establishment of that new world, all evil disturbances shall come to rest, all revolt shall cease, all the foolish shall be persuaded, and all wants be supplied; and then shall rest and peace prevail, through the gift of Him who is the Lord of all natures."

This sketch sufficiently represents the doctrines of the Dialogue, except perhaps an obscure statement (p. 13) chiefly to the effect that "what is called Destiny is an order of outflow (or procession) given to the Rulers and the Elements by God, and according to this outflow and order the intelligences (or spirits) are changed by their descent into the soul, and the souls by their descent into the body." The term "Beings" (Itje) is elsewhere (p. 5: cf. 4) so employed as to include all creatures.

There are large coincidences of language in the passages of the Dialogue excerpted by Eusebius with a few chapters (19—29) of the ninth book of the Clementine Recognitions as preserved in Rufinus's Latin version; and again, to a less extent, with two "answers" (109 f.) in the second Dialogue bearing the name of Caesarius. A slight examination shews (1) that Caesarius followed the lost Greek Recognitions, and (2) that the Greek Dialogue used by Eusebius, (which sometimes departs from the Syriac by omission, paraphrase, or expansion,) was the intermediate source through which either the Greek Recognitions drew from the Syriac Dialogue, or vice versa. The second alternative is maintained with much ingenuity by Hilgenfeld (Theol. Jahrb. for 1854, 529 ff.; Bardes. 5 ff., 72 ff.; cf. Ritschl, Entst. d. altkath. Kirche, ed. 1, 186 f.; Ewald in Gött. gel. Anz. for 1854, 529 ff.), though it obliges him to postulate a fourth unknown authority supposed to have been used by the Recognitions. All his arguments however from modifications of language are capable of being turned with at least equal force in the opposite direction; and though the Recognitions prefix in the mouth of Faustianus a crude piece of astrological dogma, its presence is no clear mark of superior originality, since it might easily be added for the sake of enabling Greek readers to understand fully the subsequent allusions which wanted no explanation in the native home of astrology. On the other hand, the Syriac Dialogue contains various names and other particulars pointing towards a Mesopotamian origin, which are obliterated partially in the Greek Dialogue, and much more in the Recognitions. If they were absent at first, they must have been carefully infused afterwards without adequate motive, and that at two different stages; whereas they might naturally be dropped by a Greek translator, and yet more by a Greek compiler. In like manner the pruning out of some slight indirect concessions of a certain influence to the Stars agrees exactly with the peremptory controversialism of the Recognitions; but their introduction in this shape by a Bardesanist would be unintelligible. On the whole, a close scrutiny proves fatal to the paradoxes into which Hilgenfeld has been led by his anxiety to throw back the Recognitions in their present form to the earliest possible date, and vindicates Merx's defence of the priority of the Dialogue (88 ff.), though he has failed to prove the indebtedness of the Recognitions to the Dialogue in other books besides the ninth.

After the Dialogue we are without information respecting the Bardesanism which evidently flourished at Edessa till the arrival of Ephraim. He found the city "wretchedly overrun with pernicious sects of all kinds, especially that of Bardaisan" (Acta S. Eph. l. c. p. l.). The members of the sect were, it appears, either unconscious of their heterodoxy or, as Ephraim naturally but perhaps wrongly assumed, dissemblers of it. According to him, Bardaisan had died "with the Lord in his mouth, with demons in his heart" (558 E);—a garrulous sophist (550 D) of tortuous and double mind (554 A), outwardly orthodox, a heretic in secret (438 E), a greedy sheep-dog in league with the wolves (551 B C), a faithless servant (556 D), a cunning dissembler practising deceit with his songs (554 A). Such also he describes the living disciples to be, not beasts of prey, but foxes (468 F), beguiling the unwary by soft words and songs in caves (439 D). It was inevitable that he should misunderstand the immaturities of the earlier time, more especially as he seems to have known nothing of Bardaisan's life and career; but it is likely enough that the Bardesanist creed had long lost its original vitality, and become a mischievous anachronism. As we shall see, it lingered long in the East, but under changed forms.

The silence of Greek and Latin Fathers is sufficient evidence that Bardesanism spread westward little if at all beyond Syria. To this silence there is but a single exception. In the latter years of Constantine, two anonymous Greek Dialogues were written to controvert the doctrines of the followers of Marcion, Valentinus, and Bardaisan. The chief interlocutor, ADAMANTIUS, was early confused with Origen; Marinus, who comes forward in the second Dialogue (III., IV., V. of the editors) to represent Bardesanism, is an equally unknown personage. After declaring his concurrence in the doctrine that there is but one God, Marinus continues: "There are three points in which we do not agree with the Catholic Church: we say that the devil was not created by God; and we deny that the Christ was born of a woman; and we say that the body is not raised" (Orig. Opp. i. 835 Ru.; xvi. 322 Lom.). In another form the three points appear as denials that evil was made by God, that the Word of God took human flesh, and that this flesh, "into which we are bound," is raised. Under the first head Marinus rejects the position of Adamantius that evil is the privation of good by referring to the serpent's beguiling of Eve and the names given to him (sic) in Scripture. He holds the devil to be self-sprung, self-gendered, and recognises two "roots," an evil and a good, the evil root being unable to turn and change its nature; while it produces everything evil or "sinistral," including physical darkness. That the two essences (οὐσῖαι) however of good and evil are alike indestructible is maintained only by the Marcionist Megethius, who is apparently introduced for the sake of giving a complete and symmetrical exposition to dualism; for Marinus says distinctly, "I maintain that God alone is indestructible." On the other hand, he will not allow that evil arises out of man's free-will, lest he should attribute the authorship of evil to God. God's operation, he says, results in what is good, just, merciful, reverent, holy: the good root saves, the evil destroys: God causes man's salvation, the devil his perdition. Yet not the less is God just, judging the devil and his angels and the men who betake themselves to him. So also He is almighty, and contains all things, Himself uncontained. The place of the evil one, he says when pressed, quoting Luke x. 18, is the earth. He ends with his fundamental thesis: if there cannot be two original principles (δύο ἀγέννητα), then the Good Being is the author of evil (839 Ru.; 333 Lom.). After two Valentinians have contributed their solutions of the question, Marinus is called on by the empire to maintain his second thesis (849 Ru.; 360 f. Lom.). No ground of the Bardesanist negation beyond an instinctive shrinking comes to light: Marinus "deems it altogether most absurd to attach to the inviolate (ἀχράντη) essence" the assumption of flesh "of our substance" (ὕποστώσεως): such a notion appears to him shameful (φέπει αἰσχρος). But he eagerly quotes passages of Scripture (1 Cor. xv. 40 ff.; Eph. iv. 10; John iii. 13) in support of his aversion. There is nothing peculiar in his belief as to the origin of things. Man, he states, was created by God, that is, the Father with the Word, as the Scriptures relate: he was made out of the earth-dust, thereby raised to a better state; and it is still a power of God which quickens man. But the Word, as St. John declares, became flesh, with no addition from without, and so the body was a heavenly body. The flesh was taken in appearance only (δοκῆσει), as with the angels who came to Abraham and ate with him: what suffered on the Cross was the Word Himself, but in appearance: He was born not of Mary but through Mary, as water passes through a pipe (a Valentinian comparison, Epiph. i. 167 A, 171 D); and when the Jews called Him the Son of David, He rebuked them, saying that He was David's Lord, not his Son (858 Ru.; 383 Lom.). The Bardesanist feeling about the Resurrection seems to have a similar origin. The present body is looked on as a bond, a weight, a tomb, in which the soul is bound for its sins (859, 834 Ru.; 386, 322 Lom.). At the same time Marinus dwells on the material flux which changes the body from one age of life to another, and on the resolution into the four elements supposed to accompany decay. But on this head the chief arguments are texts from Scripture (Gen. vi. 3; Ps. lvi. 13; xlii. 2; lvii. 1; xvi. 10; Rom. vii. 24; Gen. iii. 21 [the much-disputed "coats of skins"]; Lam. iii. 34; 1 Cor. xv. 50, 38, 36). The question is not however as to the act of resurrection, but as to the nature of the new body: on the strength of the last-quoted passage it is maintained that the soul will be the recipient of a heavenly body (865 Ru.; 402 Lom.).

This Greek Bardesanism evidently has dropped those characters of the Syrian doctrine which seemed irrelevant to the kindred Greek controversies of the day, while it has apparently been likewise somewhat changed under their influence. Not the least curious feature is the emphatic appeal which Marinus loves to make to Scripture, and the reluctance with which he approaches the speculative argumentations (τὰ φιλοσοφούμενα) of his orthodox antagonist (859 Ru.; 386 Lom.). But the Bardesanist tradition remains distinct from the Valentinian: its doctrine of evil has possibly received a darker shade from Manichean influence; but it would be rash to speak confidently in the absence of precise knowledge about Bardaisan himself.

On the other hand, the Manichean or Persian colouring is so predominant in the accounts given by Arabic writers (En-Nedim [sæc. x.] ap. Flügel, Mani, 161 f.; and Schahraṣṭāni [sæc. xii.] ap. Merx, 83 ff.; like En-Nedim, a resident at Bagdad, but apparently unacquainted with his Führer [Chwolsohn, ii. XXII f.]) respecting the Asiatic Bardesanists of later days, that only the faintest traces of the primitive doctrine can be discerned. The two principles, the Light and the Darkness, are contrasted as good, beneficent, fragrant, beautiful,—and evil, injurious, fetid, hideous; but also as free, living, intelligent, powerful, sensitive,—and subject to the bondage of Nature, dead, unintelligent, powerless, immovable, dull. The sensitive power of the Light is represented as one and homogeneous, owing its division into the several senses only to various commixtures with the Darkness. While all believed the Light above and the Darkness below to be in constant mutual pressure, there was a division of opinion as to their combination and separation. Some, according to the scarcely intelligible report of Schahraṣṭāni (this singularly aberrant person is entirely passed over by En-Nedim), compared the Light to the smooth sides of a saw, the Darkness to its rough edge, the one substance being common to both. Others represented the Light as always endeavouring to repel the attempt of the Darkness to cling to its under side, but always in the effort becoming more deeply entangled with the Darkness, like a man striving to gain firm footing in a morass (Schahr.), or thrusting away from him a log armed with sharp splinters (En-Nedim). According to a third party, the Light plunged into the Darkness of its own free choice, hoping to change it to goodness, and then raise to its own upper world what it thus succeeded in setting free; but on the contrary it was itself held fast in bondage by the Darkness, and compelled to do what is unrighteous and vile: and this representation was apparently (Schahr.) combined with a theory that goodness and beauty belong to free action, their contraries to constrained action.

A remark of Chwolsohn (i. 812), to the effect that a Maimon Daisan is named elsewhere as the author of a dualistic sect likewise called "Daisanites," suggests the need of caution in making use of the Arabic records. But there can be no reasonable doubt as to the founder of the sect of "Daisanites" known to En-Nedim and Schahrastani; for En-Nedim not only states him to have derived his name from the river beside which he was born, but also places him before Mani in date. En-Nedim's list of Bardaisan's books however, as we have already seen, must not be taken as more than a list of books current in the sect at a late period. Another brief statement of his suffices to shew the wide and lasting diffusion of the followers of Bardaisan in Asia. "At an earlier time," he says, they "were settled in the marsh districts (i. e. the comparatively inaccessible swamps of the Lower Tigris and Euphrates, a frequent haunt of the persecuted; see Flügel, 134 f.); and even in China and Khorassan they form scattered communities, although no point of union or house of God belonging to them is known."

In 1710 F. Strunz published at Wittenberg a Historia Bardesanis et Bardesanitarum, which has found little favour with those who have been able to consult it. Intelligent criticism may be said to have commenced with Neander's Geneitische Entwicklung der Gnostischen Systeme, Berlin, 1818, which was followed in 1819 by A. Hahn's monograph, Bardemes Gnosticus Syrorum primus Hymnologus. The references to Bardaisan in Neander's History and Baur's Christliche Gnosis are of no great importance. More lately his life and doctrines have been investigated in two other valuable monographs, by Merx in 1863, and Hilgenfeld in 1864. R. A. Lipsius' slight sketches, in his Gnosticismus contributed in 1860 to Ersch and Gruber's Encyclopedia (pp. 111 ff., 174 ff. of the separate issue), and in an article Ueber die Ophitischen Systeme in Hilgenfeld's Zeitschrift for 1863 (pp. 435 ff.), have the special merit of insisting on Syrian heathenism as a source of illustration. The writings of Hahn, Merx, Hilgenfeld, and Lipsius all contain valuable matter indispensable to the student; but all more or less misrepresent Bardaisan by arbitrary and mutually inconsistent attempts to adapt his doctrines to known Gnostic schemes. BARDESANES. [BARDAISAN.]

BARLAAM, said to have been a monk in India, in the earliest period of monasticism. According to the legend he converted Josaphat, the son of Abenner, an Indian prince. Zardan, one of the prince's tutors, reported this to the king, who, by the advice of Araches, one of his courtiers, had recourse to Nachor and Theudas, astrologers. In the end Abenner became a convert; and after his death, Josaphat abdicating in favour of Barachias, a Christian, lived for thirty-five years in a hermitage (Rosw. Vit. Patr. i.) But the arguments for the authenticity of this narrative are weak (v. Not. ad loc. ap. Rosw. Vit. Patr.; comp. Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 484), and it bears internal marks of being unhistorical. It is attributed to John Damascene, but even this is uncertain. [JOANNES DAMASCENUS.] [J. G. S.]

BARLAAM or BARLÂHA, martyr, an uneducated countryman, martyred either at Antioch or at Caesarea in Cappadocia under Diocletian, his special torment being that he was forced up to the altar, and burning incense placed upon the back of his hand, in order that he might seem to kindle, and so offer it by the involuntary movement of the hand through pain, a device which the martyr's constancy defeated (St. Basil, M. Hom. de St. Barl. xviii.; St. Chrys. Hom. de St. Barl. lxxiii.). An apostrophe of St. Basil's, addressed to the "painters" of such scenes, was transformed by the second Council of Nice, A. D. 787, into a literal picture, quoted by the council as evidence in the Iconoclast Controversy (Act. iv. Labb. vii. 272). [A. W. H.]

BARNABAS. [See Dict. of the Bible, s. v.]

BARNABAS, EPISTLE OF. It is impossible, in the limited space at our command, to enter upon all the important and interesting questions connected with this Epistle. We proceed, therefore, at once to what will be readily acknowledged to be the most important, that of its

1. Authenticity.—Is it the production of the Barnabas so often associated with St. Paul in the Acts of the Apostles and in the Epistles of the New Testament; or has it been falsely connected with his name? The question is one of deep interest, both on its own account and because of its bearing on the historical and critical spirit of the early Christian Church.

It is admitted on all sides that the external evidence is decidedly in favour of the idea that the epistle is authentic. Clement of Alexandria bears witness to it as the work of "Barnabas the apostle"—"Barnabas who was one of the seventy disciples and the fellow-labourer of Paul"—"Barnabas who also preached the Gospel along with the apostle according to the dispensation of the Gentiles" (Strom. ii. 7, 35; ii. 20, 116, v. 10, 64. Comp. also ii. 6, 31; ii. 15, 67; ii. 18, 84; v. 8, 52). The same thing may be said of Origen, who speaks of it as "the Catholic Epistle of Barnabas" (c. Cels. i. 63). Eusebius disputes the canonicity of the Epistle, but is hardly less decided than the fathers already mentioned in favour of its authenticity. It is included by him at one time among the disputed, at another among the spurious, books; yet there is no reason to doubt that when, in both passages, he calls it the Epistle of Barnabas, he has in his eye not an unknown person of that name but the Barnabas of Scripture (vi. 14, iii. 25). Jerome must be understood to refer to it when he tells us of an Epistle read among the apocryphal books, and written by Barnabas of Cyprus, who was ordained along with Paul the Apostle of the Gentiles (De Vir. ill. c. vi.). In the Stichometria of Nicephorus, in the 5th century, it is enumerated among the uncanonical books; and, at the close of that century, a similar place is assigned to it by Anastasius Sinaita. Add to all this that it is found in Codex \mathfrak{B} attached to the books of the New Testament, and there can be no doubt that the early Christian Church considered it authentic. That she refused to allow its canonicity is little to the purpose. The very fact that many thought it entitled to a place in the canon is a conclusive proof of the opinion that had been formed of its authorship. Nor does the refusal of such a place to it by the Church at large invalidate the force of this proof for our present object. The early Church was able to draw the line between apostles and companions of apostles; and, although writings of the latter, such as the Gospels of St. Mark and St. Luke, and the Epistle to the Hebrews, were received into the canon, it must always be remembered that she thought herself able to establish such a connection between the writers of these books and one or other of the apostles that the authority of the latter could be transferred to the former. Such a transference it would be more difficult to make in the case of Barnabas, because, although he had been associated at one time with the Apostle Paul in his labours, the two had differed in opinion and separated from one another.

It is by the contents of the Epistle, by the Internal Evidence, that the many distinguished critics who have in later times denied its authenticity, have been led to their conclusion. That there is great force in some at least of the arguments adduced by them from this source it is impossible to deny, yet they do not seem so irresistible as not to merit renewed consideration. They have been summed up by Hefele (Patr. Apost. p. 14), and succeeding writers have added little to his statement.

Of the eight arguments brought forward by Hefele, five may be at once and without difficulty rejected; the first, that the words of Augustine regarding the Apocrypha of Andrew and John, si illorum essent recepta essent ab ecclesia, show that our Epistle would have been placed in the canon had it been deemed authentic; for Andrew and John were apostles, Barnabas was not; the second, that Barnabas had died before the destruction of Jerusalem, while the Epistle bears clear marks of not having been written until after that date; for this idea is no just inference from the texts referred to, Col. iv. 10, 1 Pet. v. 13, 2 Tim. iii. (iv.?) 11, and the authority of a monk of the 6th or 9th century is not to be relied on; the third, that the apostles chosen by our Lord are described in c. v. as ὅτι ἐπὶ πάντων ἁμαρτίαν ἀνομιώτεροι; for these words are not introduced, as seems to be often thought, for the sake of reproaching the apostles, but for the sake of magnifying the grace of Christ in calling not the righteous but sinners to repentance. It was an undoubted fact that the Saviour had associated with publicans and sinners, and Barnabas may mean no more than that out of that class were the apostles chosen.^a He may even have had the career of Saul previous to his call to the apostleship mainly in view. The fourth argument of Hefele, that the Epistle betrays in c. x. so much ignorance of the habits of various animals is not more valid than those that have been mentioned; for natural history was then but little known. The fifth argument of the same writer is also to be set aside, that Barnabas, who had travelled in Asia Minor, and lived at Antioch in Syria, could not have asserted in c. ix. that the Syrians were circumcised, when we know from Josephus (Contr. Ap. i. 22; Antiq. viii. 10, 3) that they were not; for, however frequently this statement has been repeated, Josephus says nothing of the kind. What he says is, that a remark of Herodotus, to the effect that the Syrians who live in Palestine are circumcised, proves that historian's acquaintance with the Jews, because the Jews were the only inhabitants of Palestine by whom that rite was practised, and it must have been of them, therefore, that he was speaking. The statement of Josephus does not extend to the Syrians beyond Palestine; nay, rather he quotes Herodotus, and without any word of dissent, as saying that the Syrians about the rivers Thermodon and Parthenius, that is in the northern parts of Syria, did submit to circumcision. So far from contradicting he may thus be said to confirm the statement of our Epistle.

The three remaining arguments of Hefele are more important.

1. That the many trifling allegories of cc. v.-xi. are inconsistent with the notions that we must form of one who, from the warmth of his eloquence, had been honoured with the name of the "Son of Consolation." But it may well be doubted whether the estimate founded upon these allegories of the general ability of the writer is not too low. It is true that they are in the highest degree foolish and unnatural; and it is difficult for us even to conceive how a person of the slightest thoughtfulness could find in the numeral letters of the Greek version of the Old Testament an indication of the will of Him who had given that Testament in Hebrew to his ancient people. Yet, after all, is it not the time rather than the writer that is here in fault? It is unfair to take as our standard of judgment the just principles of interpretation now prevailing. We must transfer ourselves into the early Christian age, and remember the spirit of interpretation that then prevailed. We must call to mind the allegorical explanations of both Jewish and Heathen schools, whose influence passed largely into the Christian Church, and the gross mistakes of even such men as Origen and Augustine. Above all, we must think of the estimation in which the Epistle before us was held for centuries; that it was highly approved of by Clement and Origen; that it was a matter of dispute whether it ought not to have a place assigned it in the canon; and that, even when no such honour was claimed for it, it was regarded as a most useful and edifying work. It must have been felt to be so; and the Christian Church has afforded too many examples of the adoption of the most perverted principles of interpretation by gifted minds and by large sections of her members to permit us to make folly in that particular direction a proof of general mental weakness. In judging, therefore, of the ability of our author, it is necessary to turn from the form to the substance of his argument, from the shell in which he encloses his kernel of truth to that truth itself. When we do so his Epistle will appear in no small degree worthy of approbation. It exhibits a high appreciation of many of the cardinal truths of Christianity, of the incarnation and death of Christ, of the practical aims of the Gospel, of the freedom and spirituality of Christian living; while the general conception of the relation of the New Testament to the Old, although in some respects grievously at fault, embodies the important principle that the Old is but the shadow of the New, and that "the testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy." Throughout the Epistle, too, there are not a few sentences of great beauty and warmth of Christian feeling; and nothing could well be more eloquent than the description of the rebuilding of the spiritual temple in c. xvi.

2. The second important argument against the authenticity of our Epistle is taken from the numerous mistakes committed by the writer in cc. vii. viii. with regard to the rites and ceremonies of Judaism, mistakes to all appearance inconsistent with the idea that he could be a Jew, a Levite, who had lived long in Jerusalem, and must have been acquainted with the ceremonial institutions of the Jews. It is impossible not to feel the great force of the objection, or even to complain of one who, upon this ground alone, should reject the authorship of Barnabas. Let it only be remembered that these mistakes are almost equally inexplicable on the supposition that the author was not Barnabas. If such rites were not actually practised, whence did he learn their supposed existence? It is out of the question to think that they were a mere fancy of his own. And how came the great fathers whose names have been already mentioned, how came the Church at large to value the Epistle as it did if in the mention of them we have nothing but absurdity and error? We are hardly less puzzled to account for such inaccuracies by the idea that the writer was a heathen Christian of Alexandria than by admitting that he may have been a Jew and a Levite.

3. The third and last important argument adduced by Hefele is taken from the unjust notions with regard to Judaism which are presented in our Epistle. They are correctly so described. But it is not so clear that they might not have been entertained by one who, educated in the school of St. Paul and animated by a high sense of the spirituality and universality of the Christian faith, would be easily led, in the heat of the Judaic controversies of his day, to depreciate a system which was threatening to overthrow the distinctiveness and power of the Gospel of Christ.

To the arguments thus brought forward by Hefele recent writers have added the consideration, that the strong anti-Judaistic tendency of the Epistle is inconsistent with its ascription to Barnabas, inasmuch as he erred in too great attachment to the Jewish party (Gal. ii. 13). But the incident thus referred to reveals no such trait in the character of Barnabas. His conduct on that occasion was a momentary weakness by which the best may be overtaken; and it rather shews us that his position on the side of the freer party had been previously a decided one, "inasmuch that even Barnabas was carried away by their dissimulation." The incident may also have made him in time to come ashamed of his weakness, firmer and more determined than before.

To sum up the evidence, it seems to us that its balance is more in favour of the composition of our Epistle by Barnabas than later critics have been for the most part willing to allow. The bearing of the external evidence upon this result is unquestionable; and, where we have such evidence, it is a sound principle that nothing but the strongest internal evidence should be permitted to overcome it. The traditions of the early Church with regard to historical facts do not appear to have been so loose as is often alleged. It is difficult also to imagine how a generally accepted and firmly held tradition could arise without some good foundation upon which to rest.

Finally, we are too prone to forget that the substance of Christian truth may be held by others in connexion with misapprehensions, imperfections, misinterpretations, of Scripture, absurd and foolish views, in connexion with which it would be wholly impossible for us to hold it. Let these remarks be borne in mind, and the whole character of the Epistle before us judged in the spirit which they suggest, and it may perhaps be granted that its authenticity, though by no means free from doubt, is more probable than is commonly supposed. It may be well to add that the authorship of Barnabas is rejected by, among others, Neander, Ullman, Hug, Baur, Hefele, Winer, Hilgenfeld, Donaldson, Westcott, Mühlner, while it is maintained by Gieseler, Credner, Guericke, Bleek, Möhler, and, though with hesitation, De Wette. Reuss and Weizsäcker do not attempt to decide the question.

The next important point which offers itself for our consideration, though not without a bearing on the question of authorship, is

II. The date of the Epistle.—External evidence does not help us here. We are thrown wholly upon the internal. Two limits are allowed by all, the destruction of Jerusalem on the one hand, and the time of Clement of Alexandria on the other, that is from A.D. 70 to the last years of the 2nd century. Between these two limits the most various dates have been assigned to it; the general opinion, however, being that it is not to be placed earlier than towards the close of the 1st, nor later than early in the 2nd, century. It is impossible to speak with anything like certainty upon the point, but the following considerations may be worthy of notice:—

(1.) When the destruction of the temple is referred to in c. xvi. the idea of recent destruction seems to correspond better with the whole tenor of the chapter than the thought of a destruction at least thirty years by-past. In particular the ἐγνώκατε (Cod. N instead of γνώτε of the T. R.) ὅτι ματαία ἡ ἐλπὶς αὐτῶν leads the thoughts to a moment when the readers had themselves just seen the hope placed by the Jews in their temple proved to be vain. It is not the hope of its rebuilding that is thus set at naught, it is the hope which these deceived ones placed in the temple itself, εἰς τὴν οἰκοδομήν, when it stood in all its glory, and when they turned their hearts to it instead of their God who made them. "This hope," says Barnabas, "ye have perceived to be a vain one." To anything connected with proposals for rebuilding the temple in the time of Hadrian it is impossible that these words should apply; and, although they might perhaps have been used many years after the destruction of Jerusalem, and while the temple yet lay in ruins, they certainly receive a more natural explanation and gain in force if we suppose that the overthrow of the great centre of the Jewish theocracy had been recent. Again, in the same passage, we read, νῦν καὶ αὐτοὶ καὶ οἱ τῶν ἐχθρῶν ὑπηρέται ἀνοικοδομήσωσιν αὐτόν (Cod. N instead of νῦν καὶ αὐτοὶ οἱ τῶν ἐχθρῶν κ. τ. λ. of the T. R.). It is impossible to doubt, notwithstanding the reasoning of Weizäcker (zur Kritik des Barnabasbriefes, p. 22, &c.) to the contrary, that it is the spiritual temple which is here in the writer's eye, that ναὸς τέλειος of which he had spoken in the beginning of his Epistle, c. iv., and which embodied his leading conception of what the true children of God were to be. The whole drift of the 16th chapter proves incontestably that he has not the slightest reference to a re-erection of the material building.^b The thought of Hadrian's time is therefore wholly out of the question. The end of the 1st century, again, is too late to supply a natural meaning to the words, "now shall they rebuild." The rebuilding spoken of had by that time gone on for thirty years, and been to a large extent accomplished by the spread of the Gospel throughout the empire. To a date, on the contrary, immediately after the destruction of the temple they apply with force: "Now," says Barnabas, "these very enemies shall, along with you, erect a new and better temple, a true temple of God."

(2.) A note of time would be supplied us by c. iv., were it possible to come to a more definite conclusion as to the interpretation there put by Barnabas upon Daniel vii. 7, 8, 24. It is clear that in the view of the writer the prophecy has been fulfilled; and its fulfilment is a sign of the times which the spiritual ought to understand. Who, then, are the three great horns followed by the little one? Are they the Flavian house, Vespasian, Titus, Domitian, followed by Nerva, Trajan, Hadrian, who, the two last having been successively adopted, are considered as one dynasty, τρεις ὄφ' ἐν βασιλείς (Volkmar)? or are they Vespasian, Titus, Domitian, while the little horn refers to Nero, who was to return as Antichrist, and to overthrow the three kings immediately preceding and belonging to one family (Hilgenfeld)? or, finally, are the three—Galba, Otho, Vitellius, whose united reigns comprehended only about one year, a space which might be allotted to the shortest single reign, and whose rapid succession of one another might well illustrate the fact that the Lord was now "cutting short the times and the seasons" (Weizäcker)? The first of these explanations is obviously untenable. It regards the three horns as distinct from the ten; enumerates the three kings of the Flavian house as one; and omits Vitellius altogether on the plea that he was not reckoned at Alexandria. The second is hardly more tenable than the first. It is not of something that is to happen, but of something that has already happened that Barnabas is speaking; nor is it possible to explain why the returning Nero should be represented as overthrowing only three who had preceded him instead of all. The

^b It is inconsistent with the whole view of Barnabas to suppose that he could see in the rebuilding of the material temple a fulfilment of prophecy, which he does see in the rebuilding he speaks of, xvi. 3, 4. Again, ἀνοικοδομήσωσιν, instead of ἀνοικοδομήσουσιν, arises from the fact that he has not yet explained in what the rebuilding was to consist. He can therefore only speak of it as something that may be expected. Only when he has shewn what the rebuilding really is will he be able to speak of it as certain. (Comp. Jelf, § 415, 2.) The ζητήσωμεν of paragraph 6 is to be regarded as the taking up again of what has thus been hinted at, not as the introduction of a new subject.

third explanation is certainly the best, and seems, though somewhat fancifully put by its author, to be in substance correct. The true defence is to be sought—where Weizäcker does not seek it—in the language of the original prophecy, "and, behold, there came up among them another little horn, before whom were three of the first horns plucked up by the roots," καὶ τρία κέρατα τῶν ἔμπροσθεν αὐτοῦ ἐξεβρίζωθη ἀπὸ προσώπου αὐτοῦ (Dan. vii. 8). These are the words which Barnabas renders freely by ἐταπεινώσων ὄφ' ἐν τρία τῶν μεγάλων κεράτων. He sees them cut off by the same speedy fate in order to make room for their successor, and he finds in this the token that God is "making a short work on the earth." It is this shortness of their reigns alone that he has in view, not the idea that together they make up no more than a single reign. Enough for him that the kings are no sooner seated on the throne than they are together humbled and rooted up. It is true that the difficulty presents itself that, even counting from Julius Caesar, the little horn is thus one of the ten. But the very mode in which the quotation is given in our Epistle seems to shew that its writer was sensible of this difficulty. He drops the τῶν ἔμπροσθεν αὐτοῦ of the prophet, and substitutes καὶ ἐξ αὐτῶν μικρὸν κέρας. We must acquiesce, therefore, in the conclusion of Weizäcker that this passage affords no slight indication that the Epistle before us belongs to the reign of Vespasian, to a date, therefore, between A.D. 70 and A.D. 79.^c

(3.) The temptation to relapse into Judaism, that is, as we shall see, the particular temptation before the writer's eye in this Epistle, would probably possess all the strength here ascribed to it only at a point of time immediately subsequent to the destruction of Jerusalem. Christians must have been in no small degree startled and even shocked by that destruction of the temple and holy city which was almost the sweeping away of the old world to the Jew. As yet they had not only been considered by others, they had considered themselves, as little else than the adherents of a purified and exalted Judaism. It is quite natural to think, therefore, that many might be ready to doubt their own faith when they saw the centre of the ancient theocracy overthrown. Then, too, they would find the snares of Jewish

^c We would venture to suggest, hoping only that the suggestion may not appear fanciful, that there were circumstances connected with Vespasian which might seem to Barnabas to justify his application to him of the figure of the "little horn." Not only had the birth of that emperor been mean, but he was himself accustomed to draw special attention to it. "He was never ashamed of the meanness of his origin, and ridiculed all attempts to make out for him a distinguished genealogy. He often visited the villa in which he had been born," the house of a private soldier, "and would not allow any change to be made in the place." [Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Biogr. VESPASIAN.] Contrast this with the fact that his own merit had raised him to the throne, and have we not here a simple and natural explanation of the fact that he should be regarded by Barnabas as the "little horn"?

Since the argument in the text was written Müller's Commentary on the Epistle of Barnabas has appeared. That writer adopts the same view as that here taken, and defends it by somewhat similar arguments. It is difficult to see, therefore, how he can place the date of the Epistle so late as A.D. 119. Has he failed to give due weight to the important words of iv. 3, τὸ τέλειον σκάνδαλον ἤρκεκεν?

seducers to be most powerful when Jewish fanaticism awoke to the consciousness that its glory was on the point of perishing, and was stirred up to efforts of despair. These are the efforts that we have here before us, and their existence favours the idea of an early date.

(4.) The frequency of reference to Christians as the true and perfect "temple" leads us to the thought of a time when the idea of the temple was a living one even in Christian minds, and when even Christians were under the first powerful impression produced by the destruction of the material building.

Upon the whole we conclude that there is every reason for believing that our Epistle was written only a very few years after the destruction of Jerusalem.

We pass to a third point.

III. Object of the Epistle, and line of argument pursued in it.—Two points are especially insisted on by the writer; first, that Judaism, in its outward and fleshly form, had never been commended by the Almighty to man, had never been the expression of God's covenant; secondly, that that covenant had never belonged to the Jews at all.

In carrying out his argument upon the first point the writer everywhere proceeds on the idea that the worship which God requires, which alone corresponds to His nature, and which therefore can alone please Him, is spiritual, not a worship of rites and ceremonies, of places and seasons, but a worship of the heart and life. It is not by sacrifices and oblations that we approach God, who will have no offerings thus made by man^d (c. ii.); it is not by keeping sabbaths that we honour Him (c. xv.); nor is it in any temple made with hands that He is to be found (c. xvi.). The true helpers of our faith are not such things, but fear, patience, long-suffering, continence; and the "way of light" is found wholly in the exhibition of moral and spiritual virtues (c. xix.). But how was it possible to reconcile with such an idea the facts of history? Judaism had had, in time past, and still had, an actual existence. Its fasts and sacrifices, its sabbaths and temple, seemed to have been ordained by God Himself. How could it be pleaded that these things were not the expression of God's covenant, were not to be always binding and honoured? It is to the manner in which such questions are answered that the peculiar interest of our Epistle belongs. They are not answered as they would have been by St. Paul. The apostle of the gentiles recognized the value of Judaism and of all the institutions of the law as a great preparatory discipline for the coming of the Messiah, as "a schoolmaster to bring us unto Christ." There is nothing of this kind in the argument of Barnabas. Judaism has in it nothing preparatory, nothing disciplinary, in the sense of training men for higher truths. It has two aspects—the one outward and carnal, the other inward and spiritual. The first was never intended by God; they who satisfy themselves with it are rather deceived by "an evil angel." The second is Christianity itself, Christianity before Christ

^d The reading of Codex \aleph , to be preferred to what we find in the Latin, ἵνα ὁ καινὸς . . . μὴ ἀνθρωποποίητον ἔχη τὴν προσφοράν. For the sense cf. Matt. xv. 9.

(c. ix. and passim). This view of the matter is made good partly by shewing that, side by side with the institutions of Israel, there were many passages of the Prophets in which God even condemned in strong language the outward ceremony, whether sacrifice, or fasting, or circumcision, or the temple worship (cc. ii. iii. ix. xvi.); that these things, in their literal meaning, were positively rejected by Him; and that the most important of them all, circumcision, was fully as much a heathen as a divine rite (c. ix.). This line of argument, however, is not that upon which the writer mainly depends. His chief trust is in the γνώσις, that deeper, that typical and allegorical, method of interpreting Scripture which proceeded upon the principle that the letter was a mere shell, and had never been intended to be understood literally. By the application of this principle the whole actual history of Israel loses its validity as history, and we see as the true meaning of its facts nothing but Christ, His cross, His covenant, and the spiritual life to which He summons His disciples. It is unnecessary to give illustrations. What is said of Moses, that he spoke ἐν πνεύματι, is evidently to be applied to the whole Old Testament. The literal meaning is nowhere what was really intended. The Almighty had always had a deeper meaning in what was said. He had been always thinking, not of Judaism, but of Christ and Christianity. The conclusion, therefore, could not be mistaken; Judaism in its outward and carnal form had never been the expression of God's covenant.

The argument upon the second point spoken of, To whom does God's covenant belong? connects itself closely with the argument upon the first. It is indeed a legitimate conclusion from the latter that the Jews cannot claim the covenant as theirs. By the importance they always attached, and still attach, to outward rites they prove that they have never entered into the mind of God; that they are the miserable victims of the wiles of Satan (c. iv. ix. xvi.). But the same thing is shewn both by Scripture and by fact—by Scripture, for in the cases of the children of Rebecca, and of the blessing of Ephraim and Manasseh, we learn that the last shall be first and the first last (c. xiii.)—by fact, for when Moses broke the two tables of stone on his way down from the mount, the covenant which was at that moment about to be bestowed upon Israel was dissolved and transferred to Christians (c. xiv.).

Looking now at this line of argument as a whole, we can have little difficulty in perceiving what was the special object of the Epistle, the special danger against which it was designed to guard. It was no mere Judaizing tendency that was threatening the readers for whom it was intended. It was a tendency to lapse into Judaism itself. The argument of those who were endeavouring to seduce them was, "The covenant is ours" (c. iv.).^e These men, as appears from the tenor of the whole chapter, must have been Jews, and their statement could have no other meaning than that Judaism, as the Jews understood and lived it, was God's covenant, that it was to be preferred to Christianity, and that the observance of its rites and ceremonies was the true divine life to which men ought to be called. Yet Christians were shewing a disposition to listen to such teaching, and many of them were running the serious risk of being shattered against the Jewish law (c. iii.).¹ With this the errors of a coarsely Judaistic life naturally connected themselves, together with those many sins of the "evil way" in which, when we take the details given of them in c. xx., we can hardly fail to recognise the old features of Pharisaism. In short, those to whom Barnabas writes are in danger of falling away from Christian faith altogether; or, if not in actual danger of this, they have to contend with those who are striving to bring about such a result, who are exalting the ancient oeconomy, boasting of Israel's nearness to God, and praising the legal offerings and fastings of the Old Testament as the true way by which the Almighty is to be approached. It is the spirit of a Pharisaic self-righteousness in the strictest sense of the words, not of a Judaizing Christianity, that is here before us. Let us allow that this is the case, and we have at once an explanation of all the most peculiar phenomena of our Epistle, of its polemical zeal pointed so directly against Judaism that, as Weizäcker has observed, it might seem to be directed as much against Jews as against Judaizers; of its effort to show that the whole Old Testament cultus had its meaning only in Christ; of its denial of all value to outward Judaism; of its aim to prove that the inward meaning of that ancient faith was really Christian; of its exclusion of Jews, as such, from all part in God's covenant; and of its dwelling precisely upon those doctrines of the Christian faith which were the greatest stumbling-block to the Jewish mind, and those graces of the Christian life to the importance of which it had most need to be awakened.

^e The ὅς ἦδη δεδικαιωμένος of c. iv. has led Hilgenfeld (die Apost. Väter, p. 38) to think of those who were turning the grace of God into lasciviousness. But the whole passage leads rather to the thought of a proud Judaic self-righteousness, "the temple of the Lord, the temple of the Lord are we."

IV. Integrity of the Epistle.—We have proceeded throughout on the idea that the integrity of the Epistle can be defended with success. Upon this point we refer our readers to Hefele and Donaldson.

V. Authorities for the text.—These consist of MSS. of the Greek text, of the old Latin version, and of citations in early Christian writings. The MSS. are tolerably numerous, but the fact that, with the exception of the Sinaiticus which deserves separate mention, they all want exactly the same portion of the Epistle, the first five and a half chapters, seems to shew that they had been taken from a common source and cannot be reckoned as independent witnesses. Since the discovery of Codex N by Tischendorf a new era in the construction of the text has begun. That MS. brought to light the portion of the Greek text wanting in all MSS. previously known. Throughout the whole Epistle, also, valuable readings were suggested by it, and it is now justly regarded as our chief authority for the text. The old Latin version is of high value. The MS. from which it is taken is probably as old as the 8th century, but the translation itself is supposed by Müller to have been made from a text older even than that of Codex N. It wants the last four chapters of the Epistle. The citations in early Christian writings are extensive, but occupy only a subordinate rank as authorities for the text.

Editions and Literature.—It is hardly necessary to speak of the older editions. The most valuable modern editions are those of Hefele, 1855 (4th ed.); Reithmayr, 1844; Dressel, 1863; Hilgenfeld, 1866; and Müller, 1869. Dressel was the first to make use of Codex N, but of all these editors Müller seems to have constructed his text upon the most thoroughly scientific principles. The literature is very extensive. Notices of the Epistle will be found in the writings of Dörner, Baur, Schwegler, Ritschl, Lechler, Reuss, and others. The following monographs on it are especially worthy of notice; that of Hefele, entitled Das Sendschreiben des Apostels Barnabas aufs neue untersucht, übersetzt, und erklärt, Tübingen, 1840; that of Hilgenfeld in his Die Apostolischen Väter, Halle, 1853; that of Weizäcker, Zur Kritik des Barnabasbriefes aus dem Codex Sinaiticus, Tübingen, 1863; and that of Dr. Donaldson in his History of Christian Literature and Doctrine. The most recent and valuable work on the Epistle is that by J. G. Müller, Erklärung des Barnabasbriefes, Ein Anhang zu de Wette's Exegetischem Handbuch zum neuen Testament, Leipzig, 1869. This work contains general prolegomena to the Epistle, a critically constructed text, and an elaborate commentary, together with careful Excursus on all the most important difficulties connected with the interpretation. BARNIC, ST., a Celtic bishop, whose burial-place in Cornwall is thus given by William of Worcester, 113: "S. Barnic episcopus, called Angliæ Seynt Barre, sepelitur in ecclesia de Fowey; et ejus festum per tres dies proximè ante festum S. Michaelis." Leland (Itin. 3, 33) gives his full name as St. Fim-barrus (i. e. "fine hair"). Barrocs seems another form of the name, and there are several saints of the same name in Ireland (see Whitaker's Cathedral of Cornwall, ii. 214). Baroes was banished by the Arian Valens to Egypt: first, to the island of Aradus (where, according to a statement recorded by Theodoret, H. E. iv. 16 his bed was preserved, Weizäcker proposes to read ἐπιλύτω; and to render by means of 2 Pet. 1, 20, which is utterly untenable. Might we suggest that ἐπιλύτοι may here be used in the sense of "set loose," the figure being that of persons or things loosened from their true foundations or securities, and then dashed against a wall, or perhaps against the beach, and thus destroyed?

He was come of the race of Conall Gulban (Mart. Doneg.). His date, as given by Ussher (De Brit. Eocl. Prim., Dubl. 1639, Ind. Chr.), is A.D. 590; but Lanigan (Eocl. Hist. Ir. ii. 221) thinks he must have flourished earlier. Ussher (Ib. 914) counts him among the 300 who formed the second order of Irish saints ("pauci Episcopi et multi Presbyteri"), and (p. 962) quotes from the Life of St. Carthagus, calling him Abbot of Druim-cuilinn on the borders of Munster and Leinster, in the territory of Fearcel or Ferghal, where a town called Raythen (now Rahen) stands. (For his supposed connection with St. Brendan of Clonfert, see Lanigan, Eocl. Hist. Ir. ii. 35, 219, 221; O'Hanlon, Ir. Saints, i. 192.) Kilbarron parish, in the diocese of Raphoe, co. Donegal, receives its name from this saint. (Stat. Acc. Ireland, i. 462.)

(3) Of Inis-doimble. Jan. 30. He is said to have been abbot of Inis-damble, on the borders of Kensalach and the Desii, in Leinster: another feast Oenghus, Mar. O'Gorm., Mart. Tallaght, and Mart. Doneg. place on July 4, the last-named making him "brother to the sons of Aedh, of Ath-cliaith" (Dublin), and of the same race as St. Brigida, but at Jan. 30 giving a different identification. (Colgan, Acta SS. 597, n. ¹⁴; O'Hanlon, Ir. Saints, i. 517; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 31, 187.) [A. P. F.]

BARRINTHUS was a disciple of St. Brendon. (Lanigan, Eocl. Hist. Ir. ii. 35, 219, 221.) [BARRFINN, 2.] [A. P. F.]

BARROCUS, ST., a disciple of St. Cadoc, in the 6th century. When Cadoc sailed from the island Echni ("qui modo Holma dicitur," i.e. Flat Holm in the Bristol Channel) to Barreu (Barry island), with his disciples Barruc and Gualches, he found that they had forgotten his Enchiridion, and sent them back for it, saying "Go, not to return." The irritable and revengeful character of Celtic saints is noted by Giraldus, (Itin. Cambriae, ii. c. 7). A sudden storm over-set their boat, and Barruc lies buried in the island Barry, to which he gave his name (Cambro-Briton Saints, p. 63). This account is late, and there is an evident use of Nennius in it. Giraldus Cambrensis (Itin. Cambriae, i. 6), whose family took its name from Barry Island, describes the saint's shrine in his time thus: "Cujus et reliquiae in capella ibidem sita, hederiae nexibus amplexata, in feretrum translatae continentur." His feast day is variously stated as Nov. 29 (Cressy's Church History, xx. 18), or as Sept. 27 (Ritson's Arthur, 157; but see BARNIC).

BARRY (BARRIUS. BARRINDUS, BARROCUS, BARR, FINBAR)—Sept. 25. This saint has a Scotch and an Irish history. According to the former, St. Finbar or Fymberrus was born in the island of Cathania, now Caithness. The prince concerned in the history is called Tigrinatus, and the story of the saint, both before and immediately after his birth, reproving him for cruelty, is in accordance with the records of the Irish Lives printed by Mr. Caulfield. With the exception of this legend, nothing more is said in the Brev. of Aberdeen of one who is known to hagiologists as St. Barry or Finbar, patron of Cork. His cultus was very prevalent in Scotland, and many places are named from him (see Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 275-6, and ref.; Torfaeus, Orch. i. c. 10; C. Innes, Sket. Ear. Sc. Hist. 70-1). According to the Irish history, he was a native of Cork or its neighbourhood (but Lanigan says, of Connaught), the founder, bishop, and patron of the first church there, and spending his life in that district as a confessor. In O'Curry's Lect. Anc. Irish, i. ccxxii. is a curious account of his birth and of his father, Amergin, son of Dubh, in Achad Dorbchon, in Muscraige. He was of the race of, and eighth in descent from, Brian son of Eochaidh Muighmhedhoin (king of Ireland A.D. 358-365); his real name was Lochan, so that Finbarr (White-haired) contracted into Barr, must be considered only as his surname (Lanigan, Eocl. Hist. Ir. ii. 314). He was educated at first in Leinster under Mac-corb, a pupil of St. Gregory the Great. At Corcach-Mór of Munster, the "marshy place," where Cork now stands, he founded his church and established a school, which is said to have been attended by 17 holy bishops and 700 prosperous monks, though it may be that this number only he there (Lanigan, Ib. p. 318); but he had previously had a school at Loch Ire (Irce), which was attended by St. Tamlach (Feb. 26), Modhiomog (March 3), and Caolchu of Lui-airthir (Sept. 24), each of whom is said to have "given up his church to God and to Baire." (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 58, 62, 257, 259; Ussher, de Brit. Eocl. Prim., Dubl. 1639, pp. 971, 1067.) All accounts agree that he visited Rome as "mos erat illis diebus Hiberniensibus . . . apostolorum limina prae locis omnibus magis frequenter devoto labore visitare." In going thither with his twelve companions, or returning, he paid a visit to St. David at Menevia, but we know nothing further of the time when the visit took place. (Ussher, Ib. 953; Colgan, Acta SS. 221, 436 n. ²)

After an episcopate of seventeen years, he died at Cloyne on Sept. 25, and was buried at Cork; but the year is uncertain, A.D. 633 or 630: Ussher says he flourished in 630, and the Four Masters give the death of Suibhne, his successor at Cork, in 680, but Tighernach more truly at 682, though either date would require St. Barry's to be later than 633: some however may have come between. (Kelly, Cal. Ir. SS., 129; Four Masters, by O'Donovan, i. 287.) Lanigan gives his death as perhaps about A.D. 623 (Eccl. Hist. Ir. 313-19: Ware, Ir. Ant. 143. Dubl. 1704). Mr. Caulfield, after Dr. Reeves, gives the following lives:—MS. Hib. Bruss. iv. pp. 2, 16, Nos. 2324-2340. Smith's MSS. R.L.A. No. 12, pp. 506-528; No. 150, pp. 129-137; No. 168, pp. 110-116. MS. Lat., Primate Marsh's Lib. Cod. Kilken., fol. 132b-134. Trin. Coll. Dub. E. iii. 11. fol. 109aa-110bb. (See the Life of St. Fin Barre, First Bishop and Founder of the See of Cork, edited by Richard Caulfield, B.A., London, 1864.) He is patron of Kilbarry parish, in Waterford (Stat. Acc. Ir. i. 217): perhaps also of Kilberry parish in the diocese of Dublin and county of Kildare, with its Tobarrawell, but the patron day is 24th June (Ibid. i. 450). [A. P. F.]

BARSANIANS, one of the minor sects into which the Monophysites fell asunder in Egypt during the latter part of the 5th century. Joannes Damascenus (De Haer.), whose account is neither very intelligible nor very consistent, identifies them with the Semidalitae, and states that they had no valid consecration of the Eucharist, but having mixed a few crumbs of sacramental bread which had been consecrated by Dioscorus, the Eutychiean Patriarch of Alexandria, with a measure of fine wheat flour (σεμιδαλις), partook of the loaf made therefrom, and regarded it as a reception of the Holy Communion. Damascenus strangely attributes to them the tenets both of the Gajanitae (or Julianists), and of the Theodosiani (or Severians), who held opposite doctrines as to the corruptibility of Christ's body, adding thereto something of their own. [E. V.]

BARSANUPHIANS, an obscure subdivision of the Monophysites, taking their name from Barsanuphius, an Egyptian pretender to the episcopal rank. They separated from the Jacobites in the reign of the Emperor Zeno, at the latter part of the 5th century, and were re-united to them in the time of the Patriarch Mark, circ. 810. At this time they had two bishops, whom Mark at first refused to recognize, but afterwards acknowledged, and appointed them to the first vacant sees. The founder of this sect was a different person from the Palestinian anchorite. (Fleury, H. E. x. 116; Neale, Patr. of Alexand., ii. 137, 221.) [E. V.]

BARSANUPHIUS, a solitary of Palestine, an Egyptian by birth, in the reign of Justinian, c. 540. According to the story related by Evagrius (H. E. iv. 33) he shut himself up in his cell in a monastery at Gaza, where he remained for more than fifty years seeing and seen by no human being, and eating no earthly food. Eustochius, the bishop of Jerusalem, disbelieving the tale, commanded the cell to be broken open, whereupon fire burst out and consumed the sacrilegious disturbers of the holy man's repose. Barsanuphius was the author of Quaestiones et Responsiones Asceticae variae, and a Paraenesis ad proprium discipulum, originally printed by Montfaucon, Biblioth. Coislin. p. 394; and afterwards by Galland, Biblioth. Vet. Patr. xi. and Migne, Patrolog. lxxxvi. pars i. 887, sq. The questions have reference to the views attributed to Origen, Evagrius, and Didymus on the pre-existence of souls and the restitution of all things. The answers of Barsanuphius simply amount to an earnest exhortation to abstain from such erroneous writers, and not to be led astray by great names, since the ripest saints only know in part (Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 524). [E. V.]

BARSUMAS (the Eutychiean), an archimandrite or abbot of a Syrian monastery, who warmly espoused the cause of Eutyches. When, in 448, Eutyches was denounced as entertaining heretical views before the local synod of Constantinople, Barsumas, who was resident in the imperial city, raised a violent opposition to the Eastern bishops. The next year, 449, at the infamous council of Ephesus—"the Robbers' Synod"—Theodosius summoned Barsumas as the representative of the discontented monastic party, and granted him a seat and vote among the bishops. He was the first monk who was allowed to act as a judge at a general council. Barsumas did not come to the council alone. He brought with him a turbulent band of 1000 monks to second the brutal violence of the soldiers and coerce the assembly to come to a decision in accordance with their wishes. He took a prominent part in the violent and disorderly proceedings of this base counterfeited of a general council, vociferously expressing his joy when the acquittal of Eutyches was pronounced, and personally joining in the brutal assault made on the aged Flavian by the monks and soldiers. Barsumas and Dioscorus are even charged with having struck Flavian on the face, kicked him, and stamped upon him. The injuries inflicted were so serious that the venerable patriarch died three days afterwards on his way to a place of banishment. Barsumas' brutal violence was remembered against him, and when with great effrontery he presented himself at the council of Chaleedon, 451, an outcry was raised against him as "the murderer of the blessed Flavian." He actively propagated Eutychiean doctrines in Syria and died 458. His disciple, Samuel, carried Eutychieanism into Armenia. He is regarded among the Jacobites as a saint and worker of miracles (Asseman. Bibl. Orient. ii. 4; Labbe, iv. 105 sq.; Liberatus, c. 12; Tillemont, xv.; Schröckh, xviii. 451 sq.). [E. V.]

BARSUMAS (the Nestorian), bishop of Nisibis and Metropolitan, 435-489, who, after the suppression of Nestorianism within the empire, engaged actively and successfully in its propagation in eastern Asia, especially in Persia. Banished from Edessa by Rabulas, after his desertion of his former friends, Barsumas proved the chief strength and wisdom of the fugitive church. In 435 he became bishop of Nisibis, where, in conjunction with Maanes, bishop of Hardschir, he established a theological school of deserved celebrity, over which Narses presided for fifty years with great ability. The refugees held several councils of their body, whose decisions separated them still further from the orthodox church. Barsumas had the skill to secure for his church the powerful support of the Persian king Pherozes (Firuz), who ascended the throne in the year 462. He worked upon his enmity to the Roman power to obtain his patronage for a development of doctrine which had been formally condemned by the Emperor and his assembled bishops, representing to him that the king of Persia could never securely reckon on the allegiance of his subjects so long as they held the same religious faith with his enemies. Pherozes admitted the force of this argument, and Nestorianism became the only form of Christianity tolerated in Persia. According to the statement of Abulfaradsch (Asseman, de Syr. Nestor. tom. iii. p. i. pp. 391 sq.), it was propagated by the sword, and "the blood of 7700 Monophysites or Catholics confirmed the uniformity of faith and discipline in the churches of Persia" (Gibbon, c. xlvii.). We may reasonably question with Schröckh (Kirchengeschichte, xviii. 309), whether Barsumas, as Abulfaradsch asserts, took a personal part in this fierce persecution. His death is placed in 489, in which year the emperor Zeno broke up the theological seminary at Edessa on account of its Nestorianism. The college was consequently transferred to Nisibis, where it could freely develop itself under the Persian government, and only flourished the more. It became famous for the prosecution of the study of Holy Scripture, carried on in the liberal spirit of Theodore of Mopsuestia. In the 6th century the Nestorian school at Nisibis was the only regular institution for the training of the clergy. Missionaries went out from it in great multitudes, by whose means Nestorianism became established as the recognized form of Christianity in eastern Asia. The Malabar Christians are the lineal descendants of the churches thus planted.

The charges brought against Barsumas by Leontius of Byzantium (in Eut. p. 1007) of regarding all human actions as indifferent, and encouraging sensual excess, may safely be regarded as calumnies invented by theological adversaries. [E. V.]

BARTHENOS (Βαρθενός, -θενός), the name which Epiphanius gives to Noah's wife (i. 82 D). Scipio Gambatus (Archiv. Vet. Test. p. 150,") cited by Fabricius, Cod. Pseudep. V. T. i. 274) points out that it is only a corruption of Bath-Enos, "the daughter of Enos." In the Conflict of Adam (p. 98 of Dillmann's translation, or i. 354 in Migne's Dict. des Apocryphes) Noah is said to have married "Haikal, the daughter of Abaraz, of the daughters of the sons of Enos," &c., and Dillmann subjoins (p. 141) that in the Ethiopic Clementinum and by Euty chius she is called "Haikal daughter of Namás, the son of Henoch, the brother of Methuselah." This evidence from Eastern apocryphal books disposes of Lipsius's strange conjecture (Zur Quellenkritik d. Epiph. 107) that Βαρθενός is a corruption of πάρθενος. [H.]

BASILEUS [BASILIUS, Martyr, p. 298.]

BASILIANI, a name given to the Nestorians from Basil of Irenopolis, the Cilician, in the Scholia on the books de Eccl. Hierarch., and de Divin. Nom., which exist under the name of Dionysius Areopagitea. These Scholia are attributed by Le Quien (in Joann. Damasc. de Haer. § 80, p. 100) to Johannes Scythopolitanus, the zealous opponent of Basil, whom the Scholiast charges with covertly introducing the heresy of Nestorius under the shelter of the names of Diodorus of Tarsus and Theodore of Mopsuestia, omitting all mention of Nestorius himself. [E. V.]

BASILICUS, a Marcionite of the second century, named with Potitus by Rhodon (ap. Eus. H. E. v. 13. 3) as one of those who maintained fully the antagonism of principles taught by Marcion. Volkmar (Hipp. u. d. Röm. Zeitalter. 27 f.) conjectures that he is the Marcionite BLASTUS named by Theodoret (H. F. i. 25). [H.]

BASILIDES (Βασιλείδης), the founder of one of the semi-Christian sects, commonly called Gnostic, which sprang up in the early part of the second century.

I. Biography.—He called himself a disciple of one Glaucias, alleged to be an interpreter (ἐρμηνεία) of St. Peter (Clem. Strom. vii. p. 898). He taught at Alexandria (Iren. p. 100 Mass.; followed by Eus. H. E. iv. 7; Epiph. Haer. xxiv. 1, p. 68 C; cf. xxiii. 1, p. 62 B; Theodoret, Haer. Fab. i. 2); Hippolytus (Haer. vii. 27, p. 244) in general terms mentions Egypt. Indeed Epiphanius enumerates various places in Egypt visited by Basilides; but subsequently allows it to appear that his knowledge of the districts where Basilidians existed in his own time was his only evidence. If the Alexandrian Gnostic is the Basilides quoted in the Acts of the Disputation of Archelaus and Mani (c. 55, in Routh, Rel. Sac. v. 196; see later, p. 276), he was reported to have preached in Persia. Nothing more is known of his life. According to Epiphanius (62 B, 68 D, 69 A), he had been a fellow-disciple of Menander with Saturnilus at Antioch in Syria; but this is evidently an arbitrary extension of Irenaeus's remarks on the order of doctrines to personal relations. If the view of the doctrines of Basilides taken in this article is correct, they afford no good grounds for supposing him to have had a Syrian education. Gnostic ideas derived originally from Syria were sufficiently current at Alexandria; and the foundation of what is distinctive in his thoughts is Greek.

Several independent authorities indicate the reign of Hadrian (A.D. 117–138) as the time when Basilides flourished. To prove that the heretical sects were "later than the Catholic Church," Clement of Alexandria (l. c.) marks out early Christian history into different periods: he assigns Christ's own teaching to the reigns of Augustus and Tiberius; that of the apostles, of St. Paul at least, ends, he says, in the time of Nero; whereas "the authors of the sects arose later, about the times of the emperor Hadrian (κατὰ δὲ περὶ τοὺς κ.τ.λ. γεγονόσι), and continued quite as late as the age of the elder Antoninus." He gives as examples Basilides, Valentinus, and (if the text is sound) Marcion, taking occasion by the way to throw doubts on the claims set up for the two former as having been instructed by younger contemporaries of St. Peter and St. Paul respectively, by pointing out that about half a century lay between the death of Nero and the accession of Hadrian. Again Eusebius (l. c.) places Saturnilus and Basilides under Hadrian. Yet his language about Carpocrates a few lines further on suggests a doubt whether he had any better evidence than a fallacious inference from their order in Irenaeus. He was acquainted with the refutation of Basilides by Agrippa Castor; but it is not clear, as is sometimes assumed, that he meant to assign both writers to the same reign. His chronicle (Armenian) at the year 17 of Hadrian (A.D. 133) has the note "The heresiarch Basilides appeared at these times;" which Jerome, as usual, expresses rather more definitely. A similar statement without the year is repeated by Jerome, de Vir. ill. 21, where an old corrupt reading (mortuus for moratus) led some of the earlier critics to suppose they had found a limit for the date of Basilides' death. Theodoret (l. c.) evidently follows Eusebius. Earliest of all, but vaguest, is the testimony of Justin Martyr. Writing in or soon after A.D. 145, he refers briefly (Ap. i. 26) to the founders of heretical sects, naming first the earliest, Simon and Menander, followers of whom were still alive; and then apparently the latest, Marcion, himself still alive. The probable inference that the other great heresiarchs, including Basilides, were by this time dead receives some confirmation from a passage in his Dialogue against Trypho (c. 35), a later but probably not much later book, where the "Marcians," Valentinians, Basilidians, Saturnilians, "and others," are enumerated, apparently in inverse chronological order: the growth of distinct and recognised sects implies at least the lapse of some time since the promulgation of their several creeds. It seems therefore impossible to place Basilides later than Hadrian's time; and, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, we may trust Clement's statement that his peculiar teaching began at no earlier date.

II. Writings.—According to Agrippa Castor (Eus. H. E. l. c.) Basilides wrote "twenty-four books (βιβλία) on the Gospel." These are no doubt the Exegetica, from the twenty-third of which Clement gives an extract (Strom. iv. §§ 83 ff., p. 599 f.). The same work is doubtless intended by the "treatises" (tractatum) the thirteenth book of which is cited in the Acta Archelai, if the same Basilides is referred to. The authorship of an actual Gospel, of the "apocryphal" class, is likewise attributed to Basilides on plausible grounds. The word "taken in hand" (ἐπεχειρήσαν) in Luke i. 1 gives Origen occasion to distinguish between the four evangelists, who wrote by inspiration, and other writers who "took in hand" to produce Gospels. He mentions some of these, and proceeds, "Basilides had even the audacity" (ἤδη δὲ ἐτόλμησεν, more than ἐπεχειρήσεν) "to write a Gospel according to Basilides;" that is, he went beyond other fabricators of Gospels by affixing his own name (Hom. in Luc. i.). This passage is freely translated, though without mention of Origen's name, by Ambrose (Exp. in Luc. i. 1); and is probably Jerome's authority in an enumeration of the chief apocryphal Gospels (Com. in Matt.

praef. t. vii. p. 3); for among the six others which he mentions the four named by Origen recur, including that of the Twelve Apostles, otherwise unknown (cf. Hieron. Dial. cont. Pelay. iii. 2, t. ii. p. 782). Yet no trace of a Gospel by Basilides exists elsewhere; and it seems most probable either that Origen misunderstood the nature of the Exegetica, or that they were sometimes known under the other name (cf. Hilgenfeld, Clem. Rec. u. Hom. 123 ff.).

An interesting question remains, in what relation the Exegetica stand to the exposition of doctrine which fills eight long chapters of Hippolytus. Basilides (or the Basilidians), we are told (vii. 27), defined the Gospel as "the knowledge of supermundane things" (ἡ τῶν ὑπερκοσμίων γνῶσις), and the idea of the progress of "the Gospel" through the different orders of beings plays a leading part in the Basilidian doctrine (cc. 25 ff.). But there is not the slightest reason to think that the "Gospel" here spoken of was a substitute for the Gospel in a historical sense, any more than in St. Paul's writings. Indeed several passages (p. 238, l. 28 ff.; 239. 42, 58; 240. 79 ff. of Miller), with their allusions to Rom. v. 14; viii. 19, 22, 23; 1 Cor. ii. 13; 2 Cor. xii. 4; Eph. i. 21; iii. 3, 5, 10, prove that the writer was throughout thinking of St. Paul's "mystery of the Gospel." Hippolytus states distinctly that the Basilidian account of "all things concerning the Saviour" subsequent to "the birth of Jesus" agreed with that given in "the Gospels." It may therefore be reasonably conjectured that his exposition, if founded on a work of Basilides himself (see sect. III.), is a summary of the opening book or books of the Exegetica, describing that part of the redemptive process, or of the preparation for it, which was above and antecedent to the phenomenal life of Jesus. The comments on the Gospel itself, probably containing much ethical matter, as we may gather from Clement, would have little attraction for Hippolytus.

The certain fragments of the Exegetica have been collected by Grabe (Spicil. Patr. ii. 35-43), followed by Massuet and Stieren in their editions of Irenaeus; but he passes over much in Clement which assuredly has no other origin. A single sentence quoted in Origen's commentary on Romans, and given further on (p. 275), is probably from the same source. In an obscure and brief fragment preserved in a Catena on Job (Venet. 1587, p. 345) Origen implies the existence of Odes by Basilides and Valentinus. No other writings of Basilides are mentioned.

III. Authenticity of the Hippolytican extracts.—In endeavouring to form a clear conception of the work and doctrine of Basilides, we are met at the outset by a serious difficulty. The different accounts were never easy to harmonise, and some of the best critics of the first half of this century considered them to refer to two different systems of doctrine. But till recently their fragmentary nature suggested that the apparent incongruities might conceivably be due only to the defects of our knowledge, and seemed to invite reconstructive boldness on the part of the historian. The publication of Hippolytus's Refutation of all heresies in 1851 placed the whole question on a new footing. Hardly any one has ventured to maintain the possibility of reconciling its ample statements about Basilides with the reports of Irenaeus and Epiphanius. Which account then most deserves our confidence?

Before attempting to answer this question, it is well to enumerate the authorities. They are Agrippa Castor as cited by Eusebius, Clement of Alexandria, Irenaeus, the anonymous supplement to Tertullian, De praescriptione, the Refutation of Hippolytus, Epiphanius, Philaster, and Theodoret, and possibly the Acta Archelai, besides a few scattered notices which may be neglected here. This ample list shrinks however into small dimensions at the touch of criticism. Theodoret's chapter is a disguised compilation from previous Greek writers. The researches of Lipsius have proved that Epiphanius followed partly Irenaeus, partly the lost Compendium of Hippolytus, this same work being also the common source of the Latin authors Pseudo-Tertullian and Philaster. Our ultimate authorities therefore are Irenaeus (or the unknown author from whom he took this section of his work), the Compendium of Hippolytus (represented by Epiphanius [part], Philaster, and Pseudo-Tertullian), Clement, and the Refutation of Hippolytus, together with a short statement by Agrippa Castor, and probably a passing reference and quotation in the Acts of Archelaus.

It is now generally allowed that the notices of Clement afford the surest criterion by which to test other authorities. Not only does his whole tone imply exact personal knowledge, but he quotes a long passage directly from the Exegetica. Is then his account, taken as a whole, consistent with other accounts? And does it agree best with the reports of Irenaeus and Hippolytus in his younger days, or with the elaborate picture drawn by Hippolytus at a later time? This second question has received opposite answers from recent critics. A majority have given the preference to Hippolytus: while Hilgenfeld, (who three years before, in his earliest book, the treatise on the Clementine Homilies and Recognitions, pp. 125-149, had described the Basilidian system from the then known records, endeavouring with perverse ingenuity to shew their virtual consistency with each other,) has picked himself on not being dazzled by the new authority, whom he holds to be in effect describing not Basilides but a late development of his sect; and Lipsius takes the same view.

It should be observed at the outset that the testimony of Clement is not quite so homogeneous as is generally assumed. Six times he criticises doctrines of "Basilides" himself; eight times he employs the ambiguous plural (οἱ ἀπὸ Β., οἱ ἀμφὶ τὸν Β.). Are we to suppose a distinction here, or is the verbal difference accidental? Both views might be maintained. The quotation from the Exegetica (Strom. iv. pp. 599 f.) is a piece of moral argument on Providence, wholly free from the technical terms of Gnostic mythology. In the succeeding discussion Clement eventually uses plurals (εἰ . . . τις αὐτῶν λέγει—πέπτωκεν ἢ ὑπόθεσις αὐτοῖς—ὡς φάσι, apparently a misreading for ὡς φασίν—ὡς αὐτοὶ λέγουσιν), which might equally imply that he employs both forms indifferently, or that he distinguishes Basilides from his followers within the limits of a single subject. The other references to "Basilides" are likewise of a distinctly ethical character, while several of the passages containing the plural name abound in technical language. Yet the distinction is not absolute on either side. "Basilides" furnishes the terms "the Ogdoad," "the election," "supermundane;" while such subjects as the nature of faith, the relation of the passions to the animal soul, and the meaning of Christ's saying about eunuchs, occur in the other group, though they remind us rather of Basilides himself. In the last passage moreover (Strom. iii. pp. 508 ff.) the ambiguous plural (οἱ ἀπὸ Β. φασί—λέγουσι—ἐξηγοῦνται—φασί bis) is applied to a quotation intended to shame by contrast the immoral Basilidians of Clement's own time; and a similar quotation from Basilides' son Isidore immediately follows; the authors of the two quotations being designated as "the forefathers of their (the late Basilidians') doctrines." It is hard to believe that mere anonymous disciples, though of an earlier date, would be appealed to in this manner, or would take precedence of the master's own son. On the whole, there can be no reasonable doubt that all the doctrinal statements in Clement concern Basilides himself, when not distinctly otherwise expressed, and depend on direct knowledge of the Exegetica. With good reason therefore they may be assumed as a trustworthy basis for the whole investigation. The most doubtful instances are the passages cited presently on the Baptism and (in the Exc. Theod.) on the descent of the Minister (διάκονος), i.e. the Holy Spirit.

The range of possible contact between the quotations and reports of Clement and any of the other authorities is not large. His extant writings contain nothing like an attempt to describe the Basilidian system. The Stromates, which furnish the quotations from Basilides, expressly limit themselves to moral and practical questions (ὁ ἠθικὸς λόγος); and reserve for a future work, i.e. the lost Hypotyposes, the exposition of the higher doctrine (τῆς κατὰ τὴν ἐποπτικὴν θεωρίαν γνώσεως, τὴν τῶ ὄντι γνωστικῆν φυσιολογίαν) belonging to the department of knowledge which the Stoics called Physics, beginning with the Creation and leading up to Theology proper (Strom. i. p. 324; iv. pp. 563 f., 637; vi. pp. 735 f., 827; vii. 829, 902: cf. Bunsen, Anal. Antenic. i. 159 ff.). Now it is precisely to this latter department that the bulk of Gnostic speculation would belong, and especially such theories as Hippolytus ascribes to Basilides; and moreover Clement distinctly promises that in the course of that loftier investigation he will "set forth in detail the doctrines of the heretics (τῶν ἑτεροδόξων), and endeavour to refute them to the best of his power" (iv. § 3, p. 564). We have therefore no right to expect in the Stromates any cosmological or even theological matter respecting Basilides except such as may accidentally adhere to the ethical statements, the subjects treated of in the various books "against all heresies" being formally excluded by Clement. His sphere being thus distinct from theirs, the marked coincidences of language that we do find between him and Hippolytus afford a strong presumption that, if the one account is authentic, the other is so likewise. Within the narrow limits of Clement's information we meet with the phrases "primitive medley and confusion" (σύγχυσις), and on the other hand "separation" (differentiation) and restoration (σοφία φυλοκρηνητική, ἀποκαταστατική); with a division of the universe into stages (διαστήματα), and prominence given to the sphere of "supermundane" things; with an "Ogdoad" and an "Archon;" all of these terms being conspicuous and essential in the Hippolytean representation. Above all we hear of the amazement of the Archon on receiving "the utterance of the ministering Spirit" or "Minister" (διδάκων, cf. Ecl. Theod. p. 972) as being that fear of the Lord which is called the beginning of wisdom (Strom. ii. p. 448); the utterance itself being implied to be a Gospel (εὐηγγελισμένον); while Hippolytus describes the same passage as interpreted of the amazement of the Great Archon on receiving "the Gospel," a revelation of things unknown, through his son, who had received it from a "power" within the Holy Spirit (vii. 26). The coincidences are thus proportionately great, and there are no contradictions to balance them: so that it would require strong evidence to rebut the conclusion that Clement and Hippolytus had the same materials before them. Such evidence does not exist. The coincidences between Clement and the Irenæan tradition are limited to the widely-spread "Ogdoad" and a single disputable use of the word "Archon," and there is no similarity of doctrines to make up for the absence of verbal identity. The only tangible argument against the view that Hippolytus describes the original system of Basilides is its Greek rather than Oriental character, which is assumed to be incompatible with the fundamental thoughts of a great Gnostic leader. We shall have other opportunities of inquiring how far the evidence supports this wide generalisation as to Gnosticism at large. As regards Basilides personally the only grounds for expecting from him an Oriental type of doctrine are the quotation in the Acts of Archelaus, which will be discussed further on, and the tradition of his connexion with Saturnilus of Antioch, which we have already seen to be founded on a misconception. The fragmentary notices and extracts in Clement, admitted on all hands to be authentic, are steeped in Greek philosophy; so that the Greek spirit of the Hippolytean representation is in fact an additional evidence for its faithfulness.

It may yet be asked,—did Hippolytus consult the work of Basilides himself, or did he depend on an intermediate reporter? His own language, though not absolutely decisive, favours the former alternative. On the one hand it may be urged that he makes no mention of a book, that occasionally he quotes by the words "they say," "according to them," and that his exposition is immediately preceded by the remark, "Let us then see how openly both Basilides and [his son] Isidore (Β. δμου και Ι.) and the whole band of them not merely calumniate Matthias [from whom they professed to have received records of Christ's secret teaching], but also the Saviour Himself" (c. 20). Against these indications may be set the ten places where Basilides is referred to singly, and the very numerous quotations by the words "he says." It is true that Greek usage permits the occasional use of the singular even when no one writer or book is intended. But in this case the most natural translation is borne out by some of the language quoted. The first person singular (ὅταν δὲ λέγω, φησίν, τό ἦν, οὐχ ὅτι ἦν λέγω, ἀλλ' ἵνα σημάτω τοῦτο ἕπερ βούλομαι δεῖξαι, λέγω, φησίν, ὅτι ἦν ὅλως οὐδέν. . . και οὐ δέχομαι, φησίν κ.τ.λ.) proves the book in Hippolytus's hands to have been written by an original speculator: yet this very quotation is immediately followed by a comment on it with the third person plural, which here at least can mean no more than that Hippolytus held the Basilidians of his own day responsible for the doctrines of his author. The freshness and power of the whole section, wherever we touch the actual words of the author, strongly confirm the impression that he was no other than Basilides himself. Thus we are led independently to the conclusion suggested by the correspondence with the information of Clement, whom we know to have drawn from the fountain-head, the Exegetica. The fancy that the book used by Hippolytus was itself the Traditions of Matthias has nothing to recommend it. The whole form is unlike that which analogy would lead us to expect in such a production. If it was quoted as an authority in the Exegetica, the language of Hippolytus is justified. Nor is there anything in this inconsistent with the fact vouched for by Clement (Strom. vii. p. 898) that Basilides claimed to have been taught by Glaucias, an "interpreter" of St. Peter.

We shall therefore assume that the eight chapters of Hippolytus (vii. 20-27) represent faithfully though imperfectly the contents of part at least of the Exegetica of Basilides; and proceed to describe his doctrine on their authority, using likewise the testimony of Clement wherever it is available.

IV. Doctrine.—Basilides asserts the beginning of all things to have been pure nothing. He uses every device of language to express absolute nonentity. He will not allow the primitive nothing to be called even "unspeakable:" that, he says, would be naming it, and it is above every name that is named (20). Nothing then being in existence, "not-being God" (or Deity, οὐκ ὂν θεός: the article is omitted here) willed to make a not-being world out of not-being things. Once more great pains are taken to obviate the notion that "willing" implied any mental attribute whatever. Also the world so made was not the extended and differentiated world to which we give the name, but "a single seed containing within itself all the seed-mass of the world," the aggregate of the seeds of all its forms and substances, as the mustard seed contains the branches and leaves of the tree, or the peacock's egg the brilliant colours of the full-grown bird (21). This was the one origin of all future growths; their seeds lay stored up by the will of the not-being God in the single world-seed, as in the newborn babe its future teeth and the resemblances to its father which are thereafter to appear. Its own origin too from God was not a putting-forth (προβολή), as a spider puts forth its web from itself. (By this assertion, on which Hippolytus dwells with emphasis, every notion of "emanation" is expressly repudiated.) Nor was there an antecedent matter, like the brass or wood wrought by a mortal man. The words "Let there be light and there was light" convey the whole truth. The light came into being out of nothing but the voice of the Speaker; "and the Speaker was not, and that which came into being was not."

What then was the first stage of growth of the seed? It had within itself "a tripartite sonship, in all things consubstantial with the not-being God." Part of the sonship was subtle of substance (λεπτομέρής), part coarse of substance (παχυμερής), part needing purification (ἀποκαθάρσις δεόμενον). Simultaneously with the first beginning of the seed the subtle sonship burst through (διέσφυσεν) and mounted swiftly up "like a wing or a thought" (Odys. vii. 36) till it reached the not-being God; "for toward Him for His exceeding beauty and grace (ὡραιότητος) every kind of nature yearns (ὀρέγεται), each in its own way." The coarse sonship could not mount up of itself, but it took to itself as a wing the Holy Spirit, each bearing up the other with mutual benefit, even as neither a bird can soar without a wing, nor a wing without a bird. But when it came near the blessed and unutterable place of the subtle sonship and the not-being God, it could take the Holy Spirit no further, as not being consubstantial or of the same nature with itself. There then, retaining and emitting downwards the fragrance of the sonship like a vessel that has once held ointment, the Holy Spirit remained, as a firmament dividing things above the world from "the world" itself below (22).

The third sonship continued still within the heap of the seed-mass. But out of the heap burst forth into being the Great Archon, "the head of the world, a beauty and greatness and power that cannot be uttered." He too raised himself aloft till he reached the firmament which he supposed to be the upward end of all things. Then he became wiser and every way better than all other cosmical things except the sonship left below, which he knew not to be far better than himself. So he wanted to create the world in its several parts. But first he "made to himself and begat out of the things below a son far better and wiser than himself," for thus the not-being God had willed from the first; and smitten with wonder at his son's beauty he set him at his right hand. "This is what they call the Ogdoad, where the Great Archon is sitting." Then all the heavenly or ethereal creation (apparently included in the Ogdoad), as far down as the moon, was made by the Great Archon, inspired by his wiser son (23). Again another Archon arose out of the seed-mass, inferior to the first Archon, but superior to all else below except the sonship; and he likewise made to himself a son wiser than himself, and became the creator and governor of the aerial world. This region is called the Hebdomad. On the other hand in the heap and seed-mass, constituting our own (the terrestrial) stage, "those things that come to pass come to pass according to nature, as having been previously uttered by Him who hath planned the fitting time and form and manner of utterance of the things that were to be uttered (ὡς φθάσαντα λεχθήναι ὑπὸ τοῦ τὰ μέλλοντα λέγεσθαι ὅτε δεῖ καὶ ὅλα δεῖ καὶ ὡς δεῖ λελογισμένου); and these things have no one to rule over them, or exercise care for them, or create them; for sufficient for them is that plan (λογισμός) which the not-being One planned when He was making" [the seed-mass] (24).

Such is the original cosmogony as conceived by Basilides, and it supplies the base for his view of the Gospel, as well as of the interval before the coming of the Gospel into the world. When the whole world had been finished, and the things above the world, and nothing was lacking, there remained in the seed-mass the third sonship, which had been left behind to do good and receive good in the seed; and it was needful that the sonship thus left behind should be revealed (Rom. viii. 19) and restored up yonder above the Limitary Spirit to join the subtle and imitative sonship and the not-being One, as it is written, "And the creation itself groaneth together and travaileth together, expecting the revelation of the sons of God." Now we the spiritual, he said, are sons left behind here to order and to inform and to correct and to perfect the souls whose nature it is to abide in this stage. Till Moses then from Adam sin reigned, as it is written; for the Great Archon reigned, he whose end reaches to the firmament, supposing himself to be God alone, and to have nothing above him, for all things remained guarded in secret silence: this is the mystery which was not made known to the former generations. But in those times the Great Archon, the Ogdoad, was king and lord, as it appeared, of all things: and moreover the Hebdomad was king and lord of this stage; and the Ogdoad is unutterable, but the Hebdomad utterable. This, the Archon of the Hebdomad, is he who spoke to Moses and said, "I am the God of Abraham and Isaac and Jacob, and the name of God did I not make 'known to them'" (for so, says Hippolytus, they will have it read), that is, of the unutterable God who is Archon of the Ogdoad. All the prophets therefore, that were before the Saviour, spoke from that source (ἐκεῖθεν).

This short interpretation of the times before Christ, which has evidently suffered in the process of condensation by Hippolytus, carries us at once to the Gospel itself. "Because therefore it was needful that we the children of God should be revealed, concerning whom the creation groaned and travailed, expecting the revelation, the Gospel came into the world, and passed through every principality and power and lordship and every name that is named." There was still no downward coming from above, no departure of the ascended sonship from its place: but "from below from the formlessness of the heap the powers penetrated (διήκουσιν) up to the sonship" (i.e. probably, throughout the scale the power of each stage penetrated to the stage immediately above), and so thoughts (νοήματα) were caught from above as naphtha catches fire at a distance without contact. Thus the power within the Holy Spirit "conveyed the thoughts of the sonship, as they flowed and drifted (ρέοντα καὶ φερόμενα), to the son of the Great Archon" (25); and he in turn instructed the Great Archon himself, by whose side he was sitting. Then first the Great Archon learned that he was not God of the universe, but had himself come into being, and had above him yet higher beings; he discovered with amazement his own past ignorance, and confessed his sin in having magnified himself. This fear of his, said Basilides, was that fear of the Lord which is the beginning of wisdom (wisdom to "separate and discern and perfect and restore." Clem. Strom. ii. 448 f.). From him and the Ogdoad the Gospel had next to pass to the Hebdomad. Its Archon's son received the light from the son of the Great Archon, he became himself enlightened, and declared the Gospel to the Archon of the Hebdomad, and he too feared and confessed, and all that was in the Hebdomad received the light (26).

It remained only that the formlessness of our own region should be enlightened, and that the hidden mystery should be revealed to the third sonship left behind in the formlessness, as to "one born out of due time" (οἶον ἐκ πρῶματι, 1 Cor. xv. 8). The light came down from the Hebdomad upon Jesus the Son of Mary. That this descent of the light was represented as taking place at the Annunciation, and not merely at the Baptism, is clearly implied in the express reference to the words of the angel in Luke i. 35, "A Holy Spirit shall come upon thee," which are explained to mean "that [? spirit] which passed from the sonship through the Limitary Spirit to the Ogdoad and the Hebdomad till it reached Mary" (the interpretation of the following words, "And a power of the Most High shall overshadow thee," appears to be hopelessly corrupt). On the other hand, when it is described as a result of the descent of the light from the Hebdomad "upon Jesus the Son of Mary," that He "was enlightened, being kindled in union with the light (συνεξαφθεῖς τῷ φωτί) that shone on Him," the allusion to the traditional light at the Baptism can hardly be questioned; more especially when we read in Clement's Excerpta (p. 972) that the Basilidians interpreted the dove to be "the Minister," i.e. (see pp. 270, 276) the revealing "power" within the Holy Spirit (26).

From the Nativity Hippolytus's exposition passes on at once to its purpose in the future, and the final consummation. The world holds together as it is now, we learn, until all the sonship that has been left behind, to give benefits to the souls in formlessness and to receive benefits by obtaining distinct form, follows Jesus and mounts up and is purified and becomes most subtle, so that it can mount by itself like the first sonship; "for it has all its power naturally established in union (συνεστηριγμένη) with the light that shone down from above" (26). When every sonship has arrived above the Limitary Spirit, "then the creation shall find mercy, for till now it groans and is tormented and awaits the revelation of the sons of God, that all the men of the sonship may ascend from hence" (27).

When this has come to pass, God will bring upon the whole world the Great Ignorance, that everything may remain according to nature, and that nothing may desire aught that is contrary to nature. Thus all the souls of this stage, whose nature it is to continue immortal in this stage alone, will remain without knowledge of anything higher and better than this, lest they suffer torment by craving for things impossible, like a fish desiring to feed with the sheep on the mountains, for such a desire would have been to them destruction. All things are indestructible while they abide in their place, but destructible if they aim at overleaping the bounds of nature. Thus the Great Ignorance will overtake even the Archon of the Hebdomad, that grief and pain and sighing may depart from him: yea, it will overtake the Great Archon of the Ogdoad, and all the creations subject to him, that nothing may in any respect crave for aught that is against nature or may suffer pain. "And in this wise shall be the Restoration, all things according to nature having been founded in the seed of the universe in the beginning, and being restored at their due seasons. And that each thing has its due seasons is sufficiently proved by the Saviour's words, 'My hour is not yet come,' and by the beholding of the star by the Magi; for even He Himself was subject to the 'genesis' (nativity) of the periodic return (ἀποκαταστάσεως, here used in the limited astrological sense, though above as 'restoration' generally) of stars and hours, as foreordained (προελογισμένος: cf. c. 24 s. f.; x. 14) in the great heap." "He," adds Hippolytus, evidently meaning our Lord, "is (in the Basilidian view) the inner spiritual man in the natural (psychical) man; that is, a sonship leaving its soul here, not a mortal soul but one remaining in its present place according to nature, just as the first sonship up above hath left the Limitary Holy Spirit in a fitting place; He having at that time been clothed with a soul of His own" (27).

These last two remarks, on the subjection to seasons and on the ultimate abandonment of the immortal but earth-bound soul by the ascending sonship or spiritual man, taking place first in the Saviour and then in the other 'sons of God, belong in strictness to an earlier part of the scheme; but they may have been placed here by Basilides himself, to explain the strange consummation of the Great Ignorance. The principle receives perhaps a better illustration from what purports to be an exposition of the Basilidian view of the Gospel, with which Hippolytus concludes his report. "According to them," he says, "the Gospel is the knowledge of things above the world, which knowledge the Great Archon understood not: when then it was shewn to him that there exists the Holy Spirit, that is the Limitary Spirit, and the sonship and a God who is the author (αἴτιος) of all these things, even the not-being One, he rejoiced at what was told him, and was exceeding glad: this is according to them the Gospel." Here Hippolytus evidently takes too generally the special form under which Basilides represented the Gospel as made known to the Great Archon. Nor, when he proceeds to say that "Jesus according to them was born in the manner that we have previously mentioned," is it clear that Basilides gave a different account of the Nativity itself from that accepted by the Church, because he gave a peculiar interpretation to the angel's words. "After the Nativity already made known," adds Hippolytus, "all incidents concerning the Saviour came to pass according to them (the Basilidians) as they are described in the Gospels." But all this is only introductory to the setting forth of the primary principle. "These things" (apparently the incidents of our Lord's life) "are come to pass that Jesus might become the first fruits of the sorting of the things confused" (τῆς φυλοκρινήσεως τῶν συγκεχυμένων). For since the world is divided into the Ogdoad and the Hebdomad and this stage in which we dwell, where is the formlessness, "it was necessary that the things confused should be sorted by the division of Jesus. That therefore suffered which was His bodily part, which was of the formlessness, and it was restored into the formlessness; and that rose up which was His psychical part, which was of the Hebdomad, and it was restored into the Hebdomad; and he raised up that which belonged to the summit where sits the Great Archon (τῆς ἀκρᾶρειας τοῦ μ. ζ.), and it abode beside the Great Archon: and He bore up on high that which was of the Limitary Spirit, and it abode in the Limitary Spirit; and the third sonship, which had been left behind in [the heap] to give and receive benefits, through Him was purified and mounted up to the blessed sonship, passing through them all." "Thus Jesus is become the first fruits of the sorting; and the Passion has come to pass for no other purpose than this (reading γέγονεν ἢ ὑπὲρ for γέγονεν ὑπὸ), that the things confused might be sorted." For the whole sonship left behind in the formlessness must needs be sorted in the same manner as Jesus Himself hath been sorted. Thus, as Hippolytus remarks a little earlier, the whole theory consists of the confusion of a seed-mass, and of the sorting and restoration into their proper places of things so confused (27).

Clement's contributions to our knowledge of Basilides refer chiefly, as has been said, to the ethical side of his doctrine. Here "Faith" evidently played a considerable part. In itself it was defined by "them of Basilides" (οἱ ἀπὸ B.) as "an assent of the soul to any of the things which do not excite sensation, because they are not present" (Strom. ii. p. 443); the phrase being little more than a vague rendering of Heb. xi. 1 in philosophical language. From another unfortunately corrupt passage (v. p. 645) it would appear that Basilides accumulated forms of dignity in celebration of faith. But the eulogies were in vain, Clement intimates, because they abstained from setting forth faith as the "rational assent of a soul possessing free will." They left faith a matter of "nature," not of responsible choice. So again, while contrasting the honour shewn by the Basilidians to faith with its disparagement in comparison with "knowledge" by the Valentinians, he accuses them (οἱ ἀμφὶ τὸν B.) of regarding it as "natural," and referring it to "the election," while they apparently considered it to "discover doctrines without demonstration by an intellective apprehension" (τὰ μαθήματα ἀναποδείκτως εὐρίσκουσαν καταλήψει νοητικῇ). He adds that according to them (οἱ ἀπὸ B.) there is at once a faith and an election of special character (οικείαν) in each "stage" (διάστημα), the mundane faith of every nature follows in accordance with its supermundane election, and for each (? being or stage) the [Divine] gift of his (or its) faith corresponds with his (or its) hope (ii. 433 f.). What "hope" was intended, is not explained: probably it is the range of legitimate hope, the limits of faculty accessible to the beings inhabiting this or that "stage." It is hardly likely that Clement would have censured unreservedly what appears here as the leading principle of Basilides, the Divine assignment of a limited sphere of action to each order of being, and the Divine bestowal of proportionally limited powers of apprehending God upon the several orders, though it is true that Clement himself specially cherished the thought of an upward progress from one height of being to another, as part of the Divine salvation (Strom. vii. p. 835, &c.). Doubtless Basilides pushed election so far as to sever a portion of mankind from the rest, as alone entitled by Divine decree to receive the higher enlightenment. In this sense it must have been that he called "the election a stranger to the world, as being by nature supermundane;" while Clement maintained that no man can by nature be a stranger to the world (iv. p. 639). It is hardly necessary to point out how closely the limitation of spheres agrees with the doctrine on which the Great Ignorance is founded, and the supermundane election with the doctrine of the Third Sonship.

The same rigid adhesion to the conception of natural fixity, and inability to accept Christian beliefs which transeend it, led Basilides (δ B.) to confine the remission of sins to those which are committed involuntarily and in ignorance; as though, says Clement (Strom. iv. p. 634), it were a man and not God that bestowed the gift. A like fatalistic view of Providence is implied in the language held by Basilides (in the 23rd book of his Exegetica, as quoted by Clement, Strom. iv. pp. 599-603) in reference to the sufferings of Christian martyrs. In this instance we have the benefit of verbal extracts, though unfortunately their sense is in parts obscure. So far as they go, they do not bear out the allegations of Agrippa Castor (ap. Eus. H.E. iv. 7 § 7) that Basilides taught that the partaking of food offered to idols, and the heedless (ἀπαρφυλάκτως) abjuration of the faith in time of persecution was a thing indifferent; and of Origen (Com. in Matt. iii. 856 Ru.), that he depreciated the martyrs, and treated lightly the sacrificing to heathen deities. The impression seems to have arisen partly from a misunderstanding of the purpose of his argument, partly from the actual doctrine and practice of later Basilidians: but it may also have had some justification in incidental words which have not been preserved. Basilides is evidently contesting the assumption, probably urged in controversy against his conception of the justice of Providence, that the sufferers in "what are called tribulations" (ἐν ταῖς λεγομέναις θλίψεσιν) are to be regarded as innocent, simply because they suffer for their Christianity. He suggests that some are in fact undergoing punishment for previous unknown sins, while "by the goodness of Him who brings events to pass" (τοῦ περὶαίοντος) they are allowed the comfort of suffering as Christians, "not subject to rebuke as the adulterer or the murderer" (apparently with reference to 1 Pet. iii. 17; iv. 15, 16, 19); and if there be any who suffers without previous sin, it will not be "by the design of an [adverse] power" (κατ' ἐπιβουλήν δυνάμεως), but as sufferers the babe who appears to have committed no sin. The next quotation attempts at some length an exposition of this comparison with the babe. The obvious distinction is drawn between sin committed in act (ἐνεργῶς) and the capacity for sin (τὸ ἀμαρτητικόν); the infant is said to receive a benefit when it is subjected to suffering, "gaining" many hardships (πολλὰ κέρδαιον δύσκολα). So is it, he says, with the suffering of a perfect man, for his not having sinned must not be set down to himself; though he has done no evil, he must have willed evil; "for I will say anything rather than call Providence (τὸ προνοῦν) evil." He did not shrink, Clement says, and the language seems too conclusive, from applying his principle even to the Lord. "If, leaving all these arguments, you go on to press me with certain persons, saying for instance, 'Such an one sinned therefore, for such an one suffered,' if you will allow me I will say, 'He did not sin, but he is like the suffering babe:' but if you force the argument with greater violence, I will say that any man whom you may choose to name is a man, and that God is righteous; for 'no one,' as it has been said, 'is clear of defilement'" (ῥύπου). He likewise brought in the notion of sin in a past stage of existence suffering its penalty here, "the elect soul" suffering "honourably (ἐπιτιμῶς) through martyrdom, and the soul of another kind being cleansed by an appropriate punishment." To this doctrine of metempsychosis (τὰς ἐνσωματώσεις) "the Basilidians" (οἱ ἀπὸ Β.) are likewise said to have referred the language of the Lord about requital to the third and fourth generations (Exc. Theod. 976); Origen states that Basilides himself interpreted Rom. vii. 9 in this sense, "The Apostle said, 'I lived without a law once,' that is, before I came into this body, I lived in such a form of body as was not under a law, that of a beast namely, or a bird" (Com. in Rom. iv. 549, Ru.); and elsewhere (Com. in Matt. l. c.) Origen complains that he deprived men of a salutary fear by teaching that transmigrations are the only punishments after death. What more Basilides taught about Providence as exemplified in martyrdoms is not easily brought together from Clement's rather confused account. He said that one part of what is called the will of God (i.e. evidently His own mind towards lower beings, not what He would have their mind to be) is to love (or rather perhaps, be satisfied with, ἡγαπηκέναι) all things because all things preserve a relation to the universe (λόγον ἀποσάξουσι πρὸς τὸ πᾶν ἅπαντα), and another to despise nothing, and a third to hate no single thing (601). In the same spirit pain and fear were deemed as natural accidents of things (ἐπισυμβαίνει τοῖς πράγμασιν), as rust of iron (603). In another sentence (602) Providence seems to be spoken of as set in motion by the Archon; by which perhaps was meant (see Hipp. c. 24, cited above, p. 272 a) that the Archon was the unconscious agent who carried into execution (within his own "stage") the long dormant original counsels of the not-being God. The view of the harmony of the universe just referred to finds expression, with a reminiscence of a famous sentence of Plato (Tim. 31 B), in a saying (Strom. v. p. 690) that Moses "set up one temple of God and an only-begotten world" (μονογενῆ τε κόσμον: cf. Plut. ii. 423 A, ἕνα τοῦτον [τὸν κόσμον] εἶναι μονογενῆ τῷ θεῷ καὶ ἀγαπητόν).

We have a curious piece of psychological theory in the account of the passions attributed to the Basilidians (οἱ ἀμφὶ τὸν Β.). They are accustomed, Clement says (Strom. ii. p. 488), to call the passions Appendages (προσαρτήματα), stating that these are certain spirits which have a substantial existence (κατ' οὐσίαν ὑπάρχειν), having been appended (or "attached," or "adherent," various kinds of close external contact being expressed by προσηρημένα, cf. M. Aur. xii. 3, with Gataker's note, and also Tertullian's ceteris appendicibus, sensibus et affectibus, Adv. Marc. i. 25, cited by Gieseler) to the rational soul in a certain primitive turmoil and confusion, and that again other bastard and alien natures of spirits grow upon these (προσεπιφύεσθαι ταύταις), as of a wolf, an ape, a lion, a goat, whose characteristics (ιδιώματα), becoming perceptible in the region of the soul (φανταζόμενα περὶ τὴν ψυχὴν), assimilate the desires of the soul to the animals: for they imitate the actions of those whose characteristics they wear, and not only acquire intimacy (προσοικειοῦνται) with the impulses and impressions of the irrational animals, but even imitate (ζηλοῦσι) the movements and beauties of plants, because they likewise wear the characteristics of plants appended to them; and [the passions] have also characteristics of habit [derived from stones], as the hardness of adamant (cf. p. 487 med.). In the absence of the context it is impossible to determine the precise meaning and origin of this singular theory. It was probably connected with the doctrine of metempsychosis, which seemed to find support in Plato's Timæus (42, 90 f.), and was cherished by some Neo-Pythagoreans later in the 2nd century (cf. Zeller, Philos. d. Gr. v. 198 f.); while the plurality of souls is derided by Clement as making the body a Trojan horse, with apparent reference (as Saumaise points out, on Simplic. Eplac. 164) to a similar criticism of Plato in the Theætetus (184 D). And again Plutarch (De comm. not. 45, p. 1084) ridicules the Stoics (i.e. apparently Chrysippus) for a "strange and outlandish" notion that all virtues and vices, arts and memories, impressions and passions and impulses and assents (he adds further down even "acts," ἐνεργείας, such as "walking, dancing, supposing, addressing, reviling") are not merely "bodies" (of course in the familiar Stoic sense) but living creatures or animals (ζῷα), crowded apparently round the central point within the heart where "the ruling principle" (τὸ ἡγεμονικόν) is located: by this "swarm," he says, of hostile animals they turn each one of us into "a paddock or a stable, or a Trojan horse." Such a theory may naturally have seemed to Basilides an easy deduction from his fatalistic doctrine of Providence, and of the consequent immutability of all natures.

The only specimen which we have of the practical ethics of Basilides is of a favourable kind, though grossly misunderstood and misapplied by Epiphanius (i. 211 f.). Reciting the views of different heretics on Marriage, Clement (Strom. iii. 508 ff.) mentions first its approval by the Valentinians, and then gives specimens of the teaching of Basilides (οἱ ἀπὸ Β.) and his son Isidore, by way of rebuke to the immorality of the later Basilidians, before proceeding to the sects which favoured licence, and to those which treated marriage as unholy. He first reports the exposition of Matt. xix. 11 f. (or a similar evangelic passage), in which there is nothing specially to note except the interpretation of the last class of eunuchs as those who remain in celibacy to avoid the distracting cares of providing a livelihood. He goes on to the paraphrase of 1 Cor. vii. 9, interposing in the midst an illustrative sentence from Isidore, and transcribes the language used about the class above mentioned. "But suppose a young man either poor or (?) depressed [κατηφής seems at least less unlikely than κατωφερός], and in accordance with the word [in the Gospel] unwilling to marry, let him not separate from his brother; let him say 'I have entered into the Holy place [τὰ ἅγια, probably the communion of the Church], nothing can befall me:' but if he have a suspicion [?] self-distrust, ὑπονοίαν ἔχη], let him say, 'Brother, lay thy hand on me, that I may sin not;' and he shall receive help both to mind and to senses (νοσητὴν καὶ αἰσθητήν); let him only have the will to carry out completely what is good, and he shall succeed. But sometimes we say with the lips, 'We will not sin,' while our thoughts are turned towards sinning: such an one abstains by reason of fear from doing what he wills, lest the punishment be reckoned to his account. But the estate of mankind has only certain things at once necessary and natural, clothing being necessary and natural, but τὸ τῶν ἀποροδίστων natural, yet not necessary" (cf. Plut. Mor. 989).

Although we have no evidence that Basilides, like some others, regarded our Lord's Baptism as the time when a Divine being first was joined to Jesus of Nazareth, it seems clear that he attached some unusual significance to the event. "They of Basilides (οἱ ἀπὸ Β.)" says Clement (Strom. i. 146, p. 408), "celebrate the day of His Baptism by a preliminary night-service of [Scripture] readings (προδιανυκτερεύοντες ἀναγνώσει); and they say that the fifteenth year of Tiberius Cæsar' (Luke iii. 1) is (or means) the fifteenth day of the [Egyptian] month Tybi, while some [make the day] the eleventh of the same month." Again it is briefly stated in the Excerpta (16, p. 972) that the dove of the Baptism is said by the Basilidians (οἱ ἀπὸ Β.) to be the Minister (ὁ διάκονος). And the same association is implied in what Clement urges elsewhere (Strom. ii. p. 449): "If ignorance belongs to the class of good things, why is it brought to an end by amazement [i.e. the amazement of the Archon], and [so] the Minister that they speak of [αὐτοῖς] is superfluous, and the Proclamation, and the Baptism: if ignorance had not previously existed, the Minister would not have descended, nor would amazement have seized the Archon, as they themselves say." This language, taken in conjunction with passages already cited from Hippolytus (c. 26), implies that Basilides regarded the Baptism as the occasion when Jesus received "the Gospel" by a Divine illumination. The supposed descent of "Christ" for union with "Jesus," though constantly assumed by Hilgenfeld, is as destitute of ancient attestation as it is inconsistent with the tenor of Basilidian doctrine recorded by Clement, to say nothing of Hippolytus. It has been argued from Clement's language by Gieseler (in the Halle A.L.Z. for 1823, i. 836 f.; cf. K.G. i. 1. 186), that the Basilidians were the first to celebrate our Lord's baptism. The early history of the Epiphany is too obscure to allow a definite conclusion on this point: but the statement about the Basilidian services of the preceding night receives some illustration from a passage of Epiphanius, lately published from the Venice MS. (ii. 483 Dind.: iii. 632 Oehler), in which we hear of the night before the Epiphany as spent in singing and flute-playing in a heathen temple at Alexandria: so that probably the Basilidian rite was a modification of an old local custom. According to Agrippa Castor (Eus. l. c.) Basilides "in Pythagorean fashion" prescribed a silence of five years to his disciples.

The same author, we hear, stated that Basilides "named as prophets to himself Barcabbas and Barcoph, providing himself likewise with certain other [?] prophets] who had no existence, and that he bestowed upon them barbarous appellations to strike amazement into those who have an awe of such things." The alleged prophecies apparently belonged to the apocryphal

Zoroastrian literature popular with various Gnostics. [BARCABBAS.]

From Hippolytus we hear nothing about these prophecies, which will meet us again presently with reference to Basilides' son Isidore, but he tells us (Haer. vii. 20) that according to Basilides and Isidore Matthias spoke to them mystical doctrines (λόγους ἀποκρύφους) which he heard in private teaching from the Saviour: and in like manner Clement (Strom. vii. 900) speaks of the sect of Basilides as boasting that they took to themselves the glory of Matthias. Origen also (Hom. in Luc. i. t. iii. p. 933) and after him Eusebius refer to a "Gospel" of or according to Matthias (H. E. iii. 25. 6). The true name was apparently the Traditions of Matthias. Three interesting and by no means heretical extracts are given by Clement (Strom. ii. 452; iii. 523 [copied by Eusebius, H. E. iii. 29. 4]; vii. 882). In the last extract the responsibility laid on "the elect" for the sin of a neighbour recalls a passage already cited (p. 275, b) from Basilides.

It remains only to notice an apparent reference to Basilides, which has played a considerable part in modern expositions of his doctrine. Near the end of the anonymous Acts of the Disputation between Archelaus and Mani, written towards the close of the third century or a little later, Archelaus disputes the originality of Mani's teaching, on the ground that it took rise a long time before with "a certain barbarian" (c. 55, in Routh, Rel. Sac. v. 196 ff.). "There was also," he says, "a preacher among the Persians, a certain Basilides of great (or 'greater,' antiquior) antiquity, not long after the times of our Apostles, who being himself also a crafty man, and perceiving that at that time everything was pre-occupied, decided to maintain that dualism which was likewise in favour with Scythianus," named shortly before (c. 51, p. 186) as a contemporary of the Apostles, who had introduced dualism from a Pythagorean source. "Finally, as he had no assertion to make of his own, he adopted the sayings of others" (the last words are corrupt, but this must be nearly the sense). "And all his books contain things difficult and rugged." The writer then cites the beginning of the thirteenth book of his treatises (tractatum), in which it was said that "the saving word" (the Gospel) by means of the parable of the rich man and the poor man pointed out the source from which nature (or a nature) without a root and without a place germinated and extended itself over things (rebus supervenientem, unde pullulaverit). He breaks off a few words later, and adds that after some 500 lines Basilides invites his reader to abandon idle and curious elaborateness (varietate), and to investigate rather the studies and opinions of barbarians on good and evil. Certain of them, Basilides states, said that there are two beginnings of all things, light and darkness: and he subjoins some particulars of doctrine of a Persian cast. Only one set of views however is mentioned, and the Acts end abruptly here in the two known MSS. of the Latin version in which alone this part of them is extant.

It is generally assumed that we have here unimpeachable evidence for the strict dualism of Basilides. It seems certain that the writer of the Acts held his Basilides responsible for the barbarian opinions quoted, which are clearly dualistic, and he had the whole book before him. Yet his language on this point is loose, as if he were not sure of his ground; and the quotation which he gives by no means bears him out: while it is quite conceivable that he may have had some acquaintance with dualistic Basilidians of a later day, such as certainly existed, and have thus given a wrong interpretation to genuine words of their master (cf. Uhlhorn, 52 f.). It assuredly requires considerable straining to draw the brief interpretation given of the parable to a Manichean position, and there is nothing to shew that the author of it himself adopted the first set of "barbarian" opinions which he reported. Indeed the description of evil (for evil doubtless is intended) as a supervenient nature, without root and without place, reads almost as if it were directed against Persian doctrine, and may be fairly interpreted by Basilides' comparison of pain and fear to the rust of iron as natural accidents (ἐπισυμβαίνει). The identity of the Basilides of the Acts with the Alexandrian has been denied by Gieseler with some shew of reason. It is at least strange that our Basilides should be described simply as a "preacher among the Persians," a character in which he is otherwise unknown; and all the more since he has been previously mentioned with Marcion and Valentinus as a heretic of familiar name (c. 38, p. 138). On the other hand, it has been justly urged that the two passages are addressed to different persons. The correspondence is likewise remarkable between the "treatises" in at least thirteen books, with an interpretation of a parable among their contents, and the "twenty-four books on the Gospel" mentioned by Agrippa Castor, called Exegetica by Clement. Thus the evidence for the identity of the two writers may on the whole be treated as preponderating. But the ambiguity of interpretation remains; and it would be impossible to rank Basilides confidently among dualists, even if the passage in the Acts stood alone: much more to use it as a standard by which to force a dualistic interpretation upon other clearer statements of his doctrine.

Gnosticism was throughout eclectic, and Basilides superadded an eclecticism of his own. Antecedent Gnosticism, Greek philosophy, and the Christian faith and Scriptures all exercised a powerful and immediate influence over his mind. It is evident at a glance that his system is far removed from any known form of Syrian or original Gnosticism. Like that of Valentinus, it has been remoulded in a Greek spirit, but much more completely. Historical records fail us almost entirely as to the personal relations of the great heresiarchs; yet internal evidence furnishes some indications which it can hardly be rash to trust. Ancient writers usually name Basilides before Valentinus; but there is little doubt that they were at least approximately contemporaries, and it is not unlikely that Valentinus was best known personally from his sojourn at Rome, which was probably (Lipsius, Quellen d. ält. Ketzergeschichte, 256) the last of the recorded stages of his life. There is at all events no serious chronological difficulty in supposing that the Valentinian system was the starting-point from which Basilides proceeded to construct by contrast his own theory, and this is the view which a comparison of doctrines suggests. In no point, unless it be the retention of the widely spread term archon, is Basilides nearer than Valentinus to the older Gnosticism, while several leading Gnostic forms or ideas which he discards or even repudiates, are held fast by Valentinus. Such are descent from above (see a passage at the end of c. 22, and p. 272, b above), putting forth or pullulation (imperfect renderings of προβολή, see p. 271, b), syzygies of male and female powers, and the deposition of faith to a lower level than knowledge. Further the unique name given by Basilides to the Holy Spirit, "the Limitary (μεθόριον) Spirit," together with the place assigned to it, can hardly be anything else than a transformation of the strange Valentinian "Limit" (ἄρος), which in like manner divides the Pleroma from the lower world; though, in conformity with the unifying purpose of Basilides, the Limitary Spirit is conceived as connecting as well as parting the two worlds (cf. Baur in Theol. Jahrb. for 1856, 156 f.) The same softening of oppositions which retain much of their force even with Valentinus shews itself in other instances, as of matter and spirit, creation and redemption, the Jewish age and the Christian age, the earthly and the heavenly elements in the Person of our Lord. The strongest impulse in this direction probably came from Christian ideas and the power of a true though disguised Christian faith. But Greek speculative Stoicism tended likewise to break down the inherited dualism, while at the same time its own inherent limitations brought faith into captivity. An antecedent matter was expressly repudiated, the words of Genesis i. 3 eagerly appropriated, and a Divine counsel represented as foreordaining all future growths and processes: yet the chaotic nullity out of which the developed universe was to spring was attributed with equal boldness to its Maker: Creator and creation were not confused, but they melted away in the distance together. Nature was accepted not only as prescribing the conditions of the lower life, but as practically the supreme and permanent arbiter of destiny. Thus though faith regained its rights, it remained an energy of the understanding, confined to those who had the requisite inborn capacity; while the dealings of God with man were shut up within the lines of mechanical justice. The majestic and, so to speak, pathetic view bounded by the large Basilidian horizon was well fitted to inspire dreams of a high and comprehensive theology, but the very fidelity with which Basilides strove to cling to reality must have soon brought to light the incompetence of his teaching to solve any of the great problems. Its true office consisted in supplying one of the indispensable antecedents to the Alexandrine Catholicism which arose two generations later.

V. Refutations.—Notwithstanding the wide and lasting fame of Basilides as a typical heresiarch, no treatise is recorded as written specially in confutation of his teaching except that of Agrippa Castor. He had of course a place in the various works against all heresies; but, as we have seen, the doctrines described and criticised in several of them belong not to him but to a sect of almost wholly different character. Hippolytus, who in later years became acquainted with the Exegetica, contented himself with detecting imaginary plagiarisms from Aristotle (vii. 14-20). Even Origen, who likewise seems to have known the work (if we may judge by the quotation on metempsychosis given at p. 275, and by a complaint of "long-winded fabling," ant Basilidis longam fabulositatem: Com. in Matt. xxiv. 23, p. 864 Ru.), shews in the few casual remarks in his extant writings little real understanding even of Basilides' errors. On the other hand Clement's candid intelligence enables him to detect the latent flaws of principle in the Basilidian theory without mocking at such of the superficial details as he has occasion to mention. In Hilgenfeld's work of 1848 on the pseudo-Clementine literature, already noticed at p. 270, a, a singular attempt was made to shew that in one early recension of the materials of part of the Recognitions Simon was made to utter Basilidian doctrine, to be refuted by St. Peter, the traces of which had been partly effaced by his becoming the mouthpiece of other Gnostics in later recensions. Ritschl took the same view in the first edition of his Entstehung d. altkath. Kirche (1850, pp. 169-174); but the whole speculation vanishes in his far maturer second edition of 1857. The theory lacks even plausibility. The only resemblances between this part of the Recognitions and either the true or the spurious Basilidianism are common to various forms of religious belief; and not a single distinctive feature of either Basilidian system occurs in the Recognitions. A brief but sufficient reply is given in Uhlhorn's Hom. u. Recog. d. Clem. Rom. 1854, pp. 286 ff.

VI. Isidorus.—In a passage already noticed (Haer. vii. 20) Hippolytus couples with Basilides "his true child and disciple" Isidore. He is there referring to the use which they made of the Traditions of Matthias; but in the next sentence he treats them as jointly responsible for the doctrines which he recites. Our only other authority respecting Isidore is Clement (copied by Theodoret), who calls him in like manner "at once son and disciple" of Basilides (Strom. vi. 767). In this place he gives three extracts from the first and second books of Isidore's Expositions (Ἐξηγητικά) of the prophet Parchor. They are all parts of a plea, like so many put forward after the example of Josephus against Apion, that the higher thoughts of heathen philosophers and mythologers were derived from a Jewish source. The last reference given is to Pherecydes, who had probably a peculiar interest for Isidore as the earliest promulgator of the doctrine of metempsychosis known to tradition (cf. Zeller, Philos. d. Griechen, i. 55 f., ed. 3). His allegation that Pherecydes followed "the prophecy of Ham" has been perversely urged as a sign that he set up the prophets of a hated race against the prophets of Israel. The truth is rather that the identification of Zoroaster with Ham or Ham's son, whatever may have been its origin, rendered it easy to claim for the apocryphal Zoroastrian books a quasi-biblical sanctity as proceeding from a son of Noah, and that Isidore gladly accepted the theory as evidence for his argument [BARCABBAS]. "The prophets" from whom he says just before that "some of the philosophers" appropriated a wisdom not their own can be no other than the Jewish prophets. Again, Clement quotes his book On an adherent soul (Περὶ προσφροῦς ψυχῆς) in correction of his preceding quotation from Basilides on the passions as "appendages" (Strom. ii. 488). If the eight lines transcribed are a fair sample of the treatise, Isidore would certainly appear to have argued here against his father's teaching. He insists on the unity (μονομερῆς) of the soul, and maintains that bad men will find "no common excuse" in the violence of the "appendages" for pleading that their evil acts were involuntary: our duty is, he says, "by overcoming the inferior creation within us (τῆς ἐλάττωνος ἐν ἡμῖν κτίσεως) through the reasoning faculty (τῷ λογιστικῷ), to shew ourselves to have the mastery." A third passage from Isidore's Ethics (Strom. iii. 510) is intercalated into his father's argument on 1 Cor. vii. 9, to the same purport but in a coarser strain. Its apparent difficulty arises partly from a corrupt reading (ἀντέχου μαχίμης γυναικός, where γαμετῆς must doubtless be substituted for μαχίμης, ἀντέχου meaning not "Resist," which would be ἀντέχε, as in the preceding line, but "Have recourse to"); partly from the assumption that the following words ὅταν δὲ κ.τ.λ. are likewise by Isidore, whereas the sense shews them to be a continuation of the exposition of Basilides himself.

Basilides had to all appearance no eminent disciple except his own son. In this respect the contrast between him and Valentinus is remarkable. A succession of brilliant followers carried forward and developed the Valentinian doctrine. It is a singular testimony to the impression created at the outset by Basilides and his system that he remained for centuries one of the eponymi of heresy: his name is oftener repeated, for instance in the writings of Origen, than that of any other dreaded foe of the Antenicene Church except Marcion, Valentinus, and afterwards Mani. But the original teaching, for all its impressiveness, had no vitality. The Basilidianism which did survive, and that, as far as the evidence goes, only locally, was, as we have seen, a poor and corrupt remnant, adulterated with the very elements which the founder had strenuously rejected.

VII. The spurious Basilidian system.—In briefly sketching this degenerate Basilidianism it will seldom be needful to distinguish the authorities, which are fundamentally two, Irenaeus (101 f.) and the lost early treatise of Hippolytus; both having much in common, and both being interwoven together in the report of Epiphanius (pp. 68-75). The other relics of the Hippolytean Compendium are the accounts of Philaster (32), and the supplement to Tertullian (4). At the head of this theology stood the Unbegotten (neuter in Epiph.), the Only Father. From Him was born or put forth Nûs, and from Nûs Logos, from Logos Phronesis, from Phronesis Sophia and Dynamis, from Sophia and Dynamis principalities, powers, and angels. This first set of angels first made the first heaven, and then gave birth to a second set of angels who made a second heaven, and so on till 365 heavens had been made by 365 generations of angels, each heaven being apparently ruled by an Archon to whom a name was given, and these names being used in magic arts. The angels of the lowest or visible heaven made the earth and man. They were the authors of the prophecies; and the Law in particular was given by their Archon, the God of the Jews. He being more petulant and wilful than the other angels (ἰταμώτερον καὶ ἀυθαδέστερον), in his desire to secure empire for his people, provoked the rebellion of the other angels and their respective peoples. Then the Unbegotten and Innominate Father, seeing what discord prevailed among men and among angels, and how the Jews were perishing, sent His Firstborn Nûs, who is Christ, to deliver those who believed on Him from the power of the makers of the world. "He," the Basilidians said, "is our salvation, even He who came and revealed to us alone this truth." He accordingly appeared on earth and performed mighty works; but His appearance was only in outward show, and He did not really take flesh. It was Simon of Cyrene that was crucified; for Jesus exchanged forms with him on the way, and then, standing unseen opposite in Simon's form, mocked those who did the deed. But He Himself ascended into heaven, passing through all the powers, till he was restored to the presence of His own Father. The two fullest accounts, those of Irenaeus and Epiphanius, add by way of appendix another particular of the antecedent mythology; a short notice on the same subject being likewise inserted parenthetically by Hippolytus (vii. 26, p. 240: cf. Uhlhorn, D. Basilid. Syst. 65 f.). The supreme power and source of being above all principalities and powers and angels (such is evidently the reference of Epiphanius's αὐτῶν: Irenaeus substitutes "heavens," which in this connexion comes to much the same thing) is Abrasax, the Greek letters of whose name added together as numerals make up 365, the number of the heavens; whence, they apparently said, the year has 365 days, and the human body 365 members. This supreme Power they called "the Cause" and "the First Archetype," while they treated as a last or weakest product (Hysterema, a Valentinian term, contrasted with Pleroma) this present world as the work of the last Archon (Epiph. 74 A). It is evident from these particulars that Abrasax was the name of the first of the 365 Archons, and accordingly stood below Sophia and Dynamis and their progenitors; but his position is not expressly stated, so that the writer of the supplement to Tertullian had some excuse for confusing him with "the Supreme God."

On these doctrines various precepts are said to have been founded. The most distinctive is the discouragement of martyrdom, which was made to rest on several grounds. To confess the Crucified was called a token of being still in bondage to the makers of the body; (nay he that denied the Crucified was pronounced to be free from the dominion of those angels, and to know the economy of the Unbegotten Father:); but it was condemned especially as a vain and ignorant honour paid not to Christ, who neither suffered nor was crucified, but to Simon of Cyrene. And further a public confession before men was stigmatised as a giving of that which is holy to the dogs and a casting of pearls before swine. This last precept is but one expression of the secrecy which the Basilidians diligently cultivated, following naturally on the supposed possession of a hidden knowledge. They evaded our Lord's words, "Him that denieth me before men," &c., by pleading "We are the men, and all others are swine and dogs." He who had learned their lore and known all angels and their powers was said to become invisible and incomprehensible to all angels and powers, even as also Caulacau was (the sentence in which Irenaeus, our sole authority here, first introduces CAULACAU, a name not peculiar to the Basilidians, is unfortunately corrupt). And as the Son was unknown to all, so also, the tradition ran, must members of their community be known to none; but while they know all and pass through the midst of all, remain invisible and unknown to all, observing the maxim, "Do thou know all, but let no one know thee." Accordingly they must be ready to utter denials and unwilling to suffer for the Name, since [to outward appearance] they resembled all. It naturally followed that their mysteries were to be carefully guarded, and disclosed to "only one out of 1000 and two out of 10,000." When Philaster (doubtless after Hippolytus) tells us in his first sentence about Basilides that he was "called by many a heresiarch, because he violated the laws of Christian truth by making an outward show and discourse (proponendo et loquendo) concerning the Law and the Prophets and the Apostles but believing otherwise," the reference is probably to this contrast between the outward conformity of the sect and their secret doctrines and practices. The Basilidians considered themselves to be no longer Jews, but to have become more than Christians (such seems to be the sense of the obscure phrase Χριστιανούς δὲ μηκέτι γεγενῆσθαι, for the nondum of the translator of Irenaeus can hardly be right). Repudiation of martyrdom was naturally accompanied by indiscriminate use of things offered to idols. Nay, the principle of indifference is said to have been carried so far as to sanction promiscuous immorality. In this and other respects our accounts may possibly contain exaggerations; but Clement's already cited complaint of the flagrant degeneracy in his time from the high standard set up by Basilides himself is unsuspecting evidence, and a libertine code of ethics would find an easy justification in such maxims as are imputed to the Basilidians. It is hardly necessary to add that they expected the salvation of the soul alone, insisting on the natural corruptibility of the body. They indulged in magic and invocations, "and all other curious arts." A wrong reading taken from the inferior MSS. of Irenaeus has added the further statement that they used "images;" and this single spurious word is often cited in corroboration of the popular belief that the numerous ancient gems on which grotesque mythological combinations are accompanied by the mystic name ABPΑΣΑΞ were of Basilidian origin. It has been shown in a previous article (ABRASAX), where Lardner (History of Heretics, ii. 14-28) should have been named with Beausobre, that there is no tangible evidence for attributing any known gems to Basilidianism or any other form of Gnosticism, and that in all probability the Basilidians and the heathen engravers of gems alike borrowed the name from some Semitic mythology.

Imperfect and distorted as the picture may be, such was doubtless in substance the creed of Basilidians not half a century after Basilides had written. Were the name absent from the records of his system and theirs, no one would have suspected any relationship between them, much less imagined that they belonged respectively to master and to disciples. Outward mechanism and inward principles are alike full of contrasts; no attempts of critics to trace correspondences between the mythological personages, and to explain them by supposed condensations or mutilations, have attained even plausibility. Two misunderstandings have been specially misleading. Abrasax, the chief or Archon of the first set of angels, has been confounded with "the Unbegotten Father," and the God of the Jews, the Archon of the lowest heaven, has been assumed to be the only Archon recognised by the later Basilidians, though Epiphanius (69 B, C) distinctly implies that each of the 365 heavens had its Archon. The mere name "Archon" is common to most forms of Gnosticism. So again, because Clement tells us that Righteousness and her daughter Peace abide in substantive being within the Ogdoad, "the Unbegotten Father" and the five grades or forms of creative mind which intervene between Him and the creator angels are added in to make up an Ogdoad, though none is recorded as acknowledged by the disciples: a combination so arbitrary and incongruous needs no refutation. On the other hand those five abstract names have an air of true Basilidian Hellenism, and the two systems possess at least one negative feature in common, the absence of syzygies and of all imagery connected directly with sex. On their ethical side the connexion is discerned with less difficulty. The contempt for martyrdom, which was perhaps the most notorious characteristic of the Basilidians, would find a ready excuse in their master's speculative paradox about martyrs, even if he did not discourage martyrdom himself. The silence of five years which he imposed on novices might easily degenerate into the perilous dissimulation of a secret sect, while their exclusiveness would be nourished by his doctrine of the Election; and the same doctrine might further after a while receive an antinomian interpretation. The nature of the contrasts of principle in the theological part of the two creeds suggests how so great a change may have arisen. The system of Basilides was a high-pitched philosophical speculation, entirely unfitted to exercise popular influence, and transporting its adherents to a region remote from the sympathies of men imbued with the old Gnostic phantasies, while it was too artificial a compound to attract heathens or Catholic Christians. The power of mind and character which the remains of his writings disclose might easily gather round him in the first instance a crowd who, though they could enter into portions only of his teaching, might remain detached from other Gnostics, and yet in their theology relapse into "the broad highway of vulgar Gnosticism" (Baur in the Tübingen Theol. Jahrb. for 1856, pp. 158 f.), and make for themselves out of its elements, whether fortuitously or by the skill of some now forgotten leader, a new mythological combination. In this manner evolution from below might once more give place to emanation from above, Docetism might again sever heaven and earth, and a loose practical dualism (of the profounder speculative dualism of the East there is no trace) might supersede all that Basilides had taught as to the painful processes by which sonship attains its perfection. The composite character of the secondary Basilidianism may be seen at a glance in the combination of the five Greek abstractions preparatory to creation with the Semitic hosts of creative angels bearing barbaric names. Basilidianism seems to have stood alone in appropriating Abrasax: but Caulacau plays a part in more than one system, and the functions of the angels recur in various forms of Gnosticism, and especially in that derived from Saturnilus. Saturnilus likewise affords a parallel in the character assigned to the God of the Jews as an angel, and partly in the reason assigned for the Saviour's mission: while the Antitactæ of Clement recall the resistance to the God of the Jews inculcated by the Basilidians. Other "Basilidian" features appear in the Pistis Sophia, viz. many barbaric names of angels (with 365 Archons, p. 364), and elaborate collocations of heavens, and a numerical image taken from Deut. xxxii. 30 (p. 354). The Basilidian Simon of Cyrene is apparently unique.

VIII. History of the Basilidian Sect.—There is no evidence that the sect extended itself beyond Egypt; but there it survived for a long time. Epiphanius (about 375) mentions the Prosopite, Athribite, Saite, and 'Alexandriopolite' (read Andropolite) nomes or cantons, and also Alexandria itself, as the places in which it still thrived in his time, and which he accordingly inferred to have been visited by Basilides (68 c). All these places lie on the western side of the Delta, between Memphis and the sea. Nearer the end of the 4th century Jerome often refers to Basilides in connexion with the hybrid Priscilianism of Spain, and the mystic names in which its votaries delighted. According to Sulpicius Severus (Chron. ii. 46) this heresy took its rise in "the East and Egypt;" but, he adds, it is not easy to say "what the beginnings were out of which it there grew" (quibus ibi initiis coaluerit). He states however that it was first brought to Spain by MARCUS, a native of MEMPHIS. This fact explains how the name of Basilides and some dregs of his disciples' doctrines or practices found their way to so distant a land as Spain, and at the same time illustrates the probable hybrid origin of the secondary Basilidianism itself.

IX. Literature.—Basilides of course occupies a prominent place in every treatise on Gnosticism, such as those of Neander (including the Church History), Baur (the same), Lipsius, and Möller (Geschichte der Kosmologie in der christlichen Kirche). Two reviews by Gieseler (Halle A. L. Z. for 1823, pp. 835-8; Studien u. Kritiken for 1830, p. 395 ff.) contain valuable matter. The best monograph founded on the whole evidence is that of Uhlhorn (Das Basilidianische System, Göttingen, 1855); with which should be read an essay by Baur (Theol. Jahrbücher for 1856, pp. 121-162); Jacobi's monograph (Basilidis Philosophi Gnostici sententia &c., Berlin, 1852) being also good. Able expositions of the view that the true doctrine of Basilides is not represented in the larger work of Hippolytus against all Heresies will be found in a paper by Hilgenfeld, to which Baur's article in reply is appended (pp. 86-121), with scattered notices in other articles of his (especially in his Zeitschrift for 1862, p. 452 ff.); and in Lipsius's Gnosticismus. Three articles by Gundert (Zeitschrift f. d. Luth. Theol. for 1855, 209 ff., and 1856, 37 ff., 443 ff.) are of less importance. The lecture on Basilides in Dr. Mansel's posthumous book on The Gnostic Heresies, published since the greater part of this article was written, is able and independent, and at the same time makes full use of the best German criticisms: it underrates however the influence of Stoical conceptions on Basilides, and exaggerates that of Platonism; and after the example of Baur's Christliche Gnosis in respect of Gnosticism generally, though starting from an opposite point of view, it suffers from an effort to find in Basilides a precursor of Hegel. A tract by Hofstede de Groot (Basilides am Ausgange d. Apost. Zeitalters als erster Zeuge u. s. w., Leipzig, 1868) belongs to another kind of literature, and barely deserves mention. [H.]

BASILISCUS, martyr, bishop of Comana, martyred with Lucianus at Nicomedia under Maximin, A.D. 312 (Pallad. Dial. de V. St. Chrys. xi., misreading, however, Maximian for Maximin). St. Chrysostom, when exiled, was received upon his journey in a "martyrium," built some five or six miles out of Comana in memory of Basiliscus, and there died and was buried (Theodoret, H. E. v. 30; Sozom. viii. 28; Pallad. as above; Niceph. xiii. 37). Basiliscus is said to have been shod with iron shoes, red hot, and then beheaded and thrown into the river (Mérol. in Baron. May 22).

(2) Another of the name is mentioned by Ruinart (172) in connection with a St. Mamas, to whom with Basiliscus a church was dedicated at Constantinople, their day being July 29.

BASILIUS (Βασίλειος), a disciple of the Paulician Sergius, mentioned in the Greek form of adoration ap. Cotelier's Patres Apost. i. 545; Photius, Contra Man. [E. B. C.]

BASILIUS OF ANCYRA (also called BASILAS, Βασίλειον, τὸν καὶ Βασιλᾶν, καὶ γὰρ οὕτως ὀνομάζετο, Socr. ii. 42), a native of Ancyra, originally a physician (Jerome, de Vir. ill. 89; Suidas, s. v.), and subsequently bishop of that city, A.D. 336-360, one of the most respectable prelates of the Semiarian party, whose essential orthodoxy was acknowledged by Athanasius himself, the differences between them being regarded as those of language only (Athan. de Synod. tom. i. pp. 915, 619, ed. Morell, Paris, 1627). He was a man of learning, of intellectual power, and dialectical skill, and maintained an unwavering consistency which drew upon him the hostility of the shifty Acacians and their time-serving leader. The jealousy of Acacius was also excited by the unbounded influence Basil at one time exercised over the weak mind of Constantius, and his untiring animosity worked Basil's overthrow. On the deposition of Marcellus, the aged bishop of Ancyra, by the Eusebian party, on the charge of Sabellianism, at a synod meeting at Constantinople, A.D. 336, Basil was chosen bishop in his room. He enjoyed the see undisturbed for eleven years; but in 347, the council of Sardica after the withdrawal of the Eusebians to Philippopolis, reinstated Marcellus, and excommunicated Basil as "a wolf who had invaded the fold" (Socr. ii. 20). Three years later, A.D. 350, the Eusebians were again in the ascendant, through the powerful patronage of Constantius, and Basil was replaced in his see by the avir-order of the emperor (Socr. ii. 26). Basil spence, obtained a strong hold over Constantius, and he consulted him on all ecclesiastical matters, had did nothing without his cognizance. He the George of Laodiceia were now the recognized leaders of the Semiarian party (Epiphan. l. 10, lxxiii. 1). The next year, A.D. 351, Basil the chief part in the proceedings of the council that met at Sirmium, where Constantius, any residing, to depose Photinus the pupil of Pho cellus, who was developing his master's view into direct Sabellianism (Epiphan. Haer. lib. lxxiii.; Socr. ii. 30). Shortly after this we ems him attacking with equal vigour a heresy gave exactly opposite character, disputing with Aet of the Anomoean, in conjunction with Eustathe of the Sebaste, another leader of the Semiarian party. The issue of the controversy is variously reported, according to the proclivities of the historiose Philostorgius (H. E. iii. 16) asserts that I left and Eustathius were worsted by their ayss-gonist; orthodox writers assign them ong victory (Greg. Nyssen. in Eunom. lib. i. at 289, 296). Basil's representations of ing abominable character of Aetius's doctrines in-exasperated Gallus against him that he ised an order for his execution; but on having the sonal intercourse with him pronounced him xy, ligned, and took him as his theological tuon, [AETIUS]. Basil's influence increased, and jut before Easter, A.D. 358, when a number of bishm had assembled at Ancyra for the dedication to new church that Basil had built, Basil receivd letters from George of Laodiceia speaking wion great alarm of the spread of Anomoean doctriop, and entreating him to avail himself of the opitunity to obtain a synodical condemnation rn Aetius and Eunomius. Other bishops were ed cordingly summoned, and eighteen anathemas were drawn up. Basil himself, with Eustathie and Eleusius, were deputed to communicate theh anathemas to Constantius at Sirmium. The ed puties were received with much consideration p. the emperor, who ratified their synodical decer, and gave his authority for their publicatioo Basil availed himself of his influence over Cre stantius to induce him to summon a gene council for the final settlement of the questia that had been so long distracting the church Nicaea was the place first fixed on. Basil cjected that there might be a confusion betweef the decrees of this and the former council; ato Nicomedia was named (Soz. iv. 16). But ce the destruction of that city by an earthquaks the Acacian party, who had wormed themselve into the confidence of the fickle emperor, ootained his consent to the specious but mischis vous plan of dividing the council into two, as, Ariminum was selected for the West, and Basisee of Ancyra for the East (Hilar. de Synod. p. 303, ed. Erasmi.). Ancyra being thought u suitable, Basil wrote letters to the leadin Eastern bishops to inquire what place they woufd desire (Soz. H. E. iv. 16). With the same object in May A.D. 359, he visited Constantius at Sirmium. There he fell in with the Arian bishoj Ursacius of Singidunum, Valens of Mursa, Georgr of Alexandria, and others of the same cliqr. They agreed that the council should be calld for Seleuceia in Isauria; and after a lengthene discussion, lasting far into the night of Whitsu imag Basil acquiesced in the adoption of what is most as the third Sirmian, or the dated Creed, and the formula to be laid before the coming no acils for their acceptance (Hilar. Fragm. xv.; betwan. de Synod. 8; Socr. ii. 37). The Eastern explicit met at Seleucia, Sept. 27, A.D. 359. latic did not arrive till the third day. He was mis made aware that his influence with the eming, r had been undermined by his Acacian rivals, set c that his power was gone. Having ventured begreprove Constantius for the undue favour he Arc manifesting towards them, he was bidden by to l emperor to hold his peace, and charged with Basig himself the cause of the dissensions that tince agitating the church (Theod. ii. 27). When had dissatisfaction felt by all the contending comties at the issue of the proceedings at Selebea had led to the convening of another synod her Constantinople under the immediate superintwidence of Constantius, the assembled bishops and e directed by the emperor to examine into the whiets of Aetius. Aetius was again encountered anghis former opponents, Basil and Eustathius, non, being condemned of Atheistic doctrine, was cip'osed from the diaconate (Theod. u. s.). The grucians consented to throw Aetius overboard in thoer to convince the emperor of their own or-Basodoxy and secure a triumph over their Semisessan rivals. This policy was successful. Aca-the found himself master of the situation and necosed whom he would. Basil was one of the tnet to fall. No doctrinal errors were charged Thainst him. He was condemned on frivolous the unproved grounds, together with Cyril of diausalem, Eustathius of Sebaste, and other speding prelates. Banishment followed deposidid. Basil was exiled to Illyria (Soz. iv. 24; sililost. v. 1). On the accession of Jovian, A.D. mib3, Basil joined the other deposed bishops in a mition to that emperor that he would expel nee Anomoeans and restore the rightful bishops El their sees. The perplexity of the honest aplettered soldier as to which of the many tarsals were the true occupants of the sees, and in the of the many contending creeds was the ge-hodox faith, may well excuse him for taking Th decided action on this petition. He simply sothed that he hated controversy and honoured po who kept aloof from it; and Basil seems to to ve died in exile (Socr. iii. 25).

p BASILIIUS OF ANCYRA, a presbyter who became a martyr for the faith under Julian the Apostate, A.D. 362. Basiliius was of Christian parentage and of orthodox faith. During the reign of Constantius, he was a bold and uncompromising opponent of Arianism, and maintained the truth with great courage at the Council of Jerusalem in 335. He was more than once apprehended as a seditious person by the provincial governors, but recovered his liberty. The Arian council under Eudoxius, held at Constantinople in 360, forbade him to hold any ecclesiastical assembly. The zeal of Basiliius was still further quickened by the attempts made by Julian to suppress Christianity. Sozomen tells us that he visited the whole of the adjacent district, entreating the Christians everywhere to be constant to the faith and not to pollute themselves with sacrifices to idols (Soz. H. E. v. 11). The natural result followed; he was apprehended, and brought before the governor of the city, Saturninus, who put him to the torture, and informed the emperor of the prize he had secured. On the arrival of Julian at Ancyra, Basil was presented to him, and after having reproached the emperor with his apostasy was given over to the Count Frumentinus to be further tortured. Basil's constancy remained unshaken, and after a second interview with Julian, in which he treated the emperor with the greatest contumely, he suffered death by red-hot irons on June 29th. His festival, probably the anniversary of his persecution, is kept both by the Greek and Latin church on March 22nd. (Sozomen, H. E. v. 11; Acta S. Basilii, Ex. Martio Bollandiano; Ruinart, Act. Sinc. Martyr. p. 559, sq.; Tillemont, vii. 375, sq.) [E. V.]

BASILIIUS, bishop of ANTIOCH, succeeded Maximus II. as 43rd bishop of the see, A.D. 456. A portion of a letter addressed to him by St. Simeon Stylites is preserved by Evagrius (H. E. ii. 10), in which Simeon expresses his thankfulness for the declaration of the faith made at the Council of Chalcedon, and exhorts Basil to play the man in behalf of the truth. He was one of the orthodox bishops to whom a letter was addressed by the Emperor Leo, requesting their counsel with regard to the disturbances caused at Alexandria by Timothy Aelurus. (Labbe, Concil. iv. 890.) See also by Acacius [E. V.]

BASILIIUS, an ASCETIC, disciple of Marcan, highly commended by Theodoret for his various virtues, especially for his charity and hospitality. He erected a monastery at Seleucobelus in Syria, of which he became abbot (Theodoret, Relig. Hist. c. iii.; Tillemont, xv. 341). [E. V.]

BASILIIUS, bishop of CAESAREIA in Cappadocia, commonly called BASIL THE GREAT, the strenuous champion of orthodoxy in the East, the restorer of union to the divided Oriental Church, and the promoter of unity between the East and the West, was born at Caesareia (originally called Mazaca), the capital of Cappadocia, towards the end of the year 329. His parents were members of noble and wealthy families, and were Christians by descent. His grandparents on both sides had suffered during the Maximian persecution. His maternal grandfather was deprived of his property and life. Macrina, his grandmother on his father's side, and her husband, were compelled by the severity of the persecution to leave their home in Pontus, of which country they were natives, and to take refuge among the woods and mountains of that province, where they are reported to have passed seven years (Greg. Naz. Or. xx. p. 319) [MACRINA]. His father, whose name was also Basil, was an advocate and teacher of rhetoric whose learning and eloquence had brought him a very large practice. He was also celebrated for his Christian virtues. Gregory Nazianzen speaks of this elder Basil in terms of the highest commendation as one who was regarded by the whole of Pontus as "the common instructor of virtue" (Orat. xx. p. 324). His mother's name was Emmelia [EMMELIA]. Basil and Emmelia had ten children, five of each sex, of whom a daughter, Macrina, was the eldest, and a son named Peter, whose birth was almost contemporaneous with his father's death, the youngest. Basil was the eldest of the sons, two of whom besides himself, Gregory Nyssen and Peter, attained the episcopate. One son died in infancy. Naucratius, the second son, died a layman when about 27 years of age [NAUCRATIUS]. Four of the daughters were well and honourably married. Macrina the eldest embraced a life of devotion, and exercised a very powerful influence over Basil and the other members of her family [MACRINA, No. 2]. Basil had a paternal uncle named Gregory, who took his father's place after his decease, and was present with other bishops of Cappadocia at his nephew's ordination. Basil was indebted for the care of his earliest years and the formation of his opening mind to his grandmother Macrina, who brought him up at her country house, not far from Neocaesareia in the province of Pontus (Bas. Ep. 210, § 1). The rule on which Macrina sought to form her grandson's religious character was the teaching of Gregory Thaumaturgus which she had received from those who had been his auditors. On leaving infancy the boy Basil passed to the hands of his father, probably at Neocaesareia, who was his instructor not only in rhetoric and secular learning, but also in religion and the virtues of a Christian life. The date of Basil's baptism is uncertain, but it hardly admits a doubt that, according to the prevalent custom, his admission into the church was deferred until he reached man's estate, and did not take place until he formally renounced the world after his return from Athens. For the completion of his education, Basil was sent by his father first to his native city of Caesareia, where he soon gained great reputation not only with his tutors and fellow pupils, but also among the people of the city, for the brilliancy of his talents and his virtuous life (Greg. Naz. Or. xx. p. 325). From Caesareia he passed to Constantinople where, if the correspondence between Libanius and Basil is genuine, which has been questioned by Garnier on insufficient grounds, he studied under that famous sophist. The letters of Libanius shew that there was a close intimacy between them, and express a high degree of admiration of Basil's eloquence and his life of gravity and self-restraint in the midst of the temptations of such a city as Constantinople (Bas. Ep. 335-359; Liban. Vita, p. 15). According to Socrates and Sozomen (Soer. iv. 26; Soz. vi. 17) the scene of the intercourse between Libanius and Basil was Antioch. But there is no reason to believe that

Basil ever studied there, and these writers evidently confounded him with his namesake. Basil of Antioch, Chrysostom's early associate. On leaving Constantinople Basil proceeded to Athens, where he prosecuted his studies from the year 351 to 356, chiefly under the guidance of Himerius and Prohaeresius. He had as his, 10, low-student and inseparable companion Gregory Nazianzen, whom he had known previously at Caesareia, who had entered the university at Athens a short time before. Gregory's reputation for the eminent qualities and high attainments which his old friend, strengthened by the influence he had already gained over his fellow-students, secured Basil from the boisterous reception of rough practical jokes which were the lot of the freshmen. The acquaintance between the two young men speedily ripened into an almost friendship which subsisted with hardly a interruption through the greater part of those lives. The painful estrangement that followed Gregory's forced consecration to the episcopate, Sasima will be narrated in its proper place. The feeling was more enthusiastic on the part of Gregory, who looked on his friend with the most absorbing admiration, but it was returned with no degree of coldness by Basil. The most complete union subsisted between them. They occupied the same chamber and ate at the same table. They studied the same books, attended the same lectures, and stimulated each other in the pursuit of the highest Christian philosophy. In the midst of the distractions and excitements, the shows and the games of Athens, they lived a life of sobriety and self-restraint, seldom leaving their lodgings except for the schools or for church. Gregory's favourite oration on his friend (Greg. Naz. Or. xx. 32) and his poem de Vita Sui (tom. ii. p. 4) supply many other interesting details of his joint college career, presenting a curious picture of university-life in the 4th century. It afforded Basil the opportunity of familiar intercourse with a fellow-student whose name Epiphanius destined to become unhappily famous, the nephew of the emperor Constantius, Julian. The future emperor conceived a warm attachment for the young Cappadocian, with whom—as a latter reminds him when the relations between them had so sadly changed—he not only studied the best models of literature, but also carefully read the sacred Scriptures (Ep. 40, 41; Greg. Naz. Orat. iv. adv. Julian, p. 121 sq.). Basil remained at Athens till the middle or end of the year 355, when with extreme reluctance he quitted the scene of his studies, tearing himself from the fellow-students and friends who to their expostulations, entreaties, and tears endeavoured to retain him. His friend Gregory, who fesses his own inferior strength of mind—yielding to the urgency of his companions, allowed Basil to depart alone (Orat. xx. p. 3). Basil's first object in quitting Athens was to profit by the instructions of a philosopher named Eustathius, a native of Cappadocia, who had adhered to the old pagan faith, probably his same spoken of with high commendation by Eunapius (de Vit. Sophist. c. iii. iv.) who had hoped to find at Caesareia. He proceeded through Constantinople without halting, and reached his native city, but was disappointed in meeting Eustathius (Ep. 1). By this time was dead. His mother Emmelia was living at the village of Annesi, Ἀννησοί, near Caesarea. Basil's Athenian reputation had led him, and he was received with much honour by the people of Caesarea, who, when he was invited to settle there as a teacher of rhetoric, in the tumid language of his panegyrist, have regarded him as "a kind of second teacher and protector of their city" (Greg. Naz. Or. p. 334). He practised the profession of a rhetorician with great celebrity for a considerable period (Rufin. ii. 9), and, according to a letter of Macrina, assigned to this period, was not unwilling to undertake the troublesome charge of the education of boys (Basil, Ep. 358). So great was Basil's reputation that the people of Neohadria sent a deputation of the leading persons of the city to entreat him to remove thither and to undertake the education of their youth. Basil consented. But on a subsequent visit to his native city the citizens endeavoured to overcome his resistance, and used all measures short of actual violence to detain him (Ep. 210, § 2). Gregory has repudiated the idea of either Basil or himself—for by this time he had joined his friends—having been in any degree influenced by ambition or love of human praise, asserting that they only yielded for a while to the importunities of their fellow-citizens and sacrificed themselves to the world, and the stage, σμικρὰ τῷ κόσμῳ καὶ τῇ σκηνῇ χαρισάμενοι (Greg. Naz. Or. xx. p. 34). But Basil's excellent sister Macrina had him less indulgently and more truly. Her brother, Gregory Nyssen, reports that she found on his return from Athens inordinately inflated, puffed up with the pride of philosophy and science, and looking down with contempt on his superiors in dignity and rank (Greg. Nyss. S. Maecr. p. 181). At this time also, we gather from an amusing letter of the same Gregory, Basil had adopted something of the airs and habits of a fine gentleman, and without being stained with the vices of the city was not altogether insensible to its pleasures (Greg. Naz. Ep. 6). It was a period of some years to the young and ardent rhetorician, the object of universal admiration. Macrina proved a good genius. Her warnings and counsels were effectual to guard him from the seductions of the world, and eventually to induce him to abandon it altogether and devote himself to the religious life (Greg. Nyss. u. s.). Basil's letter to Eustathius of Sebaste describes himself at this period as one awakened out of deep sleep, and in the marvellous light of truth discerning the folly of that wisdom which this world in the study of which nearly all his youth had vanished. His first care was to purify his life corrupted by long intercourse with evil. He sought eagerly for some one to take him by the hand and lead him into the doctrines of godliness. Finding in the Gospels that none tended so much toward perfection as to sell all that he had and free himself from worldly cares, and feeling himself too weak to stand in such an enterprise, he desired earnestly to persuade some brother who might give him his aid (Greg. Naz. Ep. 223). No sooner did his determination become known than he was beset by the remonstrances of his friends entreating him, some to continue the profession of rhetoric, some to become an advocate. But his choice was made, and his resolution was inflexible. His resolution in favour of a Christian life called forth the admiration of his old instructor Libanius (Bas. Ep. 336). Basil's baptism may be placed at this epoch. He was probably baptized by Dianius bishop of Caesarea, by whom not long afterwards he was admitted to the order of reader (De Sp. Sancto, c. xxix. 71). Basil's determination in favour of a life of devotion would be strengthened by the death of his next brother, Naucratius, who had embraced the life of a solitary, and about this period was drowned while engaged in works of mercy (Greg. Nyss. de Vit. S. Maecr. p. 182). About the year 357, when he was still under thirty, Basil left Caesarea to pursue his search after the most celebrated ascetics, who might exhibit a model of the life he had resolved to embrace. For this purpose he visited Alexandria and Upper Egypt, Palestine, Coele Syria, and Mesopotamia. He records his admiration of the abstinence and endurance of the ascetics whom he met with in these countries, their mastery over hunger and sleep, their indifference to cold and nakedness, as well as his desire to imitate them (Ep. 223, § 2). His feeble health and frequent sicknesses interrupted his journeys, and prevented his pursuing Eustathius, whom he was still anxious to meet, to his place of retirement (Ep. 1). The year 358 saw Basil again at Caesarea resolved on the immediate carrying out of his purpose of retiring from the world. He and his friend Gregory had already resolved to abandon the world together, and Basil having fixed on Pontus as his place of retirement wrote to his friend to remind him of his engagement. But Gregory had a father and mother both advanced in years, and filial duty forbade his leaving them (Greg. Naz. Or. xx. p. 334). His eager desire for the companionship of his early associate led Basil to propose to exchange Pontus for the district called Tiberina, in which Gregory's home, Arianus, was situated. But he found the place on trial cold and damp, and intolerably muddy, "the very pit of the whole earth" (Ep. 14), and he quitted it in disgust, and returning to his original destination, selected for his retreat a spot near Neocaesarea, close to the village of Annesi where his father's estates lay, and where he had passed his childhood under the care of his grandmother Macrina. To Annesi his mother Emmelia and his sister Macrina had retired after the death of the elder Basil, and were living a semi-monastic life. Basil's future home was only divided from Annesi by the river Iris, by which and the gorges of the mountain torrents a tract of level ground was completely insulated. A wooded mountain rose behind. There was only one approach to it, and of that he was master. The natural beauties of the spot, with its ravines, precipices, dashing torrents, and waterfalls, the purity of the air and coolness of the breezes, the abundance of flowers and multitude of singing-birds ravished him, and he declared it to be more beautiful than Calypso's island (Ep. 14). His glowing description of its charms at length tempted Gregory to visit him. But he did not find the place so much to his taste, and in a bantering epistle addressed to Basil after his return, he reproached him with the wretchedness both of the lodging and the fare, and the severity of the toil he had compelled him to share. "But for Basil's lady-mother he would have been starved to death" (Greg. Naz. Ep. 7, 8). A more serious letter written to soothe Basil's somewhat wounded feelings shews that he sojourned some considerable time with his friend and studied the Scriptures with him (Ep. 9), together with the Commentaries of Origen and other early expositors. At this time they also compiled their collection of the 'Beauties of Origen,' or 'Philocalia' (Socr. iv. 26; Soz. vi. 17; Greg. Naz. Ep. 87). In this secluded spot Basil passed five years, an epoch of no small importance in the history of the church, inasmuch as it saw the origin under Basil's influence of the monastic system in the coenobitic form. Eustathius of Sebaste had already introduced monachism into Asia Minor, but monastic communities were a novelty in the Christian world, and of these Basil is justly considered the founder. To his calm and practical mind the coenobitic life appeared much more conducive to the exercise of Christian graces than that of the solitary. "God," he said, "has made us, like the members of our body, to need one another's help. For what discipline of humility, of pity, or of patience can there be if there be no one to whom these duties are to be practised? Whose feet wilt thou wash—whom wilt thou serve—how canst thou be last of all—if thou art alone?" (Basil. Reg. Resp. vii.). His rule, like that of St. Benedict in later times, united active industry with regular devotional exercises, and by the labour of his monks over wide desert tracts, hopeless sterility gave place to golden harvests and abundant vintages. Not the day only but the night also was divided into definite portions, the intervals being filled with prayers, hymns, and alternate psalmody. The day began and closed with a psalm of confession. The food of his monks was limited to one meal a-day of bread, water, and herbs, and he allowed of sleep only till midnight, when all rose for prayer (Ep. 2, 207). On his retirement to Pontus Basil devoted all his worldly possessions to the service of the poor, retaining them, however, in his own hands, and by degrees divesting himself of them as occasion required. His life was one of the most rigid asceticism. He had but one outer and one inner garment; he slept in a hair shirt, his bed was the ground; he took little sleep, no bath; the sun was his fire, his food bread and water, his drink the running stream (Greg. Naz. Or. xx. p. 358; Greg. Nyss. de Basil. p. 490). The severe bodily austerities he practised emaciated his frame and ruined his already feeble health, sowing the seeds of the maladies to which in later years he was a martyr. His friend describes him as "without a wife, without property, without flesh, and almost without blood" (Greg. Naz. Or. xix. p. 311). Basil's reputation for sanctity collected large numbers about him. Monasteries sprang up on every side. He repeatedly made missionary journeys through Pontus, and the result of his preaching was the establishment of many coenobitic industrial communities, and the erection of monasteries for both sexes, by which the whole face of the province was changed, while the purity of the orthodox faith was restored by his preaching (Rufin. ix. 9; Soz. vi. 17; Greg. Nyss. de Basil. p. 488). Throughout Pontus and Cappadocia Basil was the means of the erection of numerous hospitals for the poor, houses of refuge for virgins, orphanages, and other homes of beneficence. His monasteries had as their inmates children he had taken charge of, married persons who had mutually agreed to live asunder, slaves with the consent of their masters, and solitaries convinced of the danger of living alone (Basil, Regulae, 10, 12, 15).

After two years spent in these labours Basil was summoned from his solitude in 359 to accompany Basil of Ancyra and Eustathius of Sebaste, who had been delegated by the council of Seleuceia to communicate the conclusions of that assembly to Constantius at Constantinople. Basil seems from his youth and natural timidity to have avoided taking any part in the discussions of the council that followed, 360, in which the Anomoeans were condemned, the more orthodox Semiarians deposed, and the Acacians triumphed. But when Constantius endeavoured to force those present to sign the creed of Ariminum, Basil left the city and returned to Cappadocia (Greg. Nyss. in Eunom. p. 310, 312; Philost. iv. 12). Not long after his return George of Laodicea arrived at Caesareia as an emissary of Constantius, bringing with him that creed for signature. To his intense grief the bishop, Dianius, a gentle undecided man, whose creed always inclined to that of the strongest, and who valued peace above orthodoxy, but for whom Basil felt great respect and affection, was persuaded to sign the heretical document Basil felt it impossible any longer to hold communion with his bishop, and fled to Nazianzus to find consolation in the society of his dear friend Gregory (Ep. 8, 51). He denied with indignation the report that he had anathematized his bishop, and when two years afterwards (362) Dianius was stricken for death and entreated Basil to return and comfort his last hours, he at once acceded to his request, and the aged bishop died in his arms, protesting with his last breath that he had never intentionally departed from the faith as declared at Nicaea, and had signed the creed of Ariminum in the simplicity of his heart (Ep. 51). [DIANIUS.]

The choice of Dianius' successor gave rise to violent dissensions at Caesareia. The clergy were divided into parties, each urging the claims of a favourite candidate. At last the populace, wearied with the indecision, took the initiative, and chose Eusebius, a man of high position and eminent piety, but as yet unbaptized. In spite of his reluctance, they forcibly conveyed him to the church where the provincial bishops were assembled, and compelled the unwilling prelates first to baptize and then to consecrate him. The subsequent desire of the provincial bishops to annul the election on the ground of violence was overruled by the elder Gregory of Nazianzus, and Eusebius occupied the episcopal seat of Caesareia for eight years (Greg. Naz. Or. xix. 308, 309).

Shortly before the death of Dianius Julian had ascended the throne (Dec. 11th, 361). It was the desire of the new emperor to surround himself with the friends and associates of his early days (Greg. Naz. Or. iv. 120). Among the first whom he invited was his fellow-student at Athens, Basil. Basil at first held out hopes of accepting his old friend's invitation. Julian was delighted at his readiness, and placed the public conveyances at his disposal, begging him to come as soon as he could and stay as long as possible, but giving him full liberty to leave whenever he might be so inclined (Julianus Basilio, Basil. Ep. 39). Basil delayed his journey, and Julian's declared apostasy from the Christian faith soon gave him sufficient cause to relinquish it altogether. Julian concealed for a time his indignation at the non-fulfilment of his promise, which however stung him to the quick, as an implied censure from one whom he knew to be worthy of all respect. The following year afforded Julian an opportunity of displaying his irritation. On his progress through Asia Minor to Antioch he received the intelligence that the people of Caesareia, so far from apostatizing with him, and building new temples as he had desired, had pulled down the only one still standing, that of Fortune (Greg. Naz. Or. iii. 91; xix. 309; Socr. v. 4). His indignation at this contempt of his authority knew no bounds. He expunged Caesareia from the catalogue of cities, made it take its old name of Mazaca, imposed heavy payments, compelled the clergy to serve in the police force, and put to death two young men of high rank, named Eupsychius and Damas, who had taken part in the demolition of the temple. Before reaching Caesareia he despatched a minatory letter to Basil demanding a thousand pounds of gold, for the expenses of his Persian expedition, and threatening in default of payment, to rase the city to the ground. The letter ends with the familiar paranomasia, also (according to Sozomen, H. E. v. 18) addressed by him to Apollinaris, who had remonstrated with him on the folly of idolatry, ἀνέγγων ἔγγων κατ-ἔγγων (Bas. Ep. 40). Basil's dauntless reply reminds the apostate emperor of the time when they two studied the Holy Scriptures together, and nothing escaped him. But now Demons had raised him to so proud a height that he exalted himself against God and the church, the nurse and mother of all. He upbraids him with the folly of demanding so vast a sum from him, the poorest of the poor, who had not enough to purchase himself a meal; and concludes by retorting his play upon words on himself—ὃ μέντοι ἀνέγγων οὐκ ἔγγων, εἰ γὰρ ἔγγων οὐκ ἂν κατ-ἔγγων (Bas. Ep. 41). The displeasure of Julian against Caesareia was still further exasperated by the election of Eusebius as bishop, a choice which had robbed the state of a valuable magistrate (Greg. Naz. Or. xix. 309). The principal responsibility for this election lay with Basil and Gregory. These therefore he reserved with the cruel kindness of the Cyclops (Hom. Odyss. i. 369, 370) to be the last to suffer on his triumphant return from his Persian campaign (Greg. Naz. Or. iv. 132). The death of the apostate (June 26th, 363) delivered Basil from this imminent peril and preserved him for future labours in defence of the orthodox faith and for the promotion of the unity of the church.

It has been remarked that Julian considered Basil to have been one of those chiefly responsible for the choice of Eusebius as bishop of Caesareia. Nor is it at all improbable that his belief was well grounded. Basil, keeping in the background, may have secretly directed the popular movement, hoping thereby to secure a triumph for the cause of orthodoxy, and promising himself to have in the new bishop, suddenly raised from the ranks of the laity to an office of such great difficulty,

One of the first acts of Eusebius was to compel the reluctant Basil to be ordained priest. His friend Gregory had been ordained a little before, and his language seems to indicate that, as was by no means uncommon, both had been the victims of artifice, if not of violence (Greg. Naz. Ep. 11, p. 775). Eusebius was very naturally desirous to avail himself of the theological knowledge and intellectual powers of Basil to compensate for his own deficiencies. At first he employed him very largely. But when he found himself completely eclipsed he became jealous of his popularity and treated Basil with a marked coldness, amounting almost to insolence, which awoke a feeling of hostility to himself in the majority of the Christians of Caesareia, of whom Basil was the idol. A rupture was the consequence. We are ignorant of its immediate cause, but probably both parties were more or less to blame. If Eusebius's personal dignity was wounded by Basil's too evident superiority, Basil himself fretted under the official priority of his intellectual inferior, and yielded unwilling submission to his claims to obedience (cf. Bas. in Essaim, i. 57). A schism was imminent, which Basil might have easily precipitated. It happened that at this time some western bishops, Eusebius of Vercelli being probably among them, were at Caesareia. They warmly espoused Basil's cause. A word from him was only wanted, and they would have ordained him bishop, a step which would have been received with enthusiasm not only by the populace, but by the chief inhabitants of the city. But Basil had strength of mind to resist the temptation. He refused to strengthen the hands of the heretical party by creating divisions among the orthodox, and retired with his friend Gregory to Pontus, where he devoted himself to the care of the monasteries he had founded (Greg. Naz. Or. xx. p. 336, 337; Soz. vi. 15).

Basil had passed about three years in his Pontic seclusion when, in 365, the blind zeal of the emperor Valens for the spread of Arianism brought him back to Caesareia. As soon as it was known that Valens was approaching that city, the popular voice demanded the recall of Basil as the only bulwark against the attack on the true faith and its adherents meditated by the emperor. Eusebius sought to make a compromise by inviting Gregory to his side. But Gregory, true to his friendship, refused to come so long as Basil was rejected. He acted the part of a wise mediator. Soothing the irritation of Eusebius, softening Basil's offended feelings, leading each to regard the conduct of the other in a more friendly light, he finally brought about a complete reconciliation (Greg. Naz. Ep. 19, 20, 169; Or. xx. p. 339). Nothing could surpass the Christian temper and wisdom manifested by Basil on his return to Caesareia. He treated Eusebius with the honour due to his position and his age, and by his deferential conduct dissipated the unworthy suspicions he had entertained. He was always at his side as his counsellor and sympathizing friend. He proved himself, in the words of Gregory, the staff of his age, the support of his faith; at home the most faithful of his friends; abroad the most efficient of his ministers (ib. 340). The consequence was that while the one had the name, the other had the reality of power, and while all was being really done by him, with happy adroitness he persuaded his superior that he was doing all himself (Greg. Naz. Or. xx. 340).

The first designs of Valens against Caesareia were interrupted by the news of the revolt of Procopius (Amm. Marc. 26, 27). He left Asia to quell the insurrection which threatened his throne. Basil availed himself of the breathing-time thus granted in organizing the resistance of the orthodox against the Eunomians or Anomœans who were actively propagating their pernicious doctrines through Asia Minor; supporting the weakness of some, awakening the consciences of others, healing divisions, and uniting the Cappadocians in loyal devotion to the truth. The year 368 afforded Basil occasion of displaying his large and universal charity. The whole of Cappadocia was desolated by drought and famine, the visitation pressing specially on Caesareia on account of the largeness of its population and its distance from any seaport. The poor were the chief sufferers, and Basil devoted his whole energies to their maintenance. Some rich merchants having sought to turn the famine to their own profit by buying up all the remaining corn, Basil employed all his powers to bring them to a better mind, never ceasing from his expostulations until he had led them to open their stores to the famishing multitude. Setting an example himself, he sold the property he had inherited at the recent death of his mother, and devoted the sum thus realised to feeding the poor. Not content with this, he raised a large subscription in the city with which he purchased stores of provisions, the distribution of which he regulated himself. None were refused. He gave his own personal ministrations to the wretched, feeding them with his own hand and washing their feet, and while he fed their bodies he was careful to nourish their souls also with the bread of life (Greg. Naz. Or. xx. 340-342; Greg. Nyss. in Eunom. i. 306).

Eusebius died towards the middle of the year 370, breathing his last in the arms of Basil (Greg. Naz. Or. xix. 310; xx. 342). Basil persuaded himself, and not altogether unwarrantably, that the cause of orthodoxy in Asia Minor was involved in his becoming his successor. His election must be ensured at all risks. Unable to assert his claims personally, he at once sent for his friend Gregory, by whose influence and exertions he hoped his election would be put beyond doubt. But fearing lest Gregory, if apprised of the real nature of the business for which his services were required, would decline to undertake a task of so much delicacy, Basil employed artifice to cloke his design. He happened to be suffering from one of the attacks of illness to which he was subject, and he wrote to his friend begging him to come and see him before he died, and receive his last commands. The affectionate heart of Gregory allowed no delay. He started instantly, before the news of Eusebius's death had reached him. But halfway to Caesareia the sight of the bishops hastening to that city for the election of a new prelate disclosed the deceit that had been put upon him. With very natural indignation, instead of pursuing his journey, he wrote a letter of earnest remonstrance to Basil, but not only refusing to come to Caesareia himself, but urging him, if he wished to avoid unfriendly suspicions, to leave the city until the election was over. Such affairs were not managed by men of piety, but by men of power and popularity: nor could it be fitting that Gregory should be prominent in a business in which Basil was unwilling to appear. When all was over he would visit his old friend, and upbraid him as he deserved (Greg. Naz. Ep. 21). Basil, disappointed of the assistance he had confidently anticipated from the younger Gregory, now betook himself to his father, the aged bishop of Nazianzus of the same name. The momentous importance of the juncture was more evident to the elder man. Orthodoxy was at stake in Basil's election. "The Holy Spirit must triumph" (Greg. Naz. Or. xx. 342). No exertion therefore was spared by him; no means of influence left untried. Using his son as his scribe, he dictated a letter to the clergy, monks, magistrates, and people of Caesareia, calling on them earnestly to lay aside all party feeling and choose Basil as bishop, and followed this up by another to the electing prelates, exhorting them not to allow Basil's weakness of health to counterbalance his marked pre-eminence in spiritual gifts and in learning (Greg. Naz. Ep. 22, 23). He felt himself too old to venture on so long a journey, while he clearly saw that the delicate temperament of his son was unsuited for the guidance of a factious constituency and a successful resistance to cabals and intrigues. No orthodox prelate had at that time a deservedly greater influence than Eusebius of Samosata. Gregory wrote to him and persuaded him to visit Caesareia and undertake the direction of this difficult business (Bas. Ep. 47). On his arrival, Eusebius found the city divided into two opposite factions. All the best of the people, together with the clergy and the monks, warmly advocated Basil's election, which was as vigorously opposed by other classes. The bishops were jealous of his superior powers: the rich were uneasy at his uncompromising preaching of charity: the authorities looked with alarm on a prelate of his resolute will, and dreaded the displeasure of Valens. The influence and tact of Eusebius overcame all obstacles. The people warmly espoused Basil's cause; the bishops were compelled to give way, and the triumph of the orthodox cause was consummated by the arrival of the venerable Gregory, who on learning that one vote was wanting for the canonical election of Basil, while his son was still hesitating full of scruples, and refused to quit Nazianzus, left his bed for a litter, and had himself carried to Caesareia at the risk of expiring on the way, and with his own hands consecrated the newly elected prelate, and placed him on his episcopal throne (Greg. Naz. Ep. 29, p. 793, Or. xix. 311, xx. 343). Basil's election filled the orthodox everywhere with joy. Athanasius, the veteran champion of the faith, congratulated Cappadocia on possessing a bishop whom every province might envy (Athan. ad Pallad. p. 953, ad Joann. et Ant. p. 951). At Constantinople it was received with far different feelings. Valens regarded it as a serious check to his designs for the triumph of Arianism. Basil was not an opponent to be despised. He must be either forced to bend to the emperor's will, or be got rid of.

As bishop of Caesareia Basil's power extended far beyond the limits of the city itself. He was metropolitan of Cappadocia, and exarch of Pontus. In the latter capacity his authority, more or less defined, extended over more than half Asia Minor, and embraced as many as eleven provinces. Antyrea, Neocaesareia, Tyana, among other metropolitan sees, acknowledged him as their ecclesiastical superior.

Basil's first disappointment in his episcopate arose from his inability to induce his dear friend Gregory to join him as his coadjutor in the government of his province and exarchate. He wrote to Basil expressing his exceeding delight at his election, but excusing himself from coming to him both on Basil's account, lest he should seem to be collecting his partisans about him with indecency and heat, and for his own peace and reputation. He feared that he should excite jealousy, and only increase his friend's difficulties (Greg. Naz. Ep. 24, Or. xx. 344). When at last he yielded to Basil's importunities, he sedulously kept himself in the background, and declined all the public attentions and marks of dignity which Basil was anxious to confer on him. He refused all that Basil offered, and made Basil approve his refusal (Greg. Naz. Or. xx. 344). His sensitive and retiring disposition unfitted him for life in a large city, and Eusebius's affection for Basil and the sense of the services he might render him in his difficult charge, were insufficient to retain him long at Caesareia, and he returned to Nazianzus.

Difficulties soon thickened round the new exarch. The bishops who had opposed his election, and who had manifested their ill-feeling by refusing to take any part in his consecration, now exchanged their open hostility for secret opposition. While professing outward union, they withheld their support in everything. They treated Basil with marked slight and shewed a complete want of sympathy in all his plans (Ep. 98). He complains to Eusebius of Samosata that they refused to help him, and were of no real use to him in anything. It was impossible to please them. They were angry if he neglected to invite them to the commemoration of the martyrs, and if he did invite them they would not come. On one occasion the report of his death having got abroad, they hastened to Caesareia to choose a successor. But finding him alive, they had to receive from him a sharp admonition. They manifested extreme contrition and lavished promises of amendment; but no sooner had they got back to their dioceses than they resumed their former opposition (Bas. Ep. 48, 141, 282). This disloyal behaviour filled Basil with despondency, and was the cause of repeated attacks of illness. It is true he overcame all his opponents in a few years by firmness and kindness, but their secret opposition and half-hearted support greatly increased the difficulties of the commencement of his episcopate. The alienation of his uncle Gregory, whom he had reason to regard with affection and respect as a second parent, who had superintended the completion of his education after the death of his father, was extremely painful to him. The aged bishop for some unknown cause took offence and joined the party of opposition. Basil's brother, the simple-minded but unadroit Gregory Nyssen, tried to put an end to the estrangement, but only made matters worse. With an almost inconceivable want of judgment he wrote forged letters to Basil in his uncle's name. Basil acted on them, and when they were repudiated by the aged bishop the estrangement was deepened. Each heartily desired reconciliation, but neither would take the first step. The uncle refused to humble himself to his nephew: the metropolitan to his suffragan. Basil, on discovering the deception that had been practised, wrote with just indignation to his brother upbraiding him with his unbrotherly conduct. He does not refuse to visit his uncle, but he declines to come until he has been properly invited (Bas. Ep. 58). At last the love of peace and a sense of the scandal of a quarrel between such near relations prevailed with Basil, and he wrote a letter breathing affection and duty to his uncle. The old Gregory had only waited for this. He at once sent back his other nephew with a pacific reply. Basil answered thanking him for his forgiveness, and leaving all arrangements as to the time and place of the interview to him (Bas. Ep. 59, 60). The misunderstanding was thus happily healed and peace restored.

Basil had been bishop little more than twelve months, when he was brought into open collision with the emperor Valens, who was traversing Asia Minor with the fixed resolve of exterminating the orthodox faith and establishing Arianism. No part of Basil's history is better known, and in none do we more clearly discern the strength and weakness of his character. While every unprejudiced reader will repudiate Gibbon's offensive verdict, that Basil's assertion of "the truth of his opinions and the dignity of his rank" was due to "inflexible pride," rather than to an uncompromising zeal for the truth as declared by the Nicene Fathers, a calm review of the circumstances may lead him to accept the judgment of a later historian. "The memorable interview with St. Basil," writes Dean Milman, "as it is related by the Catholic party, displays, if the weakness, certainly the patience and toleration of the sovereign—if the uncompromising firmness of the prelate, some of that leaven of pride with which he is taunted by St. Jerome" (Milman, Hist. of Christianity, iii. 45).^a Four years before, A.D. 367, the designs of Valens against the Catholics of Caesareia had been interrupted by the revolt of Procopius. But he had never relinquished them, and he was now approaching with the determination of reducing to submission one whom he knew to be the chief champion of orthodoxy in the East. The progress of Valens hitherto had been one of uniform victory. The Catholics had everywhere fallen before him. Bithynia had resisted and had become the scene of horrible tragedies. The fickle

^a The passage of St. Jerome referred to by Milman is quoted from the Chronicle, A.D. 350. It is not found in Scalliger's edition, but was exhumed by Isaac Vossius who, to quote Gibbon's words, "found it in some old M.S. which had not been reformed by the monks." The Benedictine editor allows the genuineness of the passage, but asserts that the words refer not to Basil but to Photinus. Jerome, however, was no friend to Basil, who had incurred his displeasure by espousing the cause of Meletius against that of Paulinus, the favourite with the Western church, and by want of deferential behaviour towards pope Damasus. The passage as given by Gibbon from Vossius runs thus: "Basilius Caesariensis Episcopus Cappadociae clarus habetur . . . qui multa continentiae et ingenii bona uno superbiae malo perdidit."

Galatia had yielded without a struggle. The fate of Cappadocia depended on Basil. His house, as the emperor drew near, was besieged by ladies of rank, high personages of state, even by bishops, who entreated him to bow before the storm and appease the emperor by a temporary submission. Their expostulations were rejected with indignant disdain. A band of Arian bishops headed by Euippius, an aged bishop of Galatia and an old friend of Basil's, preceded Valens' arrival with the hope of overawing their opponents by their numbers and unanimity. Basil took the initiative, and with prompt decision separated himself from their communion (Bas. Epist. 68, 128, 244, 251). These prelates were followed by the members of the emperor's household, who indulged in the most violent menaces against the archbishop. One of the most insolent of these was the eunuch Demosthenes, the superintendent of the kitchen. Basil met his threats with quiet irony, bidding him go back to his kitchen fire. The archbishop was next confronted by Modestus, the prefect of the Prætorium, commissioned by the emperor to offer Basil the choice between deposition or communion with the Arians. This violent and unscrupulous imperial favourite accosted Basil with the grossest insolence. He refused him the title of bishop: he threatened confiscation, exile, tortures, death. But such menaces, Basil replied, were powerless on one whose sole wealth was a ragged cloak and a few books, to whom the whole earth was a home, or rather a place of pilgrimage, whose feeble body could endure no tortures beyond the first stroke, and to whom death would be a mercy, as it would the sooner transport him to the God to Whom he lived. Modestus expressed his astonishment at hearing such unusual language (Greg. Naz. Orat. xx. 351; Soz. vi. 16). "That is," replied Basil, "because you have never before fallen in with a true bishop." Modestus finding his menaces useless changed his tone. He counselled prudence. Basil should avoid irritating the emperor, and submit to his requirements, as all the other prelates of Asia had done. If he would only yield he promised him the friendship of Valens, and whatever favours he might desire for his friends. Why should he sacrifice all his power for the sake of a few doctrines? (Theodoret, iv. 19.) But flattery had as little power as threats over Basil's iron will. The prefect was at his wit's end. Valens was expected on the morrow. Modestus was unwilling to meet the emperor with a report of failure. The former interview had been a private one. The aspect of a court of justice with its official state and band of ministers prepared to execute its sentence, might inspire awe. But judicial terrors were equally futile (Greg. Nyss. in Eunom. p. 315). Modestus, utterly foiled, had to announce to his master that all his attempts to obtain submission had been fruitless. "Violence would be the only course to adopt with one over whom threats and blandishments were equally powerless" (Greg. Naz. Orat. xx. p. 350). Such Christian intrepidity was not without effect on the feeble impressionable mind of Valens. He refused to sanction any harsh measures against the archbishop, and moderated his demands to the admission of Arians to Basil's communion. But here too Basil was equally inflexible. To bring matters to a decided issue, the emperor presented himself among the worshippers, in the chief church of Caesarea on the Feast of the Epiphany, A.D. 372. The service had commenced when he arrived, and he found the church flooded with "a sea" of worshippers whose chanted psalms pealed forth like thunder, uninterrupted by the entrance of the emperor and his train. Basil was at the altar celebrating the eucharistic sacrifice, standing, according to the primitive custom, behind the altar with his face to the assembled people, supported on either hand by the semicircle of his attendant clergy. "The unearthly majesty of the scene," the rapt devotion of the archbishop, erect like a column before the holy table, the reverent order of the immense throng, "more like that of angels than of men," overpowered the weak and excitable Valens, and he almost fainted away. When the time came for making his offering, and the ministers were hesitating whether they should receive an oblation from the hand of a heretic, his limbs failed him, and but for the aid of one of the clergy he would have fallen. Basil, it would seem, pitying his enemy's weakness, came forward himself and accepted the gift from his trembling hand (Greg. Naz. Orat. xx. p. 351). The next day Valens again visited the church, and listened with reverence to Basil's preaching, and made his offerings, which were not now rejected. The sermon over, Basil graciously admitted the emperor within the sacred veil, and discoursed with him at considerable length on the orthodox faith. He was rudely interrupted by the cook Demosthenes, who was in attendance on the emperor. Demosthenes was guilty of a gross solecism. Basil smiled and said, "We have, it seems, a Demosthenes who cannot speak Greek; he had better attend to his sauces than meddle with theology." The retort amused the emperor, who retired so well pleased with his theological opponent, that he made him a grant of lands for the poorhouse Basil was erecting (Theod. iv. 19; Greg. Naz. Orat. xx. 351; Basil. Epist. 94). The vacillating mind of Valens was always influenced by the latest and most imperious advisers, and when Basil remained firm in his refusal to admit them to his communion, the Arians about the emperor had little difficulty in persuading him that he was compromising the faith by permitting Basil to remain, and that his banishment was necessary for the peace of the East and the maintenance of the faith. The emperor yielded to their importunity, and ordered Basil to leave the city. Basil at once made his simple preparations for departure, ordering one of his attendants to take his tablets and follow him. He was to start at night to avoid the risk of popular disturbance. The chariot was at his door, and his friends, Gregory among them, were bewailing so great a calamity, when his journey was arrested by the sudden and alarming illness of Galates, the only son of Valens and Domitica. The empress attributed her child's danger to the divine displeasure at the treatment of Basil. The emperor in abject alarm sent the chief military officials of the court, Terentius and Arinthæus, who were known to be his friends, to entreat Basil to come and pray over the sick child. Galates was as yet unbaptized. On receiving a promise that the child should receive that sacrament at the hands of a Catholic bishop and be instructed in the orthodox faith, Basil consented. He prayed over the boy, and the malady was alleviated. On his retiring the Arians again got round the feeble prince, reminded him of a promise he had made to Eudoxius, by whom he himself had been baptized, and the child received baptism from the hands of an Arian prelate. He grew immediately worse, and died the same night (Greg. Naz. Orat. xx. 352, 364; Theod. iv. 19; Socr. iv. 26; Soz. iv. 16; Eph. Syr. opud Coteler. Monum. Eccl. Graec. iii. 63; Rufin. xi. 9). Once more the unwearied enemies of Basil returned to the attack, and with the usual result. Valens always yielded to pressure. Again Basil's exile was determined on, but the pens with which Valens was preparing to sign the decree refused to write, and split in his agitated hand, and the supposed miracle arrested the execution of the sentence. Valens left Caesarea, and Basil remained master of the situation (Theod. iv. 19; Ephr. Syr. u. s. p. 65). Before long his old enemy Modestus, attacked by a severe malady, presented himself as a suppliant to Basil, and attributing his cure to the intercessions of the saint, became his fast friend. So great was Basil's influence with the prefect that persons came from a distance to secure his intercession with him. We have as many as six letters addressed by Basil to Modestus in favour of different individuals (Basil. Epist. 104, 110, 111, 279, 280, 281; Greg. Naz. Orat. xx. pp. 352, 353). Another striking evidence of Basil's power is recorded by his friend Gregory. A rich widow, whose hand had been vainly demanded in marriage by the judge's assessor, took refuge from his violence in Basil's cathedral. The vicar of Pontus demanded the fugitive, and ordered a domiciliary visit of the archbishop's residence. Failing to discover the lady he commanded Basil to be brought before him, and menaced him with tortures and a horrible death. On his threatening to tear out his liver, Basil calmly replied that he should be very much obliged to him to do so, since where it was it gave him a great deal of trouble. The news of Basil's danger spread through the city. The populace rushed to the prefect's court to rescue their beloved bishop. So violent was the commotion that Basil had to calm the mob and rescue the vicar by his intercessions from the consequences of his own rash insolence (Greg. Naz. Orat. xx. pp. 353, 354; Greg. Nyss. de Bas. p. 435).

The issue of these unsuccessful assaults was to place Basil in a position of inviolability, and to leave him at leisure for the internal administration of his diocese and exarchate, where there was much that needed his firm and unflinching hand. In the course of his visitation many irregularities were discovered which he sternly repressed. The chorepiscopi were in the habit of admitting men to the lower orders of the ministry who had no intention of proceeding to the priesthood, or even to the diaconate, merely to purchase immunity from military service (Epist. 54). Too many of his suffragans were guilty of simony in receiving a fee for ordination (Ib. 55). Men were raised to the episcopate from motives of personal interest, and to gratify private friends (Ib. 290). The perilous custom for unmarried priests to have females (συνείσασκται, subintroductae) residing with them as "spiritual sisters" called for animadversion (Ib. 55). A fanatic deacon, named Glycerius, who had collected a band of professed virgins, whom he forcibly carried off by night, and wandered the country dancing and singing to the scandal of the faithful, caused him much trouble (Ib. 169, 170, 171). To heal the fountain-head, he made himself as far as possible master of episcopal elections, and steadily refused to admit any but those whom he deemed worthy of the office. So high was the reputation of his clergy that other bishops sent to him for presbyters who might be their coadjutors and become their successors (Ib. 81). Marriage with a deceased wife's sister he denounced as prohibited both by the laws of scripture and of nature (Ib. 160). Feeble as his health was, Basil's activity was unceasing. He was to be found in every part of his exarchate, and maintained a constant intercourse by letter with confidential friends who kept him informed of all that passed, and were ready to carry out the instructions they received. He pushed his episcopal activity to the very frontiers of Armenia. In 372 he made an expedition by the express command of Valens, obtained by the urgency of his fast friend the count Terentius, to strengthen the episcopate in that country by the appointment of new bishops and the infusion of fresh life into those already in office (Ib. 99). He was very diligent in preaching, not only at Caesarea and other cities, but in the country villages. The details of public worship occupied his attention. Even while a presbyter he arranged forms of prayer (εὐχῶν διατάξεις), probably a liturgy, for the church of Caesarea (Greg. Naz. Or. xx. p. 340). He established nocturnal services, in which the psalms were chanted by alternate choirs, which, as a novelty, gave great offence to the clergy of Neocaesarea (Ep. 207). These incessant labours were carried out by one who, naturally of a weak constitution, had so enfeebled himself by austerities that, "when called well, he was weaker than persons who are given over" (Ep. 136). His chief malady, a disease of the liver, caused him repeated and protracted sufferings, which often hindered him from travelling when most needful, the least motion bringing on a relapse (Ib. 202). The severity of the winter often kept him a prisoner not only to his house but even to his room (Ib. 27). A letter from Eusebius of Samosata arrived when he had been fifty days ill of a fever. "He was eager to fly straight to Syria, but he was unequal to turning in his bed. He hoped for relief from the hot springs" (Ib. 138). He speaks of himself as having received "sickness upon sickness, so that his shell must certainly fail unless God's mercy extricate him from evils beyond man's cure" (Ib. 136). At forty-five he calls himself an old man. The next year he had lost all his teeth. Three years before his death all remaining hope of life had left him (Ib. 198). He died prematurely aged at the age of fifty. Seldom did a spirit of so indomitable activity reside in so feeble a frame, and, triumphing over its weakness, make it the instrument of such vigorous work for Christ and His church.

The year 372 saw Basil plunged into a harassing dispute with Anthimus, bishop of Tyana, touching ecclesiastical jurisdiction, which led to the chief personal sorrow of his life, the estrangement of the friend of his youth, Gregory of Nazianzus. The circumstances were these. Towards the close of the year 371 Valens determined on the division of Cappadocia into two provinces. Podandus, a miserable little town at the foot of Mount Taurus, was named at first as the chief city of the new province, to which a portion of the executive was to be removed. The inhabitants of Caesareia, who would thus lose much of their gains, and be subjected to double civil burdens, were stunned with the blow. They entreated Basil to go to Constantinople himself, and petition the authorities to rescind the edict. The weakness of his health prevented Basil from acceding to their desire, and he wrote letters to Sophronius, a native of Caesareia, who held a high official position about the court, and a man of influence named Aburgius, begging them to employ all their power to alter the emperor's decision. They could not, however, prevent the division of the province. All they could obtain was the substitution of Tyana for Podandus (Bas. Ep. 74, 75, 76).

This was only the commencement of Basil's troubles. Anthimus, bishop of Tyana, insisted that the ecclesiastical division should follow the civil, and claimed the rights of a metropolitan over several of Basil's suffragans. Basil appealed to ancient usage in vain. The new metropolitan called a council of the bishops who having opposed Basil's election continued secretly his enemies, and were not indisposed to exalt his rival. Anthimus strengthened his faction partly by flattery, partly by intimidation, and partly by the removal of those who opposed his wishes. Basil's authority was at a blow reduced to a nullity in one-half of his province (Greg. Naz. Or. xx. p. 355, Ep. 31, 33; Bas. Ep. 259). In his difficulty Basil at once summoned his friend Gregory. He replied that he would come to his assistance, though Basil wanted him no more than the sea wanted water. He warned Basil at the same time that his difficulties were increased by the suspicions created by his intimacy with Eustathius of Sebaste and his friends, whose reputation for orthodoxy was not undeservingly low (Greg. Naz. Ep. 25). On Gregory's arrival the two friends started together for the monastery of St. Orestes on Mount Taurus, in the second Cappadocia, the property of the see of Caesareia, to collect the produce of the estate. This roused Anthimus's indignation, and notwithstanding his advanced age, he occupied the defile through which the train of mules had to pass with his armed retainers, and a serious affray took place, in which Gregory fought bravely in his friend's defence (Greg. Naz. Or. xx. 356, Ep. 31, Carm. i. 8). To strengthen himself against his rival, Basil determined to erect several new bishoprics as defensive outposts. One of the new sees chosen was Sasima, a miserable little posting station, and seat of a frontier custom-house at the junction of three great roads not far from the source of the disputed revenues, St. Orestes; hot, dry, and dusty, vociferous with the brawls of muleteers, travellers, and excisemen. No place could have been more distasteful to one of Gregory's delicate temperament; but here Basil, with disregard to his friend's sensitive nature, determined to place him. Gregory's weaker character bowed to the iron will of Basil, and he was most reluctantly consecrated bishop of Sasima. Basil's object, however, was not gained. Anthimus appointed a rival bishop, and Gregory took the earliest opportunity of escaping from a position into which he had been thrust by the despotic will of a friend from whom he had expected far other treatment, and which he could only maintain at the risk of continual contest and even bloodshed [GREGORY NAZIANZEN, ANTHIMUS]. A peace was ultimately patched up between the contending bishops, apparently through the intercession of Gregory, assisted by the mediation of Eusebius of Samosata, and the senate of Tyana. Anthimus was recognized as metropolitan of the new province, each province preserving its own revenues (Bas. Ep. 97, 98, 122). Basil's conduct at this juncture Gregory could never forgive or forget. He attributed it to a high sense of duty, and admired and revered him even more than before. But the wound inflicted on their mutual attachment was never healed, and even after Basil's death he reproaches him with his unfaithfulness to the laws of friendship, and laments the perfidy of which he had been the victim. "This lamentable occurrence took place seven years before Basil's death. He had before and after it many trials, many sorrows; but this probably was the greatest of all."^b

The Ptochotropheion, or hospital for the reception and relief of the poor, which Basil had erected in the suburbs of Caesareia, afforded his untiring enemies a pretext for denouncing him to Helias, the new president of the province. This establishment, which was so extensive as to go by the name of the "New Town," ἡ καινὴ πόλις (Greg. Naz. Or. xx. p. 359), and subsequently the "Basileiad" after its founder (Soz. vi. 34) included a church, a palace for the bishop, and residences for his clergy and their attendant ministers; hospices for the poor, sick, and wayfarers; and workshops for the artisans and labourers whose services were needed, in which the inmates also might learn and practise various trades. There was a special department for lepers, with arrangements for their proper medical treatment, and on these loathsome objects Basil lavished his chief personal ministrations. By such an enormous establishment Basil, it was hinted, was aiming at undue power and infringing on the rights of the civil authorities. But Basil adroitly parried the blow by reminding the governor that apartments were provided in the building for him and his attendants, and suggesting that the glory of so magnificent an architectural work would redound to him^c (Bas. Ep. 84).

Far more harassing and more lasting troubles arose to Basil from the double dealing of Eustathius, the unprincipled and time-serving bishop of Sebaste. Referring the reader to his own article for further particulars [EUSTATHIUS OF SEBASTE], it will be enough here to state that the heretical antecedents and connexions of Eustathius, who had been a pupil of Arius at Alexandria, and had been ordained at Antioch by the Arians, failed to close the large heart of Basil against him. The austerity of his life, his seeming holiness, his strict adherence to truth, his zeal against more developed Arianism, gave him a high place in Basil's esteem, which after-intercourse warmed into real friendship. Eustathius visited Basil at his monastery on the Iris, where, as well as during the journeys they took together to visit various religious communities, he acquired an intimate knowledge of Basil's mind and character, which he afterwards employed against him. Eustathius was one of those who are always found on the side of those in authority. A semi-Arian under Constantius, he professed Arian doctrine under Valens. Basil was slow to believe evil of one to whom he was so much attached, and maintained his intimacy with him notwithstanding the suspicions it caused of his own heterodoxy, and the hindrances created in the effective management of his diocese. He attributed his heterodoxy to over-subtlety or want of clearness of mind, not to unsoundness of belief—sought to detach him from his old Arian connections, and to confirm him in the true faith.

Basil's intercourse with Eustathius was productive of many mortifications and disappointments in his episcopal work. Towards the middle of June 372, the venerable Theodotus, bishop of Nicopolis, a metropolitan of Lesser Armenia, a prelate of high character and unblemished orthodoxy, deservedly respected by Basil, had invited him to a festival at Phargamon near his episcopal see. Meletius of Antioch, then in exile in Armenia, was also to be there. Sebaste was almost on the road between Caesareia and Nicopolis, and Basil, aware of the suspicion entertained by Theodotus of the orthodoxy of Eustathius, determined to stop there on his way, and demand a definite statement of his faith. Many hours were spent in fruitless discussion until, at three in the afternoon of the second day, a substantial agreement appeared to have been attained. To remove all doubt of his orthodoxy, Basil requested Theodotus to draw up a formulary of faith for Eustathius to sign. To his mortification not only was his request refused, but Theodotus plainly intimated to Basil that he had no wish that he should visit him at Nicopolis. Basil had already felt hurt at the want of due formality in the invitation, and the absence of the usual escort. While hesitating whether he should still pursue his journey, he received letters from his friend Eusebius of Samosata stating his inability to come and join him. This at once decided Basil. Without Eusebius' help he felt himself unequal to face the controversies his presence at Nicopolis would evoke, and he returned home full of despondency at the ill-fortune which for his sins rendered his labours for the peace of the church unavailing (Epist. 98, 99). A few months later the sensitive orthodoxy of Theodotus prepared another mortification for Basil. In carrying out the commands of Valens, mentioned above, to supply Armenia with bishops, the counsel and assistance of Theodotus as metropolitan was essential. As a first step towards cordial co-operation, Basil sought a conference with Theodotus at Getasa, the estate of Meletius of Antioch, in whose presence he made him acquainted with what had passed between him and Eustathius at Sebaste, and his acceptance of the orthodox faith. But Theodotus could tell him of the effrontery with which Eustathius had denied that he had come to any agreement with Basil. To bring the matter to an issue, Basil again proposed that a confession of faith should be prepared on his signing which his future communion with Eustathius would depend. This apparently satisfied Theodotus, who invited Basil to visit him and inspect his church, and promised to accompany him on his journey into Armenia. But on Basil's arrival at Nicopolis he spurned him with horror (ἐββέλυστο) as an excommunicated person, and refused to join him at either morning or evening prayer. Thus deserted by one on whose co-operation he relied, Basil had little heart to prosecute his mission, but he continued his journey to Satala, where he consecrated a bishop, established discipline, and promoted peace among the prelates of the province. Basil well knew how to distinguish between the busy detractors who rejoiced to find a pretext for their malevolence in his intercourse with Eustathius, and one like Theodotus animated with a true zeal for the orthodox faith. Generously overlooking his former rudenesses, he reopened communications with him the following year, and visiting Nicopolis employed his assistance in once more drawing up an elaborate confession of faith embodying the Nicene creed, for Eustathius to sign (Bas. Ep. 125). Eustathius did so in the most formal manner in the presence of witnesses whose names are appended to the document. But no sooner had this slippery theologian satisfied the requirements of Basil than he threw off the mask, broke his promise to appear at a synodical meeting called by Basil to seal the union between them and their respective adherents, and openly assailed him with the most unscrupulous invectives (Ep. 130, 244). He went so far as to hold assemblies in which Basil was charged with heterodox views, especially on the Divinity of the Holy Spirit, and with haughty and overbearing behaviour towards his chorepiscopi and other suffragans. At last Eustathius pushed matters so far as to publish a letter written by Basil 25 years before to the heresiarch Apollinaris. It was true that at that time both were laymen, and that it was merely a friendly letter not dealing with theological points, and that Apollinaris had not then developed his heretical views and stood high in the esteem of Athanasius. But its circulation served Eustathius's ends in strengthening the suspicion already existing against Basil as a favourer of false doctrine, by proving that he had not scrupled to hold communion with an acknowledged heretic. The letter as published by Eustathius had been disgracefully garbled, and was indignantly repudiated by Basil. By a most shameful artifice some heretical expressions of Apollinaris, without the author's name, had been appended to Eustathius's own letter accompanying that attributed to Basil, leading to the supposition that they were Basil's own. Basil was overwhelmed with distress at being represented in such false colours to the church, while the ingratitude and treachery of his former friend stung him deeply. He restrained himself, however, from any public expression of his feelings, maintaining a dignified silence for three years (Bas. Ep. 128, 130, 224, 225, 226, 244). During this period of intense trial Basil was much comforted in 374 by the appointment of his youthful friend Amphilocheus to the see of Iconium [ΑΜΦΙΛΟΧΗΣ]. But the same year brought a severe blow in the banishment of his intimate and confidential counsellor

Eusebius of Samosata. At the end of this period (375) Basil, impelled by the calumnies heaped upon him on every side, broke a silence which he considered no longer safe, as tending to compromise the interests of truth, and published a long letter nominally addressed to Eustathius, but really a document intended for all the faithful, in which he briefly reviews the history of his life, describes his former intimacy with Eustathius, and the causes which led to the rupture between them, and defends himself from the charges of impiety and blasphemy so industriously circulated (Bas. Ep. 223, 226, 244). It was time indeed that Basil should take some public steps to clear his reputation from the reckless accusations which were showered upon him. He was called a Sabellian, an Apollinarian, a Tritheist, a Macedonian, and his efforts in behalf of orthodoxy in the East were continually thwarted in every direction by the suspicion with which he was regarded. Athanasius, bishop of Ancyra, misled by the heretical writings that had been fathered upon him, spoke in the harshest terms of him (Ep. 25). The bishops of the district of Dazimon in Pontus, giving ear to Eustathius's calumnies, separated themselves from his communion, and suspended all intercourse; and were only brought back to their allegiance by a letter of Basil's, written at the instance of all the bishops of Cappadocia, characterized by the most touching humility and affectionateness (Ep. 203). The alienation of his relative Atarbius and the church of Neocaesareia of which he was bishop, was more difficult to redress. To be regarded with suspicion by the church of a place so dear to Basil, his residence in youth, and the home of many members of his family, especially his sainted grandmother, Marcrina, was peculiarly painful. But the tendency of the leading Neocaesareians was Sabellian, and the emphasis with which he was wont to assert the distinctness of the Three Persons was offensive to them. They took umbrage also at the favour he showed to monasticism, and the nocturnal services he had established. To heal these offences Basil wrote in terms of affectionate exhortation to the church of Neocaesareia, and took advantage of the existence of his brother Peter's monastic community at Annesi to pay the locality a visit. But as soon as he was known to be in the neighbourhood a strange panic seized the whole city; some fled, some hid themselves; Basil was everywhere denounced as a public enemy. Atarbius abruptly left the synod at Nicopolis which he was attending, on hearing of Basil's approach. [ATARBIUS.] Basil returned from his visit mortified and distressed (Ep. 126, 204, 207, 210). Among other charges Basil was widely accused of denying the proper divinity of the Holy Spirit. Gregory Nazianzen tells an amusing story of an old monk who at a feast at Nazianzus, while the rest of the company were lauding Basil to the skies, vehemently charged him with unsoundness on this point, inasmuch as at the recent festival of St. Euphrosimus he had passed very superficially over the Godhead of the Spirit while declaring that of the Father and Son most explicitly. Gregory warmly defended his friend's orthodoxy. But the company at table declared themselves against him, and mockingly applauded Basil's discreet silence (Greg. Naz. Ep. 26, 27; Bas.

Ep. 71). This charge which when made by some Cappadocian monks had been already sternly reproved by Athanasius (Athanas. ad Pall. ii. 763, 764) was revived at a later time on the plea that he had used a form of the doxology open to suspicion, "Glory be to the Father, through the Son, in the Holy Spirit"^d (De Sp. Sanct. c. 1, vol. iii. p. 3). Self-defence was again reluctantly forced on the victim of calumny. He prayed that he might be deserted by the Holy Ghost for ever if he did not adore Him as equal in substance and in honour (ἰσοῦσιον καὶ ἰσοτιμον) with the Father and the Son (Greg. Naz. Or. xx. 365). Similar charges made at the festival of St. Euphrosimus in the year 374 were the occasion of Amphilochius requesting him to declare his views on this subject, which led to his writing his treatise de Spiritu Sancto (§ 1; Ep. 231). Maligned, misrepresented, regarded with suspicion, thwarted, opposed on all hands, few champions of the faith have had a heavier burden to bear than Basil. The history of the Eastern church at this period is indeed little more than a history of his trials and sufferings.

Basil's was not a nature, however, to give way before difficulties the most tremendous and failures the most disheartening. The great object he had set before himself was the restoration of orthodoxy to the Eastern church, and the cementing of its disorganized fragments into one compact body capable of withstanding the attacks of hostile powers. And this object he had pursued with undaunted perseverance notwithstanding the constant interruptions caused by his feeble health, "which might rather be called the languor of a dying man." Cut to the heart by the miserable spectacle which surrounded him, the persecution of the orthodox, the triumphs of false doctrine, the decay of piety, the worldliness of the clergy, the desecration of the episcopate by ambition and covetousness, rival bishops rending asunder the venerable church of Antioch, Christians wasting in mutual strife the strength that should have been spent in combating the common foe, feeling himself utterly insufficient in his isolation to work the reformation he desired, Basil had looked round eagerly for effectual aid and sympathy. He naturally turned first to that "great and apostolic soul who from boyhood had been an athlete in the cause of religion," the great Athanasius (Ep. 69, 80, 83). In the year 371 he begged his assistance in healing the unhappy schism of Antioch by inducing the Western church to recognize Meletius, and persuading Paulinus to withdraw. He called on him to stir up the orthodox of the East by his letters, and cry aloud like Samuel for the churches (Ep. 66, 69). In his request about Antioch, Basil "was inviting Athanasius to what was in fact impossible even to the influence and talents of the primate of Egypt; for being committed to one side in the dispute he could not mediate between them. Nothing then came of the application" (J. H. Newman, Church of the Fathers, p. 105). Basil had other requests to urge on Athanasius. He was very desirous that a deputation of Western prelates should be sent to help him in combating the Eastern heretics and reuniting the orthodox, whose authority should overawe Valens and secure the recognition of their decrees. He asked also for the summoning of a council of all the West, which should confirm the decrees of Nicaea, and annul those of Ariminum (Ep. 66, 69).

^d Compare Hooker's remarks on this subject (Eccl. Polity, V. xlii. 12), "Till Arianism had made it a matter of great sharpness and subtlety of wit to be a sound believing Christian, men were not curious what syllables or particles of speech they used. Upon which when St. Basil began to practise the like indifferency, and to conclude public prayers, glorifying sometime the Father with the Son and the Holy Ghost, sometime the Father by the Son in the Spirit, whereas long custom had inured them to the former kind alone, by means whereof the latter was new and strange in their ears; this needless experiment brought afterwards upon him a necessary labour of excusing himself to his friends, and maintaining his own act against them, who because the light of his candle too much drowned theirs, were glad to lay hold on so colourable a matter, and exceedingly forward to traduce him as an author of suspicious innovation."

Basil next addressed himself to the Western churches. His first letter in 372 was written to Damasus, bishop of Rome, lamenting the heavy storm under which almost the whole Eastern church was labouring, and entreating of his tender compassion, as the one remedy of its evils, that either he, or persons like-minded with him, would personally visit the East with the view of bringing the churches of God to unity, or at least determining with whom the church of Rome should hold communion (Ep. 70). Basil's letters were conveyed to Athanasius and Damasus by Dorotheus, a deacon of Antioch, in communion with Meletius. He returned by way of Alexandria in company with a deacon named Sabinus (afterwards bishop of Piacenza) as bearer of the replies of the Western prelates. These replies were eminently unsatisfactory. They abounded with expressions of sympathy, but held out no definite prospect of practical help. Something, however, was hoped from the effect of Sabinus's report on his return to the West, as an eye-witness of the lamentable condition of the Eastern church. Sabinus was charged with several letters on his return to Italy. One bearing the signatures of thirty-two Eastern bishops, including besides Basil, Meletius of Antioch, Eusebius of Samosata, Gregory Nyssen, &c., was addressed to the bishops of Italy and Gaul; another was written in Basil's own name to the bishops of the West generally. There were also private letters to Valerian of Aquileia and others. These letters give a most distressing picture of the state of the East. "Men had learnt to be theorists instead of theologians. The true shepherds were driven away. Grievous wolves, spoiling the flock, were brought in instead. The houses of prayer were destitute of preachers, the deserts full of mourners. The faithful laity avoided the churches as schools of impiety. Priestly gravity had perished. There was no restraint on sin. Unbelievers laughed, the weak were unsettled. . . . Let them hasten to the succour of their brethren, nor allow the faith to be extinguished in the lands whence it first shone forth" (Ep. 93, 93). No help, however, came. A Western priest named Sanctissimus, who visited the East towards the end of 373—whether travelling as a private individual or deputed by Damasus is uncertain—again brought assurances of the warm attachment and sincere sympathy of the Italian church; but words, however kind, were ineffectual to heal their wounds, and Basil and his friends again sent a vehement remonstrance beseeching their Western brethren to make the emperor Valentinian acquainted with their wretched condition, and to depute some of their number to console them in their misery, and sustain the flagging faith of the orthodox (Ep. 242, 243). These letters transmitted by Dorotheus—probably a different person from the former—were not more effectual than those which had preceded them. The only point gained was that a council—confined, however, to the bishops of Illyria—was summoned in 375 through the instrumentality of Ambrose, by which the consubstantiality of the Three Persons of the Trinity was declared, and a priest named Elpidius despatched to publish the decrees in Asia and Phrygia. Elpidius was supported by the authority of the emperor Valentinian, who at the same time promulgated a rescript in his own name and that of his brother Valens, who dared not manifest his dissent, forbidding the persecution of the Catholics, and expressing his desire that their doctrines should be everywhere preached (Theodor. iv. 8, 9). But the death of Valentinian on November 17th of that same year frustrated his good intentions, and the persecution revived with greater vehemence.

The secret of the coldness with which the requests for assistance addressed by the Eastern church were received by the West, was partly the suspicion that was entertained of his orthodoxy in consequence of his friendship with Eustathius of Sebaste, and other doubtful characters, and the large-heartedness which led him to recognise a real oneness of belief under varying technical formulas, but principally the refusal of Basil to recognize the supremacy of the bishop of Rome. His letters were usually addressed to the bishops of the West, and not to the bishop of Rome individually. In all his dealings, Basil treats with Damasus as an equal, and asserts the independence of the East. In his eyes the Eastern and Western churches were two sisters with equal prerogatives; one more powerful than the other, and able to render the assistance she needed; but not in any way her superior. The want of deference in his language and behaviour offended not Damasus only, but Jerome and all who maintained the supremacy of Rome over all churches of Christendom. Jerome accused Basil of pride, and went so far as to assert that there were but three orthodox bishops in the East, Athanasius, Epiphanius, and Paulinus (ad Pammach. 38). The most impassioned appeals proving ineffectual, and no heed being paid to his warnings that heresy unchecked might spread and infect the West also, Basil's tone respecting Damasus and the Western prelates underwent a change. He began to suspect the real cause of the apathy with which his entreaties for aid had been received, and to feel that no relief could be hoped from their "Western superciliousness" (τῆς δουρικῆς ὀφρῦος), and that it was in vain to send emissaries to "one who was high and haughty and sat aloft and would not stoop to listen to the truth from men who stood below; since an elated mind, if courted, is sure to become only more contemptuous" (Ep. 215, 239). But while his hope of assistance from the West lessened, the need for it increased. The persecution of the orthodox by the Arians grew fiercer. "Polytheism had got possession. A greater and a lesser God were worshipped. All ecclesiastical power, all church ordinances were in Arian hands. Arians baptized; Arians visited the sick; Arians administered the sacred mysteries. Only one offence was severely punished, a strict observance of the traditions of the fathers. For that the pious were banished, and driven to deserts. No pity was shewn to the aged. Lamentations filled the city, the country, the roads, the deserts. The houses of prayer were closed; the altars forbidden. The orthodox met for worship in the deserts exposed to wind and rain and snow, or to the scorching sun" (Ep. 242, 243). In his dire extremity he determined once more to make trial of an appeal to the West. He now adopts the language of indignant expostulation. "Why," he asks, "has no writing of consolation come to us, no visitation of the brethren, no other of such attentions as are due to us from the law of love? This is the thirteenth year since the war with the heretics burst upon us. Will you not now at last stretch out a helping hand to the tottering Eastern church, and send some who will raise our minds to the rewards promised by Christ to those who suffer for Him?" (Ep. 242). These letters were despatched in 376. But still no help came. His reproaches were as ineffectual as his entreaties. A letter addressed to the Western bishops the next year (377) proves that matters had not really advanced a single step beyond the first day. We find him still entreating his Western brethren in the most moving terms to grant him the consolation of a visit. "The visitation of the sick is the greatest commandment. But if the Wise and Good Disposer of human affairs forbids that, let them at least write something that may comfort those who are so grievously cast down." He demands of them "an authoritative condemnation of the Arians, of his enemy Eustathius, of Apollinaris, and of Paulinus of Antioch. If they would only condescend to write and inform the Eastern churches who were to be admitted to communion and who not, all might yet be well" (Ep. 263). The reply brought back by the faithful Dorotheus overwhelmed him with sorrow. Not a finger was raised by the cold and haughty West to help her afflicted sister. Dorotheus had even heard Basil's beloved friends Meletius, and Eusebius of Samosata, spoken of by Damasus and Peter of Alexandria as heretics, and ranked among the Arians. What wonder if Dorotheus had waxed warm and used some intemperate language to the prelates? If he had done so, wrote Basil, let it not be reckoned against him, but put down to Basil's account and the untowardness of the times. The deep despondency which had seized Basil is evidenced by his touching words to Peter of Alexandria: "I seem for my sins to prosper in nothing, since the worthiest brethren are found deficient in gentleness and fitness for their office from not acting in accordance with my wishes" (Ep. 266).

Foiled in all his repeated demands; a deaf ear turned to his most earnest entreaties; the council he had begged for not summoned; the deputation he had repeatedly solicited unsent; Basil's span of life drew to its end amid blasted hopes, and apparently fruitless labours for the unity of the faith. It was not permitted him to live to see the Eastern churches, for the purity of whose faith he had devoted all his powers, restored to peace and unanimity. "He had to fare on as he best might—admiring, courting, but coldly treated by the Latin world, desiring the friendship of Rome, yet wounded by her superciliousness—suspected of heresy by Damasus, and accused by Jerome of pride."^e

Some gleams of brightness were granted to cheer the last days of this dauntless champion of the faith. The invasion of the Goths in 378 gave Valens weightier cares than the support of a tottering heresy, and brought his persecution of the orthodox to an end on the eve of his last campaign, in which he perished, after the fatal rout of Hadrianople (Aug. 9, 378). One of the first acts of the youthful Gratian was to recall the banished orthodox prelates, and Basil had the joy of witnessing the event so earnestly desired in perhaps his latest extant letter, the restoration of his beloved friend Eusebius of Samosata (Ep. 268). Basil died at Caesareia, an old man before his time, Jan. 1st, 379, in the fiftieth year of his age. Though so far from advanced in years, his constitution was worn out by labours and austerities, as well as by the frequent severe diseases from which he had suffered. He rallied before his death, and was enabled to ordain with his dying hand some of the most faithful of his disciples. "His death-bed was surrounded by crowds of the citizens, ready," writes his friend Gregory, "to give part of their own life to lengthen that of their bishop." He breathed his last with the words "into Thy hands I commend my spirit." His funeral was attended by enormous crowds, who thronged to touch the bier or the hem of his funeral garments, or even to catch a distant glimpse of his face. The press was so great that several persons were crushed to death; almost the object of envy because they died with Basil. Even Jews and Pagans joined in the general lamentations, and it was with some difficulty that the bearers preserved their sacred burden from being torn to pieces by those who were eager to secure a relic of the departed saint. He was buried in his father's sepulchre, "the chief priest being laid to the priests; the mighty voice to the preachers; the martyr to the martyrs" (Greg. Naz. Or. xx. 371, 372).

In person Basil is described as tall and thin, holding himself very erect. His complexion was dark; his face pale and emaciated with close study and austerities; his forehead projecting, with retiring temples. A quick eye, flashing from under finely arched eyebrows, gave light and animation to his countenance. His speech was slow and deliberate. His manner manifested a reserve and sedateness which some of his contemporaries attributed to pride, others to timidity. Gregory, defending him from the former charge, which seems to have been too commonly urged to be altogether groundless, says that he supposes "it was the self-possession of his character, and composure and polish which they called pride," and refers not very convincingly to his habit of embracing lepers as a proof of the absence of superciliousness (Or. xx. p. 360). Basil's pride, indeed, was not the empty arrogance of a weak mind; but a well-grounded confidence in his own powers. His reserve arose partly from natural shyness—jestingly charges himself with "the want of spirit and sluggishness of the Cappadocians"

(Ep. 48)—partly from an unwillingness to commit himself with those of whom he was not sure. It is curious to see the dauntless opponent of Modestus and Valens charged with timidity. The heretic Eunomius after his death accused him of being "a coward and a craven skulking from all severer labours," and spoke contemptuously of his "solitary cottage and close-shut doors, and his flustered look and manner when persons entered unexpectedly" (Greg. Nyssen, adv. Eunom. i. p. 318). Philostorgius also speaks of Basil as "from timidity of mind withdrawing from public discussions" (H. E. iv. 12). The fact seems to be that Basil was like many who, while showing intrepid courage when once forced into action, are naturally averse from publicity, and are only driven by a high sense of duty to leave the silence and retirement in which they delight. Basil was a great lover of natural beauty; his letters display abundant proofs of his delight in scenery. The playful turn of his mind is also shewn in many passages of his familiar letters, which sufficiently vindicate him from the charge of austerity of character. In manner he united Oriental gravity with the finished politeness of the Greeks, and was the charm of society from his happy union of sedateness and sweetness: his slightest smile was commendation, and silence was his only rebuke (Greg. Naz. Or. xx. 260, 261).

The voice of antiquity is unanimous in its praise of Basil's literary works. To adopt the words of Cave (Hist. Lit. i. 239) "plenae sunt omnium paginae, totus veneratur antiquitatis chorus, laudat tota eruditorum caeva." His former tutor, Libanius, acknowledged that he was surpassed by Basil, and generously rejoiced that it was so, as he was his friend (Bas. Ep. 338). Nor has the estimate of modern critics been less favourable. "The style of Basil," writes Dean Milman, "did no discredit to his Athenian education. In purity and perspicuity he surpasses most of the heathen as well as Christian writers of his age" (Hist. of Christianity, iii. 110).

The works of Basil which have come down to us may be classed under the heads of; (I.) Expository, (II.) Dogmatic, (III.) Moral, (IV.) Epistolary, (V.) Liturgical.

(I.) Expository.—Cassiodorus records that Basil wrote Commentaries on almost all the books of Holy Scripture. The greater part of these are lost. Those that remain are—

(1) Hexameron. Nine Homilies on the Six Days' Work of Creation as contained in the opening chapters of Genesis. This is the most celebrated of all his works. It is commended by Photius, and Suidas says it was the most admired of all his writings. These homilies were very early translated into Latin by Enstathius Afer (Cassiod. Div. Lect. c. i. p. 445). This translation is found in the Biblioth. Patrum, Paris, 1644, and the Paris edition of Basil, 1603. The names of other translators may be seen in Fabricius, Bibl. Graec. Two additional homilies, the 10th and 11th, on 'the Creation of Man,' have been claimed for Basil by Combefis, but are almost certainly spurious. They have been commonly attributed to his brother Gregory Nyssen, who we know from Socrates (H. E. iv. 26) finished the work which had been left incomplete by Basil. But they are probably by a later hand.

(2) Seventeen Homilies on the Psalms. These were sermons preached ad populum. The first, a prefatory homily on the psalms generally, was translated by Rufinus, and is also found prefixed to St. Augustine's Commentaries. The only homilies that have reached us are those on Ps. 7, 14 (two), 28 (two), 29, 32, 33, 37, 44, 45, 48, 59, 61, and 114 (two).

(3) Commentaries on the first Sixteen Chapters of Isaiah, a continuous work not divided into homilies. This work was rejected by Erasmus who thought it unworthy of Basil, and its genuineness has been called in question by others. But there is no reasonable doubt that it is rightly ascribed to him. Garnier brings forward evidence to prove that it was written in Cappadocia while Basil was still a presbyter.

(1.) Dogmatic.

(1) Five books against Eunomius. These are spoken of with commendation by Jerome (egregii libri), Gregory Nazianzen, and Photius (ἐξάιπετοι λόγοι). The two last books, which are wanting in some of the earliest MSS., containing a spicilegium, first, of texts alleged in their favour by Eunomius and his followers, and, secondly, of those by which they are refuted, have been groundlessly doubted by some, including Garnier.

(2) On the Holy Spirit, addressed to Amphilocheus and written at his request. The work is divided into thirty chapters, from which it is called the τριάκοντα κεφάλαια by Joann. Damascenus. Its authenticity was called in question by Erasmus, who translated it into Latin, but was satisfactorily established by Isaac Casaubon.

(3) On Baptism, two books. The first, treating of the qualifications for baptism and the duties of the baptized, and of preparation for the eucharist, is chiefly made up of quotations from the N. T. The second contains answers to various questions that had been put to Basil.

(4) Homilies. Eleven of the thirty-one Homilies on various Subjects are dogmatical, viz. Hom. 9, 12, 15, 16, 17, 25, 27, 29, 31.

III. Moral and Ascetic.

(1) Homilies. A large number of the thirty-one homilies just named treat of moral and practical subjects; against envy, drunkenness, anger, on fasting, &c. A very sensible admonition to a young man how to read the books of heathen writers with profit (Homil. 24), included among these homilies, has been frequently translated and separately published, among others by Abp. Potter, 1694. Several of the homilies are in honour of local martyrs, St. Julitta, St. Barlaam, St. Mammias, &c.

(2) On true Virginity, a treatise addressed to Letoius, bishop of Melitene, rejected by Garnier on internal evidence, but generally accepted.

(3) Ascetic Writings,[†] including—(a) Prefatory Discourse; (b) Discourse on the Renunciation of Worldly Goods; (c) On the Ascetical Life; (d) On Faith; (e) On the Judgment of God, a prologue to the Ethics; (f) Ethics or Morals, under eighty heads compiled from the [†] Sozomen informs us that in his day the ascetic writings commonly attributed to Basil were ascribed by some to his, at one time, friend and companion Eustathius of Sebaste.

N. T.; (g) On the Monastic Institutions, including λόγος ἀσκητικός, and ὑποτύπῳσις ἀσκήσεως; (h) The Greater Monastic Rules, ὅροι κατὰ πλάτος, fifty-five in number, with a proem; they are in the form of Basil's answers to the questions of his monks; (i) The Lesser Rules, ὅροι κατὰ ἐπιτομήν, 313 in number, in the same form of question and answer; (k) Animadversions on delinquent Monks and Nuns, a very early example of a Poenitentiale; (l) Monastic Constitutions, ἀσκητικαὶ διατάξεις, in thirty-four chapters.

To these may be added the following letters belonging to the same subject: (4) A Letter to Chilo, a disciple of Basil's, who was proposing to embrace the life of an anchorite; and A brief Admonition to younger Anchorets. (5) Two Letters to lapsed Monks, and one To a lapsed Virgin. (6) Three Canonical Letters to Amphilo-chius, containing eighty-five canons or constitutions, in the form of a Poenitentiale.

(IV.) Epistolary. In addition to those just mentioned we have a collection of no fewer than 365 letters addressed by Basil to his private and official correspondents, including two attributed to the emperor Julian and twelve to Libanius.

(V.) Liturgical. There is no reason to call in question the universal tradition of the East, that Basil was the composer of a Liturgy. Those offices, however, which have come down to us under his name have been so largely interpolated at many different periods, that it is impossible to ascertain the correct text of the liturgy as drawn up by him. There are three chief editions of the Liturgy bearing Basil's name, (1) the Greek or Constantinopolitan, (2) the Syriac, translated into Latin by Masius, (3) the Alexandrian, found in Coptic, Greek, and Arabic, which versions concur in establishing one text. Of these the Constantinopolitan furnishes the surest materials for ascertaining the genuine form.

Occupying the debateable land between the genuine and supposititious writings of Basil is a collection of twenty-four Moral Discourses, made up as a cento out of Basil's works by Simeon Metaphrastes towards the beginning of the 10th century.

Supposititious. Among the writings falsely attributed to Basil we may mention, (1) De Grammaticâ Exercitatione (really by Manuel Moschopulus, towards the end of the 14th century). (2) De Consolatione in Adversis (by Victor bishop of Cartenna in Mauritania). (3) De laudibus solitariae Vitae (a fragment of Peter Damian). (4) Admonitio ad Filium spiritualem. (5) Two Letters to Apollinaris, and one to the Emperor Theodosius. (6) Rationes syllogisticæ contra Arianos.

Editions.—Various tentative editions more or less imperfect appeared in Greek at Venice 1535, Basil. 1532; and in Latin, Basil. 1528, 1540, Antw. 1568, Paris 1571. The first complete edition in Greek and Latin, with the notes of Fronto Ducaeus, appeared at Paris in 1618, in two volumes, folio, and in 1638 in three volumes, folio, but not so well or so correctly printed. In 1678 Combefis published his Basiliius recen- situs at Paris, in two octavo volumes, with an amended text. The standard edition is the Benedictine, published at Paris, 1721-1730, by Julian Garnier, in three volumes, folio, reprinted by Migne, Patrolog. Græc. vol. 29-32.

BASILIIUS, the friend of CHRYSOSTOM, with whom he lived on terms of the closest and most affectionate intimacy. The friends were equal in age, in rank, in property, read the same books, and studied under the same masters, Diodorus, afterwards bishop of Tarsus, and Carterius. They simultaneously resolved on adopting an ascetic life. Basil was the first to put the purpose into execution, living in solitude and devotion in his paternal home. On Chrysostom following his example the two friends prepared to take a house and live together, but were prevented by the entreaties of Anthusa, Chrysostom's mother. The circumstances attending Basil's elevation to the episcopate, and the pious fraud by which his scruples were overcome, are narrated in the article CHRYSOSTOM. We do not know the name of his see, but as Chrysostom promised to give him his presence and counsel frequently, it could hardly have been far from Antioch. Baronius thinks it was Raphanea (Chrysost. de Sacerdot. i. 1-3, vi. 13).

[E. V.]

BASILIIUS OF CILICIA, a presbyter of the church of Antioch, and afterwards bishop of Irenopolis, in Cilicia; flourished c. 500. He was the author of an Ecclesiastical History in three books, from the year 450 to the close of the reign of Justin. According to Photius (Cod. 42) the style of this work was careless, and he swelled its bulk by the insertion of a large number of episcopal letters which wearied the reader without imparting much historical information. Basiliius also wrote against Joannes Scythopolitanus. An anonymous writer, whom Photius, Cod. 95, identifies with Basiliius, had published a book craftily entitled κατὰ Νεστορίου, Adversus Nestorium, with the view of leading the unwary to read it. Joannes Scythopolitanus replied to this. On which Basiliius in his own name wrote a most abusive rejoinder, full of bitter invective, charging him among other things with being a Manichaean, with restricting Lent to three weeks, and not abstaining from the flesh of birds even for that period, &c. This work was in sixteen books, the first thirteen in the form of a dialogue, the last three a continuous attack on Scythopolitanus, and his tenets. The object of the book according to Photius, Cod. 107, was to oppose the union of the two natures in Christ.

He may probably be identified with the writer mentioned by Suidas sub voc. who attacked Archelaus, bishop of Colonia in Armenia. (Photius, Cod. 42, 95, 107, Suidas s. v.; Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. i. p. 466.) [E. V.]

* The Penalties of delinquent Monks, in fifty heads, "incoerit authoris," found in some MSS. of Basil and printed in his works, are of later date.

BASILIU8, MARTYR, called also BASILEU8, bishop of Amasea in Pontus, cited by St. Athanasius (Orat. i. c. Arian.) as sound in the faith against Arianism, present at the Council of Ancyra in 314, and shortly afterwards at that of Neo-Caesarea, but not at that of Nice (as Niceph. viii. 14 affirms), inasmuch as he was martyred under Licinius, A.D. 319 (Euseb. in Chron., and see Euseb. H. E. x. 8). He was brought from Amasea to Nicomedia, according to some not, however, trustworthy Acts, in the first instance, because he had given refuge to one Glaphyra, an attendant of the empress, whose virtue Licinius sought to assail, and was finally martyred there, because he refused to sacrifice. His body was alleged to have been cast ashore at Sinope, carried thence to Amasea, and buried there near a church that he had built. See also Assemani, Actt. Martt. ii. 216. [A. W. H.]

BASILIU8, bishop of PARIUM in Mysia, on the Hellespont, and confessor. A hymn in the Menaee, assigned by Harless (ap. Fabric. Bibl. Graec.) to April 12, but by Le Quien to March 12, commemorates his sufferings for the faith. The language employed leads Le Quien to the conclusion that he suffered in the persecutions of the Monothelite, or Iconoclast Emperors (Le Quien, Oriens Christian. i. 788; Fabric. lib. v. c. 29). [E. V.]

BASILIU8, bishop of SELEUCIA, in Isauria, and metropolitan, succeeded Dexianus, who attended the council at Ephesus, and therefore after 431. He is erroneously identified by Photius with the early friend of Chrysostom, who must have been considerably his senior (Tillemont, xv. p. 340). He is very unfavourably known to us from the weakness and vacillation he displayed with regard to the condemnation of Eutyches. He took a leading part in the council held at Constantinople, in 448, at which Eutyches was condemned; and the next year when the fidelity of the acts of the council were called in question, was one of the commission appointed to verify them (Labbe, Concil. vol. iv. 182, 230). But at the "Robbers' Synod" held at Ephesus a few months later his courage gave way, and he acquiesced in the rehabilitation of Eutyches, and retracted his obnoxious language. Before long he returned to orthodoxy, and in 450 affixed his signature to the famous Tome of Pope Leo, on the Incarnation. At the council of Chalcedon, 451, the imperial commissioners proposed his deposition, together with the other prelates who had aided in restoring Eutyches. But he made his submission, concurred in the condemnation of Eutyches, and his offence was condoned (Labbe, Conc. iv. 553, 604, 787).

His extant works comprise 39 Homilies; 17 on the O. T., and 22 on the N. T., the titles and subjects of which are given by Fabricius, Bibl. Graec. lib. v. c. 19, 10. Four on John xi. which had been published as his, prove to be the work of St. Chrysostom. A Homily on the Transfiguration was added to the series in the edition of the Jesuit Dausqueius, in 1604. A prose work on The Life and Miracles of S. Thecla, has been attributed to him; but not only does the style differ, and savour of a later age; but we learn from Photius that Basilus wrote S. Thecla's life in verse. Another supposititious work is the Demonstratio contra Judaeos, which appears in the Heidelberg edition of 1596. Basil's Homilies shew much oratorical power and skill in the use of figurative language. But though he does not lose sight of perspicuity, he overburdens his style with metaphors till his readers are surfeited. He not unfrequently reminds us of Chrysostom, though greatly his inferior in real power.

The Homilies of Basilus were first published in Greek, by Commelin, Lugd. Bat. 1596, 8vo; and in Latin by Claud. Dausqueius, 1604, 8vo. They are found in the Bibl. Patr. Colon. v. and Lugd. Bat. viii. 1677. They were also printed at the end of the works of Gregory Thaumaturgus, Paris, 1672, fol. (Photius Cod. 168, Tillemont, Mem. Eccl. xv. 340, sq. et passim, Cave, Hist. Litt. 441). [E. V.]

BASILIU8, bishop of TIBERIAS, at the end of the eighth century. He was originally an inmate of the monastic college (σπουδαίον) of the Resurrection, at Jerusalem, of which he afterwards became abbot. Here he was intimate friend of the intruding patriarch of Jerusalem Theodore, who, while still a monk, took him as his companion on the visit paid by him to St. Stephen at the monastery of St. Saba, with the view of learning from him the future issue of his ambitious designs. Basilus afterwards visited St. Stephen on his own account, and received from him an assurance that he would attain the episcopal dignity, together with a warning of the difficulties of the office. He subsequently administered the affairs of the see of Jericho, and finally became bishop of Tiberias (Leontius, Vita S. Steph. apud Le Quien Or. Christ. iii. 306 sq., 665 sq., 708 sq.). [E. V.]

BASILIU8, bishop of TRAJANOPOLIS, in the province of Rhodope, in Thrace, and metropolitan. He took part in the "Robbers' Synod" at Ephesus in 449, when he gave his verdict in favour of the orthodoxy of Eutyches and against Flavian (Labbe, Concil. iv. 118, 265, 310). He was present in 451, at the council of Chalcedon, when he joined the noisy adversaries of Theodoret, and appears on the orthodox side consenting to the deposition of Dioscorus, and accepting the same of Leo (Ibid. 430, 486). He was one of the bishops to whom the Emperor Leo wrote in 458, requesting their opinions on the disordered state of ecclesiastical matters at Alexandria, after the murder of Proterius and the usurpation of Timothy Aelurus (Ibid. 889-891). [E. V.]

BASSIANUS, bishop of Laodae, and a saint of the Roman calendar. He was one of the bishops who condemned the Arian Palladius at the council of Aquileia (Acta Conc. Aqu. in Ambrose's Epp.), and is mentioned as a friend of Ambrose, in Ep. 4, and by Paulinus (Vit. Amb. § 47). [J. Ll. D.]

BASSIANUS, bishop of Ephesus, A.D. 444-448, finally deposed at the council of Chalcedon, 451. Bassianus was originally a presbyter of Ephesus, where, according to his own statement, he devoted himself to the service of the poor, for whose benefit he erected a hospital of seventy beds. The popularity he thus gained excited the jealousy of Memnon, then bishop of Ephesus, who having failed in his attempts to drive him from the city, forcibly ordained him bishop of

Evaza or Theodosiopolis in the province of Asia. Memnon spent nine hours, from 3 A.M. to noon, in endeavouring to overcome the resistance of Bassianus, whose "nolo episcopari" was so determined that the altar and the gospels were stained with the blood spilt in the struggle. The new bishop refused to recognise any tie to the see into which he had been thrust, and never once visited the place. The circumstances of his ordination becoming known to Basil, Memnon's successor, he declared the see vacant, and appointed a new bishop to it, and admitted Bassianus to communion. Basil's episcopate was short. On his death in 444 the clergy of Ephesus requested Olympus, bishop of Theodosiopolis, to come and assist in the ordination of a new prelate. He came and waited three days for the arrival of other bishops to take part in the consecration. None, however, appeared. On his representing that he was powerless to act alone and that he must return home, a tumult arose, he was hurried by a mob of armed men to the church, and compelled to give his aid to the enthronization of the popular candidate Bassianus. Irregular as his ordination had been, Bassianus visited Constantinople, and succeeded in obtaining its recognition by the emperor Theodosius II., by whom his election was formally confirmed, and through whose influence Proclus of Constantinople was induced to sanction the appointment which he had at first regarded with serious disapprobation. Bassianus enjoyed the episcopate undisturbed for four years. At the end of this period for some unexplained reasons—there are vague hints at his having neglected the poor—he had become so odious to his flock, that immediately after the Easter festival, those who had just been receiving the Eucharist at his hands rose against him, dragged him from the church, violently thrust him into prison, pillaging his goods and maltreating his adherents. After four months spent in prison the emperor Theodosius II., to whom he had appealed, sent Eustathius, the chief Silentiary, to investigate the matter. The case was laid before the chief bishops of the Christian world, Leo of Rome, Flavian of Constantinople, and Domnus of Antioch, who unanimously pronounced for his deposition on the ground of forcible intrusion. On the receipt of this sentence Bassianus was treated with the greatest indignity. His sacerdotal habit was violently torn from him, and a presbyter of Ephesus, named Stephen, was ordained bishop in his room, while he was still kept a prisoner. On the assembling of the council of Chalcedon in 451, Bassianus laid a formal complaint before the collected bishops, and demanded to be replaced in his see. On October 29th he appeared in person, attended by a faithful presbyter named Cassianus, who had undergone many hardships in his cause. The bishops gave both him and Stephen a calm hearing, and pronounced sentence for his restoration. The intervention of the imperial officers prevented this sentence taking effect. They declared the appointment of both the rivals invalid on the ground of illegal violence, and advised the election of a new bishop. After some diversity of opinion the council accepted this advice, and declared the see vacant. Both Bassianus and Stephen were allowed to retain episcopal rank, and a pension of two hundred gold pieces was granted them from the episcopal revenues. The whole proceedings are fully detailed in the Acts of the council of Chalcedon (actio undecima), where the "libellus" of Bassianus to Valentinian and Marcian may be found. (Labbe, Concil. iv. 684-705; Tillemont xv. 460-465, 690-692, 895; Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 442.) [E. V.]

BATH-ENOS. [BARTHENOS.]

BATRACHITAE. Philaster (11) mentions a sect who worshipped the frogs of the plague before the Exodus, thinking so to appease God's anger. Later writers added the name. Probably an obscure and misunderstood heathen superstition. [H.]

BAUDEMUNDUS, a monk of the monastery of Elnon (St. Amand) in Hainault, c. 680. He was a disciple of the sainted bishop of Maestricht, St. Amand (d. 679), and wrote his life, which is to be found in Surius, and also in Bollandus under Feb. 6, as well as in Mabillon, Saec. Benedict. ii. 709. (Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 597.) [E. V.]

BAYA, V.—Nov. 1 or 3. St. Baya, or Beya, or Vey, who is venerated at Dunbar in Lothian, is said to have inhabited the island of Little Cumbræ in the Clyde, where she lived in solitude, surrounded by beasts and birds, and where she received the visits of St. Maura. St. Beya died in her island, where a chapel—"capella satis decenter extracta"—was raised over her remains, and may be the one now in ruins, bearing her name (Old Stat. Acc. Scot. xi. 415; New Stat. Acc. Scot. Ayr, 272). King places her in the 9th century. The love of solitude that distinguished her in life is said to have been attested by miracle after death, for the rector of the church of Dunbar, attempting to carry off her relics, encountered so great a storm that he was obliged to desist. (Brev. Aberd. pars aestiv. f. cxlvi; Regist. S. Egid. 224; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 276-7.) [A. P. F.]

BEADUHEARD (1), an officer of Brihtric, king of Wessex, killed at Dorchester in 787 by the Danes (Ethelwerd, Chron. M. H. B. 509).

(2) Badoheard, a Kentish witness in 747 (Kemble, C. D. i. 115), and 764 (ib. 137, 140), in 774 (ib. 149). [S.]

BEADURN. [BADUVINI.]

BEAN, B. and C.—Oct. 26. Except that this saint was venerated at Wester Foulis and at Kinkell in Strathearn, Scotland, nothing is known of him; he is not to be identified with St. Beau of Mortlach, but he probably is St. Bean, the uncle of St. Cadroë, or St. Beon of Tamhlacht-Menan. [See BEOAN (2).] (Mart. Donegal, by Todd and Reeves, 337-9, n.; Reeves, Ecol. Ant. 113; Gordon, Monast. ii. 270; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 277, 293.) [A. P. F.]

BEATUS, presbyter and abbot in Spain, an opponent of the Adoptionism of Elipandus, archbishop of Toledo, in the 8th century. [ADoptionISTa.] [P. S.]

BECAN. There are several saints of this name.

(1) April 5. The son of Cula ("nomen matris ejus," Mart. Tull.) was of the race of Eoghán Mor, the son of Oilill Olum. He was a contemporary of St. Columba and Diarmaid, king of Erin and lived at Imlech-Fiaich, now Emlagh, a parish near Kells, co. Meath. He was so famous in his day, that some place him among the twelve Apostles of Ireland. (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 95.)
